After one clash with him, Rom-jii surmised that Al was utilizing an Authority outside of the norm.

He had managed to hold off Garfiel and Ezzo at the Pleiades Watchtower, fought bravely against Reinhard at the Augria Sand Dunes, albeit with the help of the Divine Dragon, and with just three people broke through the five-hundred man Felt Camp led by Rom-jii, and finally took Roy Alphard of Gluttony from the Royal Capital, even evading an unrestrained, enraged Emilia in the process.

That was, as for all the misdeeds and grave sins Al perpetrated, the dots finally began to connect as it all started coming together.

It was possible. —That Al, the same as Subaru, could wield Return by Death.

"Subaru": "Al's a guy from another world just like me. So there's a considerable chance he awakened to a similar pattern as me. I mean, in isekai stories that type of pattern's a given. Why didn't I think of this, I'm beyond stupid…!"

Petra: "Then, as expected, Al-san is the same as Subaru?"

"Subaru": "Yeah, there's a high chance of that. No, maybe it's a leap ability similar to mine, just a type that's more user-friendly; there's a possibility. That is to say, the real pleasure and fun often comes from seeing the differences between isekai powers and figuring out that they aren't exactly the same as one another."

Petra: "You're betting your life, so who cares about cliches or the real pleasure? The important thing is we've discovered one of Al-san's secrets, so what are we going to do about it?"

"Subaru": "Yeah, yes, that's exactly right… But I've unraveled a bunch of things. If that's really the case, then maybe he could sneak past Reinhard and set traps for him and stuff… Could he? Like actually? Is Return by Death enough to do something about Reinhard? Wouldn't you need to die like a hundred times?"

Now that Al was suspected to be the user of some other sort of time leap ability, "Subaru" held his head in frustration.

Honestly, Petra did not hold the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea as utterly high up in opinion as her surrounders did. Maybe it was because she had not met him in person, but if he truly was as strong as she had heard he was, then carrying out feats to match that did not seem astonishing.

Rather, the person that took on enemies stronger than themself, produced results that surpassed expectations, and the one who took on those who held power greater than theirs with all they could muster was Subaru; Petra thought he was very cool.

That was why Petra was very disheartened to see "Subaru" estimate himself below Reinhard, she wanted him to puff out his chest and say how cool he was. That said, if too many people became aware of Subaru's greatness, that could result in another potential problem.

Petra: "Well, with me, Emilia-neesama, and Rem-neesama, along with Beatrice-chan and Patrasche-chan, I think we've got a flawless lineup for now."

Even if someone were to realize Subaru's charm a bit late and tried to cut in, they had already formed an impregnable enclosure that simply could not be penetrated; that gave Petra confidence.

Presently, her concern was Subaru's overkindliness, and the possibility that he might have shown some bias to the other side, but even so, she trusted Emilia would remain in his number one spot. —Although, that was also the thing that gave Petra considerable worries.

In any case—

???: "If Rom-sama is sane and doesn't have tunnel vision, then this is troublesome indeed."

Rom: "I care a lot 'bout that lass's case, so yer understandin' helps. That's how Aldebaran managed ta break through even our encirclement. And Emilia bein' bested in the Royal Capital was also likely thanks ta that guy's Authority."

Emilia: "Umm, I apologize. I still don't really understand…"

As for Ram and Rom-jii, these particularly sharp two, they seemed ready to progress the conversation swiftly; Emilia put a stop to that. At Emilia's side, Rem cutely nodded,

Rem: "I feel the same as Emilia-sama. Turning back time, was it? Nee-sama, what does that mean…"

Ram: "That's right, Rom-sama didn't sufficiently explain matters to you, Rem, who have just woken up and aren't yourself yet. Take a look at this."

Rem: “That’s… a gold coin?”

Ram stepped forward softly, showing Emilia and Rem the gold coin placed in her hand.

The gold coin was engraved with the image of the famed Divine Dragon Volcanica, and gripping that coin tightly, after she had flaunted it to Emilia and the others, Ram flipped her hand, and let the gold coin fall.

Watching the arc it drew as it fell to the floor, Petra understood Ram’s intent. The gold coin hitting the floor would serve as a metaphor of the advantages of time leaping.

Emilia: “Watch out! Honestly, Ram, you can be such a clumsy scatterbrain.”

Rem: “Nee-sama is sometimes unexpectedly careless. That’s also part of her charm.”

But, before the gold coin hit the floor, Emilia, moving swiftly, picked it up. She returned the coin to Ram, as Rem said something somewhere in the midpoint between comforting and encouraging.

The expression on Ram’s face after she retrieved the gold coin was full of meaning.

“Subaru”: “Hey, wasn’t Ram trying to show that it falls if you didn’t know it would, but if you had known it was going to fall you could stop it?”

Petra: “Probably. But this works out, let’s leave the explaining to Ram-neesama. There’s no time to be all content chatting with Emilia-neesama and Ram-neesama.”

She felt a bit bad for leaving it to Ram, but while Emilia and Rem were still catching up, Petra shifted to the next issue—she racked her brain on how to really deal with Al.

She wanted a bit more details on whatever Al’s Authority was. If, just if, it turned out they could refute Subaru’s earlier speculation—

Meili: “—Petra-chan, are you okay~?”

Petra: “Meili-chan…”

While Ram and Rom-jii were focused on explaining things to Emilia and Rem, it was Meili who rather unexpectedly called out to Petra.

Meili, too, was on the meager side of understanding the concept of a time leap, but she prioritized Petra’s wellbeing rather than knowing Al’s Authority.

Reaching her hand out gently, she touched Petra’s cheek, and murmured “so warm”.

Meili: “We’ve been running in a rush around nonstop~ since leaving the Tower, so I haven’t brought it up yet, but I know you read a Book in the Tower, Petra-chan, okay~?”

Petra: “Yeah, that’s true. —I would appreciate it if you’d keep quiet about it to Emilia-neesama and the others.”

Meili: “…You’re keeping quiet because you don’t want to worry the others, right~?”

Petra: “Yes, of course.”

Petra firmly clasped Meili’s hand, that had been on her forehead, with both of her hands.

Just as Meili had said, Petra probably did have a bit of a fever. Although, rather than poor physical shape, she thought it was a fever from her brain overthinking.

As it was, she already had a lot on her mind, and now it felt like her little brain was now also in charge of dealing with “Subaru’s” thoughts and emotions as well.

Maybe it was because of how deeply she cared, but just reading the Book of the Dead of that sole person, of Subaru, had left her like this. Ezzo, who had read more than ten of them, had to be completely off the rails, and as for the one who had built the grand library, Flugel, who had probably designed and built it so that only such lunatics could handle it, he had to be completely out of his mind.

He was surely the type to assume if he could do it then anyone could, the kind of thinking that truly irritated Petra like nothing else for better or worse.

But at the same time, Petra also thought this.

If not for that great library, there were so many things she would have gone her whole life without ever knowing.

And among the things she had come to know, there were definitely things she wanted to know. So long as that flame within her heart continued to burn, Petra did not want to stop.

Even when all was said and done, her mind was still seething.

Petra: “And also, I’ve been thinking.”

Meili: “…Thinking… what about~?”

Petra: “If what Rom-jii said is right, and Al-san’s Authority is what I think it is, then…”

“Subaru”: “Petra?”

As Petra lowered her eyes and pressed a finger to her pale lips, Meili and “Subaru” leaned in toward her. The two of them could not see nor recognize each other, yet their puzzled reactions were so matching that Petra almost laughed at the comicality; then she spoke.

What she said was—

Petra: “—I think I might know Al-san’s weak point.”

3

Felt: “—So the one who put Reinhard’s mother to sleep, was Reinhard himself?”

Having hesitated to put that to words, something quite unusual for her, Felt thought bitterly of herself.

And that was not because it was a matter concerning Reinhard. No, in a sense, it was.

Since their initial meeting, Felt was constantly being thrown off balance by Reinhard, and regarding incidents involving him, there were many times where she could not pass judgment or make decisions typical of herself. That was influenced by him continuing to forcibly prevent the results of her decisions, and to take it a step further, was influenced by the fact that he had seen her with a teary face near the loot house at the very beginning.

But, likely the greatest factor, was that Reinhard had given up on many things.

That was what made Felt hesitate to fully accept Reinhard. Simultaneously, it was the reason why Reinhard would never entrust anything to Felt from the bottom of his heart.

There was a philosophy of the slums that resided within Felt, a wise saying that went “live strong”.

No matter where one was born, no matter who one was, the saying believed that a person’s spirit could survive no matter what might befall them. When taking that philosophy into consideration, Reinhard was not living strong.

Be it as a lion, as a Dragon, or as a human being, Reinhard was half-hearted.

But, if part of the reason for that was the truth that Felt had just come to realize—

Felt: “—Nah, if that’s so, it doesn’t add up.”

However, Felt immediately refuted the hypothesis she had just come up with.

With a certain conviction, Felt carefully examined the relationship between Reinhard and his slumbering mother—Louanna Astrea, but supposing that Reinhard was aware of the truth, his actions and conduct up to this point would not make coherent sense.

Of course, it was not impossible that Reinhard was concealing that truth from Felt, calmly covering up the fact that he was involved with the cause of his mother's inability to wake up.

Felt: "Not a chance. That klutz could never pull off something so shrewd."

Was there anybody else in the world besides Felt who could have described Reinhard like this?

Well, those who foisted their ideals and dreams upon the Sword Saint would surely harbor objections, but the garbage treatment of Reinhard within the Felt Camp had been relatively normalized.

The sisters Flam and Grassis had known him for a long time, and took advantage of their familiarity to embarrass Reinhard with their cute sarcasm, and the stray dogs divorced from notions of respect, Gaston, Rachins, and Camberley, incessantly bombarded Reinhard with a well-grounded stream of bad-mouthing.

Ezzo, who frequently interfered with the management of the Astrea Family's territories, was often greatly troubled, saying "How have they managed up until now…", and Rom-jii, who seemed to not harbor a favorable impression of the Sword Saint, never changed his blunt demeanor towards Reinhard since the beginning.

And of course, the one who lambasted and insulted Reinhard the most in the world, besmirching his title of the supposed ideal, greatest Knight, was none other than Felt.

The various words and actions from the Camp's individuals, Reinhard had taken it all.

And when taking it, what did he do? —He smiled.

In a truly joyful manner, he smiled.

In those moments alone, it was as if he had not given up on anything at all.

Felt: “Even if that fuckface hides his true feelings, that sorta smile can’t be faked.”

That was Felt’s conclusion, and unlike the people who placed their excessive hopes in Reinhard, it was an idea that could only be produced by someone who saw Reinhard in such a manner.

Hence, besides Felt, the only ones who could talk about Reinhard in this way were the members of her Camp, the Knights who were Reinhard’s close friends, and—

Felt: “I’m tempted to add the fact that he’s your kid to the reasons why I think he’s incapable of hiding things.”

Before Felt as she scratched her head, having been socked in his mug, Heinkel was down on one knee gripping the sword that had been tossed back to him with a face as pale as could be.

Pouring too much strength into his hand gripping the sword, the fingers and hand had turned white, trembling in a rattle.

The emotions behind that were neither anger, nor fear, nor sorrow, but they were clearly communicated to Felt by Heinkel’s quivering blue eyes regardless.

If those emotions were to be expressed in a single word, despair would likely be the most apt.

A truth that he could not afford for anyone to discover had been discovered; such was his unavoidable, inescapable despair. That deeply etched despair bound Heinkel in his entirety, and had driven him into a corner.

His figure was so exceedingly wretched that it gave Felt the illusion that Heinkel’s very life had been plucked away by despair.

But, in all likelihood, Heinkel would not die so easily. If his life was one capable of being stolen by a despair that swathed him entirely, it would have happened a long time ago.

Heinkel: “—Ah, kuh, uh, no, uh.”

Repeatedly opening and closing his mouth, Heinkel continued to mutter in a voice that formed no words.

Narrowing her red eyes at Heinkel's reaction, Felt contemplated the relationship between Reinhard and the man before her eyes as the starry sky looked down on them through the gap in the rocks.

—With her decision to take part in the Royal Selection, Felt had made Reinhard her Knight.

From Felt's perspective, Reinhard was the strongest Knight in the world, known as the Sword Saint, but at the same time, he was the person responsible for separating Felt and Rom-jii, and who furthermore was a loathsome individual who annoyed Felt by trying to refine her and make her wear dresses and shoes with high-heels.

Since that impression existed within Felt, she had never made any effort to pry into Reinhard's circumstances, but—she came to hear about them whether she liked it or not.

About how Reinhard was treated by the Astrea Family, and how he was perceived by society.

What arose especially frequently in conversation were rumors surrounding the death of the previous generation's Sword Saint, Theresia van Astrea, and the circumstances leading to the official recognition of Reinhard as the Sword Saint after inheriting the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint—those being the incident when he was eight years old, where he stopped the invasion of the Kingdom plotted by a machiavellian of the three countries, and the unerasable stain of his complete obedience to Heinkel Astrea in the years that followed, persisting until around the time he joined the Guard.

Reinhard did not speak much on any of these events, and Felt had not questioned him about them either, but it now gave her a strong feeling of unease.

The most extreme idea being that Reinhard was at one point completely obedient to Heinkel.

If that was the truth, then what exactly was Heinkel fighting so hard for?

Felt had not investigated Reinhard, but in order to grasp the circumstances regarding the power held by the head of the Astrea Family, she had investigated Heinkel.

Heinkel had quite a poor reputation, but most of it was about his failures as a Knight and as a father, and everything Heinkel had tried to forcibly accomplish using the name of the Astrea Family was entirely in an attempt to gain the means to awaken the slumbering Louanna.

She would not describe him as living humbly, but he was far removed from the common luxuries of nobility, and had made curtailments in most facets of his lifestyle so that he could devote everything to waking his wife; that was the impression of him that she got from the numerical figures.

But—

Felt: “If you really had Reinhard’s complete obedience, you could’ve done anything you wanted.”

In both fame and might, there existed nobody in the Kingdom who exceeded Reinhard.

He might have had the integrity to deem it unacceptable to ever use Reinhard for his own purposes, but not if Heinkel was anything like the rumors suggested.

If the rumors about Heinkel were true, he could have used Reinhard’s fame, might, or whatever else was required to entirely skip the process of going out to locations by himself, negotiating directly with the other side, and resorting to forcing his way through swordsmanship if that proved insufficient.

Instead, he did his best to avoid involvement with Reinhard, and persisted with a hangup to awaken his slumbering wife through his own efforts, but why?

If his wife was more important to him than anything else, then the scales would not tip no matter what was placed on the other side. —That was, only so long as something equally weighty was not placed there.

In that case—

Felt: “Your fucking… your approach to what’s important to you, is way too damn twisted.”

Heinkel: “—Hk.”

That instant, the cowering Heinkel grit his teeth, and a light dashed.

Feeling the upsurge of swordly aura as a gust of wind, Felt understood that what had appeared as a flash was an attack of Heinkel’s sword, unsheathed in the blink of an eye, whose chilly point was now fastened to her neck.

Heinkel: “Stop… going on and on… about what’s none of your damn business.”

Felt: “Oi, I’ll say this now, but…”

Heinkel: “DON’T MOVE A FUCKING MUSCLE!”

With eyes bloodshot and spittle foaming at the corners of his mouth, Heinkel’s shout caused Felt to bite the inside of her cheek, lamenting her own blunder of excessively pressing him.

Unlike earlier when she had hit him back, when it was clearly just a threat, the current aura being emitted from Heinkel was charged with a definite intent to kill.

She understood that the source of that intent was neither hatred nor indignation, but rather a certain kind of defensive instinct, but that was exactly why she realized she had drawn out far too troublesome emotions from him.

As tension ran through Felt’s entire body, Heinkel’s blue eyes violently trembled before her,

Heinkel: “This, is my problem. I can’t stand it when outsiders delve into it without a shred of reserve. Much less when it's a brat like you, I won't let you learn about any more of this—"

Felt: "—More? So you're saying there's still something else?"

Heinkel: "—Hk, SHUT THE FUCK UUUUUUUP!"

Catching on to something at the end of Heinkel's words, Felt unconsciously blurted that out. Right after she thought she had once again triggered a violent tremor in Heinkel's expression, he erupted.

Then, the tip of his sword was drawn back for but a moment before accelerating, and it thrust forward a step further—it happened the instant before that could come to pass.

???: "I'm begging you, please don't do anything to provoke the old man."

Heinkel: "Gah?!"

A figure swooped down, and in its hand was a stone sword—with a stone dao, it had mercilessly struck the temporal region of the kneeling Heinkel, causing the latter to fall flat onto the ground.

As Heinkel fell over, his eyes rolled into the back of his head. Standing beside him and shrugging his shoulders in exasperation was Aldebaran, who had intervened when the situation grew perilous.

And in response to Aldebaran's entrance, Felt softly snorted her nose,

Felt: "Bastard, you were just watching until I was in serious danger, weren't you?"

Aldebaran: "Though, you were also just talking to the old man with a hunch that I was keeping an eye out to make sure you didn't carelessly get yourself killed, Felt-chan. That ain't a cute way of conducting yourself."

Felt: "After all, I absolutely hate being called cute."

Sticking out her tongue with a “Behhh”, Felt gave Aldebaran no thanks whatsoever for being saved.

Only, checking to see that the collapsed Heinkel had not died, she sighed. —From Heinkel’s last few words there, it seemed like there was still something else with Reinhard.

He was the Sword Saint, seemingly the reason behind his mother’s slumber, and something else on top of that which Heinkel was hiding—.

Felt: “Feels like it’d be irresponsible to say I won’t ask anything until he speaks up.”

Aldebaran: “Well, that’s a fine declaration of your intent. Do you understand the situation?”

Felt: “From what you say, you’ve got no intention of harming me, and once you’ve finished everything for your objective, you’ll let the Royal Selection resume, yeah? I think it’d be best if you were defeated, but for now, whether you win or lose, the things I’ve gotta do from here on out are the same.”

Aldebaran: “Can’t argue with that.”

As Aldebaran lightheartedly waved his right hand, Felt snorted once more; taking the sword still clutched tight in Heinkel’s grip, she aligned its tip with the scabbard, and sheathed it.

The moment before it fully returned to its sheath, the blade of the sword inscribed “Astrea” shimmered in a manner that appeared excessively merciless and cold to Felt’s eyes, irritating her all the more.

Chapter 38:
Scorched by the Sun

1

???: "—In other words, if this was not a gold coin, but a full-powered attack by Garf, Emilia-sama, who would already know what Garf was going to do, could easily avoid his very obvious attack, then counterattack, and leave him crying and groaning."

Emilia: "I see, so that's what you mean… but wait! It would be bad to make Garfiel cry. I would rather find a way to befriend Garfiel instead."

???: "If so, you would not have to fight back, because if Emilia-sama can just keep a cool facade and effortlessly avoid Garf's attacks, eventually Garf's mind would break and the matter would be settled amicably."

Emilia: "Then that is reassuring… reassuring? Really? Even though it would break his mind?"

Emilia said that with a big question mark over her head as Rem handed her back the gold coin.

At the moment, in her mind, Garfiel was too busy crying like a child, or collapsing to his knees in despair. Rem, who had taken over the role of explaining Aldebaran's Authority from Ram, was relieved to hear that she had managed to give a brief explanatory overview of Aldebaran's Authority—"Turning Back Time".

Ram: "You're amazing, Rem. You did a great job of getting Emilia-sama to understand."

Rem: "Happy to be able to help, Nee-sama. Even though Garf had to be sacrificed."

Ram: "If all it takes is for him to cry and be depressed to keep things going, Garf would happily endure it. It sounds like he's sleeping peacefully, so Ram will have to go and visit him later."

Rem: "Yes, that's right. Garf would be delighted to have Nee-sama visit him…"

Seeing Ram shrug her thin shoulders dismissively in exasperation, a complicated, bitter feeling ran through Rem's heart.

Now that Rem had regained her memory, she remembered that she and Garfiel were originally at odds over Ram. From childhood, Rem had disliked Garfiel for the way he dared to nurture feelings for Ram without knowing his place, such that it had resulted in them arguing with each other many times.

However, when she thought back on Garfiel's efforts in the Empire and the conversations they had on the way home, she felt extremely guilty about the way she had treated and viewed him as she had in the past.

More importantly, Garfiel was unable to fulfill his role of protecting Subaru, Beatrice, and the others. When he finally woke up from his slumber, he would surely be extremely depressed and most likely blame himself.

Rem: "It's sad to hound Garf like that… but I understand. Rem will have to let it go. Now we need Garf to recover as soon as possible and become a part of our fighting force to help rescue that person."

Ram: "Right. But there's nothing wrong with being bound by your possessiveness, Rem. If you don't want to do it, we can put Garf's matter off for later, okay?"

Rem: "But, you know full well that I will not ask you not to go, right, Nee-sama?"

Ram: "No clue."

Rem sighed at the dazzle of Ram, who smiled thinly and responded in a dignified manner.

How much of Ram's compassion and concern had been idly wasted in the two periods of time she was asleep and without memories?

Of course, Ram was not the only person Rem worried about.

It caused trouble for everyone within the Camp and even those outside of it as well. —Fortunately, Rem originally did not have any friendships with anyone other than those involved, so the possible damage in that sense was minimal.

Rem: “Rather, it seems that before my memory returned, I was able to interact better with Katya-san, Mizelda-san, and others than I did when I regained it…”

Looking back on the recollection of her life story, Rem had those impressions.

Even though she was transported to the Vollachian Empire by chance and had to survive, it was not surprising that Rem had been more open to establish relationships with people when she had no other choice.

To top it all off, Rem had been entirely unkind to Subaru, always pushing him away when he only was trying to stay close and devoted to her and so on, over and over again; it made her want to strangle herself.

Rem: “If only Subaru-kun had looked Rem in the eye and talked to me directly… ah, but Rem was the one who refused to do so, ugh…”

Some part of Rem wanted to defend herself, saying that it could not be helped because she had no memory, and some part wanted to convince herself that she could have conveyed her sincere feelings if she had managed to face Subaru directly.

Regardless, the fact remained that Rem had caused a great deal of inconvenience to those around her, especially Subaru, so she had to do everything in her power to make up for it.

Rem: “First, Rem will resolve this situation successfully. After that, to show Subaru-kun my gratitude, Rem’s own fingers must be broken… that’s what I have to do.”

???: “…If you do that, Subaru won’t be happy, and he might even die from shock, so please don't do it."

Rem: "Oh, Petra-san…"

When Rem turned around after her secret resolution was heard, she saw Petra with a troubled brow. Thinking that she should not have let her hear that, Rem pointed the palm of her hand at her and said, "No,"

Rem: "Please don't try to stop me. Rem owes Subaru-kun many apologies. If my unworthiness is not punished, I won't be able to face Subaru-kun…"

Petra: "So, you're punishing yourself because you want to feel better, not because you want to apologize to Subaru, Rem-neesama?"

Rem: "That's not what I mean…"

Petra: "Even if you don't mean it like that, I'm just saying that's how it's going to end up. Okay? What Subaru wants you to do is not to punish yourself for it, but to accept the happiness that you have been missing out on while you were asleep, Rem-neesama."

Rem: "…"

As Petra softly lowered the corners of her eyes, Rem's breath involuntarily caught at the former's words.

It was a gentle and sweet admonition that sounded similar to the words Subaru had said to Rem when she blamed herself on the morning that the Witchbeast incident had been solved in Arlam Village, the first day that Rem had felt special feelings for Subaru.

For some reason, the Petra before her eyes seemed to overlap with the Subaru from that time, just a little.

Rem: "…Surely, that is all the more proof of the influence that person has had on everyone, isn't it?"

Petra: "Huh? What do you mean, Rem-neesama?"

Rem: “Nothing. Petra-san, your words brought back some very fond and cherished memories of mine. Do you remember when the Witchbeasts attacked Arlam Village?”

Petra: “…Um, yeah, yes. I remember.”

At Rem’s question, Petra’s cheeks slightly tensed up. Then, Petra’s gaze flickered towards the girl standing in the corner of the room, Meili.

She apparently had joined the Camp while Rem was asleep and had been serving a role in the Kingdom while Emilia and the others had struggled in the Empire. She seemed vaguely familiar, but why was Petra paying attention to her now?

Petra: “Ahem. Anyway, please don’t do anything that could cause harm to yourself, Rem-neesama. The world would fall into darkness if your precious white and delicate fingers were to get hurt.”

Rem: “Petra-san…”

Petra: “If you absolutely insist on doing it, I’ll take responsibility and break my fingers too!”

Rem: “Petra-san?!”

When Petra suddenly clenched her small hands into fists, Rem’s voice involuntarily pierced a shrill note. Petra smiled mischievously at Rem’s reaction, and she continued, “That’s why”,

Petra: “You mustn’t do such a thing, yes?”

Rem: “—. Yes… understood.”

With that reminder from Petra, Rem nervously gave her a nod.

This was partly because she had succumbed to Petra’s enthusiasm, but it would be more correct to say that the Subaru-like impression she was getting from Petra blocked any room for a counterargument.

She also seemed to have overlapped with Subaru just earlier, but the way she held back Rem now—the way she had offset Rem's hastiness by crashing directly into her with her own extremes was very much like him.

Rem: "…"

Getting a keen sense for the magnitude of Subaru's influence through Petra, Rem fell silent.

In a way, Petra's current state seemed to indicate that she understood Subaru better than Rem did, and it would not have been strange for her to harbor jealousy or feelings of envy. But oddly enough, Rem did not feel any such emotions towards Petra whatsoever.

She did not know why that was, but thinking of Subaru just now, another splinter caught in Rem's heart.

That was—

Rem: "—Aldebaran-san's, Authority."

That which she had just finished explaining to Emilia by using a gold coin, the Authority of "Turning Back Time".

Thanks to Ram's very patient explanation, Rem had comprehended just how terrifying such a thing was, but as she thought about it more in order to explain it to Emilia, some suspicions began to simmer within herself.

An Authority to observe the future that laid ahead, and avoid that which was undesirable by turning back the clock—

Rem: "—That person, as well?"

That spark of suspicion that had faintly sprouted grew quickly within Rem, spreading like an inferno as it burned through the fields of her thoughts. Then, amidst the scorched ashes that remained, there laid a number of embers that had ignited, feeding the flame even more.

For instance, how there was always a thick fragrance of Miasma that hung over Subaru.

For instance, how Miasma would often grow deeper and more intense, as if it was enveloping Subaru.

For instance, how Subaru would read into situations with inexplicable insight, and find a path through to the solution.

For instance, how a multitude of deaths had been averted thanks to Subaru's presence, with Rem having been one amongst them.

When taken individually, these elements would seem like nothing more than nitpicking, but when taken with that single rule-breaking factor at its core, an Authority, everything fit together surprisingly well.

But, in the one in ten-thousand chance that Rem's intuition was correct, the boy known as Natsuki Subaru, despite possessing a nearly unparalleled power—

Rem: "He only ever uses it for the sake of others… What a selfless person he is."

If one could start over at any time and revise things to suit their own convenience, nothing would stop them from behaving selfishly, and reshaping the world as they pleased.

However, Subaru did no such thing, nor would he ever employ such methods. —That was best understood by Rem, who represented someone who had not bent to Subaru's will.

If Subaru had been utilizing his power to bend people's minds to his wishes, then Rem would never have managed to break Subaru's fingers.

In other words, the fact that Subaru's fingers had been broken was proof of his sincerity.

Rem: "Maybe Rem should also break her fingers to match Subaru-kun's after all…!"

Petra: "Even though I just got you to give up on doing that?!"

Rem: “You’re mistaken, Petra-san. This time is not for some backwards, negative reason like being unable to face him, but a forwards-facing, positive one like wanting to share the same pain as Subaru-kun…”

Petra: “Whether it’s forward, backward, upward, or downward, that’s a BIG FAT NO!”

With nobody willing to listen to her, Rem’s enthusiasm fell flat.

Anyhow, putting aside the matter of finger-breaking, Rem’s idea that Subaru possessed an Authority of the same type as Aldebaran’s was one that she was only growing more confident in. But, even after hearing the details of “Turning Back Time,” it seemed like Ram, Emilia and the rest had not arrived at the same conclusion that Rem had.

Perhaps it was because Rem harbored a deeper understanding of Subaru—that was not the case.

Rem: “…Rather, it’s the opposite.”

Unlike Rem, the reason why Emilia and the others had not arrived at this notion was because they, continuing to live whilst Rem slumbered, knew just how hard Subaru had been working each day until now.

From what she had been told, during the time Rem had been asleep that lasted greater than a year, Subaru made a Contract with Beatrice, and had worked tirelessly to become a Knight worthy of Emilia. Because they knew of Subaru’s efforts, they would not have harbored any suspicions that any other elements had contributed to his successes.

And though it was so vexing that it felt as if her heart was on the verge of being torn asunder, Rem knew nothing of those efforts. —That was why there was such a massive gap between her and those who had surrounded him in their perception of what Subaru was capable of.

But, that in no way diminished Subaru’s heroism.

Above all, the fact that Subaru had now fallen into this situation meant that even if he possessed an Authority, it was not omnipotent, and therefore the reality that Subaru had mustered up all of his wisdom and courage to take the hands of others and move forward remained unshakeable.

So even now, there still remained plenty of opportunity for Rem to become Subaru's strength.

Rem: "Knowing that… Nee-sama!"

The captive Subaru needed their help. —With that certainty in her own thinking, Rem hastened to share her thoughts with Ram and everyone else, hoping to increase the fuel for their discussion.

It was a theory based on intuition and the Oni's ability to smell Miasma, so it would be difficult to convince them, but she was sure that Ram, who was very intelligent, and Emilia, who was very accepting, would listen to what she had to say in earnest.

With that thought in mind, Rem was about to speak out to Ram and the rest, the former of whom had turned towards her and asked, "What's the matter?"—

???: "—We have now returned. Tardiness."

It happened at that moment.

In the hall of the Royal Residence, where Rem and the others had gathered, two men appeared as if in the blink of an eye. One was Clind, a handsome man wearing a monocle that gave off an impression of intelligence. And the person Clind had brought alongside him was Rem's master, whom she had known for a long time, and owed a great debt of gratitude to—

Emilia: "Roswaal! You came!"

Roswaal: "Yesss~, Clind has informed me of the situation. I've now heard about Subaru-kun and Beatrice's predicament, and of the circumstances that could possibly shake the very foundation of the Royal Selection, but I'm simply too exhausted from our travels to the Empire… I could never affooord~ to say such a thiiing~."

Emilia: “Hmm, that’s reaaally reassuring. We’ll fill you in on all our discussions right away… but, before that…”

Roswaal: “—?”

Emilia greeted the tall figure that was Roswaal, who had just appeared, and gestured with her hand towards Rem, who had been standing just behind him.

Roswaal turned his head at Emilia’s gesture, and his heterochromatic eyes focused in on Rem. In response, Rem pinched her skirt and performed the proper curtsey,

Rem: “Roswaal-sama, it has been a terribly long leave of absence. Allow for thanks to once again be bestowed for venturing to retrieve us from the Empire. —Rem has returned to service.”

Roswaal: “…”

Roswaal’s throat rumbled slightly upon witnessing Rem’s gratitude and return to service. The next moment, his tall body began to stagger as if he were dizzy.

Ram: “Roswaal-sama!”

Roswaal: “Ah, no, I’m fine, I’m fine… It was just so sudden, as if I was about to drown in informaaation~.”

Standing by his side, Ram quickly steadied his body, to which Roswaal responded with a wry smile.

It seemed that because Rem’s Name had been regurgitated, it had caused a resurgence of Memories.

It was disappointing that it had not been through the power of her bond with Subaru, who had zealously polished her iron ball—the Morningstar, but seeing the place she occupied within others being filled again after such a long vacancy was not a bad feeling. Though, there were some who might have called it tactless.

Either way—

Roswaal: “—Welcome back, Rem. Once this situation has settled down, why don’t we discuss what has been happening with the mansion in the time you were absent… about Ram, in particulaaar~?”

Rem: “Yes. I look forward to it from the bottom of my heart.”

With great comprehension, Roswaal was able to quickly move on from the shock of remembering Rem. Impressed by the strength of her master’s spirit, Rem tried again to reopen the conversation anew.

However, Rem’s sleeve was tugged firmly from behind—

Petra: “Master, wasn’t Frederica-neesama with you?”

Roswaal: “Yes, I had Frederica stay in the Barielle Domain. I already agreed to give my help there after all. I also couldn’t bear to leave Schult-kun alone, furthermore, Clind said he would fulfill Frederica’s expected rooole~.”

Petra: “Fulfilling Frederica-neesama’s role? Can Clind-niisama really do that?”

Clind: “Harsh. I must endeavor to dispel those doubts. Strenuous Effort.”

Petra frowned as she confirmed Frederica’s whereabouts, seeing that she did not return with Roswaal and the others, while Clind calmly vowed to make up for her absence.

During this exchange, Rem had turned her head to look at Petra’s profile as she tugged on her sleeve and asked, “Petra-san?”.

Petra had just now clearly interrupted Rem and changed the subject, bringing up a different topic. Of course, the whereabouts of Frederica was another area of concern, but her actions had another meaning of significance.

While Rem pondered this, Emilia introduced Rom-jii to Roswaal and began to talk about which countermeasures they would need to take across Camp boundaries. Seeing this, Petra turned to Rem and gave her a small beckoning gesture.

That was when—

Petra: "…Perhaps you also noticed something about Subaru, Rem-neesama?"

Rem: "—! The way you said that, Petra-san, have you also noticed Subaru-kun has an Authority…?"

Petra: "Don't say anything more than that… The Witch might hear you."

Rem: "…"

Rem could not help but keep silent when Petra put her finger to her own lips in a shushing gesture.

Petra did not explicitly say so, but her words indicated exactly what was on Rem's mind—it was evidence enough to prove that Petra also thought that Subaru also had the Authority of "Turning Back Time." From the words that followed, Rem could guess that Petra had been privy to more information than she was.

It was a bit of a stretch to say that the Witch would hear them, but —

Rem: "As I already heard that Reinhard-sama is holding back the Witch of Envy at the Augria Sand Dunes, this is not something that I can laugh off as an exaggeration."

Petra: "Yes, it has to do with that. I'm not absolutely sure that is the case, but I think it's best if we don't talk about this subject. —I don't want to ever experience that feeling again."

Petra's mutterings were filled with an almost frightening level of earnest realism that they carried a weight as if she had personally experienced the consequences from uttering those taboo words.

Naturally, Petra's quiet appeal made Rem stop speaking and swallow those words into the back of her throat. But that meant missing the opportunity to reveal Subaru's true accomplishments so far—

Rem: “…That’s not what he would be concerned about, would it?”

Before and after losing her memory, Rem had two opportunities to get to know Subaru.

What she had learned through those two occasions was that Subaru possessed an earnest sincerity, which struck deep into her heart, and that honestly and openly evaluating everything that was revealed to him was secondary.

Wishing Subaru to be praised and rewarded for all of his actions and intentions was merely a reflection of Rem’s own values.

Petra: “Rem-neesama, there is one thing I want to ask you.”

Petra asked Rem, who swallowed her own prayers and the aftertaste of her lingering sentimentality.

It was not a particularly hushed voice, but to Rem, it seemed as if Petra had asked her question with great care, so that only she could hear it.

When Rem nodded her head slightly, she felt the seriousness of the situation, a feeling which reminded her of Subaru’s earnestness, then,

Petra: “Rem-neesama, would you do anything to help Subaru?”

Behind this question, Rem sensed that Petra was expressing her belief that she could, and would do it.

There was no sense of rivalry with it. But, her deliberation lasted less than a second.

Rem: “Yes, of course. —I am Subaru-kun’s Rem, after all.”

That was an answer that required no hesitation on Rem’s part.

2

—His exhaustion continued to accumulate with every passing moment, something Aldebaran felt keenly.

Aldebaran: “I’m fine with procuring food locally, same with getting water by freezing the atmosphere and licking the ice, but… the fact that our sleeping hours are being curtailed is seriously draining.”

They continued to face relentless sabotage, an endless torment for the Aldebaran Party.

The majority of the damage inflicted by those disturbances was nothing so major that left them wounded or pressed them to retreat from the war front, but rather, nasty tricks that just kept them in a state of exhaustion. And whenever he would think along such lines, they would be hit with an attack of the same class as the falling boulder that had been the first maneuver used against them at the quarry, highlighting the underhandedness of the techniques which did not allow them to relax their vigilance whatsoever.

The greatest problem at hand, was that they possessed no means to perfectly defend against this.

Aldebaran: “Military-Grade Internal Affairs Minister… Military-Grade Internal Affairs Minister, huh? The violent way it sounds ain’t just for show, eh?”

The Internal Affairs Minister of the Emilia Camp, Otto Suwen, was a man who often appeared meek and feeble.

His role within the Camp was that of cushioning, someone often reduced to the butt of a joke, and while his position might have been necessary for their everyday operations, he was not an individual who necessitated vigilance during the most crucial of moments. —That perception had been completely mistaken.

The fact that he could converse with any living thing was something Aldebaran had underestimated, overwhelmingly so. The price for that, was something he was paying with an unbelievable amount of vigor and resources.

Aldebaran: “Moreover, the problems don’t end with just that devious Internal Affairs Minister… there's also trouble stirring between the old man and Felt-chan."

In addition to the ongoing sabotage, what troubled Aldebaran's mind even further was the friction that had arisen between his own party members; the budding of a seed of trouble he could not overlook.

Aldebaran had not originally planned on Felt being among them, but having needed to bring her along to maintain his relationship with "Aldebaran", her presence had been a huge blow.

That, was the matter of Felt having touched upon the crux of that which stirred up Heinkel's emotions.

It seemed as if Felt had touched upon almost everything that Heinkel did not wish to be touched upon.

While his son, Reinhard, was containing the Witch of Envy at the Augria Sand Dunes, with his own hands had Heinkel stabbed his father, Wilhelm, for getting in the way. The price for carelessly disrupting his mental state on the verge of collapse, was something Felt had almost ended up paying with her life. —No, in reality, she had ended up paying with her life many times.

If Aldebaran had not reset things with his Territory, Felt's death would have been set in stone.

That would have then invoked "Aldebaran's" ire, and Heinkel would have been driven into a corner. As it stood, the Divine Dragon's consciousness was in the unnatural state of being overwritten by Aldebaran. If something that considerably roused the Dragon's instincts were to be brought upon it, it was quite possible that the magic of the Book of the Dead would come undone.

Hence, Aldebaran had forcibly cut off the conversation between Heinkel and Felt, but—

Aldebaran: "It's nothing but a bandaid fix. If I ever carelessly leave the old man alone with Felt-chan, I can easily see things getting bloody again. Having said that, it'd be impossible to leave anybody but Yae to handle restraining that Roy bastard… shit, I'm not doing a quiz about getting a wolf and a goat to the other side of a river on a boat. I ain't good at those any which way."

Though it was one of those so-called logic puzzles, he had been placed in a somewhat similar situation.

The current circumstances of allocating his mental resources to a futile battle of wits was undesirable, but with that said—

???: "—If you just cast away Heinkel-sama or Felt-sama as you please, it'll become much easier, y'know?"

Aldebaran: "—. How many times do I have to tell you, I ain't gonna do that."

As a lighthearted voice suddenly interjected with that proposal, Aldebaran clicked his tongue before responding.

With hands joined behind her back, Yae walked towards him with a spring in her step, as if performing a dance. Seeing her by herself, Aldebaran narrowed his eyes within his helmet.

Aldebaran: "Oi, why are you alone? You oughta be with someone…"

Yae: "Felt-sama is with Vol-sama, the Sin Archbishop is strung up, and Heinkel-sama is bound tight. For the time being, things have settled down."

Aldebaran: "…Even so, that doesn't mean we don't have any holes."

Yae: "That would be correct. But but, it currently seems like Al-sama has the potential to become our biggest hole, y'know~?"

As she spoke, Yae hugged one of her knees as she crouched down before Aldebaran. As her cat-like red eyes peered into him, Aldebaran experienced a taste of discomfort.

No matter how bluntly he answered, her judgement was correct. —Without a doubt, the one most clearly exhausted among their members was none other than Aldebaran.

Aldebaran: “But, that’s a matter of course. The goals I’m aiming to accomplish are the biggest and most numerous. Hence, it’s natural that I have to shoulder the difficulties…”

Yae: “As a result, if Al-sama were to be crushed halfway through, wouldn’t it be unbearable to watch?”

Aldebaran: “…What is it you wanna say?”

Yae: “Like~ I’ve~ been~ saying, that which Yae-chan wants to say is the same as it’s always been. Before you get crushed like a bug, Al-sama, you should reign in your conditions for victory.”

Aldebaran: “I told you already, that’s…!”

Yae: “—Why is it that you must cling to such clean methods, Al-sama?”

Resting her chin in the arm upon her folded knee, Yae posed a sharp question.

Yae’s eyes, narrowed to a thread’s breadth, faintly opened, and sensing that the playfulness of her voice had vanished, Aldebaran was unable to muster any immediate response.

And taking advantage of that silence of Aldebaran’s, Yae resumed.

Yae: “Our opponents will come at you with reckless abandon. It’s only natural. After all, Al-sama, you robbed them of their companions, wounded them, and at the end of it all, put the fate of the world on the line. After all that, of course they’re going to be willing to risk their lives~. They won’t hesitate to use methods that go against the righteous road, fair and square.”

Aldebaran: “…I know that I’m causing you a lot of trouble. Not only are you being endlessly harassed, but you even ended up clashing with the Sword Demon in the Royal Capital.”

Yae: “You’re mistaken. It’s not that I want to complain… No, in a sense, this might just very well undoubtedly be a complaint though~.”

Aldebaran: “What are—”

You trying to say; he had been unable to finish his words.

Without dodging Yae’s hand as it suddenly reached out, it pushed down on Aldebaran’s forehead, causing him to fall backwards. Then, as Aldebaran blinked his eyes, Yae glided on top of him after pushing him down.

Aldebaran: “…”

At that close proximity, Aldebaran and Yae crossed gazes.

Vic.1120

That instant, Aldebaran immediately poked the drug package prepared behind his molar with his tongue, intending to commit suicide so that he could redo this moment—

Yae: "—The Madam has passed away, Al-sama."

Aldebaran: "—Hk."

Yae: "She passed away. Haven't you said it yourself many times now?"

Just before Aldebaran could swallow the poison, Yae spoke thus to him at such a close distance that he could feel her breath on him, causing his throat to seize up.

He need not be told. Priscilla Barielle had died. That was the basis for everything. The reason why Aldebaran had taken the leap for this decision, the genesis, and the final shackle.

Because she was no longer among them, Aldebaran was released from all the chains that had bound him; and so, while fully aware that it would make him the enemy of all beings, that it would plunge the world into chaos, he had started this.

Yae: "Is that true?"

Aldebaran: "Ah…?"

Yae: "Is that truly the case? The Madam is no longer among us. That's why nothing matters to you anymore. No matter who you betray, what you destroy, or how you might be perceived, you're completely fine with it. —Is that true?"

At the repeated question, Aldebaran froze.

Even now, he could make it so this moment never happened with a single movement of his tongue. With that as insurance—no, even if he lacked that insurance, Aldebaran would likely not have moved.

Yae's words and gaze harbored a power to bind him far greater than that of any steel thread.

Is that true; so she had asked. Just what answer did she want from him?

Is that true; so she had asked. Of course it’s true. What else could he possibly say?

Is that true; so she had asked. Of the certainty of Aldebaran’s resolve, she inquired.

Yae: “The results might be questionable. The damages brought about might even be outrageous. But, here’s what I also think. — Your way of doing things is way, way too clean.”

Aldebaran: “Clean…?”

Yae: “You confront your opponents head-on, surpassing and surmounting their strategies, and you take advantage of their weaknesses when your military prospects are lacking, but you don’t allow there to be any casualties. Your resolve is clean, Al-sama. That’s why, you’ve ended up being so terribly cornered like this.”

Aldebaran: “…”

Yae: “—Al-sama, how about you quit yearning for the sun?”

As Yae smoothly reached out her arms, she grabbed both sides of Aldebaran’s helmet. Her hands made no attempt to remove the helmet, but rather, they locked his line of sight onto herself, refusing to let him look away.

That gesture combined with the whispering of her words fettered Aldebaran’s soul, preventing any and all movement.

—To stop yearning, for the sun.

Yae: “Crawl on the ground, cover yourself in mud, stop looking up to the sky, and bathe in the blood. It’s alright. I’m already covered in filth, so I won’t balk at basking in the blood and the mud alongside you.”

Aldebaran: “—. No matter what you say, I’m…”

Yae: “You’ve no need to give up that which you aren’t willing to. But, if that’s what you wish, then please don’t try to be clean. If you would just give up on being clean, then—”

Pausing there, Yae’s lips curved into a gentle half-moon.

That smile of Yae’s, tinged with the hue of blood, was terribly transient, overlapping with the smile of someone else.

Yae: “—Nobody, would be able to defeat my Al-sama.”

—That was the smile of someone engraved into his soul, the one who had molded Aldebaran.

Aldebaran: “…”

With a bloody smile, as Yae spoke in a manner as if clinging to him, as if cherishing him, as if lamenting him, as if pleading with him, as if threatening him, as if despairing of him, Aldebaran heaved a long sigh.

Then—

Aldebaran: “—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition.”

In order to not relinquish that which was truly difficult to let go of, he thought that just maybe, he ought to cover himself in mud and blood.

3

???: “—Urgh.”

A strong, throbbing pain gouged into his brain, causing Otto to let out a small groan.

Already, twenty hours had passed since he threw open his Divine Protection of the Soul of Language. During that time, he had not been continuously checking the opened channels, but even if he did not speak through them at all times, he did not fail to collect every single scrap of incoming information.

Consequently, maintaining his Divine Protection in a half-open state, Otto ate and slept sparingly as he continued his endless solitary battle.

Otto: “Emilia-sama, I see that you have joined up with the Margrave and the others.”

Although he did not exercise as much power as he did tracking Aldebaran’s group, he managed to confirm the movements of his allies as Otto sent out animals in both directions as scouts.

He had not been in active contact with Emilia and the others, as he did not want his concentration to break, but beyond that the main reason was that Otto did not want his recklessness to be constrained.

No matter how one looked at it, if they knew that Otto’s nose had bled enough to fill up a cup, Emilia and the others would undoubtedly stop him.

Otto: “However, it is necessary.”

Soon, Aldebaran’s group would arrive at the Kararagi City-States’ Grand Mogolade Geyser, where they would attempt to fulfill their goal. Most likely, that would be the time limit.

In the end, these were just Otto’s instincts, but he was convinced that not stopping their foes here would be their losing condition; this was surely their last chance to retrieve Natsuki Subaru and Beatrice.

Therefore, it must be prevented. But, the deciding factor did not lie with Otto.

Always, the one that held the decisive factor, was someone other than Otto.

All that Otto Suwen could do, was support someone else. —And so, in that support, he would wring out every drop of blood and energy in his body.

???: “Laddie, please don’t die.”

Otto: “…At least, you are not telling me to not be reckless.”

???: “Laddie, doesn’t it seem like being reckless is a hobby for you? I know it’s something you wouldn’t stop doing even if I told you to, so I won’t waste my breath. Hence, please don’t die.”

And at the supportive expression of his loving dragon Frufoo, Otto bitterly chuckled.

Fundamentally, Otto was moving separately from the rest of the Camp, and his means of transportation was the being with whom he would speak to whenever push came to shove—in case his Divine Protection of the Soul of Language steeped him too deeply in the thoughts of other living creatures and he had to avoid becoming unable to return, he made sure to always travel with at least Frufoo by his side.

As expected, since Frufoo had known him since childhood, she seemed to be able to read Otto’s mind, and had often saved him with her dependability.

This was especially true when they were alone in the mountains, far from human habitation.

Frufoo: “I don’t know if this will help, but why don’t you get some sleep? As you said earlier, that group is currently resting… Now you don’t have to worry about losing sight of them, why don’t you take a break?”

Otto: “What are you talking about? If he is resting, then he is not being hindered. Instead, right now is the greatest time for profit.”

Frufoo: “Treating this situation as a time for reaping profits, your bad habit is slipping out, laddie.”

Frufoo shook her large head in exasperation, her tone and demeanour carefree; considering the current situation, one would think she was too easygoing, but Otto knew that this easygoingness was intentional so that he did not become anxious, so that he could not get irritated.

Actually, while talking to Frufoo, his willpower had steadily recovered. —Thanks to this, it seemed he would be able to hold out a little longer.

Frufoo: “That’s not what I was trying to do, you know?”

Otto: “Even if you did not mean to, you are helping me. My Frufoo is really the best partner.”

Frufoo: “You really have a way with words laddie!”

A low groan of dissatisfaction rumbled from Frufoo as she smiled, while Otto took a deep breath. Then, once again he drew his consciousness to his channels, towards the birds, insects, and schools of fish that he had entrusted with tracking Aldebaran’s group trying to figure out as much of the enemy’s movements as possible.

Of course, since he needed to exchange information with the animals, Otto’s pursuit of Aldebaran was just slightly delayed, and there was some amount of lag.

Still, that he had not lost sight of Aldebaran’s group, and he had been able to continue chasing them without loosening his grip, was due to the great power of the Zodda bugs. Most animals were frightened by the presence of the Divine Dragon that accompanied them, and no matter how earnestly he begged them, they refused to go beyond a certain point.

However, Zodda bugs were different. Rather than the individual, they were more concerned with the survival of the swarm, and so they could fearlessly draw close to the Divine Dragon, making them terrific for reconnaissance. Once this was over, including the peaceful place that he had promised to them, they needed to be treated as kindly as possible.

Frufoo: “If you’re too supportive of the Zodda bugs, Miss Frederica, Miss Petra, and the others will be even more grossed out.”

Otto: “I know that for some reason, a lot of women hate Zodda bugs. But, if they become aware of their contributions this time, maybe that will change their perception."

Though, Otto understood that there was very little hope of that.

It was not just the women's side; after Otto's battle in the Sanctuary, Garfiel had also seemed to develop some reluctance towards them. Subaru and Beatrice, too; once they were safely broken free and heard about the work the Zodda bugs had put in, what kind of face would they make—?

Otto: "At the very least, they should convey their gratitude to the head of the swarm directly—"

???: "Well, that will be a little difficult don't you think~?"

Otto: "…"

Just then, caressing Otto's ear, was a voice that did not belong to the insects, nor the small animals, nor Frufoo. Immediately after he gasped, Otto's body suddenly shot into the air.

Frufoo: "Laddie!!"

There was no dragon carriage, so as Otto's weight which had been straddling her back suddenly disappeared, Frufoo let out a desperate cry.

Frufoo's cries were in vain, as Otto was hanging from one of the trees on the mountain, kicking his legs as his hands and neck were constricted by something that felt thin.

Just barely, he had managed to get his fingers in front of his neck and escaped being asphyxiated—

Otto: "Ku, ugh…"

???: "You don't seem like a fighter, but it was amazing that you reacted immediately. Is this what they call always being prepared for battle? Onii-san, you would be a great shinobi, you know?"

As Otto was hanging, dangling and shaking, a slender shadow appeared from beneath his feet. A girl with crimson hair and a maid dress with wasou elements—all the features matched.

She was one of the people in Aldebaran’s group, an enemy that Otto must eliminate—

???: “See, didn’t I tell you, Al-sama? —There’s nobody, who can defeat you.”

—The crimson shinobi, Yae Tenzen, as her cheeks blushed red, looked up at the hanging Otto.

Chapter 39:
The Final Line

1

Yae: "—Al-sama, how about you quit yearning for the sun?"

When she had spoken those words, he did not know what sort of emotions or expectations she had harbored.

His own position was that of controlling her through fear, binding her with hatred, and utilizing the guarantee of her desires for revenge. From her perspective, it ought to have been satisfying to see him so cornered.

Only, the fact of the matter was that she had given many reactions that were not coherent with that line of thought.

In that case, just what were the true motivations hidden behind her contradictory attitude?

He had given up searching for that answer. —Only one thing, was certain.

Aldebaran: "—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition."

The advice given by Yae Tenzen had removed a single shackle that had been present within Aldebaran.

Though not deliberately self-imposed, it had been an subconsciously placed shackle, inhibitor, hurdle—psychological chains that had slammed the brakes on the overpowering quality of Aldebaran's Authority.

Now that he was free from those chains, the options available to Aldebaran expanded to an infinite domain—.

Aldebaran: "Target, twelve o'clock to three o'clock. —Fire, Alter."

"Aldebaran": "Alright, Origin."

Responding to the order without hesitation, “Aldebaran”, who had been waiting in the background, stretched out its wings.

Alter, it had expressed no confusion in regards to that alias. By way of the Book of the Dead, the update in his intentions had already been communicated. The alias Origin was also an easily understandable, but trivial matter.

Without the room to put his opinions on that alias into words, a white light—the Dragon’s breath was unleashed.

Aldebaran: “…”

The Divine Dragon’s dragonhusk, the tremendous might of its breath demonstrated the maximum capabilities of its specs, and proved to be a fine article that even the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea, had just barely managed to neutralize.

And on the current battlefield, with the Sword Saint absent—nay, on the area that could not even be described as a battlefield, the breath was unleashed, razing it to the ground; everything natural, everything man-made, and most notably, all life consisting of not just plants and animals, but humans too, was erased.

The range output of the Dragon’s fully-powered breath reached out to several kilometers, and anyone unfortunate enough to be engulfed by the light of ruin that arrived without giving any warning would cease to exist, lacking even the time to register pain.

—And now, passing the order to “Aldebaran”, Aldebaran had performed that deed.

Aldebaran: “…”

As commanded, twelve o’clock to three o’clock—scorching down the area signified by directions corresponding to the positions on a clock, it reduced all who stood in its path to naught.

In all likelihood, the lives lost could not have been counted in just the hundreds or the thousands, but numbered well in the realm of the tens of thousands.

???: “Ha-ha-haa~, well done~!”

Laying his eyes upon that which could only be described as tyranny, the act of brutally trampling all in one’s path, the suspended Roy Alphard snickered in amusement. Strung up with his arms bound, Roy placed the soles of his free feet together, thus cheering as he clapped not his hands, but his feet.

But, while nobody aside from Roy contributed to that noisy applause, none of the members present there appeared to criticize Aldebaran’s actions.

Present instead, was delight, understanding, subordinance, and fear —all were his henchmen, even the ones who had no say in the matter.

Thus, basking in their gazes, Aldebaran looked up to the sky.

Aldebaran: “…”

With the Dragon’s breath unleashed, not only was the land scorched, but signs of its influence appeared in the sky and surrounding atmosphere as well.

With the clouds torn asunder, and the rain and wind that were supposed to have occurred banished from the land, the traces of the Dragon had been deeply engraved; ravages of the Dragon’s rage, so to speak.

Naturally, there existed no living beings that did not fear the ire of the overwhelming existence that was the Dragon.

Because there existed no beings that could fight back against a rampaging Dragon mad with rage, it was an ironclad rule that when faced with the Dragon’s fury, all forms of life would keep their heads held low, attempting to conceal their presence, and waiting for the storm to pass.

—Therefore, the likes of birds and bugs promptly approaching the ravages of that rage, was far beyond unnatural.

Aldebaran: “Looks like a miss.”

Seeing a flock of birds assembling around the area scorched by the breath to ascertain the damages, Aldebaran muttered words that would fade away in the confines of his mouth.

The vast majority of animals were straightforward, and faithful to their instincts. If that was being distorted, and they were acting in a manner dishonest to their instincts, it was proof of some sort of unnatural interference.

That was to say, it was proof that the existence enacting that unnatural interference had survived.

Ascertaining that, Aldebaran would—

Aldebaran: “—Next.”

Muttering that, he unwrapped the poisonous drug package within his mouth, and gulped down the deadly bane.

And then—

× × ×

Aldebaran: “Target, three o’clock to six o’clock. —Fire, Alter.”

Subsequently, upon returning to his restart point, he oriented himself towards the next area, and instructed the Dragon to trample it down.

2

Aldebaran: “Target, six o’clock to nine o’clock. —Fire, Alter.”

Aldebaran: “Target, six o’clock to eight o’clock. Slight adjustment.”

Aldebaran: “Target, six o’clock to seven o’clock.”

Aldebaran: “Target, lock to seven o’clock. Adjust range output, breath to eighty percent.”

Aldebaran: “Seventy percent.”

Aldebaran: “Sixty percent.”

Aldebaran: “Sixty-five percent.”

Aldebaran: “Sixty-five point five percent.”

Aldebaran: “—Sixty-five point five percent, confirmed.”

3

—Seven-hundred and fourteen.

Having been told that his way of doing things was too clean by Yae, Aldebaran revised his thoughts.

Gaining awareness of the pride he had been blind to, he earnestly examined what was truly necessary in order to accomplish his objective, and arrived at an answer.

—The no-killing restriction.

From the moment Aldebaran had decided on the removal of Natsuki Subaru, and resolved himself to abide by his own purpose of creation, he had established that as the minimum obligation he would need to uphold.

From this world, where many had already been lost, with even she who had embodied the sun having disappeared, he would not cause anything more to be lost; so he had decided.

But, by overly adhering to that vow, Aldebaran had subconsciously placed a shackle on his own Authority.

In order to uphold his vow that he would not take the life of anyone, he had ended up imposing the same binding to the journey itself.

With Aldebaran’s Authority—with his Territory, the events that transpired in the repeating world would endlessly be made to have never happened until that Matrix was finally marked with a full-stop.

In that case, so long as the records balanced out to “no-killing” by the end, he would not need to worry about deaths during the process.

By keeping that conclusion outside of his conscious awareness, Aldebaran had unwittingly levied that shackle upon himself. In order to finally remove it, Aldebaran had continued to waste time in futility. —No, without Yae's words, he might have still been none the wiser.

Aldebaran: "I knew that the nii-san was trying to use his Divine Protection to whittle us down. The problem lies in his meticulousness and the unlimited hand of cards; it really seemed like there was no way to avert that, but…"

No longer bound by that shackle, Aldebaran surmounted that challenge with brute force.

Nothing about it was difficult. His pursuer was borrowing the eyes and agency of insects, fish, and other small animals in order to get a grasp on the movements of Aldebaran's group and enact various forms of sabotage upon them. But, considering what he conjectured to be the extent of effectiveness of his opponent's Divine Protection, even if his directions to the animals had an immediate response akin to telepathy, it was not as absolute as something like brainwashing.

Every single time, their pursuer would have needed to directly issue a command.

And in order to enact that, the commanding pursuer himself would have needed to be stalking Aldebaran's group while maintaining a reasonable distance. —Through the brute force of the Dragon's breath, he had deduced the position of their pursuer.

Aldebaran: "Narrowing down the area using clock positions, and measuring the distance with the depth of the breath. Given that we're doing something erratic, he can't afford to withhold his hand in order to get a grasp of what happened. Then, the act of playing his hand is proof that the nii-san made it out unharmed. But, what about when he doesn't play his hand?"

His hand—without the leeway to mobilize the troops he had allied with his Divine Protection, it would have served as proof that he had vanished from the world.

With that ascertained, Aldebaran had regressed his Territory, closed in on the direction of his pursuer's presence, measured the distance, and finally managed to identify the opponent's position with utmost precision. Of course, during that process, in the mountains, forest, and even some towns, a great number of lives had been sacrificed, but—absolutely all of that, had been made to have never happened.

By balancing the records in the end using his Territory, the casualties outside of Aldebaran numbered zero. —No, Aldebaran's Death was not counted, so the casualties numbered zero total.

Aldebaran: "Combined with when I was selecting the members for the Tower, one-thousand three-hundred and forty-seven… he really gave me one hell of a time."

There was nothing more exhausting than someone thought to have already been dealt with pulling the carpet out from under him yet again.

In that sense, it would have been no exaggeration to say that the pursuer—Otto Suwen, had given Aldebaran more trouble than either the Sword Saint or the Sword Demon had. If it had been his suggestion to send Emilia to Aldebaran and Wilhelm to Yae at the Royal Capital, then the damages he had caused this group amounted to far more than just Aldebaran's one-thousand three-hundred and forty-seven Deaths.

Of course, it was precisely because he had judged him to be such a large threat, that Aldebaran had spared no cards in his hand, thus succeeding in stringing up that formidable enemy.

Yae: "Al-sama, over here, over here~."

Waving her hand, Yae beckoned to Aldebaran and the rest from below. In accordance with Yae's call, "Aldebaran" perched down on the ground, and Aldebaran hopped off of its back.

Halfway up the mountainside, behind Yae, who had arrived first at the target point, was a green Internal Affairs Minister strung up to a tree and a ground dragon lying on its side with its limbs tied up.

Perhaps because the ground dragon had so fervently struggled against the steel thread bindings, its pale-blue dragonhide was stained with blood, and even now it continued to desperately writhe while panting in exasperation.

Aldebaran: “As expected, the loyalty of a ground dragon’s quite something. Thinking back, the current generation’s Patrasche was also like that.”

Yae: “The idea to make an example out of it flashed through my head, but it seems like he’s the type to just become even more stubborn instead of breaking, so I decided not to. How was Yae-chan’s judgement?”

Aldebaran: “I think you got the right answer. Besides, there’s no point in a warning if he can’t even see it.”

As Yae greeted him while tilting her head, Aldebaran scowled within his helmet. In his vision, present above the writhing ground dragon, the strung up Internal Affairs Minister—Otto, was cocooned in steel threads from his head down to the tips of his toes, which of course included his eyes and mouth; it was a state in which he could not do a single thing.

By nature, a single steel thread was so thin that one would need to strain their eyes to even ascertain its presence. Since they now appeared as an opaque tool of restraint, he could not imagine just how many had been wrapped around.

Yae: “Unable to get a glimpse of any light. Unable to even make a peep. It’d be possible to form communication with the outside through even just breathing, let alone whispers. And so, I’ve wrapped his entire body up with no gaps, save for a single airway connecting to his ankle. With this, he’ll be too busy focusing his breaths on clinging to survival to have any leeway to fill them with intent.”

Aldebaran: “…I know this isn’t about you getting revenge, and is instead just proof that you're taking precautions. After all, this nii-san would actually be capable of plotting something against us if we gave him any room to speak."

Yae: "I'd never operate on my personal grudges~. Yae-chan isn't that bad of a shinobi, y'know?"

Placing a finger to her cheek, Yae was in quite a good mood as she made a cutesy smile.

Given how much complete and utter hardship Otto, the harassment-specialist, had put them through until now, she would have likely had a substantial amount of resentment built up even if she said she bore no personal grudges. To begin with, the industry leaders of carrying out harassment and conducting wars of attrition against enemies were none other than the shinobi.

Aldebaran: "So now that you've finally dealt with that, I guess you'd be in a good mood, yeah?"

Yae: "Urghh~, you really are a gentleman who can't understand a woman's heart, Al-sama. It feels good to pin down an opponent who persistently made attacks of the nastiest kind in a sly, exhaustive, relentless manner, y'know?"

Aldebaran: "Isn't that pretty much exactly what I said?"

Yae: "But, the number one thing is that you're finally acting as the monster you truly are, Al-sama. Without a shred of concern for your trivial humanity, you've fully embraced the monster within."

Aldebaran: "…"

Yae: "For that reason, even something like having Vol-sama fling me at full strength was nothing so outlandish."

Aldebaran: "Seems like you've got your fair share of complaints with that strategy…"

As Yae was correcting Aldebaran's mistaken impression, she added that bit onto the end.

With the modification to how he utilized the Territory, he had located their pursuer's whereabouts. After completing that, they had needed the quickest means to reach their opponent before he could discern their intentions—that had resulted in having the airborne "Aldebaran" hurl Yae to the target position.

On top of being crude, it was a plan that had greatly imperiled Yae's life, but because the opponent was located in the mountains, which provided a great amount of buffering material, Yae, with her ability to create cushioning with her Steel Thread Technique, was deemed to be the most suitable candidate for it.

Yae: "Even though this duty was most suited to someone who won't die no matter how far they're hurled away, there was no way we could entrust it to Heinkel-sama in his current state."

Aldebaran: "An old man-shaped hole might have bored through the mountain while the old man remained alive and well, but you're right about entrusting any important duties to him with his condition right now."

Between Heinkel and Felt, a considerably deadly rift had formed. In response to that issue, he had worked out a countermeasure to stabilize it for the time being, but that had incurred "Aldebaran's" displeasure, and was nothing more than a temporary bandaid solution.

Because it was the type of problem that could resurge for whatever reason, Aldebaran and Yae had decided that it would be best to not touch on it for the time being.

Anyhow—

Aldebaran: "—Finally, it's checkmate."

With Otto's movements and resistance sealed, Aldebaran looked up at the opponent whose current state ought to be dubbed a silver chrysalis, and keenly felt the victory he had attained in this round of the game, which had gone on now for a long, long time.

However, the opponent Aldebaran was playing against was not just

Otto, it was a multifaceted bout against many challengers on a Kingdom-wide, even world-wide scale. Just because he had managed to make it through a single round successfully, did not mean he could continue to carry that around as a source of satisfaction.

Above all, in order to ensure that they would never make a comeback as a challenger, he would need to be thorough with their elimination.

Yae: “Though y’know, even if I cut away his eyes, ears, tongue, and limbs, I’d still technically be obeying your orders, Al-sama~.”

Aldebaran: “—Yae.”

Yae: “Fi~ne, Al-sama’s so sca~ry.”

To inflict wounds beyond any hope of recovery, thereby forcing withdrawal from the front lines with only their lives intact; doing so would be naught but a hollow pretense.

For Aldebaran, the no-killing restriction was not something so flexible that he could say he kept it so long as nobody died, and it would be troubling if it was. That sort of thing was tantamount to declaring that world peace could be achieved by cutting off the arms and legs of everyone in the world.

Hence, Aldebaran would not rob Otto Suwen of his eyes, tongue, arms, or legs. Instead, that which he would take from him—was his reason for fighting.

Aldebaran: “—Roy, I’m relaxing the curse mark’s functionality. It’s your time to take the stage.”

2

Aldebaran: “—Roy, I’m relaxing the curse mark’s functionality. It’s your time to take the stage.”

Every inch of his body constrained, Otto Suwen, with certitude, heard the pronounced voice of the opponent looking up towards him. —On merely one point, Aldebaran and the rest were mistaken about the efficacy of Otto's Divine Protection of the Soul of Language.

The Soul of Language, namely that which was called voice, was the reverberation of sound. Those reverberations would always touch Otto's body should he be within range of its reach, even if his ears were plugged. The Divine Protection of the Soul of Language did not translate sounds that entered the ear. It sensed and picked up the reverberations of intent that touched the entity named Otto.

Therefore—

Roy: "What a roundabout, strange coincidence, isn't it, Onii-san? Even though both Ley and Louis missed out on eating Onii-san despite desiring to in Pristella, in the end you've been set on the dining table before us like this, so it would seem-."

The voice of the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony licking his lips, Roy Alphard, was also detected by Otto as a thing of certainty.

Otto: "…"

However, to much frustration from the depths of his heart, there was no longer anything Otto could do.

He had still been detecting the voices in his environs through the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language, but with his mouth obstructed, his limbs restrained, and now obturated from even transmitting his will, Otto was helplessly powerless.

Frufoo: "What are you doing, to laddie… stop, please stop…!"

He heard the painful beseeching of an agonizing Frufoo immediately below his hanging feet.

For the moment, it seemed Aldebaran and his group did not intend to inflict any further harm onto Frufoo or much less, take her life. Hence, he wished for Frufoo to quietly wait for the storm drifting through to pass. That was his utmost desire at that moment.

The rest—

Otto: “—Hk.”

With a voice that fell short of being voiced, Otto’s heart consternated in trepidation for his comrades not present here.

Emilia and Ram, Petra and Meili, Rem, Clind, and Roswaal, he had heard that even people of the Felt Camp were cooperating. They would surely come up with an ingenious plan. Had it been possible, Otto wished to give a serious blow to the opponent with his own hands even on Garfiel’s behalf.

Moreover, for the captured duo of Subaru and Beatrice—.

Roy: “How sad, Onii-san. How painful, Onii-san. But-, we’ll treat those cries of agony alternating in joys and sorrows altogether and give them love-! After all, this world is gluttonous drinking-! Gluttony-!”

In lento, he sensed the polluted, violated appetite of Gluttony drawing near him, creeping close to him. Without any means to resist, Otto accepted it; there was nothing he could do besides be chewed and digested.

Thus, for however long, Otto Suwen continued to pray. Continued to wish. Continued to dream.

For his own final stratagem, to fall into place—.

Roy: “—Well then, let’s eat-!”

3

Roy: “Thank you for the treat-.”

With the efficacy of the Authority of Gluttony invoked, the hanging Otto Suwen was devoured.

The deed was unaccompanied by any befitting effects generated, no shining visual effects; nothing so flashy or gaudy occurred. In only quiet and solemnity, the feast dished up onto the platter settled into the stomach of an ill-mannered diner. —What had transpired was merely this commonplace meal.

Yae: “Although I barely saw anything just now, it truly feels like foul play. The feeling of tension in the threads vanished in an instant, after all.”

Her voice laden with unhiding repugnance, Yae whispered whilst touching the rings that sent forth the steel threads.

What her words suggested, was that the opponent in bind—Otto Suwen, his resistance in order to escape from the constraints of the steel threads had disappeared.

That was evidence of the efficacy of Roy Alphard’s Eclipsing manifesting. “1”

Aldebaran: “On top of that, we still remember that nii-san. —As promised, you only ate the Memories; seems like you really held yourself back.”

Roy: “Ah-hahaa~, what’s with that, so short on gratitude and wonderment~?! Just so you know, separating just the Name or just the Memories and chewing it is pretty tough, you know? It’s trouble like sifting through the grilled ingredients in between a sandwich without opening up the bread, you see~.”

Aldebaran: “Don’t care. Don’t do it and you die, that’s the end of that. Separate and eat quickly and cleanly.”

Aldebaran snorted at Roy as he spoke of his Authority’s hardships in front of Otto Suwen, limp and motionless whilst entangled in the steel threads.

In reality, Aldebaran had no intention of hearing out Roy’s advocation of what a high deed it was. —Should he blunder, he would simply die; his soul scorched by the effects of the curse mark engraved on his body, bound by an Oath with Aldebaran.

Of course, it would be a problem for Aldebaran were Roy to die at this time, so he did intend to redo at every instance of failure and search for a way to ensure Roy did well.

Yae: “Al-sama~, as for that Sin Archbishop, isn’t he getting a bit cocky? If you’re going to restrain his actions with the effects of the curse mark, then rather than appeasing, persuading, and winning over his heart, wouldn't you have had ways to make him abide more suitably with lesser strings attached?"

Aldebaran: "Engraving a curse mark isn't as light a job as you're thinking it to be. To begin with, in curse marks bound by Oaths, there's a risk for the engraving party as well. The opportunity for engraving a curse mark is limited to exactly one time in someone's entire life. It's a trump card to make the kinds of people who won't ever listen seriously obey."

Yae whispered into Aldebaran's ear, who pressed her forehead whilst answering.

As the name suggested, the engraving of a curse mark, a kind of Curse Art, was a deed that had existed before magic and Curse Arts branched into separate sects; the nature of it was rather close to the origin of magic. Speaking further of the impression given by the curse mark based on its impression, the one who taught Aldebaran how to engrave a curse mark and the nature of them, would likely bestow the plight of a half-day long tedious lecture about it.

Roy: "For you to be so kind and use that valuable opportunity for us…! Very nice, so nice, quite nice, how very nice, really nice, isn't it nice, as we can believe it to be nice, gluttonous drinking-! Gluttony-! By this point, that is love, isn't i~t…?"

Yae: "Wha?! Are you saying over this adorable, sexy, and devoted maid that is Yae-chan, you prefer the nasty-teethed Sin Archbishop?! Al-sama, you infidel!"

Aldebaran: "Right back at you, stop matching paces and linking up with the Sin Archbishop…"

Aldebaran winced at the combo of the blabbering Roy and the yabbering Yae.

On Yae's end, she likely had had no intention of getting along with Roy there, or ever getting along with him for that matter, but the way she utilized anything to sway Aldebaran's heart was truly befitting of a shinobi. On the other hand, Roy bore the attitude of being conversible and comprehending for a Sin Archbishop, and had almost bestowed him with that misunderstanding.

However, he mustn't misunderstand. For Aldebaran, both Yae and Roy were equivalent; used for his goals, and targets of fear for potentially backstabbing him depending on the situation.

And that was—

Aldebaran: "Roy, don't get too cocky. Start talking, what was the nii-san you just ate scheming? That's what I fed him to you for."

A chilly warning was issued by Aldebaran, who kept Roy contained well within attack range.

His restraints unfastened, Roy had gotten his fractured limbs restored by the healing magic of "Aldebaran", but neither had he gained trust in the slightest nor was he permitted freedom of action. However, in the direction the plan would now head towards for the endgame, it was not realistic to carry a tied up Roy along.

As an example, should he ever seek to rely on Roy's Authority as Gluttony like he just had, to keep him turned face-down as a card that could not be used immediately would be some excessively maladroit handling. Not in the slightest loosening his vigilance towards Roy, what was necessary were further arrangements for a policy to subdue Roy.

Fortunately, the curse mark was sufficiently fulfilling that duty.

Yae: "Though, it would be nice if he could tell us something useful~."

As she spoke, the vigilant Yae tugged on her slender finger, tightening the invisible steel thread to keep Roy in check.

It had been none other than Yae who had disapproved of utilizing Roy's Authority until the very end, and while she did welcome Aldebaran's declaration that he would unshackle himself based on her advice, she still fervently insisted that he free himself from the chains that were the "no-killing" restriction itself.

In reality, if Aldebaran did actually call off the "no-killing" restriction as she had insisted, and freely made use of the life-or-death power he had over all his opponents, his objective in and of itself would be accomplished rather quickly. To do that, all he would need to do is have "Aldebaran" shoot out its breath in all directions, never allowing any enemy to draw near.

However, Aldebaran refused to do that, and instead—he insisted on adding new options, that of permitting Death as part of the process, and making use of Roy Alphard's Authority.

As a matter of fact, this was the implementation of a forbidden technique: that of proactively utilizing a Sin Archbishop's Authority.

It was an act that could not be compared to Aldebaran exercising his own Authority, which occupied an unenumerated position, so to speak. Those inherited evils, the Authorities that had given rise to a great number of tragedies and sacrifices until now; to make use of them for one's own purposes, simply because it proved convenient.

Likely, outside of Aldebaran, that was a trespass that only a single other individual had perpetrated since the dawn of Witch Factors in this world.

Ultimately, that was the extent to which such conduct crossed the line.

If he could not attain results proportional to the misdeed he had committed, there would have been no meaning in his decision to go against the sun—.

Aldebaran: "So, let's hear it. We deliberately ruined our opponent's life. You're not gonna tell me that there's nothing…"

Roy: "Ahh~, hold on hold on. Wish you'd not rush us like that~. It seems you're misunderstanding, but even we can't all of a sudden comprehend absolutely everything about the one ju~st eaten. Things that have been known since the beginning, don't really spring to mind unless the scenario deems it necessary, you know? Same as that…"

Aldebaran: “—I ain’t gonna tell you twice.”

Roy: “…Yes yes, we’re saying we understand. Let’s see, let’s see, hu~h. This onii-san was more abound in life experience than expected, so even we are a bit surprised—”

After making a plethora of excuses, Roy concentrated on recalling the Memories of the freshly eaten Otto. Roy was probably commenting on a mix of the many ups and downs in the life of Otto, who possessed the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language, and the extraordinary quantity of voices he had come to hear.

However, there was a sudden pause in Roy’s tasteless words, incurring Aldebaran’s suspicion.

Unmistakably, that was proof that he had struck a Memory that caught his attention—

Aldebaran: “What is it, what’d you find?”

Roy: “Haha-, it seems we were more careful than expected. —There is a foolproof for the scenario in which he was compromised.”

Aldebaran: “…”

Foolproof—a safety measure to defend against any foolish mistakes.

As soon as Roy’s lips formed those words, a terrible chill ran down Aldebaran’s spine.

Not a countermeasure for an oncoming assault, but a countermeasure for after he was compromised.

If Otto Suwen had prepared such a thing, then it would be happening at any moment now.

Aldebaran: “Yae! We need to hurry up and—”

A withdrawal from the premises, or a regression of the situation via suicide.

As two possible options came to his mind, Aldebaran mobilized before deciding on his counterplay. In a sense, it was successful, and in another sense, it had led to failure.

That was—

???: “—It is a pleasure to meet you, Aldebaran-sama.”

The sweet voice of a girl struck Aldebaran’s earlobes as if it were a surprise attack.

The interloper had appeared in quite literally the blink of an eye, and by making an entrance without having given any preface, his instincts did not even have the time to sound the alarm bells.

That blue-haired girl, having altered her appearance and garment since her time in the Vollachian Empire, was not something he could bear the sight of. —That was something he only realized right after he had caught sight of her waving the skirt of her maid outfit.

That instant, his mind was rapidly threatened by the name, existence, and nature of the maid girl.

Aldebaran: "…"

With her Name and Memories having been eaten by the Authority of Gluttony, the girl's name had been erased from the register of Od Lagna, where the names of all life were engraved; with that having been regurgitated due to the malicious intentions of Bizarre Eating, that which Aldebaran had disregarded as something that would manifest no meaningful damages, now ruptured through his mind.

Forcibly overwhelmed by an impact that compelled him to recall her existence, Aldebaran, who was supposed to have shouldered a fate that would not permit his thoughts to ever come to a halt, had said thoughts left behind in the dust—

Yae: "—Al-sama!!"

As Yae promptly raised her voice, she reached her slender arm out towards Aldebaran. Whilst glimpsing those white fingers in the corner of his vision, Aldebaran found himself unable to move.

And in that immobile state, during the single second for which he had been dispossessed of his thoughts, the situation progressed.

—That instant, Aldebaran's body was detached from the space it had occupied up until a moment prior, and thrown out into the sky, basking in a ferocious wind.

Aldebaran: "…"

The sun for which he had ceased yearning cast its glaring radiance, searing Aldebaran's black eyes as he fluttered through the air. —This was now do-or-die for the Aldebaran Party; a critical juncture that had commenced without any forewarning.

—Thus, on the struggle for the Grand Mogolade Geyser, on the battle to decide the fate of the world here to come, the curtains now rose.

Chapter 40:
Flash Remnade

1

—Having fallen victim to Roy Alphard of Gluttony, Otto Suwen was forcefully removed from the battlefield.

As one blessed with the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language, the man who had accumulated its highest level of mastery in history had done exactly as he had proclaimed; humiliating Aldebaran's group, the enemies of the world, and inflicting great suffering upon them.

That was why the conclusion of his lonesome battle was brought about by a ruthless imprisonment that left no opening for counterattacks, leaving him completely helpless.

His words were sealed, his actions were sealed, his tricks were sealed, his wits were sealed; every weapon in his arsenal was sealed away, and finally, even the Memories that defined who he was were stolen away, thus was how Otto Suwen was utterly defeated.

When Aldebaran's group resolved to seal him away with such overwhelming force that gave no time to plan a countermeasure, even Otto found himself powerless, unable to resist.

Because it was impossible to predict exactly when and where his opponents would launch a counterattack, he was unable to construct a trap zone using his signature Divine Protection.

And so, there was absolutely nothing Otto Suwen could have done upon being attacked—his last resort merely being a "desperate struggle" in the event of an assault.

—He had simply left instructions for the Zodda bugs to fly off en masse so that his location would have been revealed in the event he was defeated.

???: “Al knew Rem before they met in the Empire… before Gluttony even ate her Memories. There’s no doubt about it.”

That was when the Imaginary Subaru voiced his opinion, while they were in the midst of planning a surprise attack.

With his arms and legs crossed as he sat in midair, Subaru’s stern face caused Petra to recall the events inside Subaru’s memories, in the Royal Capital where Al and Rem had crossed paths.

That was when Subaru made a major blunder at the castle and was desperately trying to make up for it.

Although Petra did feel that Subaru’s reckless behavior back then was quite bad, she did not feel completely disillusioned towards him. However, Subaru himself remembered it as an utterly humiliating experience that made him squirm just thinking about it. In fact, everyone who was there must have looked down on Subaru’s reckless behavior, so the only person who would not feel disillusioned by his actions, if Petra were excluded, would be Rem, who had been blindly devoted to him as far back as then.

Be that as it may, Subaru, unable to escape the cycle of negative emotions, had visited Priscilla’s mansion in search of a way to save Emilia, who was being attacked by the Witch Cult.

There, Subaru received an incredibly harsh and cold response from Priscilla, but the crucial connection between Al and Rem was revealed right there as he was being expelled from the mansion.

He did not know the specific reason, however—

“Subaru”: “Al mistakenly called Rem by Ram’s name and was extremely shocked by that fact. When I asked Rem about it, she said she had never met him before.”

Petra: “So Al-san knew about the two of them beforehand? Perhaps he researched the rival camps for the Royal Selection… or something like that?”

“Subaru”: “So you’re saying Al could have been in charge of the Priscilla Camp’s countermeasures against the other Royal Selection camps? I don’t think that’s impossible, but it doesn’t really matter. The important thing is that Al knew Rem. In other words—”

Petra: “Just like with all of us, when Al-san sees Rem-neesama, his Memories should get all mixed up.”

“Subaru”: “Exactly. —I would call it a Flash Remnade.”“

With a silent snap of his fingers, Subaru winked, and Petra gave him a thumbs up.

To be honest, Petra was reluctant to treat Rem like a flash grenade, but she and the others had already confirmed that there was no way to counteract the effects of Memories returning.

As seen with Petra and the Subaru within her, or Ram, the deeper the relationship and attachment, the greater the impact, but even the slightest opening was still an opening.

All that was left was to take advantage of that opening—

Petra: “Let’s show Al-san. —Just how angry we are.”

3

—Let us here give an explanation for the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, Roy Alphard.

His nature bearing the disposition of Bizarre Eating, wielding the birther of myriads of tragedies, the Authority of Gluttony, Roy had completely incapacitated Otto Suwen, tormentor of the Aldebaran Party. His Eclipsing had not only incapacitated Otto, but chewed and digested his twenty-two-year-old walk of life, assimilating his joys, his angers, his sorrows, the culmination of all that which was his, into a heterogeneous blend, which was eaten up in one breath from atop the platter.

Ringing his throat, upon finishing the incorporeal meal, Roy tasted the life of Otto Suwen, commanding a greater precision and degree of freshness than a deep read of a Book of the Dead, tasting an adequate breadth of alternating joys and sorrows for it, having overcome so-so trials and tribulations, with somewhat rich seasoning and flavor, he bestowed to it an evaluation of two stars.

By evaluating what was eaten this way, it felt as though he had fallen heir to the spirit of Gourmet belonging to his sibling who had already lost his life, Ley Batenkaitos, but setting that aside, to eat one's Memories meant it was possible to know that being's way of thinking and philosophy, and to its extreme, while in the midst of battle, even learn the orders of things that were planned, what had been schemed and plotted.

Therefore, originally, despite the aftertaste of triumph and sense of accomplishments felt after Otto's defeat, sensing the ambush planned for the subsequent instant should have been a simple and spontaneous task to accomplish.

However, it did not transpire so. —Because Otto had not shared plans with his comrades about what tangible actions they would take after he had been incapacitated.

Merely, Otto Suwen had solemnly believed.

Should he just extend a signal for the moment he would comprehensibly be incapacitated, his comrades would not let it go to waste.

Because he, devoid of plans or anything such, bet everything on just powerful bonds—

???: "—It is a pleasure to meet you, Aldebaran-sama."

Unmistakably, it had happened in the blink of an eye.

A closing, and opening of the eyes. At the presence of the blue-haired girl who had interloped in that instant, while a matter of course for Aldebaran, neither Yae, nor Roy, nor even "Aldebaran" could react.

An outsider who was not supposed to be there, had suddenly appeared without warning.

That alone was enough to pry an instant from veteran soldiers, but in this scene, the one onto which that had been most lethal, was Aldebaran, for whom it did not end with a mere instant.

Aldebaran: “…”

Yae naturally had no acquaintance with her, Roy was exempt due to it being his own Authority, and “Aldebaran”, while sharing in his Memories, possessed a fundamentally different soul; thus it was a phenomenon that did not occur for any of them.

Stimulating the black-stained Memories etched into his soul, alongside the sensation of something that had been removed being forced back into his brain, Aldebaran’s consciousness went white.

Regardless of who had defined it as such, it was a flash grenade of Memories.

???: “—Al-sama!”

A shrill, frantic voice called to him, and hands that reached out from beyond his white-stained vision grabbed hold of him. However, that did not save Aldebaran from his predicament.

Aldebaran: “…”

The legs that ought to have been firmly planted on the ground hurtled through the air, and as Aldebaran basked in a ferocious wind, he lost his sense of up, down, left, and right, and realized his body had begun revolving.

Unable to control his body, still lording overhead was the blue sky wherein shone the glaring sun—as that radiance scorched his black eyes, Aldebaran realized something.

—Through some means, he had been teleported straight into the sky, thrown outside of his Territory.

Aldebaran: “—Hk! Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition.”

Reestablishing the Territory that had been forcibly severed, Aldebaran grit his teeth.

Forced to go along with the opponent's plans, he had been driven to update his Matrix. —No longer could he return to before the surprise attack a moment prior.

But, if he lagged behind in his decision to update it, Aldebaran would have been defeated with nothing he could do in return.

Aldebaran's Authority was invincible, but that was entirely within the set bounds of his established Territory. Were he to perish outside of those bounds, he would be the same as the many lives who were not afforded any second chances.

Aldebaran: "…"

Digesting the circumstances he had been placed in, Aldebaran's consciousness concentrated on reality.

Given that he had been forced to update his Matrix, to Aldebaran, everything from here on out would be both a treasure and a calamity, a tailwind and a headwind, a virtue and an evil.

Aldebaran: "Sky…!!"

The roaring hum of the wind, the violent sense of suspension that seemed to strike his body; the fact that he was falling from such a high altitude despite having no memory of being sent up there, meant that the due procedures had been omitted.

For a moment, what flashed through Aldebaran's mind was the Authority of the strongest Witch, but that could not be it. —If the opponent had truly been that Witch, the phenomenon that occurred would have differed. He would not have been thrown out into open air like this, and above all, Aldebaran would have been killed a hundred times over before he could even blink.

Hence, he could eliminate that possibility from the multitude of worst-case scenarios.

As he narrowed down the possibilities, he gathered his surrounding situation in parallel. At present, if there were any irregularities nearby Aldebaran as he was being jostled by the wind, that would be—

???: “—Al-sama.”

Tightly grabbing onto Aldebaran’s single arm and clinging on, was Yae.

Just before he had been thrown out into the sky, she had pounced on Aldebaran just as he had frozen up from having eaten the flashbang of Memories, and thus had been sent up from the forest to the sky along with him.

Whether he ought to count that as a blessing or a curse, Aldebaran mentally separated the things he could and could not do now that Yae was here, and decided on the first action to take.

That was—

Yae: “I’ll steady our posture! Al-sama, don’t part from me—”

Aldebaran: “Obugh.”

Simultaneous to Yae embracing him and attempting to form some sort of countermeasure against falling, Aldebaran unwrapped the drug package within his mouth, and gulped down the poison.

He could tell that Yae had widened her crimson eyes, and was looking at him with an expression of surprise. But, given that he had already ended up taking a lethal dose, there was no helping it.

Yae: “I’ll ask later.”

Blood frothed at the corners of his mouth, and tasting rusted iron as that mercilessly defiled the inside of his helmet, Aldebaran’s consciousness was crushed by the wind—

× × ×

Aldebaran: “—Hk.”

It was something he had known would happen, but reality seemed to follow up by greeting him with the howling wind.

When he opened his shut eyelids, ever present there was the odious radiance of the sun—as it glared down at him intently, Aldebaran grasped that he was surrounded by several hundreds of meters of sky.

Aldebaran: “You’ve gotta be kidding me.”

Warping, instantaneous travel, teleport. —No matter how one chose to express it, the result was the same; in the sense of manipulating physical space, that which fell in the realm of Yin Magic was a hyper spell that necessitated all sorts of conditions be met.

If one carefully constructed the technique and erected a field wherein it was etched, it would be possible to create a limited warp connected by two doors through that field. Or probably even without advanced preparations, if a caster could simply visualize the coordinates of a destination, and constructed the technique to send their target there with the preparedness to fully expend their own Gate, they might have been able to issue just a one-way ticket.

× × ×

Ultimately, the phenomenon that had sent Aldebaran and Yae into the sky was at an impossible level of difficulty even if technically achievable through magic, which meant that some other form of foul play was involved.

Not once had he gotten word of a Divine Protection that could physically interfere with others to such an extent.

Of course, like in the case of Reinhard, Divine Protections thought to be trivial could be implemented in an unusual way, and there were also those who would end up tailoring them into dreadful weapons of war, but—

Aldebaran: “—This is different. But, if it’s an Authority…”

As far as Aldebaran knew, the existing Authorities of Wrath, Gluttony, and Lust belonged to the Sin Archbishops, while Sloth and Greed were both in the possession of Natsuki Subaru.

Excluding Aldebaran’s Authority, which ought to be classified as all manners of unenumerated, supernumerary, and appropriated, the leftover possibilities were Pride, as well as Vanagloria and Tristitia. —The last two were supposed to be unusable by anyone, so the only candidate remaining was Pride.

× × ×

Aldebaran: “Pride has come? Sprung up? Gotten involved? —Nah, that ain’t what matters here.”

Be it someone Aldebaran knew who had been chosen as Pride, or be it someone he did not know who had gotten involved as Pride, that which he ought to focus on was the possibility that he had made an enemy of an Authority holder.

Save for Natsuki Subaru and Reinhard, the only variables that could pose a threat to Aldebaran were unmistakably those who held Authorities—none other than those destroyers of concepts, permitted to bend the very rules of the world, trampling upon them as they pleased.

× × ×

Aldebaran: “—Alright, settled down.”

Are you finally done panicking after being forced to go along with your enemy’s plans? Feeling as if he heard those words voiced by the roaring wind, Aldebaran gave his reply.

In order to be able to do so, Aldebaran had sorted out the situation in his head.

Of course, the actual circumstances of being thrown out into the sky, the regret he had about Yae having come along with him, and the sensation of his consciousness being whited-out by the resurgence of Memories, in reality, none of that had changed.

But, that was a cheap price to pay if he did not die for real. Such was Aldebaran’s life.

In exchange for that dirt-cheap price, he could easily afford to let his head, body, and mind take a breather.

???: “—Al-sama.”

Yae grabbed onto Aldebaran’s single arm, and seeing her tied-up hair violently fluttering like a dog’s tail in good spirits, Aldebaran advanced his thoughts onto the next phase.

With both himself and Yae alive, they would need to land on the ground.

For that purpose—

Yae: “I’ll steady our posture! Al-sama, don’t part from me—”

Aldebaran: “Nah, that’s my line.”

As Yae enthusiastically tried to initiate her own measures after being thrown high into the sky, Aldebaran hindered her by forcibly pulling her into his own chest. Because he had used his right arm to do so, he rapidly forged the usual stone prosthetic arm, and rose it aloft—that instant, a vehement impact struck his prosthetic arm from above, adding speed to their free fall.

Heavily reverberating across the artificial arm, was a blow from a dreadful and fiendish lump of iron. Mixing in with the tremendous voice of the wind, it was a threat present at the end of the clangoring chains, dancing like a writhing snake.

Contrary to its name, it was a spiked iron ball with a form molded to send people into an eternal sleep—

???: “—Prepare yourselves!”

On the opposite side of the iron ball that had smashed into him, descending was a blue-haired girl who appeared to carry the sun on her back. Having greatly diminished Aldebaran’s advantage, the opponent who had shot up the signal for the commencement of the battle—Rem bellowed.

Slowly protruding from her forehead was a single horn. It was a sign that she was of the Oni Clan, proof that she was a member of the race created to decisively purge this world of all traces of the Witch.

But even more than that, now that he had recalled her existence, it took on a different significance to Aldebaran.

That was—

Aldebaran: “To begin with, you’re not even supposed to be alive, Lil’ Miss Rem!!”

4

Leaping into the air with hardened resolve, the hem of her maid uniform fluttering behind her, Rem gripped the handle of the Morningstar tightly in her hand as she glared down at Al and his maid below.

—Up until this point, the surprise attack had gone perfectly according to plan.

By exposing Al to the sight of Rem, they robbed him of his ability to make decisions, rendering him frozen, and in that instant they utilized Compression in order to abduct him. This not only separated Al from his allies, but also trapped him in a position where he was prevented from moving right away—allowing for him to be successfully dragged out into the sky, a matter on which everyone had readily agreed.

When it came to the crucial timing of the aforementioned attack, Otto, who had been pursuing the Al Troupe while engaging them in guerilla warfare, had prepared a message to be delivered in the event that he was defeated; a precaution that proved invaluable.

That signal marked the defeat of the formidable Otto at the hands of the Al Troupe, and thus was tantamount to the moment in which their tension would ease, even if only slightly.

Rem: “Priscilla-san was one who showed me utmost kindness. As someone who cared deeply for that Priscilla-san, I cannot stand by and overlook Al-san’s outrageous actions any longer.”

When objections had been raised about Rem going to confront Al directly, Rem had chosen those words in order to express her own wishes.

Ultimately, while that was merely a matter of the mindset that formed the foundation of her resolve, it was also undoubtedly a display of Rem's true feelings, and the core of her unwavering motivation in facing this battle.

Of course, right beside that core was the presence of Subaru, who had been captured by Al. Rather, he might have actually been the core. —No, Priscilla-san was also the core after all, so there would just need to be two cores. She would have to apologize to Beatrice-sama later.

In any case, that determination of hers settled the matter of Rem's participation in the unit that would confront Al head-on.

Strategically speaking, there was no particular vision of Rem being particularly useful on any other battlefronts, but even aside from the initial disruption of Memories, there was more than enough of a possibility for Rem to be super effective against Al.

The specifics of that possibility were precisely—

Aldebaran: "To begin with, you're not even supposed to be alive, Lil' Miss Rem!!"

The moment the iron ball smashed down from the high skies, Al blocked the firm impact with a prosthetic arm forged of rock, shouting angrily as he caught sight of Rem.

Despite being buffeted by the roaring winds, Rem heard those words with clarity, thus convincing her of that which Petra had told her about the possible relationship between Rem and Al that she was not aware of.

Rem: "Although, Rem can't remember any such interactions between Al-san and her incompetent self…"

She had also checked with Ram, but it seemed that her only contact with Al was limited to one time in the Royal Capital before the Royal Selection officially began. It seemed they had not had a conversation memorable enough to leave an impression, and even what they had talked about remained ambiguous.

Likely, the point of contact between the sisters and Al was one-sided, perceived only by the other party.

But—

Rem: “That manner of speaking is truly hurtful! When we were attacked by Arakiya-san in Guaral, the ones who had saved us were you, Al-san, and—”

Pausing there, however, Rem firmly swallowed all her hesitations, and,

Rem: “—Priscilla-san, is that not right?!”

Deliberately bringing up Priscilla’s name, Rem had attempted to agitate Al.

For resorting to the worst, most underhanded tactics she could think of, Rem despised herself. However, thinking it necessary in order to put a stop to Al’s outrageous behavior, she steeled her body and heart as an Oni and fixed her stern gaze on him.

Aldebaran: “…”

In response to Rem’s provocation, Al did not raise his voice, instead choosing to maintain silence.

Within his jet-black iron helmet, Al’s expression remained hidden behind his visor, the light dwelling in his eyes was unknown. Even the amount of pain Rem’s words just now had inflicted upon him, everything remained unknown to her.

Rem: “—Here it comes!”

However, Rem did not wait for Al’s reaction, resuming her onslaught without granting him any time to rest.

Rem had already set her priorities. From the beginning, when compared to Ram, who displayed talent and genius a cut above the rest of all other beings in this world, Rem was clumsy, mediocre, and inferior in every way.

If Rem desired something beyond the reach of the average person, then she would just have to carefully select the best possible means for that end.

For the time being, Rem excelled at ignoring lower priorities in order to focus on her higher ones.

Rem: “Huma!”

Alongside the incantation, Mana interfered with the world, invoking the unreal phenomenon known as magic.

Unlike Emilia’s Huma, which manipulated heat and condensed moisture in the atmosphere to create ice, Rem specialized in the type of Huma that created water from nothing using magic, outputting that water as materialized ice from the outset.

Neither Huma was necessarily superior to the other, but the Emilia-type Huma, which utilized the moisture in the air, required less Mana and possessed the advantage of remaining in place after serving its purpose, allowing for it to be reused. On the other hand, the Rem-type Huma required more Mana because it created water from nothing, and after being used, it would return to Mana and leave no trace.

Based on that explanation alone, the Emilia-type Huma might seem to have the overwhelming superiority. However, the Rem-type Huma had its own powerful advantages.

This was due to the fact that it could create ice at any desired location and in any desired shape, regardless of the amount of moisture in the air or the quality of the water—

Rem: “—HAAAHHHH!!”

Kicking off the ice platform she had created in midair, Rem ferociously lunged toward Al and his companion.

By manifesting a Huma that was anchored in place, Rem created an impromptu platform capable of withstanding even her full-powered kicks. The power of the Morningstar, unleashed after gaining a momentary boost from the platform, was beyond comparison to that which only utilized the force generated by gyrating her body.

The iron ball spun violently as it hurtled toward Al, sparing no quarter.

Capable of easily crushing a human body upon direct impact, it was as if it was responding to the affection Subaru had shown by polishing it every day, closing in toward Al from Rem's hand with delight, closer, and closer, and closer—

???: "As if I'd let you."

At the moment of impact, the loving iron ball was halted by countless threads.

Upon closer inspection, that was the work of the crimson shinobi held in Al's arm, twisting her body to glare at Rem—she was a thread user without peer, subservient to Al.

The shinobi, embraced from behind by Al, weaved the threads she had extended from both hands into a net to softly catch the iron ball like a cushion.

Her skills were impressive, but that was not what caught Rem's attention.

In the first place, the plan behind this surprise attack was to completely isolate Al from his allies by throwing him out into the sky. For her to have intervened there, something was wrong with her. —No, it was mistaken to think that there was something wrong with her. Rem was well aware of why she had been able to do it.

Despite everyone else having been completely stunned by Rem's sudden appearance, the shinobi retained enough leeway for herself to reach her hands out, and channel it into practical action.

As for what had allowed her to do so—

Rem: "—That would be, love!"

Aldebaran: "Wrong!!"

Shinobi: “You’re wrong!!”

In response to Rem’s confident outcry, Al and the shinobi shouted back almost simultaneously.

Taking advantage of that opening, Rem forcefully pulled back the Morningstar that was about to be taken from her and retrieved the iron ball from the shinobi, who was reluctant to lose her balance. In preparation for her next attack, Rem created multiple new footholds, shot herself off them, and rapidly descended in pursuit of the two.

However—

Shinobi: “It’s scary when someone catches up to you, but when stretched too far, even a lead can become a shortcoming, y’know?”

As composure returned to the previously tense expression of the shinobi, she flashed a sweet smile as she shot out a thread. And the target of that thread, had been the foothold of ice that Rem had created midair.

Having been suddenly thrown out into the sky, Al and his shinobi had had no choice but to enter a freefall, but by anchoring onto the footholds created by Rem, they would be able to stabilize themselves.

From what she had heard, the shinobi’s skills far exceeded Rem’s own. If the opponent were able to compensate for the disadvantage she had been given, the gap in strength that ought to have been somewhat closed would be reopened in no time.

Rem: “Indeed, of this I am aware. I am full of shortcomings, after all.”

That was why Rem would not allow her opponents to compensate for their disadvantages.

Shinobi: “—Hk!”

Hearing Rem’s reply—no, feeling the sensation she had just grasped vanishing like mist, the shinobi’s expression once again lost its composure.

The foothold of ice she had attempted to use as an anchor point vanished as if it were a dream or an illusion. Of course, neither was it a dream, nor an illusion. It was Mana. Rem had simply returned it to being Mana at will.

Despite both being Huma, this was the main difference between the Emilia-type, which once frozen, stayed frozen, and the Rem-type, which froze only when desired and was easy to tidy up.

Rem: “Simply put, Rem’s version is more offensive.”

Right before Rem’s eyes, the shinobi lost the target upon which she was exerting strength, thus breaking her stance.

Holding onto the shinobi, Al was caught up in that as well, almost losing his balance, but he managed to reinforce the exterior of his cracked prosthetic arm, consecutively blocking a flurry of iron ball attacks unleashed by Rem, two, three times.

Thereupon—

???: “—Hiyah!!”

—Rising obliquely upwards from below, Emilia’s long leg mercilessly slammed into Al’s defenseless back with toes armored in a boot of ice.

5

—The division of the Aldebaran Troupe.

Against a group rebelling against the world to an extent that rivalled the Witch Cult, even surpassing it in terms of instantaneous velocity, that was a prerequisite that they absolutely could not afford to mess up.

The surprise tactic performed in order to meet that condition, had gone about ninety percent as planned. The ten percent miscalculation—how the presence of the shinobi who had chosen to go along with them would come into play, was something that wounded the plan as an uncertain variable, but overly worrying about it would just be all the more harmful.

Each of them would fulfill their own part to the utmost.

After all, without that sort of faith and resolve, the stratagem to stop the Aldebaran Troupe would not bear any fruit.

???: “—Tru~ly, everyone’s got the sort of look in their eyes that one can’t help but tremble, you kno~w.”

Pronouncing so whilst dangling his languidly hanging arms to and fro, the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, Roy Alphard, exhibited a sadistic smile as he surveyed his surroundings.

In his environs were shadows that appeared in succession as though substituting Aldebaran and the others immediately after they were hurled—astood there were warriors assembled to defeat the Aldebaran Troupe.

All of them cast gazes that stood their ground against the Sin Archbishop, to which Roy unwittingly licked his lips.

Roy: “How nice, so nice, perhaps it is nice. But you know, to gather in such large numbers, the combat power required for taking care of us might get rounded up altogether in one fell swoop, isn’t it?”

???: “—Hah. Likewise for you, how about showing some lovableness by cowering in fright a bit more? That is, if you do not wish to meet death the same way as your sibling, who perished at the Tower of sand.”

???: “On top of tha~t, do you people even have Witchbeast-chans in your strike zone, hmm~? If not the~n… you can think of me, as you people’s natural enemy~.”

Amidst the warriors, the shadow clutching her own elbows and the shadow combing down her three-strand braid responded so. Even in the face of their unmistakable hostility, Roy was unable to conceal a smile trembling in premonition of a banquet.

???: “Th-this isn’t a joke… can’t you all see the Divine Dragon here?! You know how much damage it did to the Royal Capital… there's no chance that you can win this!"

Contrary to the elated Roy, Heinkel's voice trembled with a face deathly pale.

As per his words, he stood right by the feet of the Divine Dragon while relying on its intimidation, and in response to the hostility that stared him down, he fervently raised his voice with a loathsome expression.

That figure ought to have been called "a man who borrowed the might of Dragons", but Heinkel's point was in fact not mistaken. The Divine Dragon possessed absolute power; if one were to stand in its way without a plan, what awaited them was a curtain's close of merciless annihilation.

???: "Tho', that's only if ya ain't got a plan."

Heinkel: "—Hk, the old giant."

???: "This old giant's seen the Demi-Human War. Never again will I give mercy ta those barin' their fangs against me. —I'll be havin' ya return Felt."

Before Heinkel as his breathing choked up and he averted his gaze, the giant stroked his bald head and declared such. At the giant's proclamation, Heinkel's cheeks tensed up, but, there was another figure that began to stir.

And that, was none other than the Dragon he had singled out earlier.

Dragon: "I dunno if I should be saying this, but it makes me damn nervous that we've been pushed to this extent. I'm keenly feeling what it means to make an enemy of the world."

Despite being a Dragon of such dignified appearance, it placed its hand on its head in a strangely human-like gesture.

While giving off a sense of presence such that the majority of those who lived in the Dragon Kingdom would prostrate themselves just by laying eyes upon it, the way it conducted itself made it seem like an entirely different thing.

At the very least, in the eyes of those who knew the real Divine Dragon, the sense of something being amiss was palpable.

???: “But then again, unlike the dignitaries of the Kingdom, I’m in no such panic about the image of the Divine Dragon crumbling, or of its brand value pluuumetting~. —Onlyyy~, I wonder about the one next to me? Wouldn’t you have quite a few reservaaations~?”

???: “No, Master, you needn’t worry. Groundless fear. It would be laughable for me to pile words onto a past that I have already shed. Feeble.”

Looking down on those who showed no fear before the dragonhusk that did not align with its own mind or stature, “Aldebaran” narrowed its golden eyes.

Among those standing in their way, attention began to converge on a small silhouette slowly stepping forward. Naturally, Roy and Heinkel also shifted their attention to that silhouette.

It was unclear how that individual had come to stand in that position, but strangely enough, they understood without the need for words to tell them. —That girl represented the will of everyone present.

At the center of everyone’s attention, the girl—Petra Leyte thrust her finger up towards the heavens, and spoke.

Petra: “—It’s all-out war. Be dolls and let yourselves get thoroughly defeated, alright?”

So she declared.

Chapter 41:
Apprise the Usurper

1

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never imbibe.

2

Petra: "—It's all-out war. Be dolls and let yourselves get thoroughly defeated, alright?"

Indeed, the moment Petra issued her declaration in the mountains from which Al had disappeared, palpable tension immediately began to swell, and then burst asunder.

That instant, the residual members of the Al Troupe who had been on guard from the sudden appearance of Petra and the rest—the Divine Dragon Volcanica, Roy Alphard of Gluttony, and Heinkel, all sprang into motion.

However, there existed not a shred of coordination between the three, with each of them acting independently.

Petra: "…"

Upon witnessing them all begin to move, Petra's first stratagem—nay, the first stratagem had been the Flash Remnade, prying away Aldebaran's consciousness using the presence of Rem, so this stratagem would serve as the second arrow.

It was a stratagem to cause the Al Troupe, composed of individuals who were each formidable opponents, to break apart into a disorderly crowd.

Petra: "Taking Al-san out of the picture right at the onset, and then utterly disorienting the remaining combatants. With that—"

???: "With a "ready, go!", everyone will start acting on their own!"

As the Imaginary Subaru's voice completed Petra's sentence, the Dragon, the Sin Archbishop, and Heinkel all conformed to their own individual senses of judgment.

In order to disarray their options as much as possible, they mobilized the bulk of their forces right at the outset.

Of course, this stratagem also came with a large risk that the Divine Dragon would dispose of all of them in one fell swoop, but—

Petra: "—Likely, the method Al-san used to enlist the Divine Dragon, was the same one used for me."

Such was Petra's conjecture on the betrayal of the highly esteemed Divine Dragon Volcanica.

Regarding the state of the Volcanica perched at the top of the Watchtower, from what Petra had heard from Emilia, she understood that the Dragon had grown senile after many long years. —The method of forcibly cramming "something" into the void of that consciousness, was something Petra understood better than anyone from her own experience.

Just as Petra housed Natsuki Subaru in part of her consciousness upon reading the Book of the Dead, there was a high chance that Volcanica now housed an existence cooperative to Al. And, that existence shared quite firmly in Al's objective, deciding to make an enemy of the world alongside him.

There did Petra stake her gamble. —On a vow of "no-killing", shared between Al and Volcanica.

Volcanica: "—Haahraan!!"

At the outset, the one to execute the first strike was the Divine Dragon, maneuvering its enormous body with agility.

The Dragon's mighty maw gaped wide open, and it unleashed a breath that shone with a light of destruction, reducing all to naught —such was not the case; instead, unleashed was a mist of fresh water manifested from the Dragon's vast Mana. Starting with Petra, it engulfed the Royal Selection Combined Forces, the "Aldebusters", in one fell swoop, moistening all of their bodies.

For a moment, confusion stirred due to uncertainty of the Divine Dragon's aim, but those doubts were quickly dispelled.

Petra: "…"

The sound of the atmosphere creaking struck upon their eardrums, and they were hindered from readying themselves immediately. Upon looking, Petra and the rest glimpsed that their moistened bodies had begun to glitter with frost, and that they were about to be flash-frozen—

???: "—Ul Goa."

Within an instant, the forest, upon which a white fog was adrift, was overturned by a blazing red conflagration.

The freezing via dense mist that the Divine Dragon had aimed for was suppressed by the power of a swelling flame that seemed to enshroud the entirety of the visible surroundings, instantly thawing the glaciation and even drying the moistened bodies in the blink of an eye.

The one who accomplished that feat stood at the center of the formation with a finger raised, having obstructed the Divine Dragon's aim with a single incantation; and while his personality was just the worst, his skills were that of the greatest Magician in the Kingdom—Roswaal L. Mathers.

Needless to say, the higher the level of magic, the more delicate control it required.

On top of having immediately responded with magic of the Ul-tier, which by no means was easily usable by anyone, the glaciation of all present had been utterly annulled, even going so far as to dry their clothes whilst leaving not a single burn; it truly was a divine feat.

That Roswaal achieved such feats within a single breath left even the Divine Dragon, having lived since times of yore, utterly aghast.

Thereupon—

???: “That which you ought to focus on is this. Concentration.”

The quiet and courteous voice was accompanied by an unimaginable impact.

With a light step forward, Clind had soared up, delivering with his long leg a tremendous kick to the side of the Dragon’s maw, as the latter had come to a standstill. As for the might of that kick, it was something that could hold its own against even Garfiel’s kicks, which carried might akin to a cannonball; with its stance broken, the Dragon’s arms hit the ground, causing a cloud of dust to rise.

The Divine Dragon’s first move was thus directly inhibited by the Roswaal-Clind combo.

On the other side, bolting out as if to tear through that cloud of dust was the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, fangs bared—

Roy: “Hahaa~! For you to line up such a delicious looking assortment of heads, at this point, this is just love-!”

Plunging towards the front lines with vigor that spilled his drool, Roy, unlike the Divine Dragon who had attempted to stop all of the Aldebusters, swiftly pounced at a singular, clearly-defined target.

Complying to the ferine instinct known as appetite, Roy closed in on his prey with bizarrely refined precision. And the one set as the target for Gluttony’s foul tongue, was the pink-haired maid standing amidst the formation—

Roy: “—Ram.”

Touching upon something undetectable to the eyes, the outreached hand set the table for the meal.

Calling out that name, Roy grinned from ear to ear, and called out by that name, Ram’s congealed expression crossed gazes with him; the subsequent instant, the Sin Archbishop gave an ostentatious lick to the palm that had touched her.

The Authority of Gluttony was invoked, and there did a new tragedy burgeon—naught.

Roy: “Blergh.”

Eyes wide open, Roy clutched his mouth at the recoil from his misfired Eclipsing, a nauseating sensation akin to vomiting. Before Roy, as his steps began to falter, Ram twirled her body in splendor,

Ram: “Truly a fool.”

Ram’s knee shot upwards, casting a vivid strike up into the Sin Archbishop’s jaw.

Heinkel: “Shit shit shit! After coming this far…!”

The Divine Dragon and Gluttony; compared to those two, who, while differing in their respective aims, had chosen to fight, Heinkel, as the last man standing, selected an alternate path.

Having opted for a path unique to that of the Dragon’s chilly breath or the Sin Archbishop’s Bizarre Eating, Heinkel wielded his unsheathed sword to keep everything in front of him at bay, leaping not forwards, but backwards. Gaining distance in such a manner, he was most likely hoping for someone other than himself to change the tide of the battle.

However—

???: “Nothing so convenient will come to pass, Honorable Family Head.”

???: “Honorable Family Head, in truth, I have always wanted to do this.”

Thereupon descended the twin sisters, having waited in ambush atop the trees since directly after the activation of Compression.

Flam and Grassis—they were twins who served the Astrea Family, but ironically, the one whose torso they slammed their kicks into from both the front and behind happened to be the man who was the very family head of the House that they served.

Heinkel: “Goeghh… hk.”

The kicks from the sisters who had mastered the Flow Method gave rise to an explosive roar unthinkable for girls of such petite build.

At the impact that seemed like it would crush his organs, deathly cries of pain arose from Heinkel’s throat as his eyes rolled into the back of his head. —With these three avenues of impacts all occurring almost simultaneously, their strong start had unfolded exactly as planned.

And, in addition to that—

“Subaru”: “—Now here’s the game changer.”

The Imaginary Subaru snapped his fingers, and though only Petra was able to hear it, it rang out loudly. With that as a cue, an alteration was birthed in the battle situation.

—Another division by way of Compression, fractured the Al Troupe even more.

3

—Petra Leyte was more keenly aware of the Al Troupe’s terrifying nature than the results would suggest.

After his betrayal at the Pleiades Watchtower, Al had enlisted the Divine Dragon as an ally, evaded Reinhard and Felt’s forces, and successfully broke the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony out of prison in the Royal Capital.

While Al’s accomplices had played significant roles in the events that had unfolded so far, the greatest threat remained Al himself.

Upon learning the true nature of Al’s extraordinary power over fate—the power to bring about the results he desired, Petra felt a sense of understanding that was beyond words.

That was because she had learned the truth about Natsuki Subaru from reading his Book of the Dead.

“Subaru”: “Al also has the ability to leap… If that’s the case, then I know better than anyone how dangerous he is. What’s more, unlike me, with my pathetic fighting skills, Al is the type who can hold his own in a fight, so simply put, it’s like fighting a better version of myself.”

Petra: “…Subaru, you’re really dependable when you’re with Beatrice-chan, too. And when it comes to tricks and cunning, you’re every bit as good as Otto-san.”

“Subaru”: “But the original me was captured alongside Beatrice, as for tricks and cunning, they really aren’t the kind of skills that strong people brag about…”

The Imaginary Subaru spoke with a lack of confidence, but even putting aside her feelings of love or bias, Petra did not think that Subaru was inferior to Al, let alone a lesser version of him.

Regarding that, she had also heard some interesting speculation from Rom-jii, who had deduced that Al’s Authority was most likely a time leap.

—The suggestion was that Al’s time leap was more likely something that went back a short amount of time.

Petra: “If he really possessed the same power as Subaru, he could have avoided encountering Felt-sama and Rom-san before they had a chance to confront him.”

“Subaru”: “But don’t be too confident about that. It’s entirely possible that his restart point just happened to be a spot where he couldn’t avoid Felt and the others. Even I wasn’t able to completely stop Petelgeuse from attacking Emilia and the others.”

Petra: “I think that was pretty much a shutout—”

Just as she was about to say more, Petra considered “Subaru’s“ feelings and stopped herself.

Petra was going to say that if Subaru had perfectly defeated the Sin Archbishop of Sloth, who attacked the Roswaal Mansion and Arlam Village, the tragedies that befell Rem and Crusch would have been avoided.

Subaru did everything in his power. Petra recognized this, but Subaru himself felt differently.

Sadly, this led to Natsuki Subaru's low self-evaluation, which Petra found extremely frustrating, but—

Petra: "Setting that aside for now… It's not just the ridiculous Al-san, but also the Divine Dragon, that shinobi maid, a Sin Archbishop, and even Heinkel-san, all working with him."

"Subaru": "What an unbelievable members list. The Dragon, a ninja, a Sin Archbishop, Reinhard's dad, that's right, that Reinhard's dad. This isn't going to be easy."

Petra: "As for Heinkel-san, no comment."

When "Subaru" made a concerned expression, Petra crossed her fingers over her lips in the shape of an X to indicate that she would not provide an answer.

Heinkel had briefly joined forces with them in the Vollachian Empire, but he deliberately kept his distance from others, so Petra had virtually no contact with him.

The only person who cared about Heinkel, even if only a little, was Garfiel, but if he knew what had happened to Heinkel now, he would be devastated. Thinking about how devastated Garfiel would be, Petra could feel her anger toward Heinkel welling up inside her.

The Emilia Camp was united in their anger toward anyone who hurt their loved ones.

Petra: "Phew… I need to stay calm. It doesn't matter what Garf-san feels unless he resolves it himself, and we need to make sure that the path is open for him."

"Subaru": "You say path, but where do we start…"

Petra: "Yeah, you're right. It's not an easy decision. But—"

Seeing “Subaru” at a loss, Petra smiled mischievously and turned around. Following Petra’s movement, “Subaru” also looked in that direction.

There stood the figures of everyone here, demonstrating the results that had been achieved by Natsuki Subaru, a man who often took everything upon himself, stumbling over and over through repeated failures.

“Subaru”: “…”

Petra: “Sure, I think Al-san and his group are really tough, and if we tried to fight them normally, we wouldn’t stand a chance. —But we’re not exactly normal either, are we?”

Winking, Petra made one of the cutest faces she had ever made and smiled at the striking figure of Imaginary Subaru as she spoke.

And so, together with these not-so-normal but reliable companions, they devised a plan—

—At Otto Suwen’s signal, the battle began.

4

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never pen a missive.

5

—The Authority brought about by the Witch Factor of Tristitia, Compression, was by no means all-powerful.

The phenomenon induced by Compression was ultimately just the compaction of events that could be feasibly achieved—condensing the traversal time within a traversable range; such a thing served as a good example.

To put it another way, events that were impossible to achieve regardless of the time spent could not be realized through Compression.

Henceforth, even when it came to the division of the Aldebaran Troupe, after first throwing Aldebaran out from the battlefield, further dividing the group that remained had been no easy feat.

If the opponent was cautious of Compression, then the difficulty of applying the Authority's effects would rapidly increase. Not to mention, against such foes as the Divine Dragon and a Sin Archbishop, even just taking them away was a herculean undertaking.

Unless it was used on a person who consented to its effects, or a person who was caught off guard, the possible applications of Compression were extremely narrow; such was its weakness.

That weakness was surmounted by the rapid fire of outlandish stratagems devised by the Royal Selection Combined Forces, the "Aldebusters".

Overwhelming Heinkel with numbers, taking advantage of Volcanica's mindset that adhered to "no-killing", and refusing service to Roy Alphard's Gluttony as he was in delirium over a feast.

All of which, before their execution, had been outlandish stratagems of uncertain success. —But, the likes of stratagems guaranteeing one-hundred percent certainty, existed not in this world.

What did exist, however, were the efforts necessary to approach that one-hundred percent, and the hearts that believed in them to the utmost.

Those who watered the sprouting seedlings of such possibilities, their spirits were—

???: "Ah, how delightful. Admiration."

Nodding so, Clind landed on the dirt, training his gaze upon the Divine Dragon Volcanica to his fore.

Its stance broken, Volcanica supported itself with a single arm, receiving Clind's gaze head on. Within the narrowed golden eyes of the Dragon, the bud of a clearly defined will could indeed be perceived.

As Petra had surmised, a separate consciousness was being housed in the Divine Dragon's dragonhusk.

Volcanica: "…"

Naturally, as Volcanica glared at Clind, his attack from a moment prior had been ineffective for the most part. It had been enough to succeed in catching it off guard, but it was a far cry from driving the opponent into a corner.

Even so, the objective of the initial surprise attack had been achieved. —In the theater of war where the dragonhusk of the Divine Dragon was being confronted, those facing off against the usurper numbered a mere two members of the Aldebusters.

The only ones remaining were Clind, and Roswaal L. Mathers.

Volcanica: "…I guess it's the same technique that sent Origin away."

Lifting its body with a hand planted on the ground, the Divine Dragon muttered in a low, solemn voice.

As the Dragon surveyed its surroundings with its golden eyes, it ascertained that they were removed from the mountains in which they had just previously occupied, having been moved to a far away open plain.

With a teleportation invoked via Compression, it was proof the troublesome opponent had been successfully isolated.

However—

Volcanica: "Clind, was it? I'd thought there was no way, but… it seems like there's no doubt that you're the one who holds the Witch Factor of Tristitia."

Clind: "—. Where did you obtain that information? Inquiry."

Volcanica: “I’m acquainted with an all-knowing great deity who taught me. Regardless, it was only something slipped in amidst all their blabbering, so I couldn’t even remember it until just now.”

As the Divine Dragon shrugged its shoulders in an extremely human-like gesture, from its mouth came the term “Tristitia”, and an identification of the Witch Factor’s holder; faced with that, Clind pondered its words.

If the usurper was capable of extracting information from the dragonhusk, then there would have been no doubt about it knowing such a thing. But, if that were truly the case, then its conduct until this point would have been a tad incoherent.

In order for it to make logical sense on both fronts, it would mean that while the usurper had yet to attain full mastery over handling the dragonhusk, it had somehow heard about Clind’s circumstances from someone else, but—

Roswaal: “When it’s just the two of you coming to a mutual understanding, I end up feeling quite left ouuut~.”

Clind: “Master…”

Roswaal: “You are a talented individual capable of performing meticulous work, but if you go too far, you will be considered highly strung. How they obtained this knowledge isn’t the proooblem~. In fact, the stratagem has come together, after all.”

Volcanica: “Stratagem, huh?”

As Roswaal remonished Clind, the usurper grandly unfurled the wings upon its back. The mere act of that kicking up a gust, Clind and Roswaal basked in the wind as it swept through their hair.

Volcanica: “Might not be my place to say this, but regardless of my allies like Roy and the old man, isn’t it a blunder for you guys to have separated from your own comrades back there?”

Roswaal: “Hoh? Well isn’t that a rather fascinating vieeewpoint~. May I ask you to elaborate?”

Volcanica: “You should already know. When there are more people in my line of fire, there’d be a higher chance of easily getting me to curl up. With this body and overflowing power, it ain’t easy to hold back.”

Roswaal: “I see, I can understand that line of thought. If we had wished to aim for a situation in which you were unable to demonstrate your capabilities at full performance, then that’s exactly what we ought to have done, buuut~…”

Clind: “—Unfortunately, that is a condition that applies to us as well. Equivalent.”

Volcanica: “What?”

The usurper of the dragonhusk had implied that they should not have prepared an environment in which it could run amok, but at Clind’s comment, it narrowed its eyes, and then proceeded to immediately widen its eyes.

As if to encircle the Divine Dragon, multicolored lights were afloat with no gaps between them.

At a glance, they appeared faint and colorful like a gathering of Micro Spirits, materializing in a pool of Mana, but anyone with a certain extent of magic knowledge would be able to tell that each and every one of these pale lights was a cluster of immense Mana—flickers of great magic, housing dreadful power.

Of course, their origin went without saying, the strongest Magician without peer throughout history—

Roswaal: “Please don’t praise me like that, yes? For you to evaluate myself as such despite knowing Teacher, is an indiscretion that terribly pains my heart, aaafter~ all.”

Seemingly having read his innermost thoughts at a glance, if Roswaal were to demonstrate his true ability at maximum firepower, any surrounding allies would serve only as a hindrance.

And thus—

Clind: “—The same goes for me. Assent.”

As he spoke, Clind raised up his hand, removing the monocle over his left eye.

That instant, the atmosphere faintly tremored, that which was faint gradually magnifying, little by little, until it crackled through the space, and the earth began to roar.

A special monocle, it was not.

What was necessary was a shift in mindset, a step of resolve to return to the self he had sealed away in the past. —By never taking that step, Clind had forced himself to remain as a bystander.

With that melancholy and despondency called out by the girl who harbored a shining soul, Clind felt ashamed of himself.

Having received that one final push, no longer could he remain halted in his tracks.

Ergo—

Volcanica: “…Oi oi.”

With a sound of bones creaking, protruding from Clind’s cranium, crowned by blue hair, were two black horns. Neither were those horns proof of belonging to the Oni Clan, nor were they the horns possessed by Witchbeasts. —Not being either of those things, instead a race that grew horns of such deep blackness, in this world, there existed only one.

Existences reduced to so few in number that they were thought to have been extinct—the dragonkin.

As the neon genesis of the almighty Dragons, they were a new race that had elected to shed their dragonhusks in favor of assuming the form of man. Clind, too, was one such dragonkin, but also a being who bore a special meaning to this world.

That was because—

Volcanica: “Finally, I’ve identified the source of this strange feeling. —So you’re, this body’s…”

Clind: “Any further words would be tactless. Superfluous.”

The usurper still attempted to exhaust further words, so Clind cut it off directly.

No matter who it might have been, there existed nobody who held a greater right to silence the usurper than Clind. None were more worthy than the original owner of that dragonhusk, now purloined by the usurper.

Roswaal: “—The Witch’s Disciple, Roswaal L. Mathers.”

Volcanica: “—Divine Dragon, Volcanica.”

Sending powerful magic adrift, Roswaal gave his name with his feet planted on the ground. Meeting that with due procedure, the usurper shamelessly proclaimed itself as such.

Just how long had it been since he had followed that courtesy, and placed himself atop the stage? —With such thoughts in mind, as purple lightning surged around his body, Clind too gave his introduction.

Clind: “—Dragonkin of the Divine Dragon, Clind.”

That instant, the two who bore ties to the Divine Dragon leaped into action, and the magic that had been deployed unleashed its true might.

Thus, with a crash and destruction reminiscent of a natural cataclysm serving as the impetus, the battle between those who knew four-hundred years, commenced.

Chapter 42:
What Effort Doth Shatter the Heart

1

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never clutch a stuffed toy.

2

Roy: “…”

The moment the knee shot up into his jaw, Roy Alphard’s cognizance bolted around like a flash of lightning.

Peculiar, inexplicable, strange oddity, whirling misgivings, apprehension, dubiety, something’s wrong, immense abnormality, error, mystifying, accident, incorrect, irregularity, chaos, doubt doubt, doubtdoubtdoubtdoubtdoubtdoubtdoubt—

Ram: “—Kindly die.”

Governed by such misgivings, Roy would not be overlooked by Ram after she knocked the wind out of his sails by some means.

Her outstretched white fingers fired a jab into Roy’s throat whilst he faced upward. His welling nausea and respiration intercepted, ache and suffocation assaulted Roy’s small frame.

However, Ram’s terrifying essence lay in the lack of charm of not slackening her hand here.

Ram: “Fula.”

The blade of wind generated in the space of her hand seizing his windpipe, the honed sharpness arrested Roy’s slim throat straight-on, and with nowhere for him to run, Roy’s throat was mercilessly slashed away from his body—

Roy: “—This~, won’t go!”

In that instant, the wind slash cleaved through, and Roy's head spurted blood as though having burst open.

However, reach Roy's life it would not, for he had reconstructed the Carnivorous Beast, Beli Heinelga, proprietor of sturdy skin, to whom not a single sword pierced from the thousand lunged into him by the garrison in order to seize the brutal criminal.

Ram: "…"

Ram dilated her eyes at the unforeseen outcome, and in that juncture, whilst she remained stanced to aim at his throat, Roy forced her along with him as he instantly shifted to the skies above the battlefield—'twas the power of warp movement belonging to the Leaper, Dorkell.

One certain day, having attained a supernatural power by connecting via Od Lagna as though an abrupt divine oracle, the Leaper became a destroyer of order, utilizing that power to assassinate a great number of influential individuals of power. That warp movement indicated no signs in advance, and as Ram stiffened upon being transpierced by the unforeseen astonish, he held her down with brute force and used that interlude to conduct an evaluation of her as prey of the battlefield—

Ram: "El Fula!"

Roy: "—Uhyi-, seriously?!"

Devoid of hesitation, she fired a gutsy spell of wind magic, to which Roy unwittingly clamored a voice of admiration.

The warp movement, without question, must have been beyond Ram's anticipation. But she, in merely a moment, digested the shock of failing to slash Roy's throat and the surprise from the warp movement, and instantaneously counterattacked. Such courage! Such fortitude!

Roy: "You're doing it~!"

That blade of wind had also failed to pierce through the Carnivorous Beast's sturdy skin. And yet, he wished to extol that prompt judgment and mobility of action. Hence, infused with the sentiment to extol it, he returned the favor with a fist strike from the Fist King, Neiji Rockhardt.

The hit from the Fist King who had smashed the heads of all kinds of warriors on the Gladiator Island, upon being inundated by it, Ram's slender body would be turned to a pulpy squash—vanished.

Ram: "Did you lose sight of Ram? What a useless pair of eyes you have."

With that unpredicted voice, the supposedly vanished Ram's presence had emerged behind him; Roy reflexively hurled a blow of the Fist King without looking, but the attack missed. As if magic, her presence had shifted to his overhead, showering him with an enzuigiri kick, and headlong towards the ground did he fall, fall, fall—.

Roy: "A~h, so beautiful~."

In the midst of falling to the ground back-first, Roy did not even take a defensive stance, wholeheartedly enchanted by that which was overhead—the hem of her skirt waving, the form of a young girl with pink-hued hair fluttered in resplendence. Roy then went on to defenselessly crash into the ground, and as the impact sustained upon his back spread to his abdomen, pain pervaded the entirety of his body, yet he did not mind.

—Carnivorous Beast × Leaper × Fist King.

Suprarational individuals who had surfaced to the top even amongst all that Gluttony had eaten, but Ram's might, technique, and clarity of heart had splendidly disposed of them, inducing Roy to feel deeply moved with emotion in sincerity and without plot.

Here, Roy had to also show something good from his side, and with this notion, he swung his legs and stood up, bent his knees, and amassed power in them to pounce at Ram.

After all—

Roy: "Unless all strength, all capacity, all of everything is totally invested to offer up as hospitality, it can’t be called love, can it now~!”

???: “—That way of thinking, it’s identical to something I’ve heard somewhere, and I really hate i~t.”

However, faster than Roy could leap to return to the skies, a ferocious, outraged voice rushed on from the side. The roar was accompanied by sharp, beastly claws and an explosive charge.

Curved horns and an enormous build that commanded eyes upward, frame supported by limbs that seemed slender, and flexibly racing on the ground was the being called the Jet-Black King of the Forest, synonymous for ferocity and atrociousness—

???: “—AROOOO!!”

Roy: “Hyaa~, Guiltilaw!!”

Facing Roy as he cheered in delight, a claw swipe swung down. Roy instantaneously countered it with the power of the Snow Vallum, Tislow. The body exceeding norms, regarded in legend for having intercepted and restrained an avalanche unaided, interdicted the plunging robust limbs of the Witchbeast straight-on, latching a grapple in successive order from the right foreleg, then the left foreleg.

Then, giving it his all, he sought to twist off both of the Guiltilaw’s legs—when in an instant, his eyes met with pale crimson pupils wielding a wand that had slipped below the Witchbeast’s length of legs.

Roy: “Truly, the greatest—”

Ram: “Fula.”

His forehead showered with bullets of wind disallowing him from even speaking, he was blown away by a tail whip from the Guiltilaw. Repelled a great distance, whilst skiing the ground with his tiptoes, Roy lifted his countenance.

Behind Ram wielding her wand, the young girl clinging atop the Guiltilaw’s back, Meili, used her slender fingers to point towards Roy—no, towards Roy’s rear, and cried.

Meili: “Sick hiii~m, Witch Blackdog-cha~ns!!”

Blackdogs: “—Gugyaaagogugu!”

Conforming with Meili’s shrill call, countless dots of red swooped onto Roy with ferocity.

Those were eyes saturated red belonging to black dogs wolfing down their prey, fangs bared in truculence—conceived with the power of magic and a profusion of curses teeming in their bodies, a pack of Ulgarm.

The pack of demon dogs mercilessly impaled the body of Gluttony with their fangs and tore it apart. Much to irony, the end of Roy Alphard, who commanded the name of Bizarre Eating per his pleasure, was as feed for inclement Witchbeasts—

Roy: “Aa~AA~aa~AA~a~—”

The Witchbeasts’ movements came to a petrified halt from the sudden voice of song emanating from Roy’s throat.

The pack of savage dogs stood motionless, and Roy gently caressed the head of one that was biting at his neck—the subsequent instant, the blood spouting from the mouth of his wounds writhed out, taking the form of blades, slashing the Witchbeasts incapable of escaping, julienning them to skewers, and creating a choir of death wails.

Roy: “There we go~.”

Awakening his body lento, Roy stood up, unveiling his body in an ostentatious debut.

Bite wounds from the demon dogs engraved throughout his body, the blood gushing from them turned to blades with a gleaming sheen, suspending the pack of black dogs as if they were fruit growing on the branch of a fruit tree, and reduced them to carcasses.

A co-starring of dreams between the curse ballad of the Blightlove Troubadour, Notah, who travelled and chanted anti-nationalist songs across landscapes, and the magician who had been unable to manipulate anything save for his own sanguine ichor, the Bloodweeping Oni, Advan. Furthermore, he materialized the magic technique of the Lord of Phantasmal Rainbows, Matclyma Jordan, who had plotted to overthrow the Holy Kingdom by utilizing the residual Mana from the remains of perished Witchbeasts; with the carcasses serving as their chrysalis, butterflies hued in a spectrum of rainbow emerged and started to flutter about as they danced in Roy's perimeter.

The butterflies, eclosing as many as the number of corpses, flitted, fluttered, and flittered—

Roy: "Ta~dah."

—Snow Vallum × Blightlove Troubadour × Bloodweeping Oni × Lord of Phantasmal Rainbows.

Raising an innumerable count of prismatic butterflies to serve him, Roy pigmented the stage of spotlight, laden with token commendation towards Ram and the others who had attended to him with truly, truly sweet and luscious hospitality.

However, Ram and Meili rigidified their gazes and bearings, laying bare their animosity.

Roy: "Now now, that was amazing~. That perfectly synced-up coordination just now! It's tantalizing~. When did the two of you become such close pals? Indeed, you must've gotten closer in the time of the journey through the Sand Sea that we don't know of, correct~? Both Ram-san and Meili-san, how mean and sneaky of you~."

Ram: "Kindly stop trying to calmly initiate a conversation with that bloodstained form that is painful to even look at. Exchanging words with a deviant has Ram's small songbird heart close to bursting with anxiety."

Roy: "A songbird's heart-! A~h, to proclaim it yourself actually makes it pretty respectable, you know~. What kind of preliminary preparation of ingredients will fan the flames next, the excitement doesn't stop~."

Clapping his hands in applause, Roy swiftly retracted the sanguine blades into his body. Whilst the carcasses of Witchbeasts fell to thuds, Roy coagulated the blood of his bite wounds, rapidly ceasing his bleeding as he exhaled a breath, entranced.

His sentiments of sincerity seemed to not have been transmitted, but his emotion of commendation was genuine. Feelings unrequited were painful. But, Ram and the others had kindly labored to an extent much greater than Roy had anticipated, so he wished to cherish that mark.

Roy: "Now, setting that aside."

Setting aside his affection towards Ram and the others, Roy conjectured the truth behind the inexplicable phenomenon that had transpired in the midst of the several dozen seconds of offensive and defensive combat earlier—that it was intimately associated with the disappeared Divine Dragon.

It had been truly, truly astonishing. The Divine Dragon, with that ginormous build, had become nowhere to be seen on the battlefield in all but an unnoticeable interval.

Roy: "Probably, it's the same trick behind the disappearance of helmet uncle and the shinobi onee-san, as well as Ram-san and gang showing up… huh, seems like it's Clind-san, but it's very much like an Authority, isn't i~t."

The vanished Aldebaran, Yae, and the Divine Dragon. Moreover, the increasing count of adversaries, and Ram's presence oscillating between appearing and vanishing as well, all of it together aligned with the special ability belonging to Clind within the Memories.

However, concording to Roy's own knowledge, relying not on Memories, it was a possibility that what made that all possible was neither the odd talents of an individual nor a Divine Protection of disparate nature, but an Authority.

Though, in that case, Clind would end up being the individual corresponding to the sole vacant seat that was Pride.

Roy: “Well~, guess the people who’ve disappeared don’t matter right now~.”

Not only the Divine Dragon, but the figures of Clind and Roswaal were absent from the battlefield as well.

The bounds of Clind’s strength were uncertain, but if he were a possessor of an Authority, then at minimum, he would likely count as combat power. The tag team of Roswaal and Clind engaged in a large-scale battle against the Divine Dragon—to ensure that its destruction did not extend to their environs, they had changed their battlefield. That was likely the context of what had occurred in the background.

Anyhow, if he had disappeared from the battlefield, then that ploy of appearing and vanishing would have no more chances to be used.

Thus, what he must prioritise were not the cruel ones who had vanished, but surfeiting the hospitality of those who stood ready before his eyes.

Roy: “How nice, how nice, humans are how nice~.”

The trick behind averting Eclipsing, as well as the arrangement of Witchbeasts with no name to be eaten, or perhaps even the entirety of every element that concocted this battlefield, was an agglomeration of artifices designed to entrap and kill Roy and the others.

The prior groundwork for confrontation, it could be designated the preliminary preparation of ingredients, the very spirit of hospitality. Exhausting oneself of all strength to make welcome. —For that meant, effort what shattered heart.

Roy: “If so, then this side must also respond by offering up a suitable dress code~, or it’d be a discourtesy to that consideration bri~mming with love, after all~.”

Ram: “—. What do you intend?”

Taking acute notice of the change in the warmly-received Roy, Ram grimaced her finely-shaped brows. The beautiful maid laid bare her vigilance, but Roy pronounced “No no~”, and shook his head side to side.

All-out war—yes, this was a battle befitting of being benamed so, truly the final conclusion.

The Royal Selection Combined Forces, the enemy camp whom Natsuki Subaru would have labeled something like the “Aldebusters” had he been here, had prepared all arrangements for hospitality; all of its members wrung out their wisdom and latent strength in order to demonstrate their true worth, brandishing eyes resolved to labor to death till the very end.

That went for not just Ram and the others, but all who had been deployed into being war potential without stint, so to Roy Alphard, everyone earned a perfect hundred score, amounting to the very apex of those to whom he wished to grant gold stars.

The singular blemish unworthy of a gold star, was not amid his opponents. —It laid on his side.

Roy: “…”

Glancing in his vicinity, present there was a red-haired man left behind on the same battlefield as Roy, cowering in an unsightly squat as blood dripped down his nose—the form of Heinkel.

Though shameful coming from the vantage of Gluttony, Roy’s evaluation of Heinkel was surprisingly not bad.

Noosed with getting caught in his own traps, and a way of life saddled with somber anguishes seemingly never to be divulged, it seemed to have an impure bitterness only it could yield, hence he induced interest in it as a delicacy.

However, that too, operated on the major premise that it would not intrude upon the main dish with its aroma or appearance, so presently Heinkel had nothing going for him even where Gluttony was concerned.

Roy: “No matter how concentrated in extravagance a dinner banquet is, if a platter atop with uncooked flavors gets mixed in, it’s just a waste~.”

A solitary individual, on a battlefield where everyone came together as one and clashed lives against lives, for there to be a singular element capable of putting it all to waste was unbearable, even for Bizarre Eating.

Thus—

Roy: “You know~, uncle, you shouldn’t stay moping around forever, so how about you get energetic and lively~!”

Heinkel: “Wha… S-Sin Archbishop…!”

Roy howled suddenly, to which the nosebleeding Heinkel upraised his face. Meeting his eyes, witnessing the unnatural sway in those blue irises, made Roy go crazy.

A gaze that looked as if it was clinging to something. If he possessed even a fragment of camaraderie or desire to depend on Roy, to seek such a thing from a Sin Archbishop went beyond the limits of imprudent heedlessness. That boundless disgracefulness was, in a certain sense, something irreplaceable, but now it was nothing but purely, a hindrance.

Roy: “—Shall we just go ahead and free you from your~ burden, uncle~?”

He would not save him. Neither would he abandon him.

With simply a smile, Roy presented a third alternative to Heinkel.

Heinkel: “…”

Heinkel dilated his eyes, frozen, yet even to him that proposition was transmitted with certainty.

The things expressed as “burden”, just how valuable they were to Heinkel, Roy was unbeknownst to the details. However, they were surely more valuable than his own life or death. The fact that Roy did possess a means to take them away, Heinkel knew from looking into his eyes.

What Roy stated was not a threat or anything such in the slightest, but an alternative possibility that could be realized.

Therefore—

Roy: “Tha~t’s the spirit~.”

Roy’s chest palpitated in delight budding from his heart at the change in expression of the man gritting his teeth. In such a way to respond to Roy’s vivified emotions, the butterflies of rainbow-hue began a whirling dance akin to courting as they fluttered.

In the midst of prismatic scales glistening the skies, Roy let out his languid tongue and smiled. —Now in its truest sense, the all-out war could commence.

Roy: “Want to be satisfied, yet don’t want to be satisfied. —Life, is so flavorful, it’s astonishing~.”

3

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never put needle to thread.

4

Heinkel: “Goeghh… hk.”

Strikes pincering his chest and back, Heinkel collapsed, unable to do a thing.

Carol and Grimm—they were the servant couple that had long served the Astrea Family, and the kicks delivered by their twin granddaughters, who had received an initiation into the Flow Method, were lethal weapons that completely disregarded their youth.

Heinkel: “Ouegh-, eughff-, blerghh-.”

Ever since the curtain had fallen on the war in the Vollachian Empire, he had hardly been able to eat a sufficient amount. As gastric juices were wrung from his empty stomach, Heinkel pathetically fell to his knees.

Twins: “…”

As Flam and Grassis coldly looked down on Heinkel, his cheeks contorted in self-scorn.

Despite appearances, Heinkel was still the present head of the Astrea Family. Faced with Heinkel in such a state, the daughters of House Remendis were supposed to have pledged their loyalty to him; but oh, what an irreverent look they held in their eyes.

Flam: “Our fealty is devoted to the young master.”

Grassis: “Esteemed Family Head, you deeply stabbed the Honorable Predecessor.”

At the sharpness of the twins’ replies, Heinkel fell silent without uttering even a single bitter remark.

Each gave undeniably valid arguments, and provided far more than enough persuasive reasons for why the girls despised Heinkel, and regarded him with hostility. The former was something that had always tormented Heinkel, and the latter was an offense that had ended up causing him new suffering, applying pressure to his entire body like a stone weight.

Even so—

Heinkel: “I can’t die…”

The voice dissipating through his molars, could be interpreted in two ways. —The first, was that he could not afford to die, even when cornered to such an extent; and the second, was that even after being cornered to such an extent, he still was unable to die.

Even Heinkel himself was unsure of which way he had meant those words as they had escaped his lips.

Heinkel: “Gh, ughhh-!”

As Heinkel stood upon such an unstable foundation, the twins showed him no mercy. No hesitation.

Circulating the Flow Method through their bodies, the arms and legs of the girls had become as strong as steel, and so receiving a flurry of their strikes, it was akin to being out under a downpour of a rain of iron.

Above and below, left and right, ahead and behind, met with the incessant onslaught of Flam and Grassis’s perfectly coordinated opposition, Heinkel protected his vital points with his sword, and could not do anything save for keeping up the defensive as he was showered with blows.

—The Flow Method, come to think of it, Heinkel had failed to properly master that too.

Even though he was given well-reasoned and thorough instruction on the many combat techniques that first-rate swordsmen and warriors were always subconsciously performing, Heinkel had been unable to perfect them for the purposes of actual battle.

Were Flam and Grassis really still just twelve years old? Even though he had spent more than twice their age in time, Heinkel’s Flow Method was nowhere near the level of those two girls.

If Heinkel resigned himself to it being a matter of natural talent, would the hundred things that anguished him perhaps decrease by one?

Heinkel: “Fucking, shit…!”

Swinging his sword in a show of force, the twins, coordinating through a mere exchange of gazes, swiftly evaded it. His imprecise swordsmanship accurately read, he was struck in all the weak points on his elbows, sides, and neck.

His bones creaked, and the mouth that had only coughed up gastric juices until now, now flowed with droplets of blood. As soon as he unintentionally looked downwards, the twins executed a somersault as if they had been waiting for him, their kicks launching right up into his mug.

Heinkel: “Gah—!”

Sent reeling, Heinkel toppled backwards, the back of his head slamming onto the ground. With his vision flickering, and a distant ringing in his ears, Heinkel forcibly restored his consciousness from its momentarily befuddled state, and hastening to rise to his feet, he readied his sword as he glared to the fore.

Before him, the twins stuck the landing of their somersault next to each other, gently brushing the hems of their clothes as they looked up. —As their gazes crossed, Heinkel detected a faint hue of bewilderment from the pair.

Heinkel: “…”

Likely, the cause of the sisters’ confusion was the fact that Heinkel was still standing.

In a matter of a dozen seconds, Heinkel had been thoroughly beaten up. His clothes were covered in mud, and his unkempt face was lavishly soiled by a dripping nosebleed.

However, Heinkel had not been defeated. Consciousness unceasing, his eyes remained open. Based on their reactions, this was unbelievable to Flam and Grassis.

Heinkel: “Haah, haa… hk.”

But alas, the endurance that had astonished those twins, was of no pride to him whatsoever.

The tip of his sword shaking as it pointed at the twins, Heinkel’s bluff was obvious to the eyes of all. His defeat was already all but decided—nay, it had not even amounted to a battle in the first place. Since it was not a battle, there was no such victor to be decided. They were not on the stage, of vying for victory.

Heinkel: “Even, so… hk.”

He could not afford to be defeated here. He had no choice but to endure.

Were he to be taken down here, then for what reason had he even come all this way? For what reason had he stabbed his father, Wilhelm van Astrea; he would lose sight of the answer.

But if he managed to pull through, then by the skin of his neck, there would still be a glimmer of hope. The light at the end of the tunnel would surely be visible.

Aldebaran, or the Divine Dragon, or even Yae. In the worst case scenario, even the Sin Archbishop would be fine. If someone would just wrench open the tide of this battle, then Heinkel’s hopes—it happened then.

Roy: “You know~, uncle, you shouldn’t stay moping around forever, so how about you get energetic and lively~!”

Suddenly, a voice seemed to rend the battlefield, causing Heinkel to raise his face in surprise.

He consciously realized it for the first time. The large figure of the Divine Dragon was nowhere to be found on the battlefield. On the battlefield where not only Aldebaran and Yae had disappeared, but the Divine Dragon too, the only ones remaining here were Heinkel, and,

Heinkel: “Wha… S-Sin Archbishop…!”

Also confronting an enemy of his own, the only other one left here was Roy Alphard.

Wondering when the situation had become like this, Heinkel felt disappointment in his profound inability to heed his surroundings, and attempted to surmise the intentions of Roy, who had called out to him.

Something like cooperating with a Sin Archbishop, honestly, even he thought it to be deranged. But, it seemed like in the Vollachian Empire, Natsuki Subaru, the Knight of Emilia, had seized control over Gluttony. Thinking about it like that, he forcibly swallowed his intense feelings of reluctance.

They had already gone out of their way to free him from the Prison Tower. Even a Sin Archbishop would surely not want to die. Even if they were despicable, if their objectives aligned, then there would be room for them to join hands—

Roy: "—Shall we just go ahead and free you from your~ burden, uncle~?"

However, the words that followed were ones that directly betrayed Heinkel's hopes.

Heinkel: "…"

Neither was it a proposal of, nor was it a request for, aid. Merely a terribly inappropriate, selfish remark.

Just what the hell was he thinking? Did he understand the current situation? Neither Aldebaran, with his incomprehensible power to wrest open a path forward, nor the Divine Dragon, with its status as the strongest lifeform, nor Yae, with her expertise in intricate techniques and harassment, none of them were present. Even though the only ones present here were the weak, fragile, powerless Heinkel, and the great sinner of a nature most defiled, Roy, what could possibly be accomplished by making a rift between them? —No, it was not that a rift had been made. There had always been a rift. An unfillable gulf, an unsurmountable precipice, an absolute, isolating pit; he had only now just clearly understood that such things did indeed exist. And knowing that, what would come of it? What would come of the things this guy was saying? Having understood the significance of what this guy was saying, what would he do? —Freeing Heinkel from his burden? This burden, that was already so firmly infused into Heinkel's soul?

—Such a thing would never be allowed of him, and he would never allow it.

Roy: "Tha~t's the spirit~."

That voice of delight stemming from the depths of Roy's heart, reached not the ears of Heinkel.

Confronting Heinkel as he rose, swaying side to side like a revenant, Flam and Grassis tensed their cheeks, and exchanging wordless glances, they nodded to each other.

And then—

Flam: "Esteemed Family Head, prepare yourself."

Grassis: "I will hit you with everything that I have."

Perhaps seeing it as their perfunctory strikes having backfired, it was evident that the twins' resolve was being sharpened.

In accordance with their declaration, a blow utilizing all of their bodies' might was likely imminent. And after he conjectured so, Flam and Grassis kicked off the ground, speeding directly towards Heinkel. —No, not directly.

Flam & Grassis: "Ryahh!!"

Voice and movements overlapping, the twins dug into the ground with their legs, and kicked it up in front of him. Shrouding his entire field of vision, the excavated earth made its approach.

With a swing of his sword, Heinkel cleaved it in twain. Neither was it a person, nor a life. If it was merely an object, Heinkel would not think twice about cutting it down.

However, beyond the bisected earth, the sight cleaved open was bereft of the figures of Flam and Grassis.

Instead, the twins pincered Heinkel from left and right, and with the greatest amount of acceleration thus far, mercilessly thrust into both Heinkel's flanks.

Heinkel: "—Goh."

Without exaggeration, there had been enough might to bury the fists of the twins up to the wrists into Heinkel.

Shattering Heinkel's ribs, the blows landed a direct strike on the organs contained within. As copious amounts of blood spurted from his mouth with tremendous force, Heinkel was on the verge of fainting.

But, faint he did not. He held his ground. He held his ground, and not only that—gritting his teeth and swivelling his body, he seized the arms of the sisters that had thrust into him.

Flam: "—Ah."

Grassis: "This is bad."

At the pain of their wrists being tightly squeezed, Flam and Grassis grimaced.

Then, the two of them used their arms opposite the ones that Heinkel had seized, as well their free legs, to barrage Heinkel with attacks, striking him like a tempest of steel, but Heinkel did not release their arms.

It was not something he had desired. Even so, the one and only thing in which Heinkel assuredly surpassed most other people was this towering sturdiness, and the best way to make use of it, was probably this.

Even while being showered in blows, he grabbed his opponents. —As a disgrace to swordsmen, it was an unrefined, uncouth counterattack, one most fitting for Heinkel Astrea.

Heinkel: "—AAHHHHHH!!"

Sullied by a nosebleed, his face was swollen from all of the beating it had endured; Heinkel swung both his arms overhead, and vigorously moved to pummel the twins in his grasp down into the ground.

That instant, Heinkel forgot the fact that his opponents were children, that they were people who served his family, and that they were the granddaughters of Carol and Grimm, whom he had known ever since his own birth. —No, it was not that he had forgotten; he had merely shut his eyes to it, and so staking it all, he slammed the two of them down to the ground—

5

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never sing.

6

With corpses as chrysalides, their metamorphosis fueled by life’s last embers, butterflies of rainbow eclosed—the spell devised by the Lord of Phantasmal Rainbows, was by no means something that constructed new life.

These butterflies had merely been shaped in such a form, and contrary to being a construction of life, their essence was that of death made manifest.

Roy: “This was also Nii-sama’s trump card, wasn’t it~? Magic of rainbow spectra.”

Amidst the devoured Memories, a throbbing sensation arose as he delightfully recollected a sword clad in a rainbow aurora—fundamentally, the special technique deployed by the Finest of Knights was of the same ilk as the rainbow butterflies.

That which the Finest made manifest through his talents and the powers of his contracted Spirits, the Lord of Phantasmal Rainbows conjured in exchange for the dried up dregs of life, such was the entirety of the matter.

Roy: “But its might stands unchanged, you see~.”

Butterflies of death that would entirely obliterate anything they made contact with; Roy’s smile giving the cue, around twenty of them surged towards Ram and Meili in unison.

Faced with the oncoming threat, Ram and Meili instantly moved in perfect sync.

Meili: “Ram-oneesan!”

Ram: “That is not how you are to address me.”

Meili: “I go~t it, Madam!”

Following a moderately serious exchange, Meili, sat astride the Guiltilaw, advanced. Then, patting the back of the jet-black Witchbeast, she prompted it to wield its mighty arms, forcing nearby trees to come crashing down.

As destructive roars sounded from the falling trees, Ram dashed to their now-vacant position and crouched, her wand extended straight ahead—

Ram: “El Fula.”

The surging gale savagely blew the severed trees, hurling them crashing into the kaleidoscope. Striking true, they smashed through the butterflies scattering scales of death, triggering an aurora of prismatic explosions that lit up the sky.

Roy: “Kuu~~ hk!”

The optimum solution, cognizing it as such, Roy repeatedly stomped his feet, unable to bear his shuddering.

The rainbow-hued butterflies riddled with devastating might capable of unraveling the very structure of almost anything could have been designated as Fire Magic Stones that would spell the end upon a single touch. In exchange for their extensive destructive power, they were limited to just one shot before being used up—detonating and dismantling them through application of obstacles was the strategy guaranteeing the utmost safety.

Yet, for them to counter it whilst witnessing it for the very first time left Roy astonished.

Roy: “Ho~we~ve~r!!”

For the butterflies to have been exterminated in such a manner would have only left the Lord of Phantasmal Rainbows sobbing in his grave.

The butterflies he had sent into a direct charge vanished in a rainbow-hued explosion, but detouring around the dazzling explosion, the surviving five butterflies swiveled wide and aimed for Ram and the others.

What was more was that it was not just the butterflies this time, but Roy as well used the power of the Leaper to charge in their direction. Thereupon, with the burly arms of the Snow Vallum, he aimed to pound the Guiltilaw to death first.

—Lord of Phantasmal Rainbows × Leaper × Snow Vallum.

An inescapable three-pronged assault mercilessly detonated upon Ram's group; a flashing aurora smokescreen blocking their front, the surviving rainbow butterflies flanking both sides, and Roy warping into position at their rear—that instant, the sound of a crying child slashed Roy's eardrums.

???: "—GAGYAGYA-GAGYAAAH."

The piercing shrill unbecoming of a battlefield momentarily pilfered Roy of his thoughts, and before his eyes, baying the cries of an infant was a blasphemously molded Witchbeast that ought to have been deigned a failed creation of god—it brandished two spears ablaze forged of bone, incinerating the encircling rainbow-hued butterflies in one fiery sweep altogether.

An explosion of aurora blossomed yet again, and with hair waving due to the shockwave, Roy laid eyes upon the grotesque being who had advented before him, the Hungry Horse King, only supposed to be present in the below-ground of the sand sea.

Meili: "It was a lot of trouble, bringing it alo~ng."

Cranium constructed with an enormous horn, and a torso akin to a human trunk accoutred with a gigantic mouth, holding them up was an inordinately large build of a horse, far too distorted and repellent to be called a chimera of human and horse. —This Hungry Horse King had now become Meili's mount, having exchanged places with the Guiltilaw.

Roy: “…”

Roy’s thoughts fragmented into disarray at that reality, and a great conference of Memories foraged for an answer.

Raised as the agendas were: the truth behind the happening before his eyes, a precise counter to the imminent crisis at hand, and an apposite reaction to the astonishing reality, such was jumbled together by the pressing urgency of the situation.

Right before he selected the agenda to utmost prioritize—

???: “—What, looking dumb as a pig, you.”

The proprietor of the voice who had appeared right behind him, his giant knuckles punched right through Roy’s petite frame.

Roy: “—Hk-.”

His back pounded, Roy’s body was shot into flight above the heads of the Hungry Horse King and Meili. Outdistancing even the erupting aurora, Roy skidded across the ground, halted his momentum with one hand piercing the ground, and stuck the landing whilst twisting his body, his acrobatic movements to reposition himself forcing the enemy to abandon pursuit.

In his field of view, Roy captured Meili, astraddle the Hungry Horse King, a giant pigman garbed in a black suit who had appeared beside them, and finally, Ram, who was now positioned in a definitively separate locus from before. —The arrival of a new enemy, and the tactic of inexplicably instantaneous positional substitution; these were resurfacing a possibility which was supposed to have been relinquished.

Roy: “Noo~, that wasn’t it.”

It had, unwisely, slipped past him due to extraneous preconceptions influenced by the Memories he possessed.

That since this instantaneous substitution had to have been brought forth by an Authority, it would have been a power belonging to Clind. Thus he had reckoned he need not keep an eye out for it on the battlefield after Clind had disappeared alongside the Divine Dragon.

However—

???: "—If you're also a father, then don't go laying your hands on kids!!"

Audible there was a thick, anger-blazed voice, and sounds of the vehement impact that followed—at the edge of his vision, he could see Heinkel, grasping the twin girls with both his arms, basking in a fist square to the face.

Delivering that fervent blow was a large man, present within the Memories belonging to Roy—as expected, it was someone who was not supposed to have been here the moment the battle broke out, Gaston.

Heinkel: "…"

Walloped right in the face, Heinkel toppled over backwards, allowing the twins to just barely escape peril.

Whether Roy's provocation had proved effective or not, Heinkel appeared to have been on the verge of success, but his counterattack was abruptly crushed at its inception.

However, Roy would not laugh at Heinkel. After all, he had also been thwarted by the same opponent, with the same technique.

And, as for the identity of that opponent, it had not been Clind.

Roy: "Ehh~? Could it be~? Such a thing is possible~?"

Unable to conceive of any other possibility, even Roy found himself doubting that exceedingly unexpected reality.

Carried within that voice was nothing but genuine astonishment, bereft of any and all denial or disdain for that fact. Bereft though it was, even supposing that was the truth, it was preposterously unexpected.

From across every Memory that contained her presence, only one conclusion could be drawn: “No way.”

It was not Clind. In both Roy’s clash against Ram and Meili, and the battle where Heinkel was being pummeled by the twins, someone had intervened with perfect timing.

Whilst overlooking this all-out war, they had continuously employed an Authority to reconstruct the situation.

That was—

Roy: “—Petra-chan, since when did you become a Sin Archbishop?”

???: “Now that’s just extremely slanderous. If you’re going to call me something disreputable, then call me this.”

With those words, having dominated the battlefield through an Authority, the playmaker harboring a Witch Factor—Petra Leyte placed her hand over her chest, and stuck her tongue out with a “behhhh”.

Then, she declared—

Petra: “—The Witch of Tristitia, Petra Leyte.”

Vic.1120

Chapter 43:
True Name

1

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never play with children.

2

Petra: “For instance, if someone else were to use the Witch Factor held by Clind-niisama… if I were to use it, could I use Teleport as much as I wanted even without paying the compensation?”

When she had first been informed by Clind about the existence of the Witch Factor of Tristitia, and its Authority of Compression, the first thing that had popped into Petra’s mind was that method of abusing it.

Clind was not compatible with the Witch Factor, and as a result, compensation—payment was required to exercise the Authority of Compression, so he had told her. At the same time, the Witch Factor of Tristitia was a one-off Factor created to be used by a specific person, so by no means would Petra have been compatible, either.

Hence, the special tag team consisting of the Warlock who possessed the Authority that was Return by Death, Natsuki Subaru, and the Witch who supported him, Petra Leyte, was disbanded before it was even formed; while that was a relief, it was also true that she had felt regretful about it.

Hence, the matter of the Witch Factor of Tristitia was placed outside the topic of agenda, with them having decided on utilizing Clind’s Compression to reconvene with their allies and to plunge into the final battle against the enemy, but—with Al’s Authority of “Turning Back Time” having come to light, the spotlight had once again been placed on the Authority of Tristitia while they were working out a plan to decisively stop the Al Troupe.

Clind had informed Petra and the others that, due to incompatibility with the Witch Factor, it was impossible to exercise his Authority without compensation. However, the meaning hidden behind that was—

Petra: "—As long as the compensation is paid, then even people who aren't Clind-niisama can use Compression, right?"

At Petra's verification, Clind's expression did not shift.

However, that only served to convince Petra of the validity of her own conjecture. If he had truly wanted to hide it, Clind ought to have acted more surprised, saying "I had never even thought of that".

Petra: "In order to do something about Al-san and his group, it's absolutely essential that we split them all apart. Outside of Al-san himself, the most troublesome opponent would be the Divine Dragon-sama, but… Clind-niisama will do something about that, right?"

Roswaal: "On that point, I can also provide assurance. Clind is a key person to serve as a trump card against the Divine Dragon Volcanica, indeeed~. Did I use that right?"

Petra: "—. Yes, that's correct."

During the strategy meeting, the one who had boasted of being able to subdue the Divine Dragon was Clind.

Honestly, including the matter of the Witch Factor of Tristitia, it made her exasperated to think about how many secrets he was hiding along with Roswaal, but there was nothing better than his reliability. However, just because Clind was reliable did not mean she could take advantage of him for everything.

Petra: "But, if Clind-niisama is going to be busy dealing with the Divine Dragon-sama, he won't be able to take people in and out with Compression, correct?"

Clind: "I do not deny it. Affirmation. Of course, exhausting all of the power in my possession, I will deliver all personnel to the battle front without fail, but…”

Petra: “No. If you do it like that, I think Compression will lose its strengths. The best point about Compression is that, like a teleport, it can take our fighting strength in and out and switch things around.”

There was likely no falsehood in the words Clind had sworn with a quiet expression, however in them a certain heat did dwell.

Their greatest fighting strength would securely be sent to the enemy lines. That alone was already an extraordinary feat. But, this was also a battle such that, if they could afford to hope for more, then they ought to hope for as much as they could.

Rom: “‘N so, we shift ta the matter of transferrin’ the Authority. Tho’, before we start ta consider it, I’d like ta verify if that plan’s actually even possible.”

Clind: “—. About that. Hesitation.”

Petra: “Clind-niisama, please lay all the ingredients out on the table.”

Clind: “…”

Petra: “I think that right now is the time to discuss what cards everyone has in their hand, and the extent to which we might be able to use them. So, don’t hide anything.”

As Clind hesitated to speak out, Petra plainly requested him to.

She understood his reasons for being uneager to share, his reasons for worrying over keeping the information hidden. She understood, but this discussion was a meeting dedicated to saving the Kingdom, saving the world—saving Natsuki Subaru and Beatrice.

It was rather charming how Meili had been glaring at Petra as she had told him to not hide anything.

Clind: “…If you wish to know whether it is possible or impossible, then it would be possible. Approval. The Witch Factor of Tristitia fails to be compatible with myself, and it is merely within my possession. Responsibility."

Ram: "In that case, it is simply a matter of shifting ownership? Hah! That should be quite easy to handle then. It would be a disaster if Clind were to leave it behind."

Rem: "This also goes for if it were to be left behind, but it would also be quite scary if it were to be stolen or confiscated by someone else… In that sense, it's understandable that Clind was the one holding on to it."

Unexpectedly, the Witch Factor of Tristitia seemed to have been managed in a precarious state.

The notion that it was understandable that Clind had been the one entrusted with its management, with that Petra agreed. Clind, who always handled everything in a brisk and tactful manner, would have made for an ideal custodian.

However—

Petra: "It might be better to give up that duty to someone else this time."

Emilia: "Someone else… but, Witch Factors are reaaally dangerous. It's something I saw before at the Sanctuary. They aren't things you can handle safely at all."

Petra: "…There is definitely a risk. But, if it's used well…"

Meili: "—Hk, Petra-chan, I'm against it, you kno~w."

At the sharpened voice opposing her with the most emotion, Petra lowered the ends of her eyebrows.

Petra knew that Meili had constantly been worrying about her; it made her happy. After all, when Petra had just met Meili, she was always attempting to get the latter to like her. She had thought that affection would be the best weapon to dull any murderous impulses. And, she had hit the nail on the head.

Petra: “Though, it might have been a bit too effective.”

“Subaru”: “I’ll say this now, but I’m of the same opinion as Meili. You haven’t told me what it was, but you’ve already paid Clind-san with something, Petra. You can’t compromise anything further than this.”

The voice of a phantom inaudible to anyone else, it instilled Petra with the feeling that she was truly being held dear.

Let it be declared. Imaginary Subaru might have been a convenient delusion of Petra’s, but the quality of the recreation should have been high enough such that, beyond any doubt, if it had been the real Subaru, he would have said the same thing.

Petra: “I’m glad that neither Frederica-neesama nor Beatrice-chan are here.”

Even just Meili had caused Petra’s heart to waver a fair amount.

If Frederica and Beatrice had supplemented that with a one-two punch, Petra might have been knocked out. What about if Garfiel and Otto had been here? Garfiel would have likely shouted angrily, but she felt like Otto would have understood.

After all, Otto was the one currently overexerting himself by far the most out of the Camp, so Petra did not think he would have had any right to complain to her.

Harboring the self-awareness that she truly was such a blessed and beloved girl, Petra spoke—

Petra: “—Let’s divide up the roles properly. That way, everyone can do their job to the best of their abilities.”

3

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never visit that nostalgic place.

4

Tightly ascertaining the sensation of the rectangular box stored in her breast pocket, Petra focused her attention on the Witch Factor of Tristitia, which she had successfully received by manipulating her words, cajoling the people around her.

Petra: "—I have, to concentrate."

By putting that to words, Petra firmly cautioned herself so as to preserve her own sanity. —In honesty, until today, Petra had thought of herself as someone possessing a tenacious mental fortitude.

She had not lost her mind even after reading a Book of the Dead, and even if her beloved was not swayed by her in the slightest, she had never once thought about giving up on getting him to turn to face her. She was aware that she had been through many difficulties and gambles for someone of her age.

And despite all that, the destructive sense of omnipotence brought on by the Witch Factor made Petra's head spin.

Petra: "No, that's no good, for me… Subaru, cheer me on!"

"Subaru": "Petra, do your best! Don't lose! If you lose after staking everything on a gamble I told you not to do, you know what that'll mean! I'll end up hating you!"

Petra: "In that case, I definitely won't lose…"

Cheered on by her beloved within her mind, it felt like a bit of a last resort to revitalize her state of mind, but it did happen to be actually effective, showing how magnificent the power of love could be.

A Witch Factor, just what could such a thing do in the face of love?

The struggle against a Witch Factor was ultimately just a mental problem, so it was only natural that the power of love would serve as a wonder drug. —The efficacy of that remedy, which had made it impossible for Petra to remain as a mere village girl, was something she understood better than anybody else.

Therefore—

Rom: "—Noble ta Fire Eight! Then hit 'em with a Soldier ta Flowers Three!"

At the firm voice striking her eardrums with vigor, Petra opened her eyes wide, and grit her teeth.

With the activation of Compression, Petra deployed those designated personnel to those designated positions on the battlefield that had been divided up into an eight × eight grid within her mind—the same configuration as a Shatranj board.

Sure enough, two individuals aligning with the Felt Camp had been delivered to the battlefield in the blink of an eye—one of Felt's followers, Gaston, and a fierce-looking pigman known as the King Pig, Doltero; swinging their mighty arms, they wallopped Heinkel and Gluttony respectively, each of whom had been attempting to launch their own offensives, and sent them flying.

???: "Ehh~? Could it be~? Such a thing is possible~?"

Having sidestepped the punch with acrobatic maneuvers, Roy raised his irksome visage, and tearing his gaze off of Ram, whom he had been fixated on until then, he looked at Petra.

At Petra, who, maintaining a distance from the duos of Ram and Meili, Flam and Grassis, who were all engaged in direct combat, was positioned so as to grasp the entirety of the battlefield, sat atop the shoulders of Rom-jii.

Roy: "—Petra-chan, since when did you become a Sin Archbishop?"

Perhaps as ought to have been expected from a Sin Archbishop, he perceived the whereabouts of the Witch Factor—nay, were that the case, then he would have noticed their trick much sooner. Likely, it was the result of having correctly fathomed that Compression was the work of an Authority, and thinking about who was in the position to use it the most pertinently. Nothing impressive at all for a Sin Archbishop.

Petra: "Now that's just extremely slanderous. If you're going to call me something disreputable, then call me this.”

Without revealing her caution towards that insight of Roy’s, Petra placed a hand over her chest, and while ascertaining the sensation of the small black box she had received from Clind, she stuck out her tongue with a “behhhh”, declaring thus.

Petra: “—The Witch of Tristitia, Petra Leyte.”

In most cases, introducing oneself with such a title would have been received with no warm welcomes.

While calling oneself by that was already bad enough, being called that by somebody else was absolutely out of the question. Regardless of whether one was steeled in their resolve or not, that was a title akin to a curse, that of being abhorred by every person throughout the world.

However, Petra had boldly declared herself as such, as if it was something to take pride in.

After all, the master whom Petra served was the Witch of Glaciation, and her beloved was a kind, admirable Knight whose heart was smitten with that Witch.

5

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never hold beautiful flowers.

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never partake of my favorite food.

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never return to my hometown.

6

—The Witch of Tristitia, Petra Leyte.

Upon Petra declaring herself so, Roy Alphard felt a sense of apotheosis. —Owing to the surprise that she was capable of going so far, and the delight that she had indeed gone that far.

To take in a Witch Factor, and by one's own volition become a possessor of an Authority—a being who would be called the likes of Witch or Warlock or even Sin Archbishop, was an act seeming utterly devoid of sanity. The point upon which they had passed such an aberrant decision, was when their scrupulousness to spare no measure—that was to say, their love and affection that was the very spirit of hospitality, was something Roy felt potently, profoundly, vastly, and warmly.

Roy: "The- greatest…! So glad you turned up~!"

Spreading his arms wide, Roy stifled his ecstacy and proffered his gratitude to their hospitality and rendezvous.

Seeing that she named herself the Witch of Tristitia, Roy's inference that the opponent's Authority was derived from Pride had been off the mark. However, Roy had once been told by a monster who entitled itself his mother that the Witch Factor of Tristitia was a special, defective article with which nobody would prove to be compatible. The Witch Factor of Tristitia was one of the things that his mother had desired, so upon hearing of its hideaway, his mother would certainly be delighted.

Naturally, he did not feel like giving up even a single bite of such a special feast to his mother.

Roy: "It's a cute, selfish request of her hungry child after all, so she'll surely overlook it, won't she~."

This was a matter of his mother, the personification of the desire for acknowledgement, who loved nothing more than to be revered.

Roy could imagine how he would trigger her temper upon her learning that he had given priority to himself over his mother.

Once, Roy used to find this egotistic selfishness of his mother's to be unhelpably bothersome, but his current sentiment was slightly different from before. —The sentiment that even such egotistic selfishness and conceitedly diseased self-love, were irreplaceable attributes to be cherished.

Rom: “Queen ta Earth Six! Hunter ta Yang Six! Noble ta Yin Five!”

Concording to the aged Giant’s instruction, a dim glow sojourned in Petra’s eyes.

It was not as though they were actually shining. As a consequence of her devoting her consciousness to utilizing an Authority that was impossible to get accustomed to using, the moments in which she was exerting herself could be pinpointed. Normally, it was a trivial habit not worth paying attention to, but in the midst of battle where an instant’s difference demarcated the line between victory or defeat, even that became information coupled to life or death.

From Roy’s field of vision, the forms of Ram and the pigman, and Meili astraddle atop the Hungry Horse King disappeared. —And concurrent to their disappearance, they appeared as though surrounding Roy from three directions and waged their offensive.

The timing of which, he could quite clearly grasp due to the glow in Petra’s eyes.

Roy: “Yes yes, excuse us for a bit-.”

On the brink of their offensive making contact, Roy joined his hands before his chest. —When, in that instant, the ground rose as though sand dunes were swelling from force applied from left and right, cutting off Ram and the pigman’s line of sight from Roy. Entrusting the two to that, Roy focused his concentration on the utmost loud and annoying crying voice of an infant.

The field of vision from the back of his head that came to him even without needing to turn, therein were the bone spears of the Hungry Horse King that Meili was riding on—and alongside that, launched in tandem, the Guiltilaw’s monstrously proficient arm swung.

Bending his body a great deal back, Roy accreted dodge after dodge after dodge, then licked his lips.

The Compactor, Figdour, was a hitman who had specialized in burying alive, wielding a strange ability to squash everything from both ends of his field of vision into its middle; and the Priestess of a Thousand Visages, Iyerna, was the proprietor of an expansive heart and outlook, all three hundred and sixty degrees top to bottom and left to right, never to miss bearing witness to the tears of the lamenting, grieving weak. —However, the ability of the Queen of Witchbeasts, Meili, did not fall short of them either.

Hungry Horse King: "—GAGYAGYA-GAGYAAAH."

Guiltilaw: "—AROOOOOO."

The pack of Ulgarm, the Hungry Horse King of the sand sea, and the Guiltilaw renowned as the Jet-Black King of the Forest; Meili's ability of sallying forth Witchbeasts in succession granted Roy nary a breather for emotional impression. Meili's stratagem of manipulating Witchbeasts with unbroken horns was something he had been prepared for through his Memories, but since he had been deferred from experiencing its true worth at the Pleiades Watchtower, it was a great excitement to witness it in all of its glory.

Roy: "Having been born possessing such a Divine Protection, your life mu~st have been full of ups and downs, hasn't it? The way of life have you walked till now, teach us~, Meili!"

Meili: "…Teach us what way of life have you walked, that was something Subaru-oniisan and Emilia-oneechan said to me once before, to~o."

Roy: "Really? And then and then?"

The bone spears of the Hungry Horse King and the honed claws of the Guiltilaw; nimbly and agilely evading them, Roy slurped on his drool, while Meili, glaring at him, with her face harboring animosity and repugnance, pulled her eyelid downward and stuck out her tongue,

Meili: "The same as what you said about love being whatever befo~re, but in the end, what matters even more than what you say, is who says i~t!"

At the truth which left him with no place to grapple, Roy could only muster a “Taha~!” with no words to give in retort.

At Roy’s rear, the pigman smashed through the ground wall barrier, and from overhead Ram dropped, disappearing and appearing yet again. Front, rear, and above, enclosed from three dimensions, Roy distorted the space between the length of both of his legs, invoking the magical technique of the Magia Manus Magister, Yardray, who had been submerged in the shadows of history and finally eaten—spears of flame, ice, and earth were brought forth by magic, and immediately locked on to their targets.

Their aims were Meili, the pigman, and Ram—but, she was not there.

Ram: “To lose sight of Ram again and again. Why don’t you just throw those away? That set of eyes.”

—There she was. At a distance close enough for a hug, Ram’s slender frame came into sight.

7

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never shed a tear in the company of others.

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never wipe the tears of another.

8

Roy: “Witch of Tristitiaaa-…!”

—The Compactor × Priestess of a Thousand Visages × Magia Manus Magister.

Surpassing even the combined power of these new suprarational individuals, the trio closed in from all multifarious directions, and knowing the identity of the one who had orchestrated this, Roy’s throat roared the name out.

What had made his throat quake was not rage. It was delight.

Throbbing lively, his heart's thrumming pulsations would not cease.

Entrusting himself to those thrumming pulsations, Roy re-aimed the spears of three attributes from their initial targets, bringing them crashing into one another; by way of the blast and vapor generated, Ram and the others would inevitably be forced to reposition—

Roy: "—Wha…"

Ram: "Did you think we would Teleport to avoid sustaining injuries?"

With his line of sight obscured, the scorching vapor, which ought to have coerced a Teleport via the Authority of Tristitia, was rent asunder through pure strength, and from the other side came flying the proprietor of pale crimson eyes.

Plunging head-first into the inescapable scalding heat, she had caught Roy off guard, the latter having erased the possibility that they might deliberately choose to sustain injury from his head. Forthwith, born was the option for Roy to take the initiative, employing the Teleport of the Leaper to forcibly reset things to square one. —However,

Roy: "—THE- GREATEST-!"

The instant he recognized his opponent's brilliance, Roy Alphard's Bizarre Eating awakened.

With an outcry of jubilation screeching through his mind, Roy's brain sparkled with branches of countless choices.

Flinging the doors open on the plentiful treasure house of Memories, he sought that which sparkled amidst the countless miscellaneous treasures tossed aside, the articles what had been lying dormant, impatiently awaiting the chance to raise their first cries and rise to the stage at last.

—At present, the foremost point of focus was the truth of the hospitality that had rendered Eclipsing a failure.

Roy: "…"

Having reached his hand out towards his opponent in an attempt to eat their Memories, Roy's Eclipsing towards Ram had failed.

But, she was unmistakably Ram. That was evident from the freshly devoured Memories; the originator of the Memories called her by the name Ram, and those in the environs beyond that also called her Ram, if anything, even her own first person pronoun was Ram; she was Ram through and through.

Regardless, he could not meet the requirements for invoking Eclipsing on the name Ram. In that case, the most probable reason behind the failure of Eclipsing was—

Roy: "—An alteration, of the true name-." "1"

Required for Eclipsing, were the provisions to plunder the target from the name registry of souls managed by Od Lagna. Hence, the target's name would need to match exactly what Od Lagna had recorded it to be.

In most cases, it was the vow averred during the naming ritual at the time of one's birth—the moment those prayers arrived, the true name would be recorded in the vast empty mind benamed Od Lagna.

Primarily, once the true name was defined, it would not be altered, regardless of however an individual might opt to acknowledge themself. The alterations which Od Lagna did recognize, one of those few exceptions—

Roy: "—Ram Mathers."

Ram: "—Hk."

Piercing through the vapor, as Ram attempted to have her blow connect, Roy forestalled by touching her.

The predominant reason for alterations of the true name were those brought about by Marriage. —In addition, Ram had compelled Meili to refer to her as "Madam". Even from just the Memories, there laid no room for doubt pertaining to whom Ram harbored affection.

Fostering conviction, Roy invoked Eclipsing upon the soul of Ram—no, upon Ram Mathers; her pale crimson eyes dilated wide as he sought to devour her Memories, to understand her through and through, not sparing a single portion,

Roy: “Let’s ea—blergh.”

In that instant, Roy split his eyes wide open at the sensation akin to muck being crammed into his open mouth.

That was the proof of Eclipsing’s failure, his entire body quaking with a vehement sense of rejection; Roy’s heart, supposed to have graciously received a treat, now tore apart from within, an absurd dubiety governing his mind.

Why, how, understanding, marriage, Ram, true name, doting to her younger sister, awful tastes, the Margrave, earnest, ill-natured, superiority, dependable, merely awful tastes, her nature also ill, marriage, passion—

Ram: “—Did you peer into Otto’s Memories? Truly a fool.”

Roy: “Ah—?”

Ram: “Did you really think Ram would use this emergency as a pretext to position herself as Roswaal-sama’s spouse? —If you truly knew Ram, that was a misunderstanding you would never have made.”

As Ram sneered, her lips twisting into a slim smile, Roy understood.

To have herself be called “Madam” was yet another misdirect, a ploy to draw him to a false conclusion exploiting the Memories of someone close—in truth, Roy had dismissed the low-risk choice of using the Leaper’s technique, opting instead for the high-reward of reaching Ram’s soul with his tongue with the conviction that he would be able to eat her.

A decision he would have never made had he not eaten those Memories, had he not eaten Otto Suwen.

Ram: “For the most part, this is for Otto.”

Ram apprised him so; then, her wind-clad fist, the pigman's rock-like knuckles, and to top it all off the fiery bone spears clad in blasting burn and the stout arms of a fiendish beast, all impaled Roy Alphard in perfect synchrony.

Vic_1120

Chapter 44:
Collusion Beneath the Water's Surface

1

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never speak of fond reminiscences.

2

???: "—If you're also a father, then don't go laying your hands on kids!!"

Compared to the fist plowing straight into the opponent's mug, those words must have been far more scathing. —Laying eyes upon that sight, Rom-jii fathomed such a guess regarding the pain Heinkel had received.

With a counterattack strategy that fully relied on his ability to take hits, Heinkel endeavored to strike back against Flam and Grassis, but just before that could take form, he was superbly thwarted by Gaston—or to be precise, by the intervention of the young girl who had inserted Gaston there via Compression.

Rom: "Geez, really is quite somethin'…"

After verifying the safety of the twin sisters who had been released from the opponent's grasp, what Rom-jii turned his attentive gaze towards was the young girl riding on his shoulders—the side profile of Petra.

Petra: "…"

With her large, round eyes narrowed, and the lovely features of her cheeks strained, Petra diligently cast a serious gaze towards the two battlefronts.

Those being the bouts of combat clashing against Roy Alphard of Gluttony, and the swordsman who had betrayed the Kingdom—the Backstabber, Heinkel. Originally, present there had also been the principal offender, Aldebaran, alongside his obedient shinobi, and the Divine Dragon which had bowed down before him.

There had been discussions on splitting up that dangerous ensemble, creating theaters of war such that each enemy could be dealt crushing blows individually, but it would have been no exaggeration to say that it was Petra who held the key to that stratagem's success.

The plan had been constructed around the opinions of Clind, a man intimately familiar with the Authority of Tristitia, and while all personnel were united in their efforts to bring about the success of this stratagem, the one ultimately contributing the most was Petra.

Without her, nary would this battle have even commenced. —And that had now culminated, in this very moment.

Petra: "—Hk."

Tightly biting down on her lip, Petra's nails firmly dug into the shoulders of Rom-jii as she sat on him. He felt no pain from the likes of a young girl's nails, but the state of her mind as she subconsciously did so was unimaginable.

The Witch Factors that reduced people to Witches and Sin Archbishops; the burden of handling one was something that could only have been understood by those who had actually done so. Furthermore, the duty that Petra now shouldered, was one for which Rom-jii's own name had also been raised as a candidate.

Albeit lacking in direct combat ability, his quick wits and ability to make decisions made him desirable to have on the field of battle.

That was precisely the role of Rom-jii and Petra, and while the difference in their Camps had ultimately been the deciding factor, Petra's duty was one that Rom-jii could very well have ended up shouldering.

Hence, while Rom-jii's ultimate priority in this battle was to take back Felt, he had decided in his heart that his secondary priority was to do everything in his power to support Petra. If it meant that Petra's burden could become even just a bit lighter, he would devote his entire soul to ensuring that no blunders or oversights occurred in his judgments and instructions regarding the war situation.

Rom: "Queen ta Flowers Three. Noble ta Lightning Two. Hunter ta Flowers Five."

Overlooking the battlefield, Rom-jii issued commands such that Petra could hear from atop his shoulders. Each time Petra received his instructions, and exercised the Authority, the scratches on his shoulders would deepen, becoming all the more more numerous.

Primarily, it was the battle against Gluttony in which Compression could be utilized. Roy seemed to be aware that Rom-jii and Petra were making contributions to the combat, but the way Ram conducted herself was exceptionally skillful. She continued to dexterously draw the opponent's attention, ensuring that he could not lay a hand on those in the position of command.

The fact that the combat continued to ebb and flow with a paper thin difference, even when including Compression, stemmed from the abundance of moves and cards in Gluttony's hand, but this stood in stark contrast to the other front, where the moves and cards in hand were desperately few.

Heinkel: "—Kuh."

With even his screams getting lost amidst the sounds of pummeling, Heinkel continued to be showered in blow after blow.

Joining the twins Flam and Grassis, Gaston supplemented their speedy flurry with the might of his arm, causing a one-sided beatdown that ought to already have been labeled punishment without fair trial to unfold. But, since the other party had still yet to bend the knee, Flam and the rest could not afford ease off, either.

On both fronts, a nudge would be required for things to progress. — It happened right after he had reached that thought.

Petra called out "—Rom-ojiisan", and with Rom-jii her eyes met.

Petra: "…"

By the mere crossing of their gazes, Rom-jii understood that Petra had arrived at the same conclusion he had. Without even sparing the time to nod in agreement, Rom-jii kept a keen eye out for a golden opportunity.

And then—

Rom: "Queen ta Yang Five—!"

As Rom-jii let the command fly, Petra exerted strength into the hands on his shoulders, into her round eyes, and activated Compression—in a manner most magnificent, the fruit of cooperation between Ram and two others vehemently surged towards Roy.

Petra: "—Alright!"

Roy's petite frame engulfed in wind, he basked in the attacks of the King Pig alongside two Witchbeasts, and was blown away. Spraying blood as he was shot up into the air, Roy had unmistakably been dealt a serious blow.

Just before that decisive blow was made, Roy had attempted to invoke the Authority of Gluttony on Ram, but with that ending in a misfire, he had given birth to a significantly fatal opening. —Once again, he was deeply impressed by the courage of Ram in laying that trap and having it actually succeed, as well as Petra's ingenuity for having proposed it.

—Formerly Ram, now Ram Leyte.

Taking advantage of the system, an unnatural proceeding to become adopted children had been performed for all personnel on the front lines whom Gluttony had a chance of targeting; 'twas an outlandish stratagem that betrayed the expectations of the Sin Archbishop.

Rom: "But with this…"

The situation had shifted. At the certain materialization of the move that had been desired to break the deadlock, Rom-jii tightly clenched his fist.

And then, maintaining that momentum, he shifted his sights in an attempt to progress the other situation—

Heinkel: "…Nobody, fucking move a muscle. If this brat's… if this personage's life is valuable to you."

—With the variation that had been birthed on that front, he was confronted with the worst predicament possible, that of Heinkel pressing his sword against Felt, pinioning her hands behind her back.

3

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never retell my favorite stories.

4

Aldebaran: "Sorry for everything up 'till now. In a lot of ways, I've put way too much burden on your shoulders, old man."

Giving that apology, it was right after Aldebaran had mercilessly beat down Heinkel by sheer force, just when the latter had been about to take an overly hasty action while conversing with Felt.

To be frank, Heinkel was aware that he had been about to carry out a deed that could never be undone, and thus reflected that he had no right to complain about having been beaten down. He had no choice but to accept the apology.

However, the reality that Felt had caught wind of—that alone, he absolutely could not afford to leave unchecked.

Heinkel's ever-slumbering wife, Louanna Astrea.

'Twas the fact that the slumber of the woman Heinkel held most dear was caused by his son, Reinhard.

Aldebaran: “Well, hold on a sec. I ain’t gonna ask about what happened between you and Lil’ Miss Felt, old man. But, didn’t I tell you? Old man, it was my fault for making you shoulder all that burden, yeah?”

Heinkel: “…Where are you going with this? What good will apologizing do?”

Aldebaran: “Of course, I won’t say something like “I apologized, so just keep hanging in there.” For now, I’ll deal with the matter of Lil’ Miss Felt.”

Heinkel: “Even if you say you’ll deal with it…”

Aldebaran: “I ain’t gonna do anything dangerous. Though, it might be a little crude.”

As Aldebaran spoke those words with a shrug of his shoulders, Heinkel’s cheeks tensed.

Regarding what he was thinking, he was a man with many inscrutable aspects to him. Even so, what Heinkel did understand was that, driven by the sorrow of having lost Priscilla, he had begun to turn the world against him.

That at the very foundation of Aldebaran, certainly present was a love towards that blazing Sun Princess.

However, Aldebaran had retained just enough good conscience to not go as far as sacrificing everything just for that purpose. —It felt as if such a thing no longer bound him; that he had broken free from his shackles.

Heinkel: “What… what are you planning to do?”

Aldebaran: “I won’t do anything bad to you, old man. Only, there’s just one thing I’d like to confirm.”

As he unwittingly gulped aloud, Heinkel felt a strong sense of thirst from his throat. It was a certain kind of premonition that only cowards were endowed with, that of wanting to hear what words came next, but with a simultaneous desire to not hear them.

Ignoring those feelings of Heinkel, Aldebaran vocalized his question.

That was—

Aldebaran: “Fifteen years ago, about the name of the royal who was abducted from the castle—”

For Heinkel—nay, for anyone in the Kingdom of Lugunica, speaking that name had gained a perception of being something of a taboo.

Fifteen years ago, the daughter of the King’s younger brother was abducted from the Royal Castle of Lugunica, and ever since then, her whereabouts had been unknown.

In the long and storied history of the Kingdom, it was not as though there had been an absence of royals who had led lives of misfortune. However, despite having been blessed by birth, she was the only one whose growth and conclusion were never spoken of.

???: “—Filóre Lugunica.” “1”

The forty-first King of the Kingdom of Lugunica, Randohal Lugunica; the daughter of his younger brother, Ford Lugunica, was the royal whom Heinkel had been suspected of abducting fifteen years prior.

Albeit, the suspicions of abduction were false accusations—after circulating from one place to the next, Heinkel had, unto the Royal Family to whom he ought to have sworn his fealty, and unto Ford whom he owed a great debt of gratitude, committed a blasphemy which he could never retract.

Far beyond simply betraying the Kingdom, that was a clear breach of faith on his friendship with the Royal Family.

???: “—Let’s eat.”

An abominable ritual of unspeakable sin, effectuated before his eyes.

From Aldebaran's question, that was something Heinkel had foreseen, and likely even hoped for. Despite being fully aware that the ritual had served as the impetus for many a tragedy, he still had hoped so.

After all, if that was enacted, Heinkel would not end up needing to kill her.

???: "Thank you for the treat-."

Placing two hands together, Roy announced the completion of the ritual, and with eyes upon that small figure's back, Heinkel came to his senses. He had been so eager to avert his gaze that, submerged in his thoughts, he had quite literally overlooked the deed taking place before his eyes.

Though he found it absurd that his heart still ached with each new unknightly deed he enacted, Heinkel stepped forth to change places with Roy, the latter cackling in delight.

And then—

Heinkel: "—Filóre-sama."

Getting down on one knee, Heinkel called out to the girl in such a manner.

Just what sort of answer had he been expecting? If she replied acknowledging that it referred to herself, then it would signify the failure of the ritual. If she replied that she did not know what that meant, it would still likely end up causing Heinkel anguish.

Sure enough, not even holding the answer within himself, the answer Heinkel received was—

Filóre: "Who, might that be referring to? No, in the first place…"

Heinkel: "…"

Filóre: "—Who, am I exactly?"

Ultimately, the reply signifying the ritual's success wounded Heinkel, causing him anguish.

Filóre: "Filóre, that is my name… something about it does not feel quite right."

With her Memories devoured, Filóre's attitude truly felt as though she were a different person entirely.

Her mannerisms, conduct, and way of speaking had all previously given the impression of crudeness and having been poorly raised, but as if that had all been a lie, she now carried herself with a grace and gentleness befitting royalty, greatly surprising Heinkel.

If not for the tragedy fifteen years prior, she would have likely been a member of royalty beloved by all.

Aldebaran: "But in exchange for that, she would've probably ended up dying of the same illness as the rest of the Royal Family."

As Heinkel was stricken with such deep emotions, Aldebaran made a rather tasteless comment.

But, that was likely the truth. The epidemic of unknown origin that seemed to have only targeted royalty; if Filóre had been in the castle, she would have likely not escaped harm. —Heinkel had been about to realize something about what that signified, but he shut his eyes, refusing to confront it directly.

By this point, Heinkel's mind and body were already filled to the brim. With the fulfillment of his dearest wish just ahead, his heart could not bear the shocking facts that kept being added on one after another.

Filóre: "Is there perhaps something troubling you?"

As Heinkel subconsciously placed his hands over his face, Filóre inquired so of him.

Even though she had been the one in a far more uncertain situation, being without her Memories, for her to still display concern for others was an act in which Heinkel certainly glimpsed the blood of the Lugunican Royal Family.

At the same time, convinced he was of a cruel reality—substantiated the moment the Authority of Gluttony was activated, of the fact that she was undoubtedly Filóre Lugunica.

And yet—

Heinkel: "…With this, I guess the Royal Selection's over."

Aldebaran: "Why'd you think that, old man?"

Heinkel: "Is there anything at all left? The reason why the Royal Selection is being held is to find a "successor" worthy of the throne. If it has to be said, it's a backup plan because the Royal Family perished… now that we know that they didn't die out, it's a given that everyone will go back on it."

As irony would have it, it was a truth that had only come to light because following Priscilla's death, Aldebaran had gone rogue and broken Gluttony out of prison, and because she had gotten to the crux of Heinkel's heart before losing her Memories.

It almost seemed as if the world itself had exerted its control in order to install Filóre on the throne.

Of course, Heinkel did not suggest anything so insensitive as saying that even Priscilla's death had been for that purpose, but ultimately, Filóre taking the throne would have been the most desirable outcome.

He would awaken Louanna. So long as that was fulfilled, it was in Heinkel's best interests for all matters to be settled without any problems.

Hence, the Witch of Envy would withdraw, and Filóre would take the throne. Such did he desire.

Aldebaran: “Alter, this is the most peaceful way to settle things. Got any problems with that?”

???: “…Just barely, because I was able to compromise on this, the lil’ miss avoided getting hurt. I think it’s a brilliant solution, Origin. It’s just—”

Aldebaran: “It’s just?”

???: “Did you really think of this plan by yourself, Origin? It doesn’t really seem like something you’d come up with.”

Aldebaran: “…”

Next to Heinkel as he came to terms with things, Aldebaran and the Divine Dragon debated over the treatment of Filóre in such a manner. Be that as it may, at least the problem Heinkel had been carrying was shelved for now. But then again, there was no doubt that bringing Filóre around without her Memories would only sow the seeds for new problems—

???: “In that case, it won’t become a problem or anything of the sort~. Right, Al-sama?”

As Yae stealthily peered at his face from right next to him, Heinkel’s breath caught.

As if she had seen straight through Heinkel’s inner apprehensions, she sent a sidelong glance his way as if mocking him, before proceeding to encourage Aldebaran as if presuming upon him.

From Yae’s disparaging attitude, he felt no sense of unease. What did give him a sense of unease, was the demeanor Aldebaran displayed towards her.

Aldebaran: “…Yeah. I did promise the old man, after all.”

Heinkel: “Ah? Promise?”

Aldebaran: “That I’ll be the one who deals with the matter of Lil’

Miss Felt… no, Lil’ Miss Filóre.”

Declaring so with an aloof, yet evidently callous attitude, Aldebaran ignored Heinkel’s bewilderment and “dealt with it”.

At that decisive—nay, that uncompromising attitude, for better or worse, Heinkel was dismayed.

The shift in the relationship between Aldebaran and Yae, the emotions the Divine Dragon harbored towards Filóre, the expansion of the scope of actions permitted to Gluttony, and the truth about Filóre that had come to light. —By no means were they a group with a unified relationship, but Heinkel could feel the strains and discrepancies gradually growing larger.

Amidst such a group, Heinkel resolved himself to at least remain as one who maintained his sanity.

No matter how suffocating a difficult situation he was placed in, Heinkel would be troubled were this group to fall apart before his goal was fulfilled.

Hence—

Heinkel: “—Even if it’s just me, I’ll act decently.”

Indeed, receiving the result of Filóre having been “dealt with”—the black orb around the size of a beanbag in which she had been sealed, thus did Heinkel vow.

Indeed, he had vowed.

Heinkel: “If you don’t want Filóre-sama to get hurt, then stand down…!”

—He had vowed, and yet.

Faced with a predicament, Heinkel had done an about face on that resolve of his; binding the arms of the grown-up Filóre behind her back, he pressed his sword against her slender neck.

???: “Felt… hk!”

Upon witnessing Heinkel’s act of violence, a man of solid physique called out to Filóre by a different name in frustration.

Flam and Grassis, who had been pummeling him without having ceased their movements, faced off against Heinkel, their gazes filled with anger and disdain, likely mixed in with a bit of anxiety and bewilderment.

From their perspective, there would have likely been two strands of surprise.

Similar to how they had been repeatedly appearing and disappearing, Filóre seemed to have appeared in Heinkel’s hands without any forewarning, and furthermore, Heinkel had called her by a different name than the one they knew.

There was no avoiding the perplexity and unease surging up in their eyes.

Heinkel: “I’m deeply sorry, but I do not wish to be rough. Please bear with me.”

As Heinkel pinioned the arms of Filóre and spoke those words to her, he was disgusted at his own chicanery.

He had endeavored. In this battle that had commenced all too suddenly, Heinkel had endeavored to the utmost to avoid getting Filóre involved. But, he had given up. As always, his efforts had borne no fruit.

And so, shattering the black orb with which Aldebaran had entrusted him, he released the sealed Filóre to the outside, and holding her hostage, he threatened the enemies who had appeared.

Heinkel: “Don’t move, you don’t want this personage to get hurt, yeah?”

Even as he stained his hands with such an atrocity, his secret courtesy towards Filóre proved some fragment of conscience still lingered within Heinkel.

Before he had gained conviction that she was Filóre, he had been able to disregard the beautiful golden hair and blazing red eyes that were proof of royalty as being naught more than a mere accidental resemblance. But, now that he had been convinced of her identity as Filóre, Heinkel was unable to interact with her the same way that he had up until that point.

Were he asked if it was a matter of changing his attitude based on the identity of the other party, the answer would have been yes. — To devote fealty towards those of the Lugunican Royal Family, 'twas a tenet entrenched in Heinkel by his parents.

Filóre: "—Hk."

Serving as a belated trump card, Filóre's throat rumbled as she was made to raise her visage.

Freshly liberated from that black orb, Filóre complied with Heinkel's will, perhaps because of the lingering disorientation of her consciousness, or perhaps because the sudden change in situation had caused her to lose her bearings.

While that irritated him to no end, the threat had been effective, with the opponents' movements having dulled. Seizing that opportunity, albeit he was still worried about Aldebaran and the others, Heinkel chose to prioritize rescuing Roy, who had fallen into a trap on the same battlefield—

???: "—Felt!!"

Unlike that which had been wrung out by the man of solid physique earlier, this was a voice carrying strength.

Across the battlefield thundered a shout woven from joy upon reuniting with a person held dear, faint ire beneath deep affection, together mixed in with a fear for her safety, and the ironclad determination to bring her home no matter what.

Filóre: “…”

At that voice, Filóre stirred within Heinkel’s arms.

Even if she was in a state lacking Memories, in a position unsure of friend or foe, any strong emotions directed towards herself would likely be conveyed. Slowly, she blinked open those signature red eyes of royalty, and met eyes with the old giant who had called out to her from afar.

Then, opening her lips, she began to spin words. Those were—

Filóre: “—Rom-jii! Take Gaston and everyone else and fall back! That is coming!”

With all the royal grace up until a moment prior cast aside, a voice laden with a gruff strength—as if lost Memories had been forcibly reclaimed at the call of someone treasured, ‘twas the roaring cry of the regal and valorous Golden Lion.

5

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never call others by terms of endearment.

6

—Of course, the reason why Felt had been able to warn her comrades of the oncoming peril stemmed not from any fairy-tale convenience like the miracle of love that Heinkel had thought it to be.

The ruthlessness of the Authority of Gluttony was extended far past the likes of Felt, evident in the tragedies of the people who had fallen prey to it and those who surrounded them. There existed nothing so absurd like the hotbed of those countless tragedies being resolved merely by the emotions that surrounded Felt.

Hence, the reason why Felt had returned from being “Filóre” to “Felt” here was plain and simple—to begin with, Roy had never even eaten Felt’s Memories.

Roy: “About after this, Felt-chan, seems we’ve got no choice bu~t to eat your Memories~. —Felt-chan, how about cooperating with us?”

The words left Roy’s lips soon after Aldebaran had resolved to “deal with” Felt, who had become a liability that threatened to fracture their group’s cohesion after discovering an unnecessary truth.

The unnecessary truth Felt had surmised would be devoured entirely by Roy along with her Memories, and it seemed like this opportunity was also being taken to get rid of Felt’s personality of impertinently prying into things one by one.

The idea was that so long as her life was not taken, it would be fine, but if Felt were to be asked, the moment she lost her Memories and stopped being her current self, it would be tantamount to killing her, so she did not approve of Aldebaran’s methods.

Felt: “But, that doesn’t mean that I’ll suddenly approve of yours. To begin with, by cooperating with the likes of you, what the hell are you trying to get me to do? “

Roy: “Hahaa~, that attitude is tantalizing you know~. But no need to worry, Felt-chan. After all, drafting scrupulous stratagems or having a perfect plan, that kinda stuff isn’t our creed~. What we want to ask you to do, Felt-chan, is decidedly, for you to pretend your Memories were eaten.”

Felt: “…Go on.”

Closing a single eye, Felt detected a possible value in hearing Roy out. Viewing her reaction, Roy chortled “Tha~t’s the spirit~!” in delight from the bottom of his heart.

Roy: “It’s not bad to keep going along with helmet uncle and the others like this~, but if we don’t take any action, the best we can hope for is being used up and tossed aside when the ideal time comes… see, we’re engraved with a curse mark, and it’s quite the unfavorable situation we’re in. That’s why, you see…”

Felt: “That’s why?”

Roy: “While you’re pretending to have lost your Memories, Felt-chan, just keep aiming and watching out for a chance to retaliate like you’ve always been. We’ll take advantage of the opportunity you might create, Felt-chan, and attempt to slip out from our position as captive Sin Archbishop, after all.”

Felt: “—. If I were to tell that to the helmet bastard, causing a falling out between you guys, you’d easily be eliminated; that line of thought also exists, you know?”

Roy: “Yes yes, that’s exactly it! Keep laying those sorts of traps~.”

Roy clapped his hands in great ecstacy, and trying to probe deeper into his true intentions, Felt quickly dismissed it. If he did happen to be concealing his true feelings, she did not think she could see through them, and it seemed to Felt that Roy was speaking sincerely.

And in reality, given Felt’s position, it was also the best proposal she could ask for. —Felt’s position, at this rate, would be that of being robbed of her Memories, with not a thing she could do about it.

Felt: “However, you’d need to have my name in order to even eat me in the first place. Your sibling didn’t know it, and that caused him to throw up.”

Roy: “Well~, that’s true. But, even you know it somewhere deep in your heart, don’t you, Felt-chan? That your real name might very well be the same as that of the princess renowned from the Kingdom’s tra~gedy?”

Felt: “…”

Roy: “A~h, or perhaps you would like to confirm? Though if Eclipsing succeeds using that name, we’d end up acquiring your Memories, but we’ll be able to verify. How about it?”

Felt: “Hah, now there’s a cheap provocation. —Fine, I’m in.”

As Roy languidly hung out his long tongue and peered at her face, Felt scoffed at him.

Just who actually was she? —Such a worthless question did not matter in the slightest to Felt. She knew that there were those to whom it might have mattered, but it was the same logic as before, that having her Memories stolen would have been the same as being killed.

Felt had already accumulated all her life experience as a person named “Felt”. Sorry, but regardless of how it started, any life in which she was not “Felt” had ended before even starting.

Such things were unnecessary. Hence, she would take advantage of the repulsive Gluttony’s machinations.

Felt: “I’ll be the only one victorious.”

Roy: “Kuku-, ah-hahaa~! We thought you’d say that! We believed it! But, even we will do our utmost by placing insurance to make sure that Felt-chan isn’t the only one who wins, you know?”

Felt: “Insurance, eh? Don’t say such lame things. Wager everything on a single shot.”

Roy: “Such gallantry is cool and whatnot~, but what’s important to us isn’t the likes of such pri~de. —Eat or be eaten, that’s all.”

With those words, Roy gnashed his teeth as if to celebrate the establishment of the collusion.

And thereafter, as promised, Roy had pretended to eat Felt’s Memories, leaving her as she was. Felt too abided by the collusion with Roy which she had half-doubted, and acted as though she had no Memories—she performed the role of the royal whom she did not even know, Filóre Lugunica.

Felt: “Sorry, but the only person I could think to mimic was Crusch-neechan.”

In the sense that she was a victim whose Memories had been eaten by Gluttony, the first thing that came to Felt’s mind was Crusch. Having used the sudden changes in her demeanor and manner of speech as a reference, it seemed like Filóre had somehow satisfied Aldebaran and the rest, and above all, Heinkel.

Fortunately, the times she needed to play Filóre were neither long nor many, as Felt had soon ended up being sealed in a peculiar black sphere through Aldebaran's magic. The sensations within that orb were exceedingly suffocating, and it was nothing nice, but—there were aspects that had helped her.

By reducing the amount of time she had needed to play Filóre, she had managed to avoid revealing their subterfuge. Had Felt unwittingly revealed it, Roy's "insurance" would have been invoked. With such she had been threatened.

Supposing Felt did not go along with the proposal, it had been prepared to ensure she had no choice but to go along with it, and to prevent her betrayal after she agreed, proving to serve as "insurance" in quite the literal sense of the word.

That was—

Felt: "—It's coming out from my shadow!!"

While Heinkel pinioned her arms, holding his sword fastened against her neck, she shouted.

Deceiving Aldebaran and his henchmen, the face down trap card prepared by the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, Roy Alphard, in order to flee from their grasp; listed alongside the White Whale and the Great Rabbit, it was the last of the Three Great Witchbeasts—

Felt: "—The Black Serpent!!"

—So it was that in response to the breach of the agreed upon collusion, brought forth to this theater of all-out war between the two factions was the Black Serpent, the Witchbeast of Pestilence responsible for having massacred the most living creatures in this world since its birth. "2"

Chapter 45:
Clash of the Suprarational

1

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never invite another into my home.

2

—In her defense, Felt had not initially accepted Roy's conditions with the intention of immediately reneging on them.

The "insurance" he had imposed on her had certainly been "insurance".

That threat was known to Felt, and if she were to act carelessly in any way, it was very likely that she would bring enormous harm to not only her own life as a matter of course, but also to her surroundings.

Therefore, despite how annoying it was, she intended to go along with Roy's plan, playing the part of Filóre Lugunica and waiting for as large of an opening as possible from Aldebaran and the others. Of course, she intended on further outmaneuvering Roy as he tried to outmaneuver them.

However, that determination within Felt was soon forced to change course.

???: "—Felt!!"

Released from the sealed space, while feeling the frigidity of steel against the skin of her neck, Felt poured everything into getting a grasp on the situation. The first thing was the "insurance" that she would act as Filóre—to prevent that which had a risk of being invoked, regardless of if Roy was watching or not. On top of that, she was seeking an opportunity to give any members of Aldebaran's group a taste of their own medicine.

Such various determinations cracked the moment that familiar voice had called out to her.

Felt: "…"

Pinned in a nelson hold, Felt raised her head slightly and looked.

At the edge of the battlefield, the loud voice that had called out for Felt was Rom-jii, whom she was already missing after only two or three days. She was overjoyed, but at the same time, she understood that she was a hostage for this purpose, and she forcefully fastened the mask of Filóre that was beginning to slip—then, their eyes met.

With Rom-jii, it was not. Rather, it was with the pale blue eyes of the girl perched atop those shoulders with his.

—In that instant, information flooded into Felt's head with a terrifying ferocity.

Felt: "—Ugh."

Within the blinking red eyes of Felt, the muddy torrent raged like there was no time that could be spared.

Apparently the middle of a battle, Aldebaran and Yae and the Divine Dragon absent, all-out war with only Roy and Heinkel remaining, divide and conquer plus ambush tactics, my Rom-jii in command as expected, Reinhard continuing to engage the Witch, on top of that, on top of, on top, on—

Felt: "—Rom-jii! Take Gaston and everyone else and fall back! That is coming!"

After wading through the unrelenting muddy torrent of information, Felt raised her voice with the belief that this was the optimal choice.

Even should she continue to act as Filóre for fear of the "insurance", there was a high probability that Roy, who was caught in a predicament on the battlefield, would break his promise in order to overturn the situation. To begin with, he was a Sin Archbishop. It would be a mistake to place such faith in matters such as them keeping their promises.

After all, Roy had been lying from the start. —Conspiring with Felt to escape after exploiting an opening made by Aldebaran and the others was an outright lie. From the onset, Roy had only ever thought of devouring everyone: Felt, Aldebaran, Yae, Volcanica, and Heinkel included.

As such—

Felt: "—It's coming out from my shadow!!"

In this act of forestalling Roy, she had harbored no hesitation or indecision whatsoever.

If there was but one thing, it was solely the fear that they would be unable to handle the "insurance", but that fear had been dispelled by the presence of those here, and in particular, by Rom-jii.

—If Rom-jii was present, there was nothing that could not be accomplished.

The hope that many throughout the world held in the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea, was something that Felt harbored in this elderly giant.

Therefore—

Felt: "—The Black Serpent!!"

Even though a dreadful torrent of Death poured out from her own shadow, in Felt's eyes, in her heart, there existed not a single shred of fear whatsoever.

3

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never nurse the deathbed of another.

4

—One of the Three Great Witchbeasts: the Witchbeast of Pestilence, the Black Serpent.

While blighting humanity was in the core nature of the species known as Witchbeasts, the reason why the Three Great Witchbeasts were considered to stand in a league of their own even among that genus, was simply because, in addition to embodying that base ecology of Witchbeasts, the scale of destruction they wrought was far too catastrophically vast.

—Surrounded many a time by the military campaigns of every nation, and enshrouded by a mist that entirely erased the majority of those forces: the White Whale.

—Leaving no scraps behind as it devoured countless livelihoods with a calamitous appetite, the ravenous bane that stripped even tragedy bare as it cleaned its plate: the Great Rabbit.

Enrolled alongside the Black Serpent, the dreadfulness of those extolled as the Three Great Witchbeasts went without saying. Yet, even beside the White Whale and Great Rabbit, the Black Serpent stood apart, an anomalous existence that defied all regularity.

As stated previously, the Three Great Witchbeasts were beings that wrought frighteningly more harm than any other Witchbeasts. —If that condition were to have been strictly obeyed, then the Black Serpent, rather than having been listed among the Three Great Witchbeasts, would have instead been worthy of reigning as the Great Witchbeast, singular.

After all, the Black Serpent had bereaved a number of lives astronomically greater than that of either the White Whale or the Great Rabbit, what with it having delivered ruination unto a great country that had formerly existed, reducing what were once the Five Great Countries to the Four Great Countries.

Rom: “Nwahh—?!”

Apprised of the arrival of the Black Serpent, Rom-jii’s voice subsequently erupted in surprise.

That instant, burgeoning from the shadow at Felt's feet was a dense conglomeration of Miasma so dark that its true state could be ascertained on sight—appearing just as though the shadow itself had poked its head up, it was an utmost malefic menace made manifest, unparalleled in its ability to remind all living creatures of their instinctive aversion to Death.

And yet—

Rom: "Hey, what in tarnation's with them eyes…!"

Despite the fact that she would have been acutely feeling the dreadful aura of the Witchbeast up close, the fact that Felt's eyes housed no fear as she looked at him, instead carrying only an unwavering faith, brought Rom-jii's heart to a boil.

Suppressing the instincts of self-preservation that were all too superfluous for the elderly, a desire to meet her expectations was blazed within him.

Rom: "Petraaa!"

Petra: "Understood-!"

Forthwith, the young girl who had responded hopped down from Rom-jii's shoulders. Drawing his chin back at the clever girl's decision, Rom-jii fixed his gaze afore—Compression was invoked.

Rom: "…"

A sharp sensation, as if consigning his surroundings to oblivion, tremored through Rom-jii's soul.

Supposing this power had been at play in the many battles that Rom-jii—that Valga Cromwell had come to be involved with, then the tactics utilized, the outcomes begotten, even history itself would have likely undergone a massive upheaval.

By merely laying eyes upon the power of an Authority, by the mere sensation of a Witch Factor in close proximity, he could not help but conceive of such "what if" scenarios. Likely, that was the unmistakable genesis of what captivated those chosen by Witch

Factors with prospects of power, leading them astray as they drowned in delusions of omnipotence, invariably degrading them into repulsive abominations.

Wielding such a thing—

Petra: “—Hk!”

Firmly clenching her molars, it was with a brave heart that Petra endured.

A brief while though it might have been, there was no doubt that the Witch Factor was saddling her with a correspondent burden. Despite wishing to liberate her from it as soon as possible, reality betrayed his wishes, forcing her to exercise that power. The fact that Rom-jii too was naught more than a part of that odious reality, irritated him to no end.

It was precisely for that reason, precisely because it was being forced on her, that he would at least return home with the greatest results possible.

Rom: “Warrior ta Lightnin’ Eight. Soldier ta Flowers Eight.”

Concurrent to that vocalization from his thick lips, was the sensation of thoughts bursting asunder.

In accordance with Rom-jii’s commands, Petra passed brisk judgement, retrieving the trio of Flam, Grassis, and Gaston through Compression, and dropping them towards the rear of the battlefield.

Rom-jii, having advanced an equivalent distance forward to take their place, ripped Felt free from Heinkel’s continued hold, and planned to withdraw once again.

However—

???: “How cruel~, didn’t we say that we’d run away toge~ther?”

For a moment, a voice lacquered with slimy unpleasantness overlaid the nasty resonance of flesh forcibly being pierced.

A scorching pain flashed belatedly, causing Rom-jii to let out a groan as he locked eyes with the owner of the spear hand that had impaled his right flank, with the bloodstained smile of Roy.

Roy, who ought to have sustained a fatal wound at the coordinated onslaught by Ram and the others a moment ago, continued to bare his fangs while his petite, wound-riddled body was stained red with blood.

Felt: “Bastard, doing that to Rom-jii is… hk.”

Roy: “We did warn you, no? These guys won’t even properly listen to what we have to say is what we’re saying!”

Gnashing his teeth as Felt flared up in anger, Roy gestured behind him with a jerk of his chin.

A befouling spire of black sprouted up on a grand scale, unveiling a genuine threat to gnaw away at one’s life, to eclipse it entirely were they to merely catch a glimpse, let alone lay hands upon it; a peril instinctually perceived by any and all that lived.

This was no empty threat or bluff, present there was indeed the baleful legend known as the Black Serpent.

Rom: “—Nhh.”

Enduring the pain of his flank being impaled, Rom-jii’s thoughts flared to the point of incandescence.

Attempting to do something about it here would be a bad idea even among the pantheon of piss poor plans. But, given that Roy would naturally interfere with their plans, escaping with Compression would be difficult. Did Roy possess a means of avoiding the Black Serpent’s cataclysmic malevolence, or was this perhaps a suicide tactic resolved to take them down along with himself? To devise the best possible course of action in order to prevent that, thinkthinkthinkthinkthinkthink—

Rom: “—Protect the daughter of Ford!”

As for why his ardent thoughts had terminated upon such a conclusion, not even Rom-jii himself was aware. Only, with his thought process to arrive there condensed to the utmost extremity, he exclaimed.

And receiving that bloodcurdling outcry from Rom-jii, a lone man concorded.

???: “UGH, GAHHHHHHH—!”

The owner of that fearful, quavering voice reflexively brandished his sword, obliquely slashing at Roy, who was attempting to cling to Rom-jii’s giant body, blowing him away.

The mastery in that silver flash was something that astonished even the very man who had performed it, and thus, having been rescued by that, it delivered a shock onto Felt as if the heavens had come crashing down.

Felt: “You…”

Heinkel: “—Hk!”

Motionlessly looking back at Felt, whose eyes were opened wide, Heinkel grit his teeth and reached out his hand. Reaching straight ahead, not towards Felt, but towards the large body of Rom-jii who had pulled her close, he pushed. On the receiving end of that unimaginably vehement shove, Rom-jii’s body was sent flying by its vigor.

And then, in front of Rom-jii and Felt as they watched, having been thrust away—

Heinkel: “Filóre-sama, I’m—”

That countenance, an amalgam of turmoil and regret and love and hate; just how could anyone have described it? The words spun by those lips, enigmatic and labyrinthine to the utmost, just what sort of sentiments had they been attempting to convey?

All was unknown. —Before those words could take form, Heinkel Astrea was swallowed by the downpour of befoulment known as the Black Serpent, vanishing altogether.

Rom: “…”

As befoulment cascaded like a waterfall, the land, steeped in baleful black, drew its final breath.

Arboreal watchers of wood and bark withered, flora festered in rot, and waters seethed with blight. Nary a hue of life was left behind by the Black Serpent’s foul tongue following its tarnish; instead, it engulfed aught in its path, extinguishing all embers of life without discrimination.

And of course, with that befoulment spilled all over his head, Heinkel was no exception.

Felt: “—Goddamn idiot!”
Roy: “A~h, what a waste-!”

Bearing witness to that sight, the bitter reactions of Felt and Roy ironically coincided.

But, as the other relevant party, Rom-jii possessed no right to lament that. After all, he was at least aware that it was his outcry just now that had spurred Heinkel to enact that deed with his life on the line.

But regardless of whether he was self-aware or not, his determination was immediately renewed by Roy's appetite.

Roy: "Filóre Lugu—Rom: "Hunter ta Wind Two!""

Whilst befouling lethality gushed forth like spring water, the voice of Roy, prioritizing his appetite, was drowned out by Rom-jii's.

As the small figure pounced at them, Rom-jii twisted his body to keep Felt at a distance; and to his clever companion, he issued an order, not to have them withdraw, but to break the deadlock.

???: "—AROOOOOO!!"

???: "This child, not even I have confidence in stopping i~t!"

Summoned by those commands, surfacing there were Meili and the sinister beast of large build to which she clung.

As a roar overlapped with the self-deprecating remark, and the beast's claws seized Roy head-on, the Witchbeast Master pointed at the potpourri of befoulment, and yelled with all her might.

Meili: "SIT DOWN-!!"

The thunderclap that was Meili's command struck the Witchbeast with an inexorable impulse.

Forthwith, as the befoulment had been attempting to bifurcate whilst slithering across the ground, within shadow, borne in its movements was a disturbance; and having shifted places with the sinister beast, Rom-jii and the others escaped the Black Serpent's immediate range. Having fled, he resumed breathing, and turning only his neck, he finally caught sight of the befoulment in its entirety—and failed to muster even a single word.

Rom: "…"

This was no lifeform so cute as a Witchbeast, this was Death incarnate.

The befoulment that had overflowed from the forest's shadows coalesced, taking form as a serpentine contour. However, that contour was not of flesh or scale, instead, ‘twas naught more than a festering den of pathology, pestilence, and plague innumerable, an endless helix of lesions, disease, and blight, brought together by malign coincidence to assume such a shape.

Its ulcerations, akin to the scales that clad a snake’s body, would swell and burst, releasing droplets of deep black to scatter like pus; a mere touch from a single drop enough to make anything rot and wither away with nary a sound. The tip of the contour, barely acceptable to even be called a head, began to bloom like a flower, and from within writhed countless slender, filamentous protuberances, akin to tongues or tentacles, or perhaps more aptly, an infestation of parasites.

Worthy of being crowned the Vilest of All Witchbeasts beyond any shadow of a doubt, that was a being whose very existence tolled the warning bells of life.

If the White Whale devoured history from the aether, and the Great Rabbit gorged on livelihoods upon the ground, then the Black Serpent was none other than the very calamity of ruin that diseased the world itself, blighting it with rot.

Roy: “That perception’s RIGHT- ON- THE- MONEY-—!”

Within Rom-jii’s vision as he shuddered, the loud voice of Roy cheered in jubilation upon the land befouled by the Black Serpent.

At the same time, the Witchbeast of large build was launched skyward by a palm strike from directly below, its blood arcing through the air like a crimson trail.

Meili: “Shadow Lion-chan—hk!!”

An exclamation, Meili’s hand outstretched to no avail.

The Witchbeast that had been shot upwards, the Guiltilaw, plummeted to the ground that had been befouled by the Black Serpent in an unavoidable crash; its gargantuan build was licked by that foul tongue, violating it with terrible vigor. With the roar of its agonizing death screech as his backdrop, Roy too stood at the heart of the befoulment. —Even so, manipulating the blood pouring from his gashed wounds, Roy had fashioned for himself legs akin to those of a crustacean, concocting a stance with his feet hovering above the ground.

Roy: “A~h, you don’t have to cry, Meili. That child will be reborn, just like this.”

Roy pronounced so and clicked his fingers, and that which used to be the Guiltilaw, tarnished to a clump of black matter after being swallowed by the befoulment, now began to distend, and the Witchbeast’s massive build metamorphosed into countless kaleidoscopic butterflies.

Butterflies of myriad proportions, hued in the spectra of rainbow, fluttered into a whirling dance whilst Roy wickedly gave an iniquitous smile within the enshrouding Miasma of the Black Serpent.

vic.1120

Rom: “The Black Serpent… Felt, you…”

Felt: “He did say he couldn’t steer it well by himself, but he was able to pull off something like concealing it in my shadow with some conditions attached. I don’t have any reason to honestly believe him.”

Roy: “How sad~! You couldn’t trust us and for that reason betrayed us or something, is that what it means? To do something so crooked as deceiving a Sin Archbishop, won’t your Royal-born blood cry and weep over thi~s?”

Felt: “Sorry, but my blood’s made of the water and bread from the slums. No matter who or what my parents are, I don’t need any meekness that’d have me crying over betraying a bastard like you.”

As Felt gallantly retorted Roy’s mockery, her gaze shifted towards the coiling befoulment known as the Black Serpent—towards the location Heinkel had occupied, as he was engulfed by the torrent of black. Having witnessed the fate of the Guiltilaw a moment prior, it was not difficult to imagine the end Heinkel had met.

He was a man whom neither Rom-jii, nor anyone else in the Camp, would have harbored a good impression of. But, he was Reinhard’s father. With Felt as a hostage, they likely would have also had some conversations.

For him to meet his end as the Black Serpent’s prey, was far too cruel to be called recompense.

???: “—UL GOA!!”

That sentimentality of his was blazed to naught by a coarse voice.

Passing over Rom-jii’s head, hellfire brilliantly lit up the forest as it closed in on the Black Serpent. Plowing into it, the infernal explosion tempestuously perturbed the befoulment, and the hot, putrid malodor immediately asserted a sense of reality for the scene before them.

And, the one who had launched such a merciless offensive upon the Black Serpent, was an individual who had newly joined the fray—

???: "Oi, Felt! If you're back safe, then start giving us orders! Isn't that your damn job?!"

Having fired off a flashy attack in place of a proper greeting, Rachins sparked a fire of determination within her.

Seemingly having exerted himself quite a bit, Rachins was already out of breath despite only just arriving at the battle. However, that determination went into effect immediately. Right after widening her eyes slightly, Felt valiantly braced her cheeks—

Felt: "Rom-jii, let me win this."

Rom: "…Don't'cha go bein' rash now."

Felt: "I wouldn't be asking if there was no shot."

Rom: "Didn't say that there ain't no shot. I'd said, don't be rash."

He was wounded on his flank, and it did not seem like he would be able to move with any haste. He ought to devote himself to the work he could perform, so with the blood that had rushed to his head coming back down, he cooled off to think rationally.

Supposing Gluttony were to lay his hand upon Felt, what might occur if the name Filóre Lugunica were used? —Knowing the answer to that question, Rom-jii quelled his sentimentality, and began to work his thoughts.

And as if having found that demeanor of Rom-jii's reliable, Felt smacked her cheeks with both her hands,

Felt: "Alright, time for orders, as requested. —Let's do this, you bastards!!"

Everyone: "YEAHHHHHH—!!"

Receiving Felt's invigorating command, voices began to rise, with those of Rachins and Gaston being the first.

Facing a Sin Archbishop and the Black Serpent, foes truly worthy of being called threats to the world, whilst feeling proud of his comrades who roused their spirits instead of faltering, Rom-jii also smacked his cheeks with his hands.

Roy: “A~h—”

Indeed, basking in the gazes of hostility directed towards him, Roy embraced his own body,

Roy: “—It’s irresisti~ble. —Everyone, all of you, to the greatest-level- possible-, love you-!”

5

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never hold the hand of another.

6

Harboring the aegis of delight, want to eat.

Harboring the aegis of gratitude, want to eat.

Harboring the aegis of affection, want to eat.

Bearing not rage, not sorrow, not fear, not animus, not diffidence, not repugnance, not hatred, not begrudgement, not grief, not scorn, not disdain, not malediction, not acrimony, want to eat.

—From the deepest depths of his heart, all of those present here did Roy Alphard of Bizarre Eating want to eat.

Roy: “But, there’s many obstacles to tha~t.”

Discarding his clothes, torn to shreds as they were, Roy bared his skin marred in wounds to the wind, licking his lips.

Requisitioning advantage on the misfire of Eclipsing, Ram and company’s hospitality had dealt him enormous damage, so the equanimity Roy was purporting to show was, in reality, equanimity of which he was bereft. He was reutilizing his copious volumes of blood through the magic of the Bloodweeping Oni, and the Witchbeasts and creatures of the forest that had perished due to the Black Serpent's befoulment as rainbow-hued butterflies with the power of the Lord of Phantasmal Rainbows, but from Roy bearing the effects of Aldebaran's curse mark, even the freedom to abscond from the battlefield was lost.

But then again, even should that not hold true, in the face of those treating him to such a feast, the option to run did not so much as even pass through the mind of Roy of Bizarre Eating.

Roy: "We're different from Ley of Gourmet after a~ll."

With myriads of likes and dislikes, Ley, who would be fastidious about the persons to be eaten, tended to be particular about the situation as well.

Befittingly, he would utilize desertion or postponement if necessary as a substitution for spice, but Roy was different. To not be fastidious, meant his appetite craved all persons equivalently.

Videlicet, Roy Alphard wanted to devour every last person in this world.

Thus, to abscond would be outrageous. Should he ever become unable to meet somebody again after meeting them once, no number of aprons doused in drools of vexing regret would likely ever suffice.

Roy: "For us who are like that~, this preliminary preparation of ingredients is a bi~t troublesome you see~."

Through both "Ram" and "Ram Mathers", he had foundered on eating Ram .

The alteration of the true name was unmistakable. However, for no cues to match even in the newest Memories of someone close to her meant that there were an interminable number of candidates for the true name post-alteration—and likely, it was possible that not just Ram, but everyone in the vanguard had arranged the same preliminary preparation of ingredients.

Roy: “Even the name of the Witch of Tristitia, Petra Leyte, who knows for how much can that be truste~d.”

Even her act of having pronounced it as her name loud and clear, now this appeared to be an extensive trap.

Bearing that in mind, in the present situation, that which was in scope for Roy to outstretch his hand and reach for was only to the extent of Felt, who was almost certainly Filóre Lugunica, but even that was not fully definite.

In the one in ten-thousand chance that attempting such on Felt were to end with a swinging and a miss, triggering the vomiting recoil of Eclipsing with a “Blergh-”, then the opening Roy caused for himself would be taken advantage of and this time, with certitude, it would be the terminus.

Thus, with emotion of heartbreak, Roy made a determination verboten to Gluttony—

Roy: “—Let’s put off eating, for now.”

At this very present moment, ascertaining the true names of these tasty treats in order to wolf every last one of them down would be impossible.

In order to clean them off the plate without leaving any scraps, what must be given foremost priority in this place was the stocking up of preserved foods. Providentially, the Black Serpent obeying Roy was the one head with that as its forte. —To that end, he had idealized to manifest the Black Serpent at a spot with a greater multitude of people, but with that included, Felt’s decision to turn traitor was of an exquisitely unfavorable timing for Roy.

Roy: “But that’s precisely what-! Makes-! Eating-! Worth-! It-!”

The precipice of exsanguination, enormously damaged, hunger amongst hunger, the utmost sensation of starvation—full force Bizarre Eating.

Joining his hands before his chest, he bulldozed the world from both ends of his field of vision to a convergence at its center.

Trees with roots entrenched deep were smashed, even the grounded earth trodden down in immense natural spontaneity got exhumed in the crossfire by the might of the Compactor, seeking to block the escape routes of the prey retreating back to safe turf.

Felt: “Gaston! Doltero!”

The two colossi sought to cease the fabrication of that firm wall of earth through brute force. The struggle only lasted for but a moment, the resistance towards the compaction rebounding to Roy’s closed hands, and forcing them to spread apart as fire billowed before his eyes.

Felt: “Rachins! Maid-neechan!”

The fireball of the sanpaku eyes coalesced with the wind brought forth by Ram, thus birthing a tornado of fire. Roy expended three of the whirl-dancing butterflies against it and countered it with a water spear of the Magia Manus Magister.

The butterflies that emerged from Mana leftover in carcasses exhibited destructive might despite being of simple chemical construct, but they were also capable of sequestrating magic as external tanks of Mana. For Roy, who wished to subsist the Flow Method in his dying body with his own Mana expense, they were automated reinforcements who would only be supplemented the more the Black Serpent slaughtered.

Felt: “Flam! Grassis!”

The tornado of fire and the iceberg collided, with his vision being engulfed by the consequent steam eruption.

Piercing through the world where the waxen white of the skies and the sable black of the grounds were repainted, the merciless sortie of the twins befell Roy, discounting his desire to take a breath.

Willfully devouring it with the sturdy skin of the Carnivorous Beast, he reciprocated the favor with a combined offensive onslaught, taking in his right hand the Fist King, and the Snow Vallum in his left, knocking off the twins together into the ground besmirched with befoulment.

But on the escarpment of the virulent foul tongue of blight swallowing the twins, a bone spear of the lunging Hungry Horse King collected the two, retrieving them from the span of lethality. Pulverizing the other bone spear, which had been thrust forth, alongside its arm through the song of the Blightlove Troubadour, the destitute fruits of battle made Roy's stomach squirm with peristalses of starvation.

There—

Roy: "BIIIIG WAAAAAVE!"

In Roy's immediate rear, the Black Serpent stretched its body high up into the sky and slowly, like a felled tree, flopped down ahead—where all of its prey had assembled.

A single touch being the harbinger of end; the clod of impulses far too ruinous to be construed with a classification as tepid as murder, the Black Serpent conducted its hunt in a manner that, whilst admittedly lacking in creativity, could be crudely connoted as cursory, a congenital conqueror. By just scattering its mass would its opponents perish, thus it did not requisite greater astuteness.

That was what callously descended upon Felt and the others head-on—

Felt: "—Live!"
Everyone: "Strong—!!"

The roars that became one transfigured into strength, and the Black Serpent's befoulment that would sleet down onto the ground was barged back.

The ones charged with physical labor exhumed the ground, the ones charged with magic reinforced that ground to act as a bulwark, the ones charged with techniques mortared it such that the Black Serpent would receive the blow, earning the singular second of the bulwark's dissolution for them to retreat.

Every one of everyone, mobilized to the utmost with unfathomable harmony—

Roy: "…"

Resolute, intrepid, what gallantry.

Entering the visual percept of the Black Serpent scattering the menace of lethality, whilst combating Roy who transmutated the existences of formidable enemies (friends) fought so far into power, they who marched forward absent of dither possessed might that was inexplicable.

Roy: "Normally, you'd panic or be astonished or be shuddering or something, you kno~w!"

Chaos, fright, trepidation; their conduct elided over these appropriate impacts at which Roy vociferated.

Harmony greater than that between family or lovers, blended with resolution and grit resembling the apotheosis of aberrants. Unmistakable. They were finessed to completion. —All of them together, were a singular, excessively extravagant platter.

The moment he contemplated so, before the lineup rich in variety and the abounding assortment of hues, his heart capered that none were the appetizer, the side dish, or the main course. All of them were equivalent, invaluable, deeply flavorful uniques.

As Roy's eyes sparkled in such elation, Felt rolled through the plume of smoke and hoisted a middle finger at him. She flaunted her sharpened high canines,

Felt: "Don't stand around drooling over yourself, you manic bastard!"

Roy: "You all are so exceedingly beloved that it's impossible not to-!"

Towards Felt, who was acting as the nucleus and instructed directions of mobilization to her comrades, the affection exacerbated.

In the beginning he was indignant with rage for his plans being betrayed, but now he was thankful for her betrayal. To be served with hospitality so wonderful, this side must also return the favor or it would bring dishonor to the name Sin Archbishop.

Roy: "…"

Upon glancing, he perceived the Black Serpent's movements to be sluggish.

The Black Serpent was intrinsically a Witchbeast of ploddingly laggard movement that corroded the area, proliferating blight by befouling the ground leaving naught a crevice behind. As a hunter, its efficiency was by no means high. Being just one of its heads, it was unquestionably not operating at its normal condition, but even so, its movements being yet duller was due to—

???: "Sit down, no~w… hk."

Clinging to the Hungry Horse King with slender arms, Meili inhibited the Black Serpent's movements with her quavering timbre.

Eyes bloodshot, she overexerted the Divine Protection she had been blessed with, and its recoil must have been bestowing upon her a sensation of her soul being seared, of her blood being smouldered.

Yet, her Divine Protection of Fiend Manipulation was interfering with even the Black Serpent, one of the Three Great Witchbeasts. —Though in truth, the Black Serpent's responses seemed slow even when taking that into account.

Roy: "After having gone so far-! Let us-! Compensate for that-! On this end~!"

Harboring the emotion to extol not the beleaguered Black Serpent but the beleaguering Meili, Roy joined his hands and jutted the ground upward, off of which the rainbow-hued butterflies blasted, scattering shrapnel of the befouling variety.

Befoulment of death that would eliminate upon touch. If the movements of the Black Serpent itself were slow, then all he must do was to take up charge for the task of spattering. Accruing two, three successive eruptions, a wide acreage was spritzed in black.

Roy: “Haha~, hahaha~, hahahaha~-!”

Naturally, being at the epicenter of the eruption, Roy’s life would also be in peril should he bathe in the befoul. Hence Roy coated himself in an armor of blood, braced to perfectly avoid basking in the spattering daub of befoulment.

Besides a select few exceptions, there was nobody capable of dodging rain. Furthermore, it was improbable for all members of the plates of treats to be such exceptions, thus the bombardment of the Black Serpent’s befoulment would ruthlessly lacquer the battlefield in black. There were limits to how much the prey could protect one another. Incapacitating Meili would be ideal, but—

Roy: “Huh?”

A vacuous, doltish voice escaped Roy’s throat as he removed his faceguard of blood.

Before his sight, amidst the thickets felled to necrosis by the spattered daub of befoulment, was a gaping space that had eluded the blight—therein were the forms of the treats assembled together, backs joined together, successfully safeguarding from the bombardment of death.

Roy: “Just no way.”

The insuperable scales of the kaleidoscope of rainbow-hued butterflies, were intercepted by the boisterous dance of the ground’s bombardment.

Roy: “There’s no way.”

The compaction which squashed his field of vision from edges to center, was curbed at its inception, thus thwarting its invocation.

Roy: “We’re saying there’s no way.”

His impediment, aiming to transpierce their eardrums through a strident song, was drowned out by the clangorous detonation kindled by gale and flame.

Roy: “There’s just no way, we’re telling you there’s no way, because there is no way-.”

Turning the Stomach of Souls inside out, wielding all within his grasp without restraint, using the might of the suprarational, with even the truth of their existences fostering terror having vanished, he had begotten successive cataclysms.

The Aldebusters, however, with Felt at the helm, responded to counter all of it with precision and optimum conduct, synchronously coordinating as though all of them together formed a singular organism.

—This was odd.

Roy: “…”

Whilst repeating onslaughts which whittled the world and its common sense, without pause and unremitting, Roy was posed with a doubt.

No matter what, this was odd. It was certain that they were gallant. They placed trust in one another. Their purpose was one. They were superlative and adroit. They were strong.

—Even so, this was odd.

Humans were incapable of conduct optimized to this magnitude.

Yet notwithstanding, Felt and the others continued to play the utmost effective cards in their hand with the best possible timings against every possible kind of offensive.

Roy was acquainted with this sensation. Aldebaran, when he had fought him at the Prison Tower.

Upon unfastening the captive Roy’s seal, Aldebaran had battered Roy to demonstrate the difference in their strength. The inexplicability that had disabled his arms and legs alike, this was the same—close, but different. That had ultimately only been the abnormal essence of Aldebaran standalone. However, this was an abnormal essence dwelling in every single enemy present.

—Something, was clearly wrong.

Roy: “—A~h, misjudged, haven’t we~?”

The unordinary that paralyzed common sense, the suprarational inexplicable through reason, the inscrutable that precluded debate.

These abnormal straits induced, his hungry stomach glutted with doubt, Roy arrived at an inordinately obvious truth and cursed himself.

Based on her authoritative commands, he had been set under the impression that the enemy’s nucleus had been Felt.

This guided direction of Roy’s rationale was also a part of their plan. The true person at the nucleus was not Felt, but the string-puller concealed behind her; with this conjecture, Roy shot a leer in that direction.

Just then, the string-puller blinked their eyes with an “Ah”—

7

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never desire reconciliation with another.

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never rage on the behalf of another.

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never divulge secrets to another.

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never to display weakness to another.

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never watch the morning sun in the company of another.

8

???: “—Perhaps, you finally noticed?”

As she responded so, having Compressed all the thought processes of her allies present there, in addition to all the processes of discussion in order to share that information amongst themselves, the Witch of Tristitia closed a single eye and winked.

Chapter 46:
The Witch of Tristitia

1

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never be picky about anything.

2

—The Witch of Tristitia, Petra Leyte.

To begin with, how had Petra ended up in a position to receive the Witch Factor of Tristitia?

The reason why the original proprietor, Clind, had been unable to take on the role, was because he had a duty that only he could fulfill—because he was the one who had to subdue the Divine Dragon Volcanica.

And ultimately, anybody other than him could have served the role of proprietor just fine.

Naturally, there were some who would be less suited to utilizing the Authority of Tristitia than others, as well as those such as Emilia and Meili, who would serve as capable fighters even without it, and Rem, who had her own role to play, and thus were quickly excluded from candidacy. However, even after leaving out those girls, there were still plenty of candidates.

Hence, the greatest reason why the other final remaining candidates, Ram and Rom-jii, were set aside in favor of selecting Petra to hold the Witch Factor, was due to decisions based on more than just comprehensive fighting strength.

—Simply put, Petra had the topmost ability to wield the Authority.

Felt: "—About the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony… that Roy bastard, given that he insists on devouring everything he can get his hands on, the amount of moves he's got to play can't be anything ordinary. What are we gonna do?" / Flam: "Close-quarter, mid-range, and long-distance combat will all be troublesome to perform." / Grassis: "Foul play. Like the young master." / Rachins & Gaston: "If he's the same as Reinhard then how the hell's anyone supposed to win?!" / Rom: "Don't'cha be kickin' up such a loud racket! Grassis, don't'cha be sayin' such thoughtless things. It'll only serve ta overwhelm 'em." / Ram: "Hah! You all are quite close. If you already feel like you've won, care to share that feeling with Ram?" / Rom: "This girl's got quite the sharp tongue…" / Felt: "Though, I get what this maid-neechan is trying to say. What do we got?" / Rom: "We'll keep up the fundamentals like this. The opponent indeed's got cards ta play no matter the distance, but…" / Rachins & Gaston: "But?" / Rom: "No matter how many cards he's got in his hand, he's only got one head ta chose which of 'em ta play. If we continue attackin' in waves, he'll inevitably end up playin' the wrong card." / Ram: "Even without that, the opponent's wounds are deep. Once he gets impatient he will end up wanting to force a progression of the situation. Quite brilliant, Rom-sama." / Felt: "Heh, my Rom-jii's amazing, isn't he?" / Flam: "Indeed, we will be counting on Rom-sama." / Grassis: "Clap clap, Rom-sama." / Rom: "We're in the midst of puttin' our lives on the line, for cryin' out loud!" / Meili: "Sorry to interrupt while you're all having fu~n, but there's a lot I have to say to Hungry Horse King-chan and the o~thers, so it sort of feels like my head is about to split apa~rt, you know?" / Rachins & Gaston: "—Sorry!!"

With that, the contents of a war council, equivalent to if they had gathered face to face and had discussed earnestly, were Compressed to have happened in a single instant by Petra, exercising the Authority of Tristitia.

Having also accreted Compressions on the thought processes for all of them to conceive their best ideas, she had done so.

???: "If we can compress the distance and time for traversal, like Clind-san's been doing, then it should also be possible to compress things like thinking time and discussion time… an essential component of such conceptual-type abilities, is that type of paradigm shift!"

Petra: “Since Clind-niisama had always continued to use it the same way, I guess he’s just way too blockheaded.”

While concentrating on the intricacies of operating the Authority, Petra bantered with the translucent Imaginary Subaru.

They were amidst combat. Ordinarily, one might be tempted to complain how distracting it was, but in the particular case of the current Petra, her exchanges with “Subaru” were proving to be a source of great relief.

The small box in which the Witch Factor of Tristitia was preserved—concealing that which she had inherited from Clind in her breast pocket, Petra continued to experience first-hand the dreadful force of attraction brought about by this power.

Petra: “I probably shouldn’t be saying this, but the term “attraction” just fits way too perfectly.”

Likening the sensation to that of being irresistibly drawn in by “attraction”, Petra scolded herself.

Were she to let her mind relax for even a second, the Witch Factor would immediately tempt Petra with thoughts such as “You could try this” and “You could even try that”, attempting to remove an important shackle binding one to their humanity.

Without that or anything to hold onto, she felt like she would surrender to the sensation of being swallowed up as she shakily stared down over the edge of a great cliff, but—

Petra: “But, that’s a no-go.”

The sensations of omnipotence, a sweet nectar intoxicating to the likes of man.

Witch Factors were prone to exploiting those weak hearts of humans. And yet, their way of going about it took the form of offering “Well how about this?” as a means to grant that which one desired most.

The more one treasured something, the more they harbored a wish they could not relinquish, that harder it would become to resist its allure.

Certainly, neither the Witch of Greed, nor the former Sin Archbishop of Sloth, Petelgeuse Romanée-Conti, had been exceptions.

Even Petra did not know what might have happened to her if she had lacked a means to sustain her sense of self.

However—

"Subaru": "Petra! Tonchin need a follow-up!"

Petra: "Kan-san's on break, after all-! Leave it to me-!"

As that gallant, boyish voice struck the eardrums of her heart, Petra exercised her Authority—as Rachins and Gaston agonized over how they ought to handle the onslaught of the brandishment of the blood scythes and the befouling downpour, she Compressed their processes of thought and communication, having them select the best course of action.

The pair immediately made a switch to dealing with the approaching assault; Gaston caught the sanguine scythe with his Flow Method, and Rachins unloaded a gatling volley of fireballs into the befoulment, magnificently tiding them over.

Seeing that, "Subaru" gave a thumbs up, and Petra also returned the gesture.

"Subaru": "That's it, Petra! Just like that! You're so cool!"

Even if it was just an illusion and naught more, the way her beloved was smiling for her cheered her heart to high spirits.

This was it. Thanks to this, Petra could transcend her limits whilst remaining as Petra. —Unlike the many who had been enthralled by Witch Factors throughout history, Petra was not alone.

That was what kept Petra from falling into corruption as the Witch of Tristitia.

After all—

Petra: “I don’t want Subaru to hate me.”

If there were any who would laugh at that vanity, then laugh. Fingers ought to be pointed, and ridicule ought to be cast upon Petra.

If necessary, she could make as many excuses as she liked. This was a battle to save the world. She would rescue the many people who lived in the Kingdom from their unease. She had no choice but to protect the grand stage that was the Royal Selection. She was carrying everyone’s hopes upon herself, after all.

I have far more reasons than simply the excuses I’m making. Ram-neesama’s always eager to slack off on everything, but she’s fighting her hardest. Frederica-neesama’s staying back to attend to things, but she’s praying for me. Otto-san’s always acting way too recklessly. The fact that I’m moving in accordance with the Master’s expectations is truly unpleasant. I want to show off to Emilia-neesama and Rem-neesama. I’ll roar out like a tiger on Garf-san’s behalf too. Meili-chan, don’t make such a worried expression. Beatrice-chan, I’ll definitely save you so you mustn’t cry.

All of those were precious to her, and no doubt reasons why Petra was giving it her all, but the number one thing was different.

My number one, is you.

To you, I don’t want to show any part of me that’s uncool. I don’t want to show any part of me that’s pathetic. After all, when I find myself reflected in those eyes of yours, I don’t want your attention to drift away for even a second.

With your heart taken by a person who’s always glistening so brilliantly, if I need to present myself with a form that’s always so glisteningly radiant in order to get you to turn to me, then so be it.

That attraction has long since pulled me in.

Don’t call it anything like a Witch Factor. —The entirety of my being, is made up of love and affection.

Petra: “That’s why, this is nothing.”

No matter how tempting the Witch Factor might be, Petra would never succumb.

So long as these feelings of love resided within her, then neither Gluttony nor the Black Serpent were dreadful in the slightest.

3

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never cry for another.

4

The latent might of the Aldebusters—no, of the assemblage apt of being named as the Witch of Tristitia and her apostles, was something that far surpassed Roy’s anticipations and postulations.

Roy: “How nice, perhaps it is nice, very nice, surely it is nice, certainly it is nice, nothing but nice, as it is nice, because it can be called nice, because it can be praised as nice-! Gluttonous drinking-! Gluttony-!”

Penultimately, what the Witch of Tristitia was carrying out was unbeknownst to Roy.

He simply comprehended, with lucid precision, that she was countering the Authority of Gluttony, enacting the Authority which she possessed to its utmost and bestowing the means to survive upon the entire troupe of Felt and the rest.

Pertaining to the battle, Felt and the others had failed to bear fruits greater than their own abilities as well.

The maximum of their ability was constantly being drawn, poured into the best cup and being utilized, that was all. And what made this possible was the efficacy of the Authority of Tristitia.

However—

Roy: “It’s not supposed to be something so~ convenient that it can be used as much as pleased, you see."

As aforementioned, Roy had hearkened from his mother's mouth the flaw present within the Witch Factor of Tristitia.

Witch Factors that could not be compatible with anyone, were supposed to be defective articles that, on one hand, granted the possessor tremendous might that interfered with the rules of the world, but demanded compensation to that end on the other.

Roy: "We know we do kno~w, Petra-chan absolutely loves Natsuki-san after all."

The Stomach of Souls—upon following the newest Memories settled within the treasure house of all that Roy had eaten, he could earnestly feel the valorous sentiments of the Witch, newly born into this world, to be stabbing at his chest.

A young, immature girl, but a girl who shan't hold her own life dear for the sake of her flaring love.

Upon being told of the necessity to use anything but life itself for firewood in order to regain something valuable that had been robbed, she would perhaps devote anything as fuel without falter.

And, in reality, that was what she was doing. —However, the stockpile was not endless.

Roy: "The rest, is about which side gets consumed to exhaustion first."

Just as the Witch of Tristitia had limits, Roy too possessed an allotted time of life.

The reason as to why he willfully did not heal his wounds, blood gushing profusely from them, was because he reworked even his flux of blood into an armament for fulfilling his own objective, employing it as a means to fight.

That sizable forfeiture of sanguine ichor, continued to keep alight the fuse of Roy Alphard's life.

Indeed, this battle at present, had mounted upon the frontier of whether to eat, or to be eaten.

Roy: “Haha~.”

Exhaling a hot, feverish breath, Roy expressed gratitude to the hunger enlivening his soul.

Until now, as Bizarre Eating, Roy had messily eaten all kinds of articles haphazardly and indiscriminately. Eating them, licking them, coveting and indulging and devouring them, Eclipsing to spoil eleventy lives, Roy Alphard had done so in order to seek an article that would appease the hunger that he had borne since birth.

For that purpose, until he discovered the flavor of his wish, Roy scoured for a match all throughout the world—resuming to subsist his eathos with this bearing of heart, he ate and felt dispiritedness, he ate and felt despondency, he ate and felt disappointment, no matter how much Eclipsing and Eclipsing to spoil he partook in, he was forevermore tyrannized by the sensation of starvation ever unappeased. “1”

In this heretofore eathos, was born a change.

Its progenitor—

???: “Here, try it out n’ see. To eat me up, dependin’ on that ya live or ya die. C’mon, ya prick.”

Largely responsible was, within the Tower piercing the heavens in the midst of that sand sea, the proprietor of an overwhelming soul that drove him to distortion, nearly filling to bursting the vessel called Roy Alphard.

—Reid Astrea.

Coming into contact with the soul of the man christened as the first generation Sword Saint, enkindled a drastic reformation in Roy.

Naming himself Bizarre Eating, conscientiously and indefatigably devoting himself to his eathos through multitudes, Roy had been mourning in lament. —That the hunger borne by the existence known as his self, would never come to be fulfilled, perhaps.

???: “That’s not really unique to you or anything such, though? This lovely lady as well as all the other rabble, everyone everyone every~one, is seeking love that won’t be appeased. How about this lovely lady assists you in finding that nameless something you want. In exchange, what this lovely lady wants is… you get it, right?”

Vocalizing so whilst laughing with a beguiling, sadistic smile, the monster stated itself to become Roy’s mother.

Neither did he trust to open his heart to her, nor did he depend upon her being, in avarice for a possibility Roy could not find by his self, he used his mother. It was probably likewise.

However, no matter how much he ate, no matter how he took a hand blemished with love, he failed to acquire that article which he wanted.

Ley searched for means to appease hunger by finding and picking out worth in each and every singular meal, Louis meanwhile had a definite, tangible prospect of the article she wanted in order to appease hunger, apparently.

Only Roy. Roy alone, did not have that. —Which now, at last, had been discovered.

Reid: “It ain’t odd, ya prick. Eat or be eaten, that’s how life works, ain’t that so.”

Yes, that’s right. That’s precisely right.

What was wanted, was the real feeling of living. Just the reason to be able to say with a smile from the bottom of the heart, that he was alive.

Mother: “To pour this lovely lady’s entirety for the sake of something wanted, isn’t something like that plainly obvious?”

Yes, that’s right. That’s precisely right.

Even without affection, esteem, or anything at all, only that teaching of his mother's was helplessly correct.

That was why—

Roy: "Unless all possible moves all in their entirety, without hesitation and wholly altogether are sunk into i~t, it's not called love, isn't i~t!"

Because the opponents were kindly transcending their limits, his side must also respond in kind.

Should he humbly not finish eating the treats that had gone out of their way to be prepared, it would make the name of Gluttony weep.

Roy: "No~w no~w no~w, welcome yourselves to eating welcome yourselves to tasting-!"

Contrary to his limbs, benumbed to cold by the efflux of blood, the voltage of his heart had risen to a crescendo.

Transforming his exuding blood into thorned legs made in the image of those belonging to insects, Roy pulsated thrummingly, and in his backdrop, in concert, the Black Serpent speared into the heavens, becoming a pillar of befoulment, recommencing its hunt comprised of flopping onward with wholly one side.

Black Serpent: "…"

Rumbling the wind as if thunder, the contagion relentlessly descended upon the flora.

Birthed thereupon was a seemingly undeflectable billow of toxicity, terribly blasphemous. It quite literally swallowed the battlefield in black, pressing to kill all things with murrain pestilence.

But—

Felt: "Live—!"

Everyone: "—Strong!!"

The command and response akin to a fool's single bit of knowledge, became an arrow of counterattack baled with composite strength.

Ram's rend of wind tore the tidal waves of black, and a brigade of beasts with the Hungry Horse King obeying Meili at its vanguard breached an opening. Following up, the well-physiqued men including those newly summoned, lumped themselves together to convene—the hammer swinging forth vehemently shattered the ground, successfully erecting a bulwark that protected against the blighting toxicity.

That was the stalwart might consequent of the convening of ones who would fail to compare by their individual strengths, a battle of a potpourri of raw effort that retaliated against the advancing fruition of surging death.

Roy: "Judging from the looks of things, Petra-chan's Authority, is around the shortening of events ri~ght?"

Petra: "Blehh. Won't tell."

Roy: "That unfriendly reply is so tempti~ng!"

Amidst the Black Serpent's befoulment downpouring like rain, ceasing not his onslaught, Roy bolted like a flash of lightning whilst clad in his armor of blood, switching between the odd talents, techniques, and deviances of different suprarational individuals in succession, and the force fist, the Magic, and the curse ballad layered atop one another to torrent upon the herd of prey.

But on every instance, they all immediately rearranged their formation, knit the physical with magical attacks and weaved together resistance—who guarded what was unintelligible now. Merely the truth that all of them accepted the offense, and all of them countered it would keep on rewriting the battlefield.

—Even in midst of this battle's escalations, Roy darted his eyes about in inspection of the prey.

The Witch of Tristitia's Authority being Shortening more or less was unmistaken. It thus reduced the time and distance for movement and was probably also dealing with the time for thought process and judgment.

Its evidence was how the apostles of the Witch of Tristitia, consecutively accreting appearances and disappearances in the battlefield, would grapple with sudden situations without any perplexity, including those participating in the war for the first time—no, by Shortening the perplexity part of it, they were prepared to be capable of immediately participating in the confronting situation.

Roy: “But how much longer will even that la~st!”

Their grappling resilience and sprightly morale purchased admiration, but both sides were likewise close to limit. Although if Roy were to have one step of an advantage, it was the menace of the Black Serpent he had kept in reserve behind him—even should the Witch of Tristitia and company vanquish Roy, they then must grapple with this atrocious, fiendish Witchbeast.

That was to say, they could not exhaust all of their strength against Roy as their opponent. And to their circumstance of expending not the entirety of their might, lest it deplete, adding a further pinch of seasoning to the platter—

Roy: “—Now’s the time to not shoot for the stars, but to shoot for the Eclipse, you see~-!!”

The Black Serpent’s ginormous frame once again speared the heavens, the befoulment on standby to torrentially downpour. Preparing for it, the Witch of Tristitia and company simultaneously stood guard, towards which he disgorged the Memories.

This was—

Roy: “—『Eclipse Binaries』.”

Neither Solar Eclipse nor Lunar Eclipse, Roy Alphard’s novel and original table manners did he let cascade.

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never wish upon a star with another.

6

In that moment, what surged onto the battlefield was merely one part of the horde of Memories, multitudes that were apt to be called simple food, that Roy Alphard had eaten until now but failed to find and pick out worth in them to remember.

Following his experience at the Pleiades Watchtower, Bizarre Eating had revised oneself's own cognizance of eathos.

Gratitude unto all ingredients, reverence unto all trysts of fate. — There was no such thing as a foul ingredient in this world. It simply meant that his self was the proprietor of a foolish tongue that failed to recognize their goodness.

Take a venomous fish for example. Should the fish's organs which store venom be adequately disposed of, it would become possible to surfeit a delicacy superior to consuming venom.

The same applied to the prey from Gluttony's vantage. In this universe, there was no such ingredient, from the head to the rear, that was entirely useless, that lacked all worth of being tasted.

Any and every kind of ingredient had portions that were usable. — Thus, he used such.

Roy: "—Memories of Agony."

Over the course of an ordinary life, plausibly everyone would possess a memory or two of having suffered unbearable pain.

These multitudes of Memories of Agony, Roy extracted them from the Stomach of Souls he had stockpiled, blended them together, and hurled them toward the battlefield before his eyes. —This was not something visible to the eye. Consequently, there were no ways to evade it, either. Its identity: a blasphemous deed of forcing an abstract concept onto the opponents.

Most of all, pelting opponents with Memories of Agony would not produce immediate results. They were literal Memories that the body bore no recollection of, so even upon being pelted by them, there lay no margin for the herd of prey to taste those agonies.

Then, what would transpire? —It would merely incite a chain of remembrance of Memories in close proximity.

???: “—ah.”

At first, a faint voice leaked from inside the troupe.

They had until now roared with voices of intrepidity, worn valor and resolution on their visages, and anchored in themselves the mettle to confront every obstacle head-on, truly worthy of being called heroic warriors.

From those lips leaked a timbre, neither a warcry nor a call of each other’s names, but a shrill note.

???: “AA, aa, AA, aaAaA— hk!!”

And upon its onset, the leak persisted ceaselessly.

They dilated their eyes, opened their mouths wide, and placed their hands on parts that became the unsought founts of screaming, screeching helplessly as though spouting blood.

Moreover, this was not one lone individual. Everyone present in that locus began to scream.

Everyone: “—Hk!!”

The synthesis of Memories of Agony that Roy had hurled impelled the bodies to remember agony within proximity that had been tasted before, for those who were within range of that abstract concept, as though it was a thing of the present moment.

Agony that had been tasted once in the past could be endured. —Nay, this rationale was erroneous. Agony that was unbearable in the past was unbearable yet in the present, and yet so in the future.

Everyone: “Gagh—”

It was a voice unbecoming to be voiced, a cacophony uproared in succession by Felt, by Ram, by Old Man Rom, by Meili, by Flam, by Grassis, by Gaston, by Rachins, by Doltero, by the apostles summoned to the battlefield by the might of the Authority of Tristitia.

Nobody could brave it. And the one to screech the shrillest wail, above and beyond—

???: “—Petra!!”

Was none other than Petra Leyte, her eyebrows spasming upward, compelled to taste and even relish the concourse of agonies that had chaperoned Natsuki Subaru to Death.

7

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never rendezvous with another.

8

“Subaru”: “—Petra!!”

Hearing the frantic outcry of the Imaginary Subaru, the fact that it seemed like he did not have to experience any of this pain, given that he was a phantom watching her, served as a relief to Petra—’twas not so.

It had been unable to serve as such. Any possible leeway for that existed not within Petra Leyte, tasting in the torment of Death.

Petra: “—agh.”

A hoarse breath, spilled forth. It hurts. It hurts. It hurts it hurts it hurts. It hurts it hurts—.

Petra: “—igh.”

Lacerated abdomen hurts. Crushed eyeball hurts. Stabbed chest hurts. Misfortune wrought by passing malice hurts. Finger cut by poor knife skills hurts. Skin fissures from kitchen work hurts. Head caved in without warning hurts. Body tortured alongside sound of chains hurts. Throat gouged by wind hurts. Jumping off and crashing onto pointy rocks hurts. Body and mind after vicious beating hurts. Hands and legs after putting on airs and being taken easy on when disciplined hurts. Frozen and shattered fingers, ankles hurts. Licked eyeball feels disgusting and hurts. Wrists freed from handcuffs frozen and broken hurts. Falling to knees on ground completely congealed, everything creaked and hurts. Body shoved away by a perturbed Otto hurts. Unsightliness trying to escape the White Whale after that hurts. Soul amidst being frozen in zenith cold hurts. Thread of life running amok to convince an assisted suicide hurts. Chest assailed for the sake of assisted suicide hurts. Heart grabbed upon confessing Return by Death hurts. Being grabbed by tenacious pursuit of the Authority of Sloth hurts. Stabbing own throat for fear of losing Rem hurts. Abdomen disemboweled for the first time in months hurts. Entire body struck by debris, arms mangled up, finally body being devoured from inside hurts. Toyed with by ferocious beast, entire body bitten to shreds again hurts. Finally, stabbing own throat again, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts it hurts it hurts.

Petra: “—ugh.”

“Subaru”: “Petra! Petra! That’s no good, don’t give in, Petra!!”

The entirety of the mind was dominated by pain. Even though the inside of the body, the inside of the mind, the inside of the heart, were all supposed to be filled to the brim with ■■■, the pain eclipsed everything entirely.

From the top of the head to the tips of the toes, there was no place within the body that was not feeling pain. All throughout this being, the entirety of what shaped the self transformed into pain, in order to make the self experience pain, by constructing the pain, the pain pained, and the paining painpainpainpainpainpainpainpainpainpainpainpainpaininininin—.

Petra: "—egh."

Vision stained bright red, their own incredibly noisy voice seemed to ring like tinnitus, a sharp scent of blood deep in the nose, drool spilling from within the mouth with the taste of death, the shock causing an unbearable level of goosebumps on all the skin of the body.

Once again, the torment of ■■■□■■■ that had failed to truly be understood by merely having read the Book of the Dead, was clearly steeped into ■■■□■■■ as well. Through that pain, ■■■□■■■ gained a painful understanding of ■■■□■■■, in the truest, most literal sense.

As the pain blotted over both the inside and outside of ■■■□■■■ entirely, deep down, a painful understanding.

Petra: "—ogh."

A painful understanding, that the entirety of pain endured, was linked to ■■■□■■■'s, to Na■■□■ba■'s, to Na■ki□Suba■'s—to Natsuki Subaru's memories of repentance accompanied by sublime feelings of loss.

Petra: "…"

It had hurt. Letting Emilia die. It had hurt. Letting Felt die. It had hurt. Letting Rom-jii die. It had hurt. Letting Rem die. It had hurt. Letting everyone in Arlam Village die. It had hurt. Letting Ram die. It had hurt. Letting Frederica die. It had hurt. Letting Petra die. It had hurt. Letting Beatrice die. It had hurt. Letting Otto die. It had hurt. Letting Roswaal die. It had hurt. Letting Ryuzu die. It had hurt. Letting Garfiel die. It had hurt. It had hurt. It had hurt. —Utmost vexation.

Petra: “Vexing.”

It hurts. It hurts it hurts. It hurts it hurts it hurts. It hurts it hurts it hurts it hurts. —Why was that?

Petra: “Don’t want to lose.”

Even if it hurt, even if it was painful, it was far better than sorrow and vexation.

Love everyone, so will not give up on anyone. Love you, who loving everyone, would not give up on anyone, so will not give up on you.

Hence—

Petra: “—Just who, do you think I am?”

■■■□■■■ was, ■■ra□■y■ was, Pe■ra□■yte was—Petra Leyte was a bundle of potential, rich with talent and quick to learn, harboring great promise, with a bright future ahead of her.

That person, those people, all believed that about Petra. —Then, she would do so.

Petra: “Can do it.”

It ought to be possible for you, Petra Leyte.

I won’t let everyone who told me that I could do it become liars, after all.

Or perhaps, were they all just liars who believed in a weak, pitiful Petra who could not do anything?

Petra: “There’s no way, it could be that.”

It’s possible. It ought to be possible. If it’s possible, then stop being all talk and do it. Do it. Just do it. You can do it. Do it now. Do it right this instant. NOW! Come on, do it, do it—JUST DO IT!!

Petra: “Compression… no.”

By means of the power of the Authority of Tristitia, Compression would be invoked.

Just as distance, traversal time, thinking time, and discussion time had all been Compressed, right now, on the dreadful instant that had befallen Petra and the rest, Compression would be invoked.

Pain, oh what a dreadful thing it was.

Even a slight amount of pain would cause one to get teary-eyed; when it turned to a matter of pain that was a bit sharper, one would become unable to sleep at night; when it came to having an abundance of dull pains, it might very well have sway over the rest of one's life to follow.

Be it slight, sharp, or dull, the time in which pain was experienced, would always feel long and drawn out.

On the time that would make a second feel like ten, an hour feel like twelve, and a day feel like an eternity, Compression would be invoked.

Petra: "Everyone, get ready to grit your teeth."

"Subaru": "Hk, it'll be over in a second, but it'll hurt a hundred times more—!!"

That it might be ten-thousand times more, he did not tell her.

Regardless if he did, regardless if her heart was ready for it, the fact of her doing it would not have changed, after all.

Petra: "—『Compress Agony』."

The power of the Witch of Tristitia, ascended to a brand new stage, was unveiled.

9

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never lament parting with another.

10

Roy: "…"

The new art he had debuted erupted unerringly, fissuring the flawless coordination of the herd of prey.

Whilst his ears hearkened the wind's rumble as the Black Serpent's body flopped forward, contrived with befoulment abound with toxic blight, a varicolored pandemonium of screams, screeches, and wails reached him from the other side.

All of it seemed so aching, so agonizing that if Roy had been conferred the time, he would have wept through the whole night thinking of them the utmost, then inscribed those feelings into verses of poetry, and set them adrift atop a river.

Time for that he had not, however. Neither did he have the erudition to compose poetry, so it would not have been of any decent makings.

But, it was the truth that he thought of them with compassion. He bore no begrudgement toward them. Nothing akin to hatred either. Not even an intermixed blend of love and hate, all he felt was nothing but, simply, love.

Who would ever want to see anything such as the figures of their loved articles wailing in agony? That would be nothing more than spice for when their lives were surfeited. Spice was not staple food. To set it as the main dish was the deed of an aberrant.

Roy: "We… will not commit such a terrible act, you know."

In the wake of Eclipse Binaries, which sparked a chain reaction of Memories of Agony, the herd of prey's ability to mobilize had been ruptured. "2"

All that remained was the downpour of the Black Serpent's befoulment—this particular head was charged with representing Elder's Blight, so it would not go so far as to rob them of their lives. It would occlude their thinking and mobility, restraining them on the precipice of mortality in perpetuum. Should that happen, the rest would be like a wine cellar. Until the time of drinking when their true names were brought to light arrived, he shall await their time of ripening and fermentation.

He had heard that the precipice where they would be restrained offered no refuge, anguish and darkness lasted unceasing, but in the end, the pain and affliction they shall taste would settle within Roy and vanish, so it was fine. Tasting such bitterness, licking it to finish, and surfeiting himself with it too was yet eathos.

Roy: “A~h, even though they can’t be eaten immediately, looking at ripened fruits is so—”

Painful, as he about uttered so, Roy’s words were interrupted.

There was no counterattack. If anything, it was the opposite. The herd of prey bellowed a bitter, chest-stabbing screech on a higher order of magnitude in both intensity and volume. They held a sonorousness that could understandably be perceived as death wails.

Roy widened his eyes for a moment, but it progressively indicated the success of his plan—

Felt: “—LiiAAARGH! LIVEEE!!”

Everyone: “STROOooNG—!!”

The subsequent instant, fathomless response and unity defied the inevitable demise that should have swallowed the herd of prey.

11

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never walk into the sunset with another.

12

That instant, a sensation as if all the skin on her body being peeled off, followed by Reinhard scrubbing her flayed body with a metal brush steeped in ample amounts of salt water, assailed Felt as a hellish pain.

Felt: “eeUGHh…”

For the first time in her life, the pain she experienced was so intense that it felt like her insides were twisting themselves inside out. A paralysis crept through the corner of her mind, and she even hallucinated a sensation of her blood flowing backwards in her veins.

Exactly what had just happened, she did not know. —No, she understood. Petra had done something.

Felt: “That pipsqueak’s quite impressive…”

And so, Felt quietly praised the strenuous efforts of the girl, who was nearly the same height as her.

From the discussions that had been squeezed tight with absurd momentum up until this point, she knew that Petra had coordinated brilliantly with Rom-jii to establish the Combined Forces. This was an incredible feat. After all, Rom-jii was the wisest and most reliable man in the world, so Petra must have been nothing short of a genius.

And, that genius had done something beyond imagination, in order to land a crushing blow on the something that the opponent had done.

Felt: “Even still, you’ve really got some damn terrible luck, you know that?”

Cheeks contorting as she spoke, Felt caught sight of a small shadow in the corner of her eye—Camberley.

Unlike Gaston, who had been in the fight since the beginning, or Rachins, who had joined the fray midway through, Camberley had made his grand entrance at the most critical moment. —But at that exact instant, the unimaginable pain had been unleashed upon them, so calling it terrible luck would have been a gross understatement.

However—

Felt: “—You’ve got terrible luck, but you’re the best.”

With tears streaming from the corners of his eyes, that which Camberley had carried here in his hands, was now snatched away by Felt. —Something of a trump card of their Camp: the Star Staff.

She would fire it. With every fiber of her being, every ounce of strength she could scrape together, Felt would give it everything she had.

All that remained—

Felt: “Is finding an opening to fire it!”

13

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never tread upon the shadow of one who walks beside me.

14

Felt: “—LiiAAARGH! LIVEEE!!”

Everyone: “STROOooNG—!!”

An exclamation that rendered imperceivable which exactly was the warcry of a Witchbeast, the roar pulsated, and the Black Serpent’s body, analogous to a thousand calamities baled together, was jostled backward by the shock wave immediately below it.

Raging across the battlefield with a vehement torrent of light and dark, the heaven-rending impact broiled Roy’s entire body with astonishment.

What had occurred? What did they do? —All of it, he questioned not.

Roy: “Petra-cha~n-!”

With only the identity of who did it certain, Roy Alphard reached zenith.

It was an amazing thing to accomplish. Ovation and a round of applause. Becoming one with the multitudes of the crowds of Memories within Roy, he must bid them thunderous applause.

Just how much sacrifice of oneself would it take, to make the Witch Factor of Tristitia do that.

By any measure of imagination or surmise, the ordinary, average kind of happiness in all of its forms would have to be parted with, or it would not be possible to materialize this battlefield, this close of a skirmish, this extent of outrageous insolence, would it.

—Want to become happy.

That was bound to be the unconditionally imperishable, fixed and indivisible wish, as a human being.

It was bound to be an unconditionally absolute prayer, no different even for Roy—no, even for Ley and even for Louis, even for the Sin Archbishops, even for evildoers and even for criminals.

Living and continue to live, for that purpose. But, lest it be parted with, this battlefield shall not—.

Roy: "…"

Pupils bedewed with delight, drying them with a single blink of his eyelids, Roy looked upon Felt who had snatched a white staff from the hands of her comrade.

Since the dwarf, who did not seem to be any war potential for the most part, had gone out of his way to bring it here at this eleventh hour, unmistakably meant that it was a special, secret weapon.

In other words—

Roy: "If that won't do then will you start cry~ing?!"

Rainbow-hued butterflies danced, spears of fire and ice rained, titanic scythes of blood from multifarious directions were fired, a pressure that crushed everything not from left to right but from the rear to the front precipitated, and a soprano befitting of a young boy cursedly resonated in song.

Rom: “Protect Felt!!”

Wind sundered the butterflies altogether, magic bullets of ice and fire shattered the spears of fire and ice, burly muscles intercepted the titanic scythe of blood through lacerations received, a momentary twin impact perforated the ground, surging from the rear to the front, and the enormous builds of the aged man and the pigman shielded against the curse ballad that disintegrated flesh and blood.

Roy: “Magnifice~nt! Bu~t—”

His wavelike onslaught blocked by the bastion of coordination, Roy however did not lose heart.

Invoking the Teleport he had restrained from utilizing until now, Roy’s silhouette appeared at the heart of Felt’s troupe in the blink of an eye, his aim being Felt—naught, instead,

Roy: “The two over here are also pivotal, ri~ght?”

Within the personnel braced to intercept, he aimed for the spines of the two bereft of energy to stand up.

The Witch of Tristitia and Witchbeast Master, both of them war potential essential for the opposing contingent to rival Gluttony and the Black Serpent in battle, and nobody’s hand shall timely reach Roy who stood right behind them.

Licking his lips, Roy hosted the Fist King in his right hand and the Snow Vallum in his left, and with tender kindness—

—That moment, Meili’s hair wriggled and crawled, and a corona was shot through Roy’s left eye.

Roy: “Kyau-?!”

Impaled by a sensation of scorching heat, the left side of Roy’s perception vanished. Just what was this, Roy bared his remnant eye and in his vision entered the virtuoso that had crushed his left eye

—a little scorpion lurking in concealment within Meili's hair was reflected therein.

A being unknown to him. A trump card absent in Memories, a face down card, viva fight to the finish.

Roy: "Even a tiny ally like that—"

Is gallantly devoting its might, was how he was to resume, but did not.

Hastier than that, the ground upon which Roy's legs were braced double-crossed him, rocketing him into the sky without omen.

Roy: "…"

Magic, it was not. Nowhere could the wavelength of Mana be perceived.

Then, was it the Witch of Tristitia once more? —Nay, not even she fostered eyes on the back of her head.

What had transpired was an eminence protruding from the ground. With nary an omen or prior signal, did that burgeon.

???: "—Good grief, my amazin' self's comrades're way too damn reliable."

That which had beat upon his eardrums all too suddenly was a sharp voice, an exceedingly common recollection in his Memories.

By the soles of their feet did they achieve concert with the earth, such that during the intervals whilst they were planted firm upon the ground, steeled that person would become as though an iron keep, unfellable to all who sought its conquest; precisely because of being so dependable, the bark of their timbre ought not to have been heard.

Whirling up into the air, stretched out amidst Roy's vision upside-down was the earthy landscape where the Witchbeast of Pestilence writhed, and thereupon would he set it to wreak havoc.

Unlike before, a distance had now emerged between it and Roy. Albeit his armor of blood was beginning to shed, were the befoulment to be spattered out like a shower of rain, the herd of prey would have to divert their efforts towards countering that.

???: “Sit down!!”

For but a moment, the Black Serpent’s movements were thrown into disarray by the weeping outcry.

But, the duration of its stoppage amounted not to even the blink of an eye. Even if it had been deprived of that interval, that would never amount to Roy’s machinations falling out of—that instant, the serpentine form of the Witchbeast, whilst seeking to reach skyward as though a spire piercing the heavens, ruptured.

Rupturing, its befoulment spilled out from within, and onto that besmirched ground did a lone silhouette tumble down.

???: “Pwahhk-, ghehough, gahoggahhk-…”

Roy: “You’re kiddi~ng.”

Violently coughing, the red-haired man who had fallen into a pool of the most abhorrent befoulment in this world, delivered unto Roy an impact that could not be explained by simple tenacity or a pathetic adhesion to life, leaving him lost for words.

For what reason, was he alive? The question, and the appetite welling up, made Roy’s stomach growl unwittingly.

???: “Yo, look th’ fuck over here.”

With an effortless leap, the golden-haired boy caught up to the airborne Roy, and gnashing his sharp fangs, he raised aloft one of his fists clad in silver gauntlets in a grandiose hoist.

Should those smite him, the half-killed status Roy would be left in would strip him of standing any chance.

Despite knowing it would only amount to stalling for a few moments and naught more, from his choices of withdrawing to refuge, Roy sought to follow suit of the odd talent of the Leaper and invoked Lunar Eclipse,

Roy: “Bgh.”

—Zodda bugs cannoned into him from the blind spot on his left, disrupting his focus.

Roy: “…”

Upon allowing his line of sight to be lured by the irksome buzz and abhorrent texture, laying ahead, tens of meters distant were trees onto which a light blue ground dragon had been latched, and with his body entrusted to it, was the silhouette of a man supposed to be hollowed empty.

The man pointed his finger in this direction, and upon noticing their gazes cross, smiled. Transmitting to him, “You have been bested”.

The subsequent juncture, the wind howled, and a fist bedizened with wind pressure blitzed straight towards Roy.

It was awfully slow, seeming like it would take some time before it reached—when he noticed.

Roy: “This, is Petra-chan’s doing, is that what it means?”

Petra: “Yes. Thought I’d properly say it at the end. That it serves you right.”

Feet stationed atop the ground, the Witch of Tristitia proclaimed triumph to Roy in the time that she protracted.

There no longer seemed to be anything that Roy could do, pertaining to that. Also, the fist strike of the ravenous, raging tiger had drawn imminent to about a distance the size of five coins away from him.

In the time until that direct hit, what was there that he could do? He ruminated, and it occurred to him.

Roy: “It’s an amazingly, amazingly big deal, Petra-chan. But you kno~w, weren’t the sacrifices you made to win just too big?”

Petra: “Making excuses like a sore loser? Nobody’s been taken down on our side. Just so pathetic for a Sin Archbishop.”

Roy: “With the Witch of Tristitia as the opponent, would lose face. But, what’s called a sacrifice doesn’t apply to lives alone. The future, the hopes, the possibilities, it’s those kinds of things. We are worried from the bottom of our heart that Petra-chan’s long, long life hereon out will become so lonely, you see~.”

Four coins away.

At the very least, to dredge out the compensations albeit her wish to hide them, and engrave oneself into her through that agony.

Such was Roy’s unscrupulous eathos, to which Petra fluttered her eyes and put on a puzzled face. It couldn’t be, surely she had not paid them without realizing, whilst these thoughts dwelled, this reaction was—

Petra: “—Could it be, you’re misunderstanding?”

Roy: “Misunderstanding?”

Petra: “That’s strange. I’d thought Otto-san would likely say something like it. —That this time, the entire world is your enemy, that sorta thing.”

Roy: “…”

Three coins away.

He had not been told so, firsthand. However, such ardor was extant in Memories.

Considering Aldebaran’s deeds and the devastation he perpetrated, this cognizance could be called just and legitimate. However, that ought to be something with no greater or lesser purport.

Roy: “It can’t be…”

Petra: “It is.”

Two coins away.

Within the confines of the sensation of protraction, it was impracticable to commit an act so extravagant as gulping a breath, but in the throat of his heart Roy gulped a breath of his heart, and looked at she who smiled as it befit a Witch, tenderly.

The young girl supposed to be incompatible with the Witch Factor, however, was beyond question the Witch of Tristitia.

After all—

Petra: “The Witch Factor of Tristitia, can be used by anyone should they pay compensation, and if the compensations are properly harmonized, anyone can act as the agent. —So, it’s being paid together with everyone in the Royal Capital.”

Roy: “…”

Petra: “Well then, I’ll say it one more time. —Serves you right.”

One coin away.

After all, unbeknownst to Roy was any being who had abused the Witch Factor of Tristitia to this degree.

If this were not the Witch of Tristitia, then what could it possibly be.

Roy: “—A~h, thank you for the treat-.”

VIC.1120

Zero coins away. —Gorgeous Tiger’s thunderbolt exploded.

Roy: “…”

It mercilessly shattered into Roy’s countenance, knocking it down toward the ground where the Black Serpent writhed. His petite frame plunged right towards the core of the befoulment—just before that.

Felt: “—Fire!!”

Felt roared, and the staff scintillating in her grip fired a corona that washed the world with its paint of alabaster white.

It altered into a smite of judgment, without err and escape forbidden, swallowing ones who were auxiliaries of malefaction and atrocity.

—So was the denouement, of the eathos of Bizarre Eating.

Chapter 47:
“Voice”

1

—When I opened my eyes, I realized I had no idea who I was whatsoever.

???: “…”

Where this place is; when the present time is; who I am; what is happening; I do not have the slightest idea.

I cannot see. I cannot hear. I cannot move my hands, or my legs. My feet are not on the ground. I cannot breathe properly either, and I am in extraordinary discomfort—and yet, I can sense “Voices”.

???: “…”

Even though my senses of sight, smell, touch, taste, and, most of all, sound, are blocked off, there are “Voices”.

Many, plentiful, innumerable “Voices” showering down upon me, unable to do a thing, as if I am a powerless baby thrown into the cradle of hell.

???: “…”

Ceaselessly, bereft of intent, the tempest of “Voices” continue to pummel me.

Just as a baby would be defenselessly struck by the rain, I am being drowned in “Voices”. At this rate, I think I would prefer to just drown and die like this—

???: “—Laddie! Laddie, are you alright?! You’re going to be rescued now!”

—. —. A loud “Voice”, it rang in my head.

Amidst the numerous, countless “Voices”, it is a voice that feels clearly directed towards me. I cannot do anything. But still, I can understand. —The powerful “Voice”, directed towards myself.

Hence—

???: “—Ottobro, grit yer teeth now.”

Hearing that “Voice”, a feeling of suspension arrived along with a terribly violent sound—a sound that was not a “Voice” vibrated my eardrums and restored the means for my tightly sealed eyes to take in light; and so, I was finally able to face the owners of the “Voices”, those who had directed their “Voices” towards me.

???: “Really fuckin’ sorry that it took me so long to get here. Everythin’, it’s my amazin’ self’s fault.”
???: “Really fuckin’ sorry that it took me so long to get here. Everythin’, it’s my amazin’ self’s fault.”

???: “What are you saying, Garf-san! If Garf-san and everyone else hadn’t come, Laddie would still be strung up even now… Ah, Laddie, Laddie! Do you understand what I’m saying?!”
???: “What are you saying, Garf-san! If Garf-san and everyone else hadn’t come, Laddie would still be strung up even now… Ah, Laddie, Laddie! Do you understand what I’m saying?!”

Present there is a golden-haired boy, alongside a large ground dragon with a pale blue hide. The “Voices” that I feel are overlapping with the voices that I hear, but there is no doubt about it.

The ground dragon is nestling close to me as I sit on the ground, and the boy is forcefully grabbing at my shoulders.

Boy: “Ya don’t understand anythin’ right now, aye? But, that’s aight. We’ll get it back with everyone else. Everythin’ my amazin’ self’s lackin’ for, everyone’s gonna lend their hands…!!”
Boy: “Ya don’t understand anythin’ right now, aye? But, that’s aight. We’ll get it back with everyone else. Everythin’ my amazin’ self’s lackin’ for, everyone’s gonna lend their hands…!!”

???: “…”

Boy: “‘N so, Ottobro, ya just sit tight here ‘n…”
Boy: “‘N so, Ottobro, ya just sit tight here ‘n…”

Rest assured; I think he wanted to say that.

It seems like the boy before my eyes knows my empty self, and is trying to do something about it. In all likelihood, he knows the reason why I am empty.

I want to know, I want to ask him about it. Naturally, I feel inclined to do so.

I do, but—

???: “—Might there be anything, that I could possibly do?”
???: “—Might there be anything, that I could possibly do?”

The “Voice” that spilled from my mouth, I do not know whether or not it actually formed as a proper voice. Only, seeing that both the boy and the ground dragon were widening their eyes, I could tell that my words had been conveyed.

To be honest, I do not understand anything. I do not, but, there is just one thing I can say. —I am grateful that they rescued me from that cradle of hell.

Above all—

???: “—When you guys speak to me with such earnest voices, of course I will want to respond accordingly.”
???: “—When you guys speak to me with such earnest voices, of course I will want to respond accordingly.”

Boy & Ground Dragon: “Ah, that’s…”
Boy & Ground Dragon: “Ah, that’s…”

Hearing my words, the boy and the ground dragon opened their eyes wide, and as their breaths and “Voices” synced up, they spoke.

Ground Dragon: “—Just like you, Laddie.”

Ground Dragon: “—Just like you, Laddie.”

Boy: “Just like ya, Ottobro.”
Boy: “Just like ya, Ottobro.”

At those “Voices”, I began thinking of myself before I became empty, a smile coming over my face.

—Directed towards whoever did this to me, it was a smile as if to say “you have been bested”.

2

???: “—Hiyah!!”

Delivered alongside the loud carillon of a silver bell, was a powerful kick in contrast to its lightness.

Gripping the handle of her Morningstar, Rem bore witness to that satisfactory outcome of her efforts.

Using magically crafted footholds of ice as practical disturbances, she had drawn the attention of the opponents upwards, successfully supporting Emilia.

Of course, if it had been possible, she would have preferred victory to have been decided through the affectionate iron ball that Subaru had continued to polish, but she must not be too greedy. Subaru had also taken things step by step with Rem in the Empire. If Subaru had been impatient, and instead had pressed Rem with everything being about “Me, me, me”—

Rem: “Back then, it might not have just been his fingers, but his arms and legs that would have gotten broken as well.”

Now that her Memories had returned, even just the thought that she would ever enact such violence unto Subaru was enough to make her faint, but Rem herself recognized that it was entirely possible for her to have done so, given her state of mind at the time.

Hence, it was important to do everything step by step, in the proper order. It was the same with cooking. Even though she was relatively proficient at cooking, Rem had a bad habit of disregarding that principle when it came to anything else.

And, when it came to bad habits, she had another—

Rem: "—Must not jump to conclusions!"

The reason why she would quickly always be convinced that something was settled, and thus relax her efforts, was due to a lack of imagination.

The one who had preached to Rem that ceasing one's thoughts was wrong had also taught her, when she had been bereft of Memories, how to determine her heart: Priscilla. —Even if she was gone, her teachings yet lived on. And so long as those teachings kept Rem alive, they would remain so.

That was why—

Emilia: "—Hk, you're joking?!"

When Emilia raised a voice of astonishment, Rem had not ceased her thoughts.

Directly below, Emilia rose up to deliver a kick within the blind spot of Al and his shinobi, and her ice-clad foot ought to have struck him with spine-shattering force.

But, Al had protected against that. —Covering himself and his partner with a box of stone, he had done so.

Rem: "That's what Rom-sama was talking about—"

The efficacy of "Turning Back Time", Rem had judged it to be so.

For a split-second defensive maneuver, that which covered his entire body had been far too flawless. In order to use magic, what was required was a mental image of the effects, and the construction of the technique. If either was lacking, magic would not take form, and the more complex the endeavor being attempted, the longer it would take to conceive a mental image of its effect.

That which Al had performed, was borne of a mental image far too certain in regards to a surprise attack from his blind spot.

Rem: "…"

Even though she understood the principle behind it in her head, Rem once again bit down on the inside of her cheek upon witnessing that cheat technique.

To begin with, Al's Authority had already proved it was capable of sidestepping even Reinhard. Even if they continued to attack like this, would he not just continue to evade everything? Such negative thoughts were—

Emilia: "—Rem!!"

Just as she began spiraling into negative thoughts, Emilia's holler snapped her out of it.

Across the rocky box that had emerged mid-air, Emilia and Rem crossed gazes. Unlike Rem, who was overwhelmed by the threat of the Authority, a powerful glint was housed within Emilia's amethyst eyes. That gave her heart.

Rem: "…"

As strength flaringly returned to her own eyes, the invigoration of her horn by way of her Oni form swelled Rem's entire body with vitality.

Plummeting through the sky, thirty seconds had already elapsed since the battle had commenced—what allowed for that to be accurately measured, were the marks engraved into the large rock visible far to their rear.

An enormous fissure in the land that existed within the Kararagi City-States, the Agzadd Canyon, had a difference in elevation of five thousand meters from the surface to the deepest part of the valley, and the time it took to descend all the way was around a hundred seconds. Markings had been engraved beforehand along the rock face for intervals of every ten seconds, and they were currently passing the third—seventy seconds remained until they hit the bottom.

Emilia: “We’re still—!!”
Rem: “—Just getting started!!”

Emilia and Rem’s voices overlapping, they resumed combat with renewed morale and an upsurge of strength.

Rem greatly bent her body, and Emilia, spinning around, produced mallets of ice in both her hands. In that moment, the Morningstar was fired like a cannonball, and the ice hammers were unleashed on both sides whilst clad in a powerful wind, pulverizing the stone box that Al and his accomplice had enclosed themselves in—fragments of stone scattered alongside a thunderous crash, and the enemies, split up between the top and bottom, fiercely commenced their attacks unto Rem and Emilia.

Al headed for Emilia, and for Rem, came the red-haired shinobi—

Rem: “—No, you’re also…”

Shinobi: “Indeed, I’m Al-sama’s helpful all-purpose maid, Yae-chan.”

Rem: “That’s Rem’s designation in regards to Subaru-kun!”

Putting a halt on the statement of the not-shinobi red-haired maid—no, of the woman who called herself Yae, Rem pulled back her iron ball with her right hand, and moved to slam her mighty left arm into Yae as she flew towards her.

But, Yae stopped mid-air through some unnatural braking mechanism, and evaded it.

At a glance, she sent a thread from her backhand to connect to Al, using exquisite tension and flexibility to halt her movement, before a shimmer shot from her other hand towards Rem’s neck.

Rem: “—Huma.”

Intuiting the incoming threat, Rem’s spinal reflex guarded her vitals by forming a collar of ice. As soon as the thread attached itself to the collar, she removed her head from it, avoiding decapitation. — Just as Rem survived through quick judgment, she veered the rising iron ball towards targeting Yae's back, the latter having raised her eyebrows slightly.

However, as the iron ball approached Yae from behind, she evaded precisely as if she had eyes on the back of her head; as Rem expressed astonishment whilst catching the iron ball that had barely missed on its return path, Yae stuck out her tongue,

Yae: "It's reflected in your eyes, y'know?"

Momentarily enraged by that provocation, Rem accepted a scolding from the Katya in her heart. Nodding in agreement with the imaginary Katya as she clamored like a cat "Idiot, that's exactly what your opponent wants!", Rem praised the talents of an enemy capable of utilizing what was reflected in their opponent's eyes,

Rem: "In that case, kindly strain those eyes well!"

With those words, she took the retrieved iron ball of her Morningstar, and covered it in layers, and layers, and layers of ice, doubling, and doubling, and doubling its mass, and hurled down a lump of ice around ten meters in diameter.

Yae: "Maybe my provocation was a little too effective?!"

The roaring iceberg slayed all wind in its approach, and as Yae, her voice quavering, furiously waved her hands around, she chiseled, notched, and carved away at the Morning-iceblock-star, fragmenting its mass over, and over, and over again to stop it.

Ultimately, stripped naked from the ice, all that remained was the bare iron ball, and as it hurtled right at her chest, she caught it with a web of threads, dispersing the impact as it forcefully shot her downwards.

What awaited her down there—

Emilia: "This time! Unlike the Royal Capital! I won't let you! Get away!"
Al: "Though normally! If you! Do that! I'd just end up! Running off with the win!”

As Emilia and Al clashed against each other, they traded blows in the form of both weapons and words. In their vicinities, each had floating armaments of ice and stone respectively, and they both continued to promptly grab any of the weapons next to them, wielding them with no concern for their surroundings as they bashed them against each other.

Emilia: “Yah! Terya! Hiyah! Uya! Torya! Tei-tei-tei-tei-tei!”

Contrary to her cute war cries, Emilia’s offense did not leave any room for breathers. However, for all the swords, spears, and axes that rained down upon Al, he parried with his own axes, spears, and swords, and continued to pull through.

As Emilia utilized acrobatic movements to enact her incessant offensive, Al met her every blow with weapons at the shortest distance possible, successfully defending against it. Likely, that was also the effect of “Turning Back Time”. Once an attack landed, he would return to before it landed, and then place his weapon over the spot it had landed. —Rinse and repeat.

Yae: “—Al-sama!”

After being spiked down by Rem, Yae arrived at the scene of that back-and-forth combat. Realizing that she had blundered by temporarily creating a two-on-one situation, Rem too attempted to increase her falling speed by using a foothold—nay,

Rem: “Emilia-sama!”

Instead of catching up herself, Rem passed instantaneous judgment and tinkered with the angle of the iron ball she had sent down there.

Although Yae had dispersed its impact, the iron ball still plummeted with her at a constant speed, and as if carrying Subaru’s spirit, who had polished it, it flew towards Emilia to aid her in her predicament. Then, just before a joint attack from Al and Yae could strike her, Emilia was caught by the chains.

Rem: “UrrrrYAHHHHhhhh!!”

Using the foothold she had made a moment prior, not to launch herself off of, but to brace herself, she fished Emilia up with the chains that had caught her—as Emilia was lifted up between Al and Yae just as they were about to reconvene, the two factions regrouped into divisions of upper sky and lower sky.

Emila: “Thank you! You’re reaaally strong!”

Rem: “You’re welcome! The feeling is mutual!”

Grabbing the hand of Emilia, who had been elevated to the same position, Rem was impressed by the enemy’s strength.

Originally, Rem and Emilia were supposed to be responsible solely for Al, so Yae’s participation here was incredibly troublesome. Not only did she divide their forces, she was also incredibly skilled herself. Moreover, being together with Al was not just an addition to her strength, it served as multiplication.

Rem: “Indeed, just like myself and that person…”

Emilia: “Eh? Just now, did you say something about Subaru?”

Rem: “Apologies, that is a matter for after this is finished!”

Responding so to the wide-eyed Emilia, Rem ascertained that they were passing another marking on the rock face—that sixty seconds remained until they landed at the bottom, and firmly grit her teeth.

Her thoughts from just earlier were correct. Yae was formidable, and made even stronger when Al was with her. In order to do something about that—

Rem: “Split them up. Emilia-sama!”

Emilia: “Yes! Do it with me!”

Holding hands, they raised up their opposite hands, Emilia’s empty and Rem’s with a weapon, directing them towards the pair directly below,

Emilia: “Al—”
Rem: “—Huma!!”

As the two types of Huma intermingled, ice began to appear in the air whilst a creaking sound perforated the atmosphere—of course, were they to simply attack by hurling pebbles, it would only be a repeat of failures up to this point. So, to prevent that from happening, rather than focusing on how the ice came out, they plotted where it would emerge.

Yae: “—Hk.”

Al: “Tch.”

Obstructed by the expanding ice, the sound of tongue-clicking within that helmet was inaudible. Yet, judging from the results alone, there was no doubt that he had indeed clicked his tongue.

The mass of ice produced by Rem and Emilia—a thin, level sheet of ice was wedged between Al and Yae, one below, the other above, thus preventing their reconvergence. While maintaining the sturdiness of the ice sheet, it had been stretched to a disk of around thirty meters in diameter; it would have been a herculean task for them to get through it and reunite while falling, and furthermore, since it had been made flat, the threads could not carve through it either.

Yae: “Al-sa—”

Al: “—Yae, hold out for a bit.”

Facing each other across the ice sheet, Al ordered Yae from below. What sort of state of mind Yae had arrived at after receiving that was something Rem understood quite distinctly.

Rem was participating in this battle for the sake of Subaru, and so, for the same reason Yae was—

Rem: “When someone precious puts their hopes in you, it sets you alight with motivation.”

Yae: “You’re wrong.”

With a curt response to Rem’s understanding, Yae folded her knees and spun her body, going barefoot.

The enormity of the ice sheet resulted in significantly more air resistance, bringing their falling speed to a limit. As Yae landed atop that ice, Rem and Emilia were perched to her front and back, as if pincering her.

Barefoot as she was, each of Yae’s ten white toes were equipped with a ring—

Yae: “—Once again, magic is quite troublesome~. I’m grateful to the teachings of the village elder.”

Rem: “Thank you so very much for the praise. My mentor was quite an outstanding personage, after all.”

Emilia: “Same for me. I was always being told “You’re learning so quickly, Lia”.”

Yae: “That’s the same way they raised me at the village, so you must also be quite the genius, Emilia-sama.”

With a bitter smile and a shrug, Yae glanced between Emilia and Rem before prefacing with “So, you see”,

Yae: “The fact that I’m even here means that y’all’s plans have failed… Vol-sama will come rushing over here before long, so why don’t we omit the futile exchanges and just have you two surrender?”

Emilia: “Mm-mm, we can’t do that. Sure, it was quite the surprise that you were together with him, but…”

Rem: “Rem and Emilia-sama aren’t playing around either. Besides, if you are counting on the Divine Dragon-sama, it won’t be coming. —Our lord is the one serving as its opponent, after all.”

Yae: “…This is against the Divine Dragon, y’know? Aren’t you expecting a bit too much?”

Emilia: “So, are you not expecting anything from Al?”

As Yae inclined her head, it seemed as if Emilia's question had pierced her directly. Holding her breath with a "Mph", Yae then released it, straining her white fingers and toes as she readied herself.

Rem retracted her iron ball to her hands, and Emilia gripped beautiful twin blades of ice. Glancing down at the sheet of ice, the distance with Al, subject to lesser air resistance as he was, continued to widen rapidly.

After all, Al was having Yae buy time for him.

Rem: "Emilia-sama, Al-san is…"

Emilia: "Yes, I know. We reaaally have to hurry."

Reaching an understanding in just a short exchange, Rem harbored an out-of-place sentimentality.

She had never conceived of being so in sync with Emilia like this before. —Such was her sentimentality.

Setting aside Rem's inner feelings, the trio atop the ice silently roused their fighting spirits—

Yae: "—Crimson Sakura, Yae Tenzen."

Emilia: "—The Witch of Glaciation, Emilia."
Rem: "—The Hero's Confidant, Rem."

Finishing their introductions, Rem and Emilia immediately charged toward Yae across the ice.

As Yae bent her knees and ducked down, twenty dancing threads shot from her appendages, and while those clashed against chains and magic, Rem, in order to reach Al below the ice, challenged the one blocking the path, the Crimson Sakura.

Rem: "Yahhhhh!!"

Howling a battlecry, Rem was not bluffing or putting up a strong front; she wholeheartedly believed.

That Ram and their allies, who were taking on Gluttony and other foes, as well as Roswaal and Clind, who were dealing with the ultimate threat of the Divine Dragon, would all fulfill their respective duties.

For that purpose, right now, she would defeat Yae, who stood before her, and reach Al. Passing another marking, there now remained fifty seconds until they reached the floor of the Agzadd Canyon—

—As he plummeted below, Al trained his gaze upon that beautifully tempestuous clash atop the ice,

Al: "I don't think you'll lose, but… don't forget, Alter. After all, there's something I need you to do no matter what."

That voice, whispered only within his own mouth, never reached those atop the ice.

3

—Aldebaran, who had betrayed the sun, and his henchmen.

The battle against the scoundrels who were fully capable of pulling the trigger on the world's collapse, the bouts against Gluttony in the mountains and Aldebaran at the Agzadd Canyon, both transitioned to their next stages.

Naturally, the same applied to the third bout, forecasted to be the most rigorous.

By the Authority of Witch of Tristitia, newly born into this world, the battlefield had shifted to a rocky region where collateral damage was of no concern; there, the one extolled as the guardian of the Kingdom, the Divine Dragon Volcanica—the usurper who had bent that almighty dragonhusk to their will, now faced confrontation by its rightful dragonkin.

It was a battle in which all fighters were concealing tremendous power, further ravaging the rocky wasteland that was already naught more than sand and stone, into a place where nobody would ever dare set foot.

Unmistakably, those had been the scars of war forecasted for such a battle against the Divine Dragon.

However—

???: "—Ugh."

Vision blurred, consciousness hazy, ringing in the ears transcending noisiness to end up as silence. Limbs bereft of strength, unsure if both were properly still attached to the body.

Each frail breath brought pain akin to being struck by a flash of lightning from head to toe; likely a sign that fractured bones were tearing up the insides of the body all throughout.

Thinking to that extent, they realized that they had collapsed face down on the hard rocky ground.

???: "—!"

Upon realizing one thing about their current state, other realizations quickly followed.

Evidenced by the ground's violent tremors, the sensation of the sky bursting asunder, and the faint shift in the scent of the atmosphere, the environment had undergone a tremendous upheaval, so not long had passed since they had collapsed to the ground. A minute? Thirty seconds?

???: "Five seconds, Master. Report."

They were bestowed with an exact answer to their question, however, they lacked the leeway to even curve their lips into a wry smile..

The other party had not expected a response, either—nay, it was simply that they were not in a position where they could afford to be placing expectations. The tremors of the ground, the bursting of the sky, and the upheaval of the atmosphere; all were caused by that tactful other party and their opponent.

The battle between Dragon and dragonkin ravaged the world as though it were a natural cataclysm, reshaping it through feats of strength. —Off to the side of that battle, not merely half-dead, but rather nine-tenths dead, they laid collapsed.

???: “…”

No longer, could they even hear voices properly.

—The life of Roswaal L. Mathers, flickered like a candle flame before the wind.

Chapter 48:
The Ultimate Lifeform

1

???: “—Roswaal and Clind-san say they can do it. So, why not let them handle it?”

At the tactical briefing, whilst the Aldebusters were deliberating over who should confront the Divine Dragon Volcanica, it was Emilia’s remark that ultimately served as the decisive blow.

Emilia’s decision to entrust the battlefield to them without demanding a detailed explanation was not reckless impulsiveness, it was rooted in genuine trust; and for that, Roswaal felt both admiration and gratitude toward her.

The situation was what it was. Even if his long-planned schemes were to be somewhat derailed, Roswaal was at least half-prepared for the moment he would have to reveal Clind’s origins. —That was, the identity of the Divine Dragon’s dragonkin.

Roswaal: “But if we’re going to talk about that, it would inevitably involve touching upon the matter of our Contract as well.”

Naturally, Roswaal knew very well whose dragonkin Clind really was, welcoming him into the Mathers household as a servant regardless. Of course, this was not due to his exceptional abilities as a steward, but rather, because he believed his presence would prove to be useful.

The long cherished desire that Roswaal must fulfill no matter what —he believed Clind to be indispensable to that purpose.

Clind: “Even if you were to reveal it, I doubt it would change any of their stances. Advice.”

As Roswaal kept trying to remain quiet on this matter, Clind, as one in the know, made such a proposal.

There was no reason to stubbornly deny him. In fact, Roswaal shared his view. Even if Roswaal's circumstances were to be revealed it would likely not change the attitudes of Emilia or the rest of the Camp.

Still, Roswaal's inability to reveal any details was simply in his nature.

Roswaal could not face others without placing himself in a superior position. He had to grasp their intentions, seize their weaknesses, and if necessary, he even wished to take hostages to secure his advantage.

The numerous years in which he could not afford failure had molded Roswaal into a cautious, even cowardly, villain.

That was why, even though Roswaal knew that Subaru, Emilia, and the others were terribly kind-hearted, he simply could not bring himself to reveal his true intentions to them.

Roswaal: "I don't believe that will be a hindrance, thooough~."

The key was not to reveal everything, but to prove oneself capable where it counts.

In this regard, Roswaal was proud to say that he did not lag behind his comrades. In fact, precisely because he carried the guilt of hiding his true intentions, he felt compelled to deliver results.

Roswaal: "…Feeling guilt? Me, the Witch's disciple of all people?"

Though he recognized such doubts within himself, Roswaal shelved them for later.

In any case, without revealing Clind's circumstances, Roswaal found himself headed toward the same battlefield as him—and toward a fight against the enemy who had stolen the dragonhusk of the Divine Dragon.

And so—

Roswaal: "Let's take this opportunity to put it to the test. —That is, all my diligent studies, in order to slay the Dragon.”

2

—In that battle, there had been no such trial runs.

Removing his monocle, Clind arrayed himself in surging bolts of violet lightning—from his cranium protruded two black horns, and casting off the long-worn mask of the versatile steward, he became naught but a lone dragonkin.

As soon as he took a single step forward, flashes of lightning were birthed at the soles of his feet, and the initial velocity of his explosive leap emitted a cacophony that tore through the air.

Clind: “…”

Rupturing the atmosphere, each step upon the ground quaked the world as if it were cannonfire.

Propelled by fulminations of violet lightning, Clind charged directly towards the majestic figure hovering in the aether. —The Divine Dragon Volcanica spread its valiant dragonwings whilst carrying the sun upon its back, thrusting forth its gaping jaw.

Volcanica: “—Haahraan!”

In that instant, a ray of white heat coalesced from the unleashed breath, seizing Clind head-on.

The Dragon’s breath was a torrent of pure Mana, raw power that had not been bestowed with directionality through magic. Even so, just as drops of water, harmless on their own, could amass into a flood capable of washing away nations, Mana charged with overwhelming vigor could easily tear apart the realm of reality—

Clind: “—Your address at curtain’s rise is bereft of all artistry. Crude.”

Swinging his hand down like a blade performing a bamboo-splitting strike, Clind severed the white light that had been fired with might capable of leveling a city. “1”

The breath was split clean down the middle, and passed straight behind him as if it was trying to avoid a direct hit. In exchange, the scorched ground was upheaved, rock fragments were pulverized until they turned to sand, before being melted all down into viscous streams of red lava.

Leaving all of that in his wake, Clind pressed forward, his body leaping high up as he drew ever closer to the Dragon amidst heavenly skies.

Volcanica: “Tch, you impudent little shit!”

The roaring Dragon gyrated its body, delivering a swing of its thick, tenacious tail. Striking the wind dead, the tail whip revolved relentlessly, and leaving no place to run, it seized Clind head-on—roaring thunder crackled.

Purple lightning of a noticeably stronger degree illuminated the sky, and a moment later, it was the Dragon’s tail that had found itself repelled.

The principle mirrored his earlier ground-kick acceleration: a shock wave generated by the eruption of the violet bolts surging around his body. Whilst airborne, Clind had triggered that phenomenon at his feet, using the impact as a foothold; then, by fulminating lightning through his shoulder, elbow, and down to his fist, he repelled the Dragon’s tail with an unbelievably powerful punch.

And frighteningly, that purple lightning was—

Clind: “Bear with me for a little while longer. Inexhaustible.”

As if ignoring the fine weather of those cloudless, clear skies, those surging flashes of lightning were discharged ad nauseam.

Volcanica: “OHHHHHHHHHH—!!!”

Raising its voice in anger, the Dragon beat its wings and swiveled through the air. In the surroundings of that Dragon, Clind dashed about freely, accelerating with each eruption of indigo lightning.

As before, eruptions of purple lightning at the soles of his feet kept

Clind airborne, bestowing the wingless dragonkin the right to maneuver through the sky as he pleased. Of course, the diligent dragonkin was not merely enjoying a leisurely stroll through the air, and he did not forget to unleash ferocious offensives against the Dragon.

Clind: "…"

Evading the dragonclaws by a hair's breadth as they swung at him, he drove lightning-clad strike into the face of the opponent with whom he harbored far too great a difference in both stature and reach, and thereupon did he unleash the apotheosis of all thunderbolts. This assault, layered with the twofold preparations of strike and fulmination, was not performed merely once or twice; in the blink of an eye, it repeated ten, twenty times.

Volcanica: "Shit—hk!"

Its dominance of the air space robbed by the overlapping eruptions of purple voltage, the Dragon spat that out and ascended to a higher altitude.

Possessing wings, it was the special right of the Divine Dragon to choose its battlefield not merely on the ground, where the wasteland stretched out as far as the eye could see, but even in the sky, covering three-hundred and sixty degrees in three-dimensional space.

However—

???: "—Al Duet."

—Ascending to a high altitude, the Divine Dragon's head plunged right into an enormous mass of water, losing all sense of up and down.

Volcanica: "—Hk?!"

Exhaling a large air bubble out of astonishment, the Divine Dragon's colossal body was swallowed by a sphere of water spanning over several dozen meters in diameter, created by focusing the moisture in the surroundings and the streams of water on the surface together at a single point.

As the water pressure began to creak, the Divine Dragon, held captive in its aquatic gaol, widened its golden eyes.

???: “To think you would forget about me and become so invigorated, how cooold~.”

Beneath the Dragon, Roswaal, who had imprisoned the Dragon in the water sphere, flashed a smile.

Licked by the tongues of the heat wave from the breath that Clind had initially severed, the surface of the ground had been transformed into glass of black luster, and standing atop it, Roswaal pointed to the sphere of water in the heavenly skies, and folded it in on itself.

“Duet” signified an instrumental duo, and so, this magic did not end at merely entrapping the opponent in the sphere of water. —Immediately after, the water sphere in which the Dragon had been sealed began to froth with a scintillating heat, reaching a boiling point.

Thereupon, violet voltage flashed a degree yet stronger—

Clind: “I shall now get a bit flashy. Roaring thunder.”

The thunderclap unleashed by Clind’s fist harmonized as it thrust into the water sphere. —That instant, the voltage surged through the entirety of the mass of water, frying the water sphere itself, along with the Dragon, purple lightning scurrying through all its insides.

In the following moment, the heat and pressure both reached their limits—the water sphere burst asunder in a thunderous overture.

The purple lightning, with nowhere else to go, cracked through the battlefield; the tempest of steam, capable of rivaling an eruption of flames, blew radially outward as a devastating blast; the water that had lasted through the incandescent heat poured down onto the land incessantly as if rain from clear skies.

Clind: "…"

The vehement detonation that was induced harbored the power to wipe out a small village entirely, leaving nary a trace behind.

While it might have been assisted by a dragonkin, it was a level of destructive force impermissible for a lone magician to exhibit; and receiving the full brunt of it without restraint, even the Dragon would surely—

Volcanica: "—Ahh, shit, I've cooled my head now."

Tearing through the white steam with its dragonwings, the Divine Dragon grumbled those words amidst the locus of the epicenter in the sky. —Indeed, it grumbled. If it had sustained any extent of injury, the grumble would have likely been a viler curse instead.

That was to say, the airborne Dragon was going strong. —Nay, it was completely unscathed.

Roswaal: "…Even though it was something we had known, it's quite disheartening to bear witness to it firsthand, iiisn't~ it?"

Gazing up at that feat of having survived unscathed from the ground, Roswaal closed a single eye whilst leaving the blue one open.

Even when subjected to such an extent of firepower, the Divine Dragon had not sustained even a sliver of damage. This was neither because Roswaal's magic was trivial, nor was it because the Dragon had spontaneously devised the most optimal defensive maneuver. —Though the latter was closer to the truth, reality was far more despairing and overwhelmingly unreasonable.

Clind: "Master, do not be dispirited. Encouragement."

Beside Roswaal landed Clind, who had escaped the blast radius and dropped down.

Using purple lightning to dry off after soaking in the water sphere, Clind spoke with an unchanged tone and expression, but conveyed therein was a faint consideration founded in the long time they had known each other. —During their long acquaintance, Clind had told him much about the Divine Dragon's unreasonable absurdity.

Roswaal: "—As expected, the dragonscales and dragonhalo protecting the Heartstone are quite troooublesome~."

At Clind's failed attempt at an encouraging response, Roswaal vocalized proof that he had not lost his fighting spirit. —The dragonscales and dragonhalo, those were the greatest reasons why the Divine Dragon Volcanica had come to be known as the most powerful existence in the world; the unreasonable absurdities that would need to be surmounted, no matter the cost.

Roswaal: "…"

—The Cloud Dragon Mezoreia and the Blight Dragon Valgren; if one questioned where the differences between those two Dragons and the Divine Dragon Volcanica lay, the answer would be in the dragonscales and dragonhalo.

Mezoreia, still young, was yet underdeveloped as a Dragon; and Valgren, having lost the equilibrium of its mind following the death of its birthed dragonkin, had thus forfeited its future. Each of them had proved lacking in the cultivation of their dragonhusks, failing to forge the same two types of armor possessed by the Divine Dragon.

That was—

Roswaal: "Dragonscales impervious to any physical attacks, and a dragonhalo that wards off all magical attacks."

Clind: "Without conquering those two armors, the Heartstone of the Dragon will remain unreachable. Reaffirmation."

Inducing a sense of despair, Clind's words presented the greatest obstacle in conquering the Divine Dragon.

The overwhelming physical defense of the dragonscales, and the absurd magical defense of the dragonhalo; unless they stripped it of those two powerful safeguards, none of their attacks would be able to reach its weak point, the Heartstone.

It was not a matter of which, both were required. Unless they stripped it of both armors, neither would they be able to surpass the astounding regeneration of the Dragon's Mana body, nor would they be able to render it incapable of combat.

Ergo, in order to defeat the Divine Dragon, experts in both hand-to-hand and magical combat were necessary.

But then again—

Roswaal: "Even if its dragonhalo is still intact, it's impressive how even that much firepower resulted in no damage, riiiight~?"

Clind: "It is not known as the most powerful Dragon in the world just for show. Sigh."

Roswaal: "Was that not a bit of a proud sigh juuust~ now? However things may have ended up now, this opponent was originally yourself. If there are any weaknesses that only you are aware of, it's fine for you to secretly tell me, you know?"

Clind: "There is. The Dragon Sword. Immediate response."

Roswaal: "Rather to the point…"

The Dragon Sword, having been immediately given in response, was an enchanted sword that made it possible to cut things that could not be cut.

With the ability of the Dragon Sword, it would have certainly been possible to disregard the dragonscales and dragonhalo and launch an attack straight for the Heartstone. If the wielder felt so inclined, then even just hitting the Divine Dragon with the Dragon Sword might have dealt a notable amount of damage.

Of course, it was fruitless to discuss a weapon they did not have at hand, and it would not change the situation for the better.

Clind: "As a point of reference for the dragonscales, I will target the reverse scale on its neck. Old wound. As for the dragonhalo… I suppose it will depend on your strenuous efforts, Master. Expectation."

Roswaal: “Aren’t you speaking to me a little too casually after my first trump card proved completely ineffective juuust~ now?”

Clind: “Is that so? —Though, Echidna-sama would have been able to do it. Soliloquy.”

Roswaal: “…”

As expected, the duration of their acquaintance went both ways.

Hearing that shameless extra comment from Clind, despite knowing that he was playing right into the former’s intentions, a flame was verily set alight in Roswaal’s heart.

Of course, even now Roswaal was not so conceited as to believe that he had reached the level of his mentor, but—

Roswaal: “A disciple must never cast shame upon their Teacher, aaafter~ all.”

The karma of past lives that he needed to fulfill no matter what, and the deepest, most cherished wish he desired to fulfill; these breathed life into Roswaal’s scarred soul, granting strength to his eyes as they grappled with the challenge presented before them.

The history of magic was a helix of trial and error, and the same was true for the span of Roswaal’s lives.

Once one problem was solved, the subsequent problem would immediately stand in the way, and he would continue to struggle onward in order to find a solution. But, it was by solving all of those problems, that he had arrived at where he was today.

Just as he had done ever since he had lost his mentor, all by his lonesome.

Roswaal: “To begin with, there exists nobody who stands a greater chance than I.”

He would intentionally proclaim it himself. Without a doubt, Roswaal was the strongest magician of the present era.

There existed none who had a greater potential of overcoming the dragonhalo of the Divine Dragon Volcanica than Roswaal. —No, even that infinitesimal possibility was something he had cultivated over these four hundred years.

In the field of magic, if there was a wall that needed to be surmounted no matter what, Roswaal, without fail, would find a way to surmount it. Anything less was an impossibility.

That was the vow Roswaal L. Mathers had taken, the path of thorns he had resolved to walk all by his lonesome.

That was why—

Roswaal: "—With the entirety of my being, I shall vanquish this plight."

Alongside his declaration of resolve, in order to break through to the untrodden domain of surmounting a dragonhalo, Roswaal once again began formulating techniques in the sky of a complexity that would scorch any ordinary mind to naught.

3

—The position of "dragonkin" was one which Clind actually found to be quite troublesome.

In the first place, dragonkin were ultimately the forms taken by the next generation of Dragons and, strictly speaking, were not identical existences to their Dragon progenitors. Nevertheless, they inherited many of the memories, experiences, and emotions of their Dragons, harboring an amalgam within their minds that made it difficult to classify them as separate beings entirely.

Clind was no exception to that, and the influence from the days of Volcanica was markedly reflected in his current self's way of being. —To give an example, this could be seen in his strong envy towards unrealized potential.

Born as a member of the absolute race known as Dragons, Volcanica innately esteemed the unripeness within humans as radiant, as it meant they needed to grow and develop whilst they headed towards their goals, thus validating its own absolute way of being. That disposition was carried forth into the present with him as a dragonkin, and now, unrealized beings who concealed within themselves great potential—children, were something that Clind could not help but greatly revere, respect, esteem, love, and cherish.

That nature of Clind's, carried over from his past life, so to speak, was something that Frederica and the like harbored an enormous misunderstanding about. Only, there was another matter concerning dragonkin that he wished to keep concealed from Frederica, so he deliberately refrained from clarifying that misunderstanding with her and those around her.

Clind: "While that may be the case, it is a tad vexing to be kept at a distance from Annerose-sama, Petra, Beatrice-sama, Meili, and Emilia-sama. Discontent."

In any case, not limited solely to Clind, there existed an inextricable bond between Dragons and their dragonkin.

Given that a dragonkin's development would spur on the growth of their Dragon, and that a dragonkin's death would destroy the mind of their Dragon, that bond was evident—in fact, if the need ever arose, a dragonkin could even house their own mind within the empty dragonhusk, wielding their rightful strength as a Dragon to their heart's content.

Clind: "I have heard that in the Empire, Mezoreia and its dragonkin had done so. Interest."

Though a long time had passed since Clind had become a dragonkin, his points of contact with other dragonkin were essentially nonexistent, so he thought it might be nice if he could one day exchange words with one who had newly been born into Vollachia, Madelyn.

That which she was said to have performed, the housing of one's own soul into their dragonhusk, was an act which Clind had also performed many times in the past, returning to the Divine Dragon Volcanica in order to abide by the Covenant with the Kingdom of Lugunica.

Clind: “Albeit at present, governance of the dragonhusk has been seized through some unknown means. Foul play.”

In essence, all that was required for a dragonkin to house their soul within their Dragon, was the act of touching their dragonhusk. But for Clind, his soul’s first homecoming in approximately forty years had ended in failure, his dragonhusk remaining in the palm of the usurper.

Clind: “It is not as though I was without concerns, but… Regrettable.”

However mighty an existence the race known as Dragons was, the means to commandeer an empty vessel did not amount to zero.

In particular, an Evil Spirit whom Clind knew harbored the power to possess the bodies of others, and he had also discussed the possibility of such a power being capable of seizing a dragonhusk in private with his allies. —Juice, it had been an awfully long time since he had seen the Evil Spirit who went by that name.

Clind: “There is no helping it now. Sentimentality.”

Regardless, Clind knew that it was possible for a Dragon to have its dragonhusk hijacked, and that in order to recover said dragonhusk, there was a need to strike its Heartstone. —The problem was, it was the Divine Dragon’s dragonhusk that had been annexed, so its dragonscales and dragonhalo were obstructing the way to its Heartstone.

Clind: “I will deal with the dragonscales by piercing the reverse scale, so the Master must surmount the dragonhalo. Devotion.”

By way of the absolute defense belonging to the Divine Dragon, the Heartstone was protected behind its dragonscales and dragonhalo—the feat of striking that, was the victory condition for this battlefield levied upon Clind and Roswaal.

Fortunately, there stood a prospect for breaking through those dragonscales. —The old white scar carved into its neck at the culmination of its deadly clash against the Sword Saint, Reid Astrea, was the one and only opening in that absolute defense.

Clind: “The fact that in the end, that which has become our means of grasping victory is a blow dealt by that insolent fellow, how truly aggravating. Infuriation.”

That Dragon-meat-eating freak was always going “Gimme yer damn tail”, or “Lemme eat yer damn guts” and so forth, before ultimately staking his attempt to carve out its heart. Just what in the world had he thought of his traveling companion on their journey?

At the end of it all, they had clashed in an attempt to sever the other from the thread of life—irrespective of the circumstances of the wound’s origin, there already existed a breach in the dragonscales.

Ergo, the path that would lead them to triumph, depended on whether or not Roswaal could surmount the palisade that was the dragonhalo.

Clind: “It is my duty to buy time for that purpose. Concentration.”

For four-hundred years, Roswaal had devoted himself to diligent studies. And now, he would be put to the test. —Standing witness to that ordeal extreme to the utmost, Clind once again reproached his troublesome position of “dragonkin”.

After all, Clind could not help but find the dazzling blaze that was Roswaal’s life, having commenced as but a seedling of unripeness, as something that ought to be esteemed, beloved, and cherished.

Volcanica: “—HAAHRAAN!!”

Harrowing the heavens, affrighting the lands, and imperiling the world, the roar of the Divine Dragon thundered far and wide.

The mighty voice incited quakes all throughout heaven and earth, rending the sky as its resonance took shape as a torrent that deluged Clind in his entirety. The bellow ravaged aught in its path, and swallowed by it, Clind’s body was also sundered, rupturing—before that could transpire, a voluminous cloud of mist emerged, and plunging right into it whilst clad in violaceous teravolts, the roar of the heavens quite literally dispersed into the mist.

Fine particles of water created passageways for the sound, immensely dampening the ruinous shockwave.

Roswaal: “—Al Trio.”

Above Clind’s head as he bolted through the mist, honing in upon the Dragon were tricolored radiances.

Red, blue, and green; the triadic varieties of light achieved a brilliant harmony, and in that instant, the swelling of illumination scorched the sky. —Wind and flame erupted on a scale of nigh a hundred meters, and the glacial inferno berserking through the storm enveloped the Dragon; hues and spectacle befitting the world’s end, painting the clear skies of the battlefield with the spitting image of hell.

Clind: “Sh—hk!”

Into that hellscape, Clind thrust himself forth, galloping through the air with lightning by his side.

The world’s demise, the degradation of the battlefield’s sky to hell—to survive even if it was a realm of such absolute death, was the mark of a powerful being who had lived in the age of the Witches that wielded their power as if to assert their very existences.

Volcanica: “—Welcome!!”

Reigning over the sky, woven with a chaotic, incoherent blend of colors as it was, the Divine Dragon bellowed sonorously as it demonstrated its pristine condition.

Behind the Dragon whilst it spread its wings, suspended in the air were colossal arms of crag construction, numbering twelve in total; the sturdy firsts ferociously burred as if a joyous gesture of welcoming, meeting Clind head-on.

Clind: “—Sealing Shackle: Unleash Second Stage.”

The moment before he crashed into the monolithic arms, Clind intensified the light emitted from the black horns on his head a stage further.

Purple lightning surging around his body, Clind temporarily attained a protection equivalent to that of the Dragon. Weaponizing that sturdiness, Clind wielded the entirety of his body as an indestructible armament capable of combatting the Divine Dragon's onslaught.

A flash of roaring thunder, a detonation of purple voltage that caused the heavens to cry out, pulverized the rocky arms forged by the Dragon, actualizing a volley of blows between the two who possessed far too great a difference in stature.

Clind: "You fight with reckless abandon. Exceedingly unthinkable for a Dragon. Creative ingenuity."

Volcanica: "We're both far past the stage of choosing a clean way of winning, yeah? The recent trend of all my adversaries, is that they're all damn strong guys who don't hesitate to come at me with unfair methods, you know?!"

As he shattered, one, two, three colossal arms, Clind nodded in affirmation to that response.

He was not fond of self-praise, but as one might expect, the one most proficient, most capable of wielding the dragonhusk of the Divine Dragon Volcanica to its fullest strength, was undoubtedly Clind. No matter how powerful the receptacle was, if the contents did not match, its true potential would not be fully exhibited.

To make up for that which was lacking, the usurper did not draw forth the true value of the dragonhusk, but rather, explored many varieties of delicate tricks and techniques that the actual Dragon would have never attempted.

And the scope of those delicate tricks, arriving at a domain bereft of all charm, began to drive Clind into a corner.

Volcanica: "—Aghh."

Unleashing a tempest of the twelve monolithic arms, its dragonclaws, and its tail, the Divine Dragon began to thunderously churn a maelstrom of light within the depths of its throat.

Kneaded in synchrony to that, was a torrent of flame and water being compressed in the Dragon’s oral cavity. Contrary to what common sense might dictate, the flame and water did not simply cancel each other out. Encasing a terrifying amount of heat and volume of water, with no place left for it to go, seeking an outlet to direct its power, erupting outward—that instant, Clind induced a shockwave of purple lightning to his fore, launching himself backwards to extract himself from the Divine Dragon’s line of fire.

Clind: “—Kuhh!”

That was prevented by the colossal arms of stone that had stretched out to surround him. As the bouldering palms moved to clasp him, even as he attempted to blow them away through a boisterous dance of thundering bombardments—

Volcanica: “—Get blasted away!”

—Following that, alongside the ear-piercing bellow, detonations began to erupt all across the battlefield, as if it was being hailed with strikes.

A wave of heat to scorch away aught that had been birthed, a wave of shock to rend away what was the very world, the onslaught of each granted Clind no method of escape, merely passing a surplus of divine punishment unto the fool who had dared to challenge the Dragon.

Clind: “…Hk.”

Clenching down on his molars firmly, Clind rescinded the bulwark of purple lightning that had clad his entire body. Instead, he promptly discharged voltage through his black horns, generating the maximum output of purple lightning as a vallum that rivalled the dragonhalo. Even still, supposing the attack were to have been taken directly, not even Clind would have been able to escape a fatal wound.

Indeed, if he had taken the attack directly—.

Roswaal: "—Al Quartet."

Vocalizing such, the one present to Clind's rear, past the scorched, colossal arms of stone that had crumbled beyond recognition, was Roswaal, performing an incantation of great magic.

Having taken flight into the sky by means of aviation magic, Roswaal had joined the fray of aerial combat between Clind and the Divine Dragon, invoking four attributes simultaneously against those tremendous detonations, a feat that cancelled them out entirely.

Volcanica: "Oi oi, you've gotta be kidding me…"

Faced with that reality, it was no wonder that even the Divine Dragon spilled a voice of astonishment.

The attack from the usurper just now harbored a destructive power mighty enough to wipe an entire city off the map, leaving no trace behind. For that to have been offset by the measure of man, having fully protected Clind on top of that, was a level of precision light-years beyond anything that could have been considered ordinary.

If there had been even just a single, slight miscalculation, it would have instead bolstered the Divine Dragon's attack, and quite possibly scorched both of them to ashes. It truly was a feat befitting divinity, threading the eye of a needle from a kilometer away.

Only, this could not be called a perfect victory.

Roswaal: "…I'm, beeeat~."

As such words feebly spilled out from Roswaal's lips, in a state of delirium, he lost control and began to fall head-first.

Clind: "Master! Haste."

Kicking off the air to catch up to the plummeting Roswaal, Clind gazed in wonder.

The mere aftershock of the offset detonation had torn Roswaal's body to shreds, and his right arm in particular had sustained tremendous damage; hideously charred to a red and black chunk of flesh, it was too painful to even look at.

Albeit Roswaal had mastered all manners of magic, the one and only thing he could not employ was healing magic. As for whether he could continue to fight whilst bearing such a wound, would be far too—

Volcanica: "Don't take this the wrong way, but Origin's waiting on me!"

Clind: "Kuh—hk!"

Clind embraced the severely wounded Roswaal in his arms, however, the Divine Dragon did not relax its onslaught.

Furling the wind in their wake, dragonwings became blades of light in fearsome approach, and violently discharging purple voltage, Clind bolted through the sky as though lightning, continuing to evade, evade, and evade. Whilst basking in the shame of having allowed Roswaal to sustain a wound, he pulverized the blades of wind with kicks, and catching the scything dragonwings with his body, thereupon did lightning fulminate—by the force of that impact, they were sent flying backwards.

Forcibly distancing himself, he restored his posture—that instant, the Dragon's tail came crashing down.

Clind: "—Hk."

Converting the impact of the discharge into rotational force, the Divine Dragon's tail struck down in a direct hit.

Even though he used his arm to protect their heads from the fatal blow, the force sent them hurtling straight towards the ground at full speed. Falling to the ground as they were, the inertia would be vigorous enough to dig their own graves for them, but—

Volcanica: "—And just to make sure of things…"

As Clind and Roswaal plummeted, the Divine Dragon spoke those words and inhaled a deep breath.

Amidst the combat where offense and defense alternated rapidly, any action that required charging time could prove fatal. Ergo, the full force of the Dragon's breath, a move kept sealed away save for the opening hand, was now unleashed.

Against the destruction inescapable by even his lightning dash, naught could be done. —By Clind.

Roswaal: "—Al Quintet."

With all of the strength having faded from his body, having entrusted Clind with all of the offensive and defensive combat, Roswaal invoked the greatest firepower that he had ever charged up.

—The activation of the perfected technique, manifested an enormous magic circle baling together five lights in the heavens above.

Fire, Water, Wind, Earth, and finally, Yang—that which coalesced these conflicting principles by means of overlapping rationality that surpassed human understanding, was a power of overwhelming destruction not permitted to exist anywhere but the outside of order. It clashed directly against the unleashed breath of the Divine Dragon—in that moment, all notions of sound and color were bereaved from the world.

Roswaal: "…"

The two unbridled powers contested, vividly tearing asunder the very boundary between heaven and earth.

Infernos raged ferociously, the sky froze over, the wind swirled into a vortex, the earth was vehemently exhumed, and all of it was amplified by light; five contradictory powers took the shape of great spires of illumination as the battlefield crumbled in a chain reaction.

The region that had been merely a craggy wasteland before the battle's commencement was now filled with the thunderous dance of light and sound, to the point that up could not be discerned from down; aught was consumed in a crucible of chaos.

Roswaal: "…"

In the sense of destroying the equilibrium of the world, that technique was already on a level which rivaled the numerous forbidden arts whose existences had been erased by Od Lagna. The reason why this had never had its existence extinguished as a forbidden art, was none other than because there had been nobody capable of using it to make it worth prohibiting.

Prior to this, the only ones who had ever materialized great magic—nay, hyper magic to this degree, were the Witch of Greed, Echidna, and the Original Magician, Myonmyon.

The hyper magic bordering on taboo was fired not as an arrow of "destruction", but as one of "negation".

Clind: "Master, truly you are… Hats off."

Just who could have ever believed that the spectacle of this cataclysmic upheaval was the proof of a lone man's devotion to his diligent studies?

The journey and footprints trodden by that personage, many would likely loathe and vilify its details as immoral, repudiating his way of being.

But, Clind would not repudiate him. Nor would he scorn him. He may have deserved scorn, but the impact that would stir in the heart upon witnessing something that surpassed all measure, was no different for humans or Dragons.

Only, Clind had been overcome with emotion. To think that a human could build something up to this extent.

—Clind dearly loved the potential of humans.

Born as weak, fragile, and imperfect beings, the question of what they might pursue, what they might desire, fascinated him to no end. From that perspective, Roswaal had nearly achieved the maximum score.

As far as Clind was aware, there existed nobody else who had continued to pathetically cling to such a distant possibility, ever struggling towards it, to the extent that Roswaal had.

—If one did not harbor any talent, they would have given up far sooner.

—If he had been a chosen existence like the Sword Saint, he would have reached this point without suffering to this extent.

Having been neither of those, the only quality Roswaal possessed was a tenacity beyond all normality.

For that reason, Clind had revered his way of being, affirmed his path, and lent him his strength.

Clind: “That prayer, yet remains shining brightly within me. —Vow.”

Speaking of his vow in such a manner, Clind gently laid Roswaal onto the ground.

Shedding tears of blood, the matchless magician convulsed throughout his entire body as a result of overusing his powerful Gate; the reward for his meritorious deed was an all-too-dreary bed of sand, but he would just have to bear with it for the time being.

—After all, having basked in the magician’s apotheosis, the Divine Dragon was ever unscathed, thriving up in the heavenly skies.

4

—And thus, reality had caught up with Roswaal, whose life was teetering on the brink.

???: “Five seconds, Master. Report.”

That which greeted the return of his scattered consciousness was an exceptionally calm voice.

However, he did not seem to blame Clind for that. If he had five seconds, the Divine Dragon should have been able to kill Roswaal fifty times over. —There was word of them having a "no-killing" rule, so he supposed that they would crush his limbs and freeze his wounds for later in order to render him incapable of fighting, or something like that.

Because if it were Roswaal, he would have gone that far in order to render someone incapable of fighting.

Clind had protected Roswaal from that damage, splendidly fulfilling his role as the vanguard.

The issue was—

Roswaal: "My poor display, huh?"

It was the pathetic feeling of having jumped into the battle between Dragon and dragonkin, and arriving on the verge of death so quickly. It was not that he had underestimated the situation, but he had thought he could accomplish more.

Roswaal: "…"

Thanks to Petra's struggle to assume custody of the Witch Factor herself, Roswaal's preparation was spread across the battlefield which the Divine Dragon was drawn into, and he had performed in what was probably the greatest magical battle of his lifetime.

He could say that he had not fought a battle like this since he had faced the Warlock of Tristitia alongside Clind. Simply looking at the results alone, it was not purely a matter of the Divine Dragon being stronger than the Warlock of Tristitia.

Either way—

Roswaal: "…We need… to change… our conditions for victory."

Even now, Clind might still be fighting, believing that Roswaal would recover, but he knew his own limits better than anyone. His strength was depleted, his body was a complete mess, and even his life force had been largely whittled away by his intense consumption of Mana.

Even the numerous great magics he had prepared were not enough to pierce the dragonhalo of the Divine Dragon. It had been impossible even with the simultaneous activation of five different types of Al-class magic. If any possibility existed, it was in the simultaneous activation of Al-class magic of all six attributes, but given that such magic had never been successful even under perfect conditions, there was no way it would be successful under the current circumstances.

A sensation like his brain was boiling, and pain as if all the blood in his body was flowing backwards were indications that the greatest Gate of his family, selected for across Roswaal's four-hundred years, was on the verge of breaking.

It was pointless for him to continue any further. If what he had prepared could not do the trick, he would lower the hurdle for what he aimed to achieve and accomplish at least the minimum required of him.

Originally, the goal of this battle had been to prevent Aldebaran's plans, which they could achieve if they could just continue to keep the Divine Dragon pinned down here.

Thus, he would be clever and adaptable while devoting himself to supporting Clind as he continued to resist here.

However—

???: "Roswaal, you shouldn't push yourself too hard, but it's a reeeally important role. So, good luck!"

???: "Roswaal-sama, I apologize for the inconvenience until now. Finally, we can repay your kindness to us. Together, we can help that person… Subaru-kun!"

???: "It's what the Master said he would do, so please don't change your mind… I hate the Master, but I really believe he wouldn't lose to anyone else."

???: “Roswaal-sama, may fortune in battle be upon you. —And please, do enjoy yourself.”

Roswaal: “…Oya?”

Being clever and adaptable while devoting himself to supporting Clind—that was what he ought to have done.

But the next thing he knew, Roswaal was standing on unsteady feet, cradling his right arm that had been reduced to a horrible state.

Roswaal: “…”

It was strange. He had intended to fight sneakily, not in the manner of the grand magicians Roswaal had admired, but rather by using the underhanded means of a mediocre magician hungry for victory, and yet.

Why, for what reason, had he risen to his feet?

Surely he did not mean to say that he had not given up? Even though that which he had prepared had been ineffective? Even though he had never once achieved results beyond his ability?

???: “—What, you stood back up? I had intended to take on the role, however…”

Roswaal was so surprised by his own actions that the unexpected voice did not surprise him whatsoever.

Roswaal: “…”

The owner of that voice slowly stepped upon the desolate earth, as if depicting the demise of the world, and stood next to the unsteady and wavering Roswaal.

However—

Roswaal: “Sorry, but I don’t even have the strength to move my head… You’re too short, so I can’t tell who you are, but this is faaar~ from a role for a child.”

???: “Who exactly are you calling a child?! You knave, you are truly an infuriating man…!”

The other person raised his voice in full earnestness at Roswaal’s half joking, half serious words, and his unseen form gradually lifted up and entered the edge of Roswaal’s field of view. It was not that the other party had grown taller. He had made the ground swell with magic, using it as an improvised step-stool to match their eye levels.

It was truly a silly waste of magic, yet he did not hate it.

Indifferent to Roswaal’s inner thoughts, the black-robed, green-haired dwarf who had done so crossed his arms, and—

???: “I shall engrave who I am anew, so that you shall not forget, you knave. —The Gray, Ezzo Cadner, shall conquer the Divine Dragon before you!”

Vic.1128

Chapter 49:
Magician

1

—Fulminations of purple lightning cavorted, and amidst the sky of the battlefield, Clind dashed around through a full range of motion in every conceivable direction, free from any and all obstructions.

Volcanica: "—Haahraan!!"

As if to chase the light of that thunderous blast, dragonclaws stirred the air as if a storm, ripping the empty airspace asunder each time they did so, and the resultant vacuous waves shut off the dragonkin's escape routes.

His options dwindling by the moment, Clind restrained the Dragon's aim to himself, and exercising caution such to ensure that its shockwaves did not reach the surface below, he maneuvered through the heavens with both prudence and boldness.

Clind: "You have managed to exceed my expectations? Wonder."

Whilst evading, sidestepping, and cancelling out the Dragon's tyranny head on, each and every one of its blows capable of reshaping the terrain, Clind could not help but admire the usurper's handling of the dragonhusk.

As mentioned previously, the usurper had failed to achieve a perfect control over the Divine Dragon's dragonhusk. —It was something akin to granting a newborn baby the body of the Sword Saint. To begin with, it was an unreasonable matter.

Ergo, the avaricious approach taken by the usurper, electing to use even the dragonhusk as a means to seize victory rather than drawing out its true merits as the Divine Dragon, was something that impressed Clind, further increasing his reverence for the strength possessed by weak humans.

However, when the battle began to surpass his expectations and drag on, he realized. —Far exceeding Clind's expectations, the usurper had adapted to the dragonhusk, all while still continuing to grow.

Clind: "I heard that you had also contended with the Sword Saint and Sword Demon to reach this point. Understanding."

Even while possessing the Divine Dragon's dragonhusk, the usurper had accreted battles against powerful individuals who could not be so easily defeated, and had thus drawn out a rather powerful degree of its potential as a dragon. From the brilliance of the dragonscales and dragonhalo that defended its Heartstone, that could be perceived overwhelmingly.

Clind: "The potential of humans… Heartfelt devotion."

To boast as if they were perfected existences, just how comical was the way of being of Dragons?

For what reason had the Dragons, as the strongest of lifeforms, lorded over the surface as if they owned the place? —The answer to that lay in their massive, unapologetic footsteps, so Clind believed. They asserted themselves with might, such that nobody would be able to avert their attention from them. Such that they could not be ignored. That was what had made it look as if the Dragons were the most important beings who resided on the surface.

Hence, when they lost their place upon these lands, the Dragons had disappeared beyond the Great Waterfall.

Clind: "…"

Although he knew it to be an inappropriate sentimentality, glimpses of the past flashed through the dragonkin's mind.

Heavenly skies were rent asunder into numerous rifts, amidst gigantic crags and lumps of ice that heaved up roaring winds as they flew past each other, slipping through the accumulation of shockwaves numbering ten, twenty, Clind's mind went to four-hundred years ago—he envisioned the figures of his brethren, flying away as they were ousted from these lands.

That day, those who had remained in these lands were either ones who had strayed from their weyrs or who were eccentrics; the Dragons that had fled beyond the Great Waterfall were considered to be in possession of sound thinking and judgment, but if Clind were to be asked, he would give the opposite answer.

The reason why Dragons were the ultimate lifeforms, was because their lives had been designed to be the most strong. In that case, a Dragon must always keep learning in order to never relinquish that seat, and must always continue to grow.

Was the fact that dragonkin had been conceived not proof in itself of that way of being belonging to the Dragons?

Clind: “Above all, are they truly not aware of it? —Snicker.”

Channelling the purple electricity surging around him into thunderous discharge, Clind pulverized the clods of rock and ice tessellating the sky in the realm of hundreds, and concentrated the Dragon’s attention upon himself, before looking down at the ground.

And present there—

Ezzo: “—The dragonscales and the dragonhalo, so those were the Divine Dragon’s contrivances to render your trump cards powerless, knave?”

Roswaal: “Rendered powerless, that is a bit of an upsetting way to put it. I would rather you described it as having been rendered ineffective, or rendered harmless, you knooow~.”

Ezzo: “Is this really the time to be finicky over such worthless things…?! The simultaneous invocation of differing attributes, was that an application of the “Two Attribute Intersection Theorem”? But, if you mix in a third variety, then how do you keep the convergence pressure of fire and wind under control?”

Roswaal: “It is rather elementary. Simply affix that convergence pressure as the nucleus. It is possible to correct for the imbalance birthed in the technique from the mutual interference by applying fire if the third element is water, and applying wind if it is earth.”

Ezzo: “You’re saying to make use of the helical interference of attributes?! Absurd, if attributes of inverse phases were to clash, the technique would cancel itself out, and it would easily exceed the critical deviation of the Gate… extreme compression, is it?!”

Roswaal: “Ho, I did not expect that you would be able to arrive at that conclusion on your own merits. From how it appears, you have formulated a rather novel technique, even though you seem to be self-taught… no, upon closer inspection, is it not founded upon a technique left behind by my House two generations prior?”

Ezzo: “Ngh…!!”

Roswaal: “By now, “Equilibrious Circulation”, which views the Mana flowing through one’s body as a torus, already ought to have been discarded as worthless in the mainstream… the materials on that subject were lost quite a long time ago, but, do not tell me, you…?”

Ezzo: “I-it takes a good amount of resolve in order to pursue the path of magic! To begin with, the book was covered in dust at a street stall! I discovered “Synthesis Circulation” from there, dramatically improving the efficiency of Mana usage in the invocation of spells!”

Roswaal: “A little audacious after stealing someone’s theory, areeen’t~ you?”

Ezzo: “I’ll admit that it served as the impetus for my ideas, but improvements and revisions are a constant for advancement! In that case, are you trying to say that you’ve never received any training or education from anyone, knave?!”

Roswaal: “…”

Ezzo: “Don’t fall silent all of a sudden! In the first place, even if I concede some ground here for the sake of argument, it was not even you, knave, it was the accomplishment of your forebearer, the Madam Roswaal J. Mathers!”

Roswaal: “Though, she was not too dissimilar from myself, or something like that. —Let us get back on topic. I had never thought of “Synthesis Circulation”. If you understand the main issue with the “Two Attribute Intersection Theorem”, then I suppose I have no need to explain why “Tripedal Centroid Control” is ill-suited to “Multi-Attribute Intersection Theorem”?”

Ezzo: “Are you trying to make a fool of me? Each attribute added to a simultaneous invocation multiplies the disturbance of helical interference. Even if “Tripedal Centroid Control” can reach a simultaneous invocation of three attributes, any more than that would be… no, just earlier you demonstrated control over five attributes at once, knave. How in the world did you perform that?”

Roswaal: “I see. So you want to hear the answer. Very well, I shall tell you. I believe the true pleasure of magic lies in exploring one’s own curiosity and the essence of abyssal enigmas, but since your passion is too shallow for that—”

Ezzo: “Wait wait wait wait, be quiet…! Five attributes, helical interference, extreme compression… no, that technique was using “Equilibrious Circulation”… that’s it! It’s “Tripedal Centroid Control” superimposed in parallel!”

Roswaal: “—!”

Ezzo: “In other words, you performed the simultaneous invocation of three attributes through “Tripedal Centroid Control” twice at the same time, and superimposed them before deployment! Among the second set of three attributes, you utilized the invoked Yang attribute to support your own Gate, and by fixing the nucleus as the convergence pressure yielded from the helical interference, you formulated the extreme compression between the three and two attributes remaining, resulting in that culmination…”

Roswaal: “Yes, yes that’s exactly right! That was the breakthrough that proved the existence of the “Fivefold Resonance Point”!”

Ezzo: “Are you stupid?! It only takes a single thousandth of a single instant of a single maneuver! If anything even so slightly shifts out of place in any part of the process, it would trigger a helical breakdown and spell the end of everything! Knave, that would cause a second Agzadd Canyon to form with you as its center, you know?!”

Roswaal: “But, such a thing did not happen. —That is the towering, distant summit of this blasphemous path.”

Ezzo: “…”

Roswaal: “Does it scare you? Ezzo Cadner-kun?”

Ezzo: “Yeah, it’s terrifying. That my own heart desires such a thing, Roswaal L. Mathers.”

—Indeed, the two magicians on the surface clashed with their diligent studies, sharpening one another.

Clind: “What remarkably lively faces. Beyond expectation.”

There was a role he had been entrusted with from the start. Hence, Clind gladly undertook the frontline in the battle against the Dragon, cladding himself in purple voltage as they violently clashed.

But, even if he had not been entrusted with that role, Clind, following his own convictions, would have likely chosen to wield purple lightning against his own former dragonhusk like this.

The way that humans sharpened and polished each other, would inevitably give rise to a brand new “something”.

Unmistakably, that was the desire of Clind—the dragonkin of the Divine Dragon Volcanica, who had elected to be left behind in these lands, thus being deemed a heretic by its brethren who did not recognize its new sense of values.

After all, that was the stoutest pillar of the mentality that would never accept the Witch Factor of Tristitia, which demanded the stifling of potential as compensation.

Roswaal did not know much about the one who was standing alongside him, Ezzo Cadner.

He had heard the name. As personnel who had recently joined the Felt Camp, his capabilities quickly gained him a key position within the Camp responsible for internal affairs; such was Roswaal's understanding.

For the most part, there had also been some information saying that he was a magician, but with it having been unknown who he apprenticed and studied under, he was commonly seen as a mock magician operating privately, and since he was in fact self-taught, that perception was not very far off the mark.

However, that perception of him as a mock magician was overturned upon coming face to face with the real Ezzo, and laying eyes upon the theories that his magic were formulated upon. —He was the real deal.

Thus, mutually understanding each other as the real deal, there was no need to exchange many words.

Ezzo: "Rest for a bit to catch your breath. I will be needing you to push yourself once more."

As Ezzo spoke those words, he hopped down from the foothold he had made for himself to stand at eye level with Roswaal, before taking a step forth towards the battlefield and gazing up towards the sky.

Ezzo: "…"

With the successive firings of great magic and hyper magic, further layered with the clash between Dragon and dragonkin, the stagnated Mana was dramatically perturbed, and the sky where blue had stretched out overhead was transformed into abnormal weather conditions of rainbow-hued flickerings. Amidst that scene, yet chaining were the innumerable fulminations of purple lightning as the dragonkin dashed through the sky, ever engaged in solo combat.

Even after Roswaal had fallen, unable to accomplish anything, Clind remained performing his role to the fullest—

Ezzo: “For what reason is he fighting alone? You seem to have the wrong idea, knave.”

Roswaal: “…What did you say?”

Ezzo: “You mean to suggest that a magician ought never consort with others? Nay, it is in harmony where their true worth lies!”

As Roswaal widened his eyes, before him Ezzo spoke those words, countless spheres of water floating in his vicinity.

Contained within each of those water spheres were numerous fragments of the boulders that had fallen down; at once, they all ascended up in one swift motion—sent towards the battlefield where Clind was vehemently clashing against the Divine Dragon.

Roswaal: “That is—”

Excessive, or rather, meaningless; in such a manner did Roswaal grasp Ezzo’s intent.

It was a simple defense of the water attribute, nevertheless, he was impressed by that ability to easily control a number nigh on a hundred; however, that degree of water spheres would fail to even draw the attention of the Dragon, even if they smashed an entire boulder into it.

Rather, they could even spoil the tactics of Clind as he contended against the Divine Dragon by himself.

Ezzo: “I’ll say it once more, Roswaal. —You have the wrong idea, knave.”

Ezzo’s declaration, and the spectacle that ensued, took Roswaal’s breath away.

The countless spheres of water he had elevated, had not been for the purposes of attacking the Divine Dragon directly. —The water spheres and rocky fragments burst asunder from the fulminations of purple lightning, and having thus gained a foothold as he revolved through the skies, Clind accelerated a degree further.

As Clind accelerated, the water spheres guiding his path were deployed across a vast area, granting the dragonkin launchpads to make his attacks sharper, weightier, and more vehement as they bore into the Divine Dragon's dragonscales.

The thunderous crackles and shockwaves were delivered back down to the surface, and Ezzo continued speaking to Roswaal as they basked in the wind.

Ezzo: "Certainly, that individual has the ability to engage in aerial combat by himself. But per my judgement, the original usage of that magical light is not suited to such purposes, and rather, is meant to be an astonishing defensive ability. Since he is a powerful individual of such mastery, he is utilizing it in a different way in order to fight, but if the dissipation of that power is set aside, it might be incomparable to its intrinsic might."

Roswaal: "—. But, if you create footholds within the sky, it would instead make it more difficult to scatter its aim. Would the advantage of Clind being able to freely kick off the sky not then perish?"

Ezzo: "Do you take him for a novice incapable of switching between them as necessary? In that case, knave, it is not just consideration in which you are lacking, but an eye for people as well."

Roswaal: "…"

Ezzo: "Roswaal, to fight alongside someone does not mean to neglect considering all matters, and merely have faith in the other person. You entrust what you can entrust, and compensate what you can compensate. With your way of doing things, knave, even if you can achieve two-hundred by having a hundred and a hundred that do not get in each other's way, you will never achieve a hundred and a hundred that elevate each other into a thousand."

As he spoke of his opinion, Ezzo did not slacken from providing backup to the battle overhead.

This was a rocky wasteland with plenty of boulders to send up. The water spheres multiplied with enough vigor to permeate the sky, so even if Clind expended them as footholds faster than the eye could see, the quantity of that multiplication far overpowered it.

Volcanica: “Tch-, just when I thought things were getting too clever, turns out it’s Sensei-san?!”

Having located Ezzo as the source of the footholds being utilized, the Divine Dragon roared in anger. Crushing a hundred of the water spheres in one fell swoop of its dragonclaws, it took aim at the magicians upon the ground, and unleashed its breath—

Clind: “I do not advise looking away, have a look at this. Demonstration.”

Shooting straight up into the Dragon’s jaw from directly below were the two legs of Clind after soaring upwards. The unreleased breath was thus detonated within the Dragon’s oral cavity, and some of its fangs could be seen flying out from the impact.

Volcanica: “You, little…hk!”

Reeling back from its own explosion, the atmosphere surrounding the Divine Dragon was rapidly filled with a distorted, warped, unstable yet mighty and authentic magical light; the Dragon was attempting to invoke the great magic it had learned through observation.

Even if Clind, who could use purple lightning as a barrier, and the Divine Dragon, who could entrust its defenses to its dragonhalo, could withstand it, if it reached the surface, Roswaal and Ezzo would not stand a chance.

Roswaal: “—In that case, the only option is to have it detonate in the sky.”

Fortunately, in addition to the Mana that had been discharged at random, there happened to be countless water spheres of magic founded upon “Synthesis Circulation” that he had been carefully observing next to him. —Interrupting the formulation of that magic, he overwrote its efficacy.

Ezzo: “You knave, that’s my magic you know?!”

Roswaal: “Magic does not belong to anyone. Paths forwards are constantly being opened. —A teaching of my mentor.”

That instant, Ezzo’s control over the water spheres was stolen, and they were bundled together whilst taking in the surrounding Mana to achieve extreme compression—the great magic that the Divine Dragon had attempted to construct had been injected with self-interpretation, deliberately thwarting its completion.

Induced was the helical breakdown that Ezzo had feared—the sky that had fractured several times during this battle, once more underwent a grand explosion of collapsing aurora.

Waves of scorching heat and zenith cold blew past them in turns, and the crags present in the sky melted, then froze, then shattered. Amidst the catastrophe, lightning scorched all of those remnants to naught, and the wind pressure blew the ashes and dust particles several kilometers away.

Ezzo: “Are you out of your mind, knave?! Your ally there would have disintegrated along with it?!”

Roswaal: “But, you protected him. —This is the harmony you were speaking of, riiight~?”

Closing his yellow eye in a wink, Roswaal silenced the angered Ezzo.

In truth, as Clind was engulfed in the enormous explosion at high altitude, it had been Ezzo’s skills that enclosed him in innumerable layers of water, bestowing him the maximum defense from that destructive firepower.

Roswaal thought that if it was Ezzo, the latter would have correctly guessed his intentions, and performed that act. If the roles had been reversed, due to the differences in their talents and consideration, such a thing would absolutely not have taken shape; truly, it was the right man in the right place.

As expected, Roswaal was an inhuman villain. —Only, he was merely one who still had room to improve, to revise, and to advance.

Clind: “Nevertheless, this deed makes me question the Master’s sanity. Brute.”

With that, Roswaal felt like he could hear Clind voicing complaints after having averted a crash thanks to Ezzo’s quick-wittedness, but being reproached whilst confronted with that ice-cold face, and all other such matters, would need to wait until this battle was concluded.

Thus—

Roswaal: “Ezzo Cadner-kun.”

Ezzo: “—. What, Roswaal L. Mathers?”

Called out by his name, it was amusing how Ezzo called back to him as if in opposition. Concealing those sentiments of his beneath the makeup that had been ruined by blood and sweat, Roswaal sighed.

Then, once again training his gaze upon the Gray, Ezzo Cadner—

Roswaal: “—I wish to have you assist me. For something that has not once transpired in this world, the genesis of a brand new magic.”

Recognizing it as a cowardly thing for even himself to say, Roswaal took the offensive. —After all, those who gave themselves to the path of magic, could never even hope to resist such an allure.

3

—In the midst of constructing a technique, Ezzo Cadner was on the verge of shedding tears in spite of himself.

Ezzo: “Stupid stupid stupid, these foolish lacrimal glands. Cease your operation now, just slack off.”

Reprimanding the functions of his own body, he stiffened his cheeks to hold back the tears.

Ezzo despised slacking off. This was because the dwarf race was not endowed with outstanding physical abilities or Gates, and many of his brethren were required to put in much more strenuous effort than other races in order to accomplish their goals. The sole grace of the dwarf race was that they had a tendency to be bestowed Divine Protections, but unlike his fellow member of the Felt Camp, Camberley, Ezzo had also lost out on that lottery, and was easily identifiable as a have-not.

Ezzo despised slacking off. This was because he was forced to live under stricter conditions than most others—it was not. To use his dwarven ancestry as an excuse, and hold it in contempt saying “Ah, it can’t be helped”, was quite frankly unbearable to him.

If Ezzo failed to reach the goals he set for himself, it would not be because he was a dwarf.

If one allowed themself to make an excuse even once in their life, they would fall into the trap of sloth and neglect in the blink of an eye, setting themselves up to live in a slackened and unproductive spoiled manner; Ezzo knew this well.

Rather, that had been the case for his elder brothers and sisters. Ezzo was the youngest child of ten siblings, and all of his other siblings had received Divine Protections, rejoicing in the lives they lived fully dependent upon them.

He would not say it was a bad thing. Those were the lives of his elder brothers and sisters. He wanted to say it was bad, but he would not. He could bear it.

Merely, he could not bear to allow that for his own life.

Hence, when Ezzo Cadner discovered a book of magic covered in dust stored deep within a box at a street vendor, he vowed to dedicate his life to the deep inspiration it gave him, and to never make excuses no matter what.

Ezzo: “You’re the same, Roswaal… I can tell by looking at you.”

While he occupied the seat of the Kingdom’s Magician of the Court, and had multiple “colored” titles under his belt for having mastered certain magical attributes to their extremes, Roswaal did not provide guidance, nor did he ever consort with others. Even if he was skilled as a Margrave, his position as a magician had been something bought through his parentage and political strength. —Having doubted Roswaal in such a manner, thus seeking to challenge him, was the unforgettable dark past of Ezzo.

But, in reality, upon witnessing the efficiency of construction in the magic Roswaal was deploying, and the beauty of the techniques he was materializing, Ezzo felt ashamed from the bottom of his heart.

Ezzo and Roswaal were of the same generation.

And, Ezzo had conceitedly believed that among those in similar age to him, there were none who had endeavored as much as he had. Having devoted the entirety of the time he had lived, he had believed he had touched upon part of just what magic exactly was. But that was not the case at all. —Between Roswaal and Ezzo, in both their research and devotion to their studies of magic, it almost seemed as if there existed a difference of over one-hundred years.

A difference in talents, a difference in race, a difference in births, he would not credit it to any such thing, it was an absolute truth—hence, Ezzo Cadner was on the verge of spilling tears of joy.

Ezzo: “—Hk.”

That there was someone who had endeavored even more than him, standing in the realm he longed for, he was glad.

Understanding, reverence, and gratitude all pounded through Ezzo’s heart, causing him, who hated slacking off more than anything, to command his lacrimal glands to slacken for the first time in his life.

With such sentiments in his chest, Ezzo once more focused his attention on demonstrating all the studies he had accreted.

When it came to magic, it was required to firmly envision the result that would occur. Thus, it was tantamount to an act that would lay everything bare about a person: what they thought, what they desired, and what they wished for.

Hence, there were no lies in magic. —By witnessing someone's magic, everything about that person could be understood.

Ezzo: "—Hey, you understand, right, Roswaal?"

Had those words actually been produced as a sound? Or perhaps, was it merely a deception produced by abusing his Gate more than ever before, concentrating to the point of his life eroding away?

Roswaal: "…Ahh, I do understand, Ezzo Cadner-kun."

However, contrary to his heart that doubted if it had actually been an illusion or auditory hallucination, there was indeed a reply.

The extreme heightening of Mana shifted the scenery to white, and despite being unable to hear even the purple lightning vehemently booming in order to protect them, their presences were so close to each other that it felt as though even their heartbeats could be heard.

Through a pathway of magic being weaved, the two magicians laid themselves bare, and their consciousnesses intertwined.

The days Roswaal had accreted, the fruits of his wholehearted research, and the time in which he had continued to walk by his lonesome, aiming for the summit with none ever managing to catch up to him, was imparted.

As a result of taking things too far, people would end up being isolated, regardless of their wishes. Roswaal, too, had remained by his lonesome.

But, swearing on the tears he had not allowed to fall, Ezzo had something he needed to say to Roswaal.

Ezzo: “Knave, as for how far you intend to venture all by yourself, my current self knows not. But, no matter how many people you attempt to distance yourself from, I alone shall remain different.”

If it was a combination of effort and diligent study that had delivered him to where he was, then Ezzo was the same—nay, he could go even further,

Ezzo: “No matter how much you like being isolated, even if you elect to die by your lonesome, even if you decide to venture to a place where nobody else can ever reach, I alone will come to sink my teeth into you, knave.”

While he might not have understood the feeling of wanting to give up, Ezzo did understand the feeling of wanting to lament.

Simply doing everything he could to the fullest, before he knew it, there no longer remained anyone in his vicinity. —There was nobody who would wish to believe such a thing was their own fault, after all.

Ezzo: “The titles of those who have mastered certain attributes to the extremes: Red and Green, as well as Yellow, are all appointed to you. Since the seat of Blue has been bestowed to Mr. Felix Argyle, only the seats of White and Black still remain vacant. —Do you understand what that means?”

Roswaal: “…”

Ezzo: “Do you know what it is that they call me? The Gray, Ezzo Cadner. And just what colors do you think gray is made of? —Roswaal, I am the one who will reach you.”

Hence, the same gratitude that Ezzo Cadner had experienced, was now offered to the great magician.

Ezzo: “—This path you walk, knave, is not one you walk alone.”

4

Color had perished from the sky a while ago now.

Blue had vanished from the clear azure above, leaving only a faded curtain of ash-white, and the merit of the atmosphere itself had waned, ephemeral in nature as it slowly vanished.

By a streak of light was that faded sky rent asunder. As Clind bolted forth with a belt of purple lightning trailing behind him, no longer could it be described as “jumping”, it was a force akin to kicking the fabric of the sky open.

In opposition was the colossus protected by dragonscales and dragonhalo, the dragonhusk soaring through the air with a faint glow—each time the dragonclaws flashed, the empty sky was cleaved open, the empty rifts inundating the dragonkin alongside thunderous crackling.

Clind: “…”

There was not even the leeway to utter a voice. Merely, purple lightning roared out.

Following that, with a beat of dragonwings, unleashed into the resultant gust of wind were countless orbs of light, gleaming in the sky. They studded the gray sky as if stardust, carving out ferocious paths as they closed in on Clind, nearer, and nearer. —With a flash of roaring thunder, the downpour of several hundreds of light rays were impaled, and innumerable shimmers bestowed color to the desolate sky. The shockwaves from the explosions were all diffused upwards, not allowing even a single star fragment to reach the two magicians on the ground.

Volcanica: “…”

The subsequent instant, in the truest sense possible, all present bore witness to the radiance of a star up in the heavens above.

From far beyond the faded sky, falling at the behest of a tremendous force of attraction, starlight plummeted down towards the ground in a straight line—hesitation did not last for even the blink of an eye.

Clind: “—Hk!”

Violet voltage surged all the more vehemently, and the chaining of thunderous fulminations elevated the dragonkin to the sky in which a star was falling.

Volcanica: “—HAAHRAAN!!”

The Divine Dragon’s breath was unleashed as a torrent of white heat that scorched the sky, however, the brunt of it was not directed at either the dragonkin in the heavens above, nor at the magicians down on the ground; rather, it soared towards a land over yonder.

The rupturing purple lightning and the Dragon’s breath intermingled with the star that had been shattered across the edges of the sky, intensely illuminating the dulled hues of heaven and earth—

???: “—Al Sextet.”

An incantation quaked the horizon, and the heavenly skies baited their breath.

The Mana that gave this world form was bestowed with roles of six varying colors, and the power let loose began to intermingle, blending together. The interference that would have normally caused an instantaneous breakdown instead birthed a unique rhythm, utilizing the colorless world itself as an intermediary, a beautiful torus was brought to fruition.

Before long, the torrent of six colors coalesced as one, becoming a pillar that severed the boundary between heaven and earth.

The pillar of six hues did not incline to any one color in particular, rather the very principle known as “magic” merely elected its own color for the aurora of its manifestation, a light pillar that returned everything to a power engulfing all.

—Captured at the heart of that light pillar, was the colossal form of the Divine Dragon.

The resisting claws, wings, and breath, all were engulfed by nihil, and as the Dragon’s power was converted into fuel for the magic, the light pillar grew wider, emboldening it to shine even more radiantly.

The light stretched to reach the heavens, perforating the sky bereft of clouds, illuminating far beyond the highest layer of the atmosphere, casting its brilliant light even further beyond the horizon. For a moment, the laws of reality, of heaven and earth, were written anew.

—That was something that neither the Original Magician, nor the Witch of Greed, had managed to accomplish ever since the systemization known as magic had first commenced, an absolute miracle made manifest.

Volcanica: "—Ah."

In a world from which sound had vanished, that which had resounded all too unreliably, was meager praise when compared to the events that had transpired.

But, it was enough to arrive at conviction. —Here, the Divine Dragon's dragonhalo had shattered.

Thus—

Clind: "—Sealing Shackle: Unleash Third Stage."

Sundering the aether and scorching the land, the six attributes maintained equilibrium to form a pillar, the beacon at the center of the world. And the sole thing to pierce that maelstrom of aurora, was the lightning teeming with purple hues that came crashing down from the heavens.

As if an iron meteorite that had broken off from the star, it bolted down from across the sky whilst lightning surged around its body. Legs explosively kicking off the air, it acted as a supreme arrow seeking to pierce a single target.

Its aim was the reverse scale. —The sole weak point carved into the Divine Dragon's neck, the ant-sized hole in the armor that boasted an absolute defense. Engulfed by the pillar of light and stripped of its dragonhalo, that was the final barrier that stood on the path to reaching the Dragon’s Heartstone.

Clind: “You have my gratitude. —Gratitude.”

As if a comet with purple lightning trailing behind it, he firmly drove his fist forward, shattering both the sound barrier, and the protection of the dragonscales.

The brilliance of the pillar and the torrent of purple lightning overlapped, and as the impact quaked the empty sky, the sound of shattering was accompanied by a strip of light that dashed through the Dragon’s entire body.

The resolute strike entwined with the zenith miracle of magic never before seen throughout history, and bored down to the deepest depths housed within the Divine Dragon’s dragonhusk, finally striking the Heartstone that slumbered therein.

V!c.H2o

Volcanica: “…”

Perforated by the definite blow, the Divine Dragon spread its wings mid-air and slowly looked down at the surface. Acknowledging those tiny existences that barely clung to life present there, the Dragon slashed the air as it brought its claws up to its own head. —As if out of habit, reaching its fingers towards the metal fixtures on the helmet it expected to be wearing.

Volcanica: “Tch-, how pathetic… To end up like this even while having such a leg up, I can’t even… blame… the stars…”

Indeed, in annoyance, divorced from all the solemness befitting the Divine Dragon, cursing out in such an excessively banal manner, the absolute being that had dominated the heavenly skies was pulled by gravity, plummeting towards the ground.

Tearing through the empty sky whilst dragging the flickering vestiges of light with it, alongside thunderous noise, it came crashing down.

—That marked the conclusion against the usurper, who had stolen the dragonhusk of the Divine Dragon Volcanica.

Bonus Short Stories

The Land of Nascent Wolves:
Undead Busters IV
(LQ AI Translation)

1

Flop: “—In short, dear sister! To embody how the Vollachian Empire ought to be from here on out, your work is going to be hugely important! This is a job that’ll go down in history!”

Medium: “I dunno what you’re sayin’, but that sounds awesome, big bro!”

The back-and-forth of booming voices resounding through that imperial chamber hardly seemed fitting for the Crystal Palace of the Imperial Capital of Lupugana, the very axis of the Land of the Sword Wolf that was the Vollachian Empire.

The Crystal Palace, famed for its brilliance and hailed as the most beautiful castle in the world, had always been said to owe that splendor to the chill, sharp air, and to the unrelenting tension that never slackened—a discipline that extended to even the lowliest private.

Precisely because of that, for someone to fill the Crystal Palace with such restless clamor—other than Cecilus Segmunt, the Blue Lightning—was quite unexpected.

And on top of that, it was the Empress whom Vincent Vollachia, the “Wise Emperor,” had welcomed.

Eight years had passed since his ascension to the throne. Lauded throughout his reign as an exceptional ruler with remarkable ability, Vincent had until now never taken a consort. With the Empire still bearing deep wounds from the recent Great Disaster and the people’s hearts unsettled, their attention was fixed on the presence of this new Empress—

Flop: “Which is to say, let me repeat myself: right now you’re in a place where everyone around you is really watching you! With that in mind, tell your big brother one more time what you were doing just now!"

Medium: "Sure thing! Sittin' still in some frilly dress just ain't my style, so I did training and mock battles with all the soldiers at the castle! I won a whole bunch!"

Letting out a drawn-out "Hmmm~!", Flop O'Connell faced his sister, Medium O'Connell—the Empress—who had answered with a vigorous grin and a crisp thumbs-up.

Flop: "Medium!"

Flop: "Pass! Right now His Excellency the Emperor-kun is laying the groundwork to change all sorts of things, but the faith in the Empire's iron-blooded precepts is still deeply rooted!"

Medium: "Ehehe~ So, whaddaya mean by that?"

Flop: "It means it's really admirable for you to show that you've actually got the skills to back it up!"

Medium: "Woooh, heck yeah, big bro! I'm gonna hone my skills even more!"

Beaming as he returned her thumbs-up, Flop heard her vow aloud to redouble her efforts.

Incidentally, during the drill Medium had joined, the soldiers had received a direct imperial decree—"Do not go easy on the Empress"—so the results she'd achieved were by no means the product of favoritism.

Flop: "In truth, with His Excellency the Emperor-kun rushing about dealing with the aftermath of the Great Disaster, it would hardly be strange if there were those who took aim at his position and plotted to usurp the throne. The Empress, too, needs at least the strength to protect herself."

Medium: "Hm? Big bro, you say somethin'?"

Flop: “Nothing at all, dear sister! Just keep on as you are—bright and brisk—and make His Excellency the Emperor-kun fall head over heels for you!”

Medium: “…Ah—yeah, right, big bro.”

All at once, Medium, who had been so full of momentum, seemed to lose steam. In front of her suspicious older brother, she pressed the tips of her fingers together in front of her chest and fidgeted.

Medium: “U-Uhm, big bro, I wanna ask you something.”

Flop: “Mm? What is it, what is it. If it’s something this brother can answer, fire away.”

Medium: “—If I’m gonna make Abel-chin all melty, what should I even do?”

With her cheeks faintly flushed and her words coming a touch faster than usual, his sister posed her question. Flop brought a hand to his narrow chin and said, “I see.”

And then—

Flop: “—This calls for an emergency meeting!”

2

Yorna: “—So, is that why you summoned me, then?”

In the invited imperial chamber, Yorna Mishigure heard the Empress’s reason for calling her, and at the adorably wholesome nature of the consultation, she let her lacquered lips relax while she gently twirled the kiseru in her hand.

There had been many summons to the castle for Yorna, one of the Nine Divine Generals, but circumstances being what they were, she had never once obeyed them. This time, however, with the Great Disaster concluded and the situation changed—and with the summons coming not from the Emperor or the Prime Minister–led council but from Medium, now the Empress—she decided to answer.

After all, Yorna, in former lives as Iris and as Sandra Benedict, had several times been chosen to sit as a consort to the Vollachian Emperor. She felt more confident than anyone that she could understand the feelings of Medium, who had been plucked up from an ordinary Imperial subject and named Empress in one stroke.

Even so, she hardly imagined the consultation would be not about the mindset of an empress, but of a good wife.

Medium: "Me 'n big bro were both abandoned kids, so I dunno what kinda person makes a good wife or a good mom. So I figured, if I'm gonna ask anyone, it's gotta be you, Yorna-chan."

Yorna: "My, my, being chosen honors me, sugar. That said, the way I love and the way I like to be loved are rather my own… If that can serve as a reference, I shall be delighted."

Medium: "It will! Totally will! Sorry, Yorna-chan, you're busy rebuilding Chaosflame and all."

Beaming, hands pressed together over her chest, Medium's sunny words made Yorna lift a hand to her lips and slowly shake her head.

At present, the Demon City of Chaosflame where Yorna lived had been razed in the battle that heralded the Great Disaster, and she was hounded by the work of its restoration. Even so, the citizens of the demon city were brave and stalwart; instead of sinking into gloom over the ruined streets, her beloved children were all spurring themselves on to make a city even better than before.

If Yorna stayed there, she would only make those beloved children fuss over her too much, so in a way, this timing suited her just fine.

Yorna: "Besides, I needed to speak with His Excellency about the matter of Tanza anyway."

Medium: "Gotcha. Then I'm glad~"

Serena: "—Good grief, Middy. Are you relying only on General First-Class Yorna? If so, there is nothing quite so lonely for me, your foster parent."

Medium: “Eh—? But I’ve never thought of you as my foster parent, Seri-nee. You’re the one who told me to think of you as my big sis, remember?”

The one who creased her brow at the ever-innocent Medium was another person present for this parlor talk—a fierce beauty with a sword scar on her face: Serena Dracroy, High Countess.

She, too, was someone Medium had summoned for counsel—and—

Yorna: “Well then, darling, how about you? Do not just sit there quiet; say a little something.”

Madelyn: “…I, the dragon, have friggin’ no interest in the petty troubles of humans. I only keep an eye on Medium because she’s Balleroy’s friggin’ little sister.”

Medium: “Madelyn-chan’s my snack buddy! When I feel lonely eating snacks by myself and Abel-chin’s busy, she keeps me company.”

As if to back up Medium’s words, Madelyn did not join the discussion; she simply reached single-mindedly for the tea sweets on the table, crunching away. Quite adorable for someone of the outrageous dragonkin race, almost like a small animal. Yorna very much wanted to pat her head and pull her in for a cuddle, but she imagined she would be scolded like a blaze from hell if she tried, so she restrained herself.

Be that as it may—

Yorna: “To make His Excellency all melty, is it…? Sounds fun.”

Serena: “I agree. Not to be rude, but both I and General First-Class Yorna had more than enough qualifications to be candidates for His Excellency’s consort. He cast us aside, and of all people chose Middy? It is absurdly entertaining.”

Yorna: “If we speak only of designs, Prime Minister Berstetz—so vexed by the succession—must surely have thought to make Madelyn, too, a candidate to be His Excellency’s consort.”

Madelyn: “Pff— cough, cough”

Medium: “Waa, waa—Madelyn-chan, you okay?! You were a candidate to be Abel-chin’s bride?!”

Madelyn: “Th-The dragon knows friggin’ nothing about that… I shall friggin’ wring the old codger later.”

At Madelyn’s tear-eyed vow of revenge, Yorna made a note to herself to go protect Berstetz later so the girl did not misjudge her strength.

And in truth, Serena was not wrong. The Demon City of Chaosflame served as a refuge for beloved children who had nowhere to go; seeking that protection, Yorna had indeed worked hard to win Vincent’s favor.

Yorna: “I had thought for sure His Excellency fancied a more challenging kind of woman…”

Until the Great Disaster was weathered, he would welcome no one as a consort. That was Vincent’s true conviction, and, shameful though it was to admit, Yorna’s provocations had been for naught.
—That said, considering Vincent’s ties to Priscilla, she could only be glad she had failed.

If it had been Priscilla, she might have laughed such a thing off as well.

Thinking of her late daughter, Yorna lowered her eyes in quiet sorrow.

Serena: “…Hmph. Still, asking for advice is a commendably modest attitude, Middy. In anything, you tend to play it by ear and leave success to momentum… That is who you are, is it not?”

Medium: “Mmm, as expected of you, Seri-nee—you know me so well~! But that’s fine for other stuff; for Abel-chin, that won’t cut it~”

Madelyn: "—? And what is friggin' different when it is Vincent?"

Serena intentionally—and Madelyn unconsciously—shifted the topic away from Yorna's melancholy and started digging into the true heart of Medium's consultation. Yorna straightened her posture as well and waited for Medium's words, the focus of three women upon her.

Under those three gazes, Medium hesitated for a while, choosing her words—and then—

Medium: "…I just don't wanna fail."

Serena: "You fear failure? That is unlike you."

Medium: "Usually, yeah! Even if I mess up, I think, "Welp, it couldn'ta been helped," 'cause I gave it my all! But…"

Yorna: "But what, sugar?"

Medium: "…When it's about Abel-chin, I don't wanna fail. Is that weird?"

At Medium's question, asked with her brows drooping, Yorna felt something catch in her chest.

In anything, it was only natural to not want to fail. All the more so in human relationships—so Yorna believed—but for Medium, that was not how it had been. —Not until she began to worry like this over Vincent.

Before Yorna could say, What about that is strange—

Madelyn: "—It is not friggin' strange."

Madelyn denied Medium's anxiety in a small voice.

Madelyn: "When it is with your man, wanting not to mess up is friggin' natural. Even the dragon, when speaking with Balleroy, friggin' felt half happy and half anxious."

Medium: "Did you ever say something weird, or make him upset?"

Madelyn: “I friggin’ did. …When I told him that, Balleroy friggin’ laughed.”

Madelyn spoke with her eyes downcast, telling of a wound not yet healed, but she met Medium sincerely.

Yorna had not had many points of contact with Balleroy Temeglyph, a former member of the Nine Divine Generals. Even so, she remembered him as a good man who cherished his flying dragons and held no prejudice. She also knew that, to the three others here, he had been irreplaceable.

Medium: “Sounds like Big Bro Bal.”

Serena: “Not a bad answer. Well, naturally. I raised him. I could not scour out his lousy taste, though.”

Madelyn: “…You friggin’ raised Balleroy?”

Serena: “I did. Consider it, and I am quite something, am I not? One became a Divine General chosen by the Dragon, and one is the Empress of the Empire. I may as well call myself the Mother of the Nation.”

Yorna: “That does seem a touch too dismissive of His Excellency’s wishes.”

Serena: “Oh my, to hear that from none other than Yorna Mishigure, the Empire’s premier rebel—the Flamboyant.”

At Serena’s raised hands and mock surprise, Yorna could not help but let a soft “kuh-fu” slip from her lips, and it spread to Medium—and, shockingly, even to Madelyn. Seeing Madelyn’s lips faintly loosen, Yorna had a thought.

Yorna: “How about this, then. I cannot promise it will soothe Her Majesty the Empress’s worries, but we could set up a little club, just us, and meet like this from time to time.”

Medium: “Eh, really? But everyone’s busy, right? Seri-nee, you can’t, can you?”

Serena: “Do not go making me the odd one out from a fun gathering. First of all, I am the Empress’s mother. What reason would I have not to fly to you when you need me? I shall send as many dragon ships as it takes.”

Yorna: “And I expect that, hereafter, I can come and go in the Imperial Capital without being glared at by His Excellency or by General First-Class Goz, so do ring me any time, sugar.”

Medium: “~~! Seri-nee, Yorna-chan, thank you!”

Overcome with emotion, Medium sprang to her feet, squeezing Yorna’s and Serena’s hands in turn as she expressed her gratitude. Seeing how delighted she was, Yorna felt her proposal had been worth making.

Then, at Medium’s momentum, Madelyn narrowed her eyes while toying with her hair—

Madelyn: “…So you are not friggin’ going to ask the dragon?”

Medium: “—? Well, Madelyn-chan, you always come to me anyway, so I kinda thought it was just normal for you to be there. Eh, you won’t come?!”

Madelyn: “I did not friggin’ say I would not! …Hopeless girl, friggin’ honestly.”

Told as if it were obvious by the wide-eyed Medium, Madelyn bared her fangs and shouted, then let out a great sigh, looking not entirely displeased. At that uncandid reaction, Yorna met Serena’s eyes, and the elder pair traded a shrug.

Medium: “All right—now that I’ve got tons of stalwart allies, I’m invincible! Riding this wave, I’m gonna make Abel-chin all melty… ahem, I’m gonna work hard to make him melty!”

Serena: “Indeed. His Excellency must see no one but our Middy.”

Madelyn: “They may as friggin’ well tremble and wait.”

Yorna: “Goodness, this is starting to feel like a rather dangerous powwow.”

Be that as it may, Medium’s pure feelings for Vincent—the feelings she voiced so boldly—were something Yorna desperately wanted to support. No; all three of them felt as one.

Because watching that iron mask of Vincent’s finally crack would, surely, be deliciously satisfying.

3

Flop: “And so, that’s how it is right now—an excessive amount of firepower is piling up around my little sister!”

Cecilus: “Aha, so that’s how it is! My, my, what a deployment to my taste, Mister Adviser! I was wondering what exactly the post that sprouted up to replace Ubilk the Stargazer was supposed to do, but this is just the talent I wanted right now!”

Flop: “Thank you, Lightning-kun! Hearing you say that makes all my efforts worth it!”

Out in front of the Crystal Palace, the two met, hit it off, and exchanged a firm handshake. They were Flop and Cecilus—two of the top five loudest voices in the Imperial Capital. For the record, the other “fingers” were Medium and Goz Ralfon, with the last one being a rotating seat.

Even for a loudmouth like Flop, running into the likewise loud Cecilus here was a surprise.

After all, Cecilus and company were currently carrying an important duty entrusted to them directly by Vincent.

Namely, hunting down the remnants of the undead scattered and lurking throughout Vollachia.

Cecilus: “I’m thrilled we got to see each other again so soon, niece-kun… no, Miss Spica, but did something go wrong, perhaps? The very idea of a problem that even Lightning-kun and Lady Arakia couldn’t handle is scary to contemplate!”

Spica: “Uooou, a—u.”

As he patted Spica’s head—she’d taken a shine to him and clung to him—Flop cocked his head, wondering why they had cut their journey short.

Picking up on that, Cecilus cheerily began, “Well, you see,” and—

Cecilus: “It isn’t a problem so much as the kind of stylish happenstance that made me reevaluate the heavens’ guidance! I’d like to ask His Excellency for a judgment on how to handle a certain person we picked up along the way. I personally think we don’t even need to ask!”

Arakia: “…Cut it out. Not funny. We’re going to have His Excellency hear us properly.”

Compared to the riding-high, all-jazzed Cecilus, Arakia’s sour reluctance was plain as day. That said, this was, in its way, the two of them as usual.

So then, just what was it they wanted Vincent to decide?

Flop: “Well, even if it’s only a progress report, I’m sure His Excellency the Emperor-kun will be pleased to see your faces. And my sister will welcome you with open arms regardless. Besides, High Countess Dracroy and General First-Class Yorna are both here now—you’d make their day if you met them.”

Arakia: “Eh.”

Cecilus: “Ho!”

Spica: “Au.”

Flop watched the three show three different reactions to his words.

Spica rounded her eyes and glanced at the fourth member of their party behind them; Arakia pressed her palm over her eyepatched eye. Cecilus alone grew ever more delighted—and—

Cecilus: “See? The heavens’ guidance, just like that. Everything converges toward a heart-thumping romantic drama! Ahahahaha!”

Throwing his head back, he laughed aloud.

To be continued

Kararagi Reaper Incident IV
(LQ AI Translation)

1

—The Kararagi City-States' Second City, Banan.

A few days earlier, the metropolis had been struck by an unprecedented wind disaster, and the sting of that great damage had yet to subside when, as if to pile calamity upon calamity, the next disaster—a gigantic black tornado—was drawing near.

Julius: "To dismiss this as coincidence stretches credulity."

Murmuring thus, Julius ran against the tide of the masses fleeing the tornado, cutting through a cityscape where restoration work was still sporadic, toward the heart of the calamity.

Fortunately, the city had many hands gathered from across Kararagi for the sake of reconstruction—mercenaries for maintaining public order, workers for clearing rubble and rebuilding structures—so the evacuation of the residents could likely be left to them.

Halibel: "But that means the more hands there are, the more folks are gonna get caught up in it, y'know."

Running abreast with Halibel, who harbored the same impression, the same concern, Julius nodded with a "Indeed," and summoned Aro, the Spirit who obeyed him.

There was something he wished to confirm with her, a wind Spirit—but…

Julius: "—From the look of it, it seems I need not even ask."

The faintly green-glimmering Spirit who had answered his call tried to carry herself stoutly before her contractor, yet she could not suppress the subtle tremor in her Od.

There was no reason for a Spirit to fear abnormal weather. Which meant that that was—

Halibel: “A Spirit-related magical calamity, then? In that case, we talkin’ ’bout Tia-chan bein’ involved?”

At the question, a white-haired woman confined in a zashiki cell flashed across Julius’s mind. Arrested as the cause of the previous wind disaster, she had proved to be a very high-ranking Great Spirit.

It was hard to imagine that Tia, the name she had given, and this wind disaster before them were unconnected.

Julius: “That it is a magical calamity is certain. That it is related to her as well. Yet I do not believe it is her own malice.”

Halibel: “That yer hunch as a handsome fella ’n a Spiritual Arts User talkin’?”

Julius: “I affirm it, and shall take it as praise. —I engage.”

Once they had reached the outskirts where no evacuating figures remained and several broken buildings lay untouched, Julius leveled his blade’s tip at the tornado visible in the distance and came to a halt.

Of course, one could not expect an honorable match against a tornado. He dispensed with preamble—

Julius: “—El Fula!!”

A pale radiance dwelt upon the blade’s tip, and the power of six Spirits, with Aro at their center, converged; what he loosed was a counter-rotating gale aimed at annihilating the tornado through cancellation. It thrust straight in, surging toward the tornado that was closing on the city as it swept up sand and stone from the plain—

Halibel: “This ain’t good. I ain’t seein’ a killin’ spot.”

Almost at the same moment as Halibel’s breath, his hand raised as a visor, the gale was helplessly swallowed by the tornado and became but one more part of the wind disaster.

Feeling no purchase and seeing it taken in an instant, Julius immediately shifted his awareness: that tornado was not a mere extension of a wind disaster, but an attack suffused with a very strong intent.

Julius: “If we continue to oppose it as we just did, we shall only make that tornado still larger.”

Halibel: “Then what do we do? Scoop everybody up ’n make a run for it?”

Julius: “No. Lady Anastasia ordered us to hold that thing up. Had it been within our power, I would have wished for us to erase it ourselves—but let us return to our initial objective. We shall slacken the tornado’s advance.”

Given the speed at which the gigantic black tornado was advancing, a full evacuation of the city’s residents was not realistic. What was more, if that tornado possessed intent, its harm might not stop with the city alone.

Therefore, as a Knight who protected the innocent populace, Julius could not yield to that wind disaster.

Julius: “Aro, I would borrow your strength once more. To fight a wind disaster, you are indispensable. Halibel, I shall ask for your aid as well. Will that be acceptable?”

Halibel: “Reckon as things stand, ’bout all I can do is poke ’n prod while huntin’ for a weak point. So let me see ya show yer stuff.”

Julius returned a nod to Halibel—and to Aro, who burned for a chance at restoring her honor—and looked to the tornado.

Here and now, the best move available to Julius was a tactic of delaying the tornado, and—

Julius: “—To place my faith in you, Anastasia-sama.”

Tia: “Huh? What are they even doing? We’ve gotta stop that tornado, so why are they attacking nothing but totally off-base spots?”

At her side, Anastasia, having grasped what Julius and the others who had gone on ahead were aiming for, snapped her fingers.

She had ordered them to hobble the tornado, and left the concrete methods to them—but—

Ricardo: “I get what Miss Tia’s sayin’, too. They’re freezin’ the ground, and even lightin’ fires near the twister… I ain’t got a clue what Julius’s up to.”

Anastasia: “What’re you talkin’ about? He’s just bein’ proper and followin’ my orders. Look.”

At Anastasia’s words, Ricardo, who had been grimacing much like Tia, narrowed his eyes. For a short while he puzzled over what he was supposed to be seeing, but soon went, “Huh?” and realized—

Ricardo: “The tornado’s slowin’ down, ain’t it!”

Tia: “Hah? Eh? Really? Why? They aren’t doing anything to the tornado!”

Confronted with the immovable fact, Ricardo and Tia raised their voices in surprise.

But the two of them were not mistaken. The tornado was certainly slackening, easing its momentum.

Eridna: “I see. Rather than attacking the tornado directly, they went for the meteorological environment. Even if it’s wind raised by magic, it still obeys the bare minimum of natural laws.”

Anastasia: “Big winds come from hot ’n’ cold winds gettin’ into a fight, right? Julius is deliberately knockin’ that balance outta whack. Smart boy—just what I’d expect from my Knight.”

Tilting her chin at the understanding voiced by Echidna at her throat, Anastasia praised Julius's judgment.

He had executed Anastasia's orders magnificently. Halibel, alongside him, was apparently pitching ruined buildings and needless boulders into the tornado to help slow it as well. Whether the more it swallowed, the fatter—and thus slower—a tornado would get was anyone's guess.

Anastasia: "Those two bought us time. Next is you, Ms. Tia!"

Tia: "—What?"

Anastasia: "You talked a big game, didn't ya? You went 'n' tore up our Ricardo, too, so is it fair for me to figure you're skilled enough to scrap with that tornado?"

At Anastasia's question, Tia's golden eyes narrowed to slits.

From what they'd heard, Tia, being a Great Spirit, had whipped up a massive wind with magic and floated Banan's residents and buildings whole into the sky. In terms of sheer scale, she should be a good match for the oncoming tornado.

Yet, faced with that expectation, Tia averted her gaze and groaned, "Aah—" "Uugh—".

Ricardo: "What, so it's a no-go? Seein' you act like that before we've even started is the last thing I wanted, Tia-chan."

Tia: "You've got a mouth on you—wanna die?! Can't be helped, okay? If that were just a draft or some petty Spirits' prank, I'd have blown it away! But—"

Anastasia: "But what is it?"

Tia: "…Because that's the handiwork of the one usin' my Light Orb, the odds are stacked against me."

At Tia's halting answer, Anastasia and Ricardo traded looks.

Ricardo: "That again! So what the hell is this Light Orb, anyway!"

Tia: “A Light Orb’s a Light Orb! It’s my precious thing that got stolen, and it’s why I’m mad!”

Eridna: “…Judging from Ms. Tia’s attitude and our exchanges so far, I surmise it’s something like the source of her power. She had it taken from her. And that tornado was raised by the one who stole it. Hence, the odds don’t favor her.”

Anastasia: “If that’s so, how bad are the odds for you, Ms. Tia?”

At Anastasia’s question, given in accord with Echidna’s reading, Tia made a guttural sound in her throat.

Even if she herself had said it, she likely didn’t want to acknowledge the fact that the odds were against her. Wavering, she greatly contorted those keen, blade-like good looks and—

Tia: “…Fifty-Fifty.”

Ricardo: “That ain’t a fifty-fifty face! Looks more like ninety–ten to me!”

Tia: “You trying to get yourself killed?! It’s not that far apart! At worst it’s seventy–thirty!”

Anastasia: “Seventy–thirty—yeah, that’s definitely bad odds.”

Realizing her slip, Tia groaned, “Uooh—”. Thinking what a groany Spirit she was, Anastasia mouthed, very softly, “Seventy–thirty”.

Tia was a Great Spirit as well. If what she had just said wasn’t mere bravado, then if one set that tornado as a seven, she could muster a three on the wind scale.

If that was the case—

Mimi: “—Ojou! Everybody, assemble! What’re we doin’?”

Right then, with Mimi charging in at their head, the Iron Fang who’d come to Banan ran up. Welcoming them, Anastasia softened her cheeks, having gotten exactly what she wanted.

Anastasia: “Now ain’t that sweet of y’all—really knowin’ how to make me happy.”

Ricardo: “Talkin’ like that means you thought of somethin’, Ana.”

Anastasia: “’Course I did. C’mon now, hop to it, everyone. —Ms. Tia, you’re followin’ my lead too.”

At Anastasia’s brisk clapping, Iron Fang answered as one. Seeing Ricardo raise the hooked claws of his right hand in reply as well, Tia shut one eye and—

Tia: “I’ll just say this: if you make me pull any stupid stunts, I’ll kill you.”

—then waited for the instructions, with an attitude not one bit meek.

3

Julius: “—Hk, Halibel, even just one more move.”

Halibel: “No, no, ya can’t be pushin’ it. Any more ’n we’ll get swallowed up ourselves.”

Halibel, who had been yanking out the pillars of ruined buildings and feeding them to the tornado, recommended retreat as the funnel cloud drew to within several hundred meters of the city.

Chagrined by those words, Julius nevertheless obeyed Halibel and lowered his blade.

Surveying the situation from above, Halibel possessed a broader field of view than Julius, and his judgment was on the mark for now. More than Julius, an outsider, Halibel’s frustration burned hotter, for it was his own familiar ground being menaced. It was precisely those feelings of Halibel’s that Julius ought to honor.

Halibel: “I ain’t the hot-blooded type, y’know. ’Sides, I ain’t feelin’ frustrated.”

Julius: “That is…”

Halibel: "'Cause Ana and the others're gonna handle that twister, ain't they? Right?"

Shrugging as the gale-like wind washed over him, Halibel spoke, and Julius's eyes widened a fraction. He answered with a firm nod and, "Indeed."

It was pitiable to have Halibel say it first, but indeed, as he said, Julius and company had carried out Anastasia's orders. All that remained was to see, with the time purchased by their delaying action, what Anastasia had managed to ready. —The answer revealed itself at once.

A black tornado, racing upon the city with ferocious speed—and, rising to oppose it, a white tornado.

Ricardo: "C'mon, c'mon, if ya don't put yer backs into it, Ojou's gonna gripe later!!"

Mimi & Iron Fang: "Wah—!"

Mimi & Iron Fang: "Haa—!"

Before Ricardo, who was rallying them by clanging his great machete and hook-claws overhead, Mimi and the Iron Fang howled, blasting out shockwaves of their roars. The kittenfolk's adorable unity was not enough to stop that black tornado even when braided together. That said, even cute cries had their uses.

They lacked the power to halt a tornado, but they did have the power to nurture one—apparently.

Ricardo: "All right, we set the table for ya, Tia-chan! Now really put yer spirit into it!"

Tia: "I know! After all that talk, like I'd be the one to botch it! And anyway, you're the only one not even do—"

Ricardo: "Haa—!!"

Talking over whatever Tia had been saying, Ricardo joined the child-rearing of the great wind with a roar of his own. After making very sure everyone saw him do it, he clanged his weapons again to goad Tia.

Ricardo: “A’right then, be my guest!”

Tia: “Nnnn— fine, fine, I’ll do it!—Watch me.”

No sooner had she declared it than Tia shut both eyes and focused. —The great, great seed of wind that had already been stirred up swallowed the cheering of the Iron Fang, then began to spiral, stronger still.

At the feel of that wind, the fur all over Ricardo’s body stood on end, recalling the wind disaster from the other day.

The wind disaster Tia had unleashed—that had been outrageous enough, but their foe this time was a tornado wrought by someone with more than twice Tia’s power. As for the rival tornado spawned and reared to oppose it, its scale was enough to make one almost laugh.

And then—

Tivey: “Big brother, more! More, more! It is not enough, desu-yo!”

Hetaro: “Uwaaah! I’m gonna get tons of head pats from big sis later for sure—!”

Saying so, Tivey and Hetaro leveled their staves at the newborn wind’s feet; in contrast to Julius, who had been freezing the ground, they set the ground ablaze, raised the wind, and stoked the flames’ force.

Ricardo did not understand the principle of it, but apparently that, too, was necessary for raising a great wind. In fact, the white tornado swelled rapidly, and soon—

Tia: “—Who do you think I am? I’ll kill you, you know?”

Without a doubt, she was the leading architect behind the white tornado’s creation, but it sat ill with Tia to be crowing as if it were solely her own strength. As her snarled boast came to its end, tornado met tornado.

Black and white, two tornados clashed on Banan’s outskirts, and gusts battered the four directions. The collision of those raging winds seemed to portend the spread of yet more harm, yet one thing was certain.

Ricardo: “Put ’em together and it might be bigger than when there was just one, but the oomph it had as a single twister’s gone down.”

And with slackening and weakening now visible—

Halibel: “—Ahh, I can finally see the killin’ spot.”

The Death God of Kararagi who flew toward the tornado had nothing that he could not slay.

4

The black tornado’s whole form wavered greatly and, in the next instant, unraveled as if coming apart.

Watching that from a position set a ways back from the battlefield, Anastasia pressed a hand to her chest, relieved.

Eridna: “Looks like everyone pulled it off.”

Anastasia: “Sure does. We got Julius to come up with a plan that’d work right from the start. If you can weaken the wind by working the environment, you can do the reverse and beef it up, too.”

Eridna: “Though the Tia-kun who got helped along might look a little dissatisfied about it.”

Lifting her head so that her white beast-fur tickled Anastasia’s nape, Echidna drew a murmured, “That’s so,” from her as Anastasia stroked her partner’s coat in return.

That said, Anastasia didn’t think Tia would actually bristle as much as all that. Her words and deeds were certainly thorny, but beneath them you could glimpse a basic, irrepressible niceness. She was soft when pressed. For a merchant looking to pitch a product, a perfect mark.

Anastasia: “Whoops—nah, nah. Cleaning Ms. Tia out comes later. First, we gotta thank everybody and… figure out what the other side was aiming for.”

Eridna: “Their aim, huh. Besides the city’s destruction?”

Anastasia: “Easiest read is they were after Ms. Tia. If that wind was the work of whoever stole her precious thing, then stubborn Ms. Tia would’ve been in their way.”

Even so, if they’d gone as far as launching an attack on this scale for that, then the other party lacked both good sense and restraint.

It was, to be sure, a commercial harm Kararagi ought to address as a whole. For Anastasia, who kept the Hoshin Company’s main office in Kararagi, it wasn’t a problem she could call somebody else’s concern.

This might also mean getting back to Lugunica would be delayed for a while—and then—

???: “—Die.”

Eridna: “—! Ana!”

Struck in the eardrums by Echidna’s cry at the sudden presence and abrupt declaration, Anastasia whirled around, and there she saw Tia—or no, someone else who looked very much like Tia.

In the next moment she was swallowed by the sound of the wind, and realization came a beat late. The tornado’s target hadn’t been Tia. The tornado’s true target was—

No sooner had the tornado that attacked the city vanished than the group under Anastasia’s lead was thrown into fresh chaos.

The charming, dependable company head whose safety they were to welcome was nowhere to be seen, and before long, everyone understood.

—That Anastasia and her companions, whisked away by the passing wind, had fallen into the Death God’s hands.

To be continued

No Stella No Life IV

???: “—Teacher, you ever had a lover or something?”

???: “…There you go with yet another sudden question.”

Constructed within a dream was the Witch’s domain, and while sitting with his legs crossed on the grassy plain of that unwithering illusion, Aldebaran tilted his head, causing the Witch to frown her well-shaped eyebrows.

Fundamentally, the Witch would welcome any question with open arms, so that reaction was rather fresh and unusual. Today, as always, Aldebaran had been made to experience a hellish time, tormented by the Trials bestowed upon him by the Witch; subconsciously, he let out an “Oh?” as his eyes sparkled.

Aldebaran: “What’s this now? Did I hit a sore spot for you, Teacher?”

Witch: “It is in poor taste to become so proactive when it comes to that. I am the Witch of Greed… a being who avariciously covets all kinds of knowledge, so I have answered all of your questions until now as sincerely as possible. If I have allowed you to misunderstand that attitude of mine, it would be my own insufficiencies that I would need to painfully reflect on.”

Aldebaran: “Starting to talk fast just makes it even more suspicious. This Witch is way too easy to read.”

Witch: “You are quite a bit lacking in relent! I think it would do you better to show some more consideration!”

As Aldebaran seized the moment and jumped on the topic, the Witch raised her voice in such a manner.

Given that he was normally in the position where many things were done to him, he had desired to savor this situation in which he held such an advantage for as long as he could, but first, he wished to prioritize delving deeper into this topic.

That was to say—

Aldebaran: “Love talk! Love talk!”

Witch: “What a lowbrow curiosity… I have no recollection of raising you in such a manner.”

Aldebaran: “Even if you don’t remember, students are cultivated by watching the backs of their predecessors. Frankly, if we’re gonna talk about who I got this lowbrow curiosity from, then you’ve got no chance of winning, Teacher!”

Witch: “I see, this is a defeat in education… regardless of learning on one’s own, it is quite the great task to make another person learn. Good grief, there is much to learn.”

Aldebaran: “Oi oi, it’s no use trying to get out of this by playing such a sentimental grown-up move like that. Even if you say something that seems profound, my current spirits won’t be crushed.”

Witch: “Fine, fine.”

As Aldebaran, with lowbrow curiosity in his heart, proactively refused to let her off the hook, the Witch cast a wry smile.

Witch: “Regardless, it is difficult to say if it will meet your expectations. As you can see, given that I possess an extraordinarily excellent appearance from an objective perspective, there was no shortage of people who attempted to court me. But then again, none of those individuals ever became a close companion of mine.”

Aldebaran: “As expected, even if a flower is beautiful, it’s no good if it has a deadly poison.”

Witch: “From the fact that you strongly assume poison as a factor to begin with, I can tell just how much you understand me, which makes me glad. Well, that perception is mostly correct. In the first place, Witches place a heavy burden on others by merely existing in the same vicinity. There exists no means to avoid this.

Additionally…”

Aldebaran: “Additionally?”

Witch: “Unlike the other girls who became Witches along the way, I was a Witch by birth. To put it another way, I do not know any way of life that does not place a burden on others. —As one who is so thirsty for knowledge, I think it to be quite the irony.”

Placing a hand over her chest, the Witch reminisced, and witnessing that, Aldebaran’s throat closed up.

He had brought it up thoughtlessly as payback for everything that she was always doing to him, but he had ended up closing in on an unthinkable darkness of the Witch.

Aldebaran: “Is that… so. Sorry, that was a bit thoughtless. To think that by birth, you were a natural born loner who had no way to associate with others… wait a second?”

Then, as he attempted to reflect on it aloud, he suddenly realized.

Aldebaran: “Nah, if you really couldn’t associate with anyone, it contradicts me even being here in the first place! It also contradicts the reminiscences you occasionally tell me about, Teacher!”

Witch: “Tch-.”

Aldebaran: “You just clicked your tongue! This was a premeditated crime, you ill-natured Witch!”

Half-closing her eyes, the Witch averted her gaze, and Aldebaran cast aside his reflection from a moment ago. Her approach of trying to throw up a smokescreen on any inconvenient topics like this was truly a tactic befitting a Witch, but now that her technique had been seen through, she would no longer be able to escape.

Aldebaran: “In fact, there’ve also been times when you’ve uttered the names of men, Teacher! That’s a front that these lowbrow ears of mine won’t let slide!”

Witch: “Holding a grudge are we… only, sorry to say since you’ve taken such an interest, but my answer is that nothing really happened. In particular, that which you speak of, the notion that anything happened between myself and the members of the opposite sex that I have brought up in conversation, such a thought—”

Aldebaran: “Such a thought?”

Witch: “—Just by imagining it, I feel a sensation of my soul rejecting envisioning anything further along those lines. I have never attempted such a thing, but it is surprising how vivid of a sensation it is. To think that I could be made to experience such dread.”

Aldebaran: “Setting aside their humanity, was it something like them being horrible as members of the opposite sex?”

Witch: “No, they were not a lot praised for their humanity either. It is a miracle that the group did not fall apart along the way… or rather, they did a few times, but the girls managed to mend things back together.”

Perhaps it hurt her head to think back, because as the Witch searched through the shelves of her memories, and the people present in those recollections came to mind, she was pressing her hand on her forehead the entire time.

If even this ill-natured Witch was speaking of them so harshly, Aldebaran assumed they must have been quite the formidable lot, but at the same time, he also noticed something.

He noticed that as the Witch spoke, her lips were by no means pursed in displeasure.

Witch: “Speaking of the opposite sex, the majority of my companions at the time belonged to it. Though as I have said, it would have been quite problematic to have such a perception of them. Reid was out of the question, Farsale was married, and Alec and he both had people they were in love with. Volcanica was not a target for such a thing, and Reid was out of the question.”

Aldebaran: “There was someone marked as out of the question twice, but I see, if any such developments happened, it would have turned into a quagmire for the party.”

Witch: “It was sort of like a mud boat founded on balance rather than trust, so the journey could have very well ended up as a mud boat sailing through a quagmire. Given that there was no leeway for such things, are you satisfied?”

Aldebaran: “Well, when you put it like that… no! I won’t give up so easily! Even if you didn’t choose anyone close at hand, you ought to have had a summer romantic adventure or something with someone you met during your journey!”

Witch: “Why are you so fixated on this that you would make such leaps like that? I would have been glad if you displayed this much initiative during the Trials I had prepared for you.”

Seeing Aldebaran’s enthusiasm when it came to this topic, the Witch pouted her lips in a bit of a dejected manner.

But unfortunately, there was no way for her wish to be granted. To begin with, the impetus for this conversation topic had been a retreat to reality from the harsh and merciless Trial she had given him. For just a bit longer, until Aldebaran’s heart regained some leeway, this topic would not be dropped.

Regardless, the conversation had already delved into a rather interesting zone.

Aldebaran: “See, there was something you had boasted about earlier, Teacher. Something like, that it became the point of many scuffles to seek out your knowledge as the Witch of Greed, Teacher. At the time I thought you were just joking, but just for now, I’ll believe it in order to broaden the current conversation!”

Witch: “I would prefer if you did not use such a disappointing method of broadening the conversation. I’ll speak if you make me, so I would like it if you could make it enjoyable for me to do so.”

Aldebaran: “Yo, sexy lady! Beautiful courtesan Witch! With a smile that can make all royalty and nobility weak in the knees.”

Witch: “How smooth… Well, I have experienced an episode quite similar to that.”

It was an obvious encouragement, but it seemed like it had cheered the Witch up, and she began speaking of the past.

If there was a similar episode, would it be stuff like courtesans and weak-kneed royalty? Whichever happened to be more applicable, it was sure to be an episode that packed quite a punch.

Witch: “At the time, Magrizza was still at the height of its prosperity. We were basically a group of fugitive problem children, so we were trying to hide our identities as much as we could, but… Farsale ended up getting found out by a noble of that nation. Though, that was also because when someone came to return something that he had dropped, he boldly declared in the middle of the road “My venerable self shan’t forget this gratitude. Should you encounter any hardship, do visit the Kingdom! I, Farsale Lugunica, shall grant you my aid.”

Aldebaran: “Was that companion an idiot?”

Witch: “Indeed, he was a fool. Foolishly earnest and honest to a fault… well, he was the type who was applicable with everything that could be attributed to being a fool. And so, our identities were revealed because of Farsale, and we ended up being invited to a banquet of nobles. That is where they saw me for the first time.”

Aldebaran: “Heh, so you caught the eye of some nobleman?”

Placing his hand on his chin, Aldebaran pretended to be impressed, though he was not particularly surprised.

To the point that even Aldebaran, who was already well accustomed to her face, would end up slipping a “What a beauty” if he let his mind lose focus, the Witch harbored a truly beautiful appearance. Earlier, he had likened her to a beautiful flower, but it truly was the case. As if her allure and toxicity were proportional, she was a poisonous beauty.

Witch: “No, the one whose eye I had caught was not merely some nobleman, it was the crown prince of Magrizza.”

But, it seemed like Aldebaran had still underestimated the toxicity of that deadly bane.

Witch: “At that time, we had just split up from the ones with capable fighting strength, which was quite the hard blow. In fear of causing any larger ruckus, we had intended on following the other party’s demands for the time being, but before I knew it, preparations for the wedding ceremony were already commencing. I almost became a queen.”

Aldebaran: “You could say that was dangerous in two different ways. What happened then?”

Witch: “Naturally, the wedding of the crown prince would have been a large-scale event involving the entire nation. Of course, as most people might expect, that wedding was completely and utterly spoiled. Ultimately it was the result of Reid and Volcanica going on a rampage, but the trigger for that was—”

Aldebaran: “…Teacher?”

Her loquacity in speaking of those resuscitated memories suddenly paused, and in response to Aldebaran’s suspicion, the Witch gave a curt “It’s nothing” before eliminating the hesitation in her words.

Witch: “Anyway, that was how my wedding with the crown prince was cancelled. We were chased out of Magrizza, but not too long afterwards, the Black Serpent began wreaking havoc in that nation. It thus met its demise, and we had naught the time to concern ourselves with it. And that was that.”

Aldebaran: “You can’t just end on “that was that”! That was a great tragedy! Teacher, I can’t believe that you and the rest were even involved with the Black Serpent…”

Witch: “Still, I think Daphne bears more of a responsibility than I do when it comes to the Witchbeast’s damages… Well, I won’t deny the possibility that the Black Serpent had been pursuing us.”

The Witch shamelessly shrugged her shoulders, and Aldebaran was at his wits' end because of her attitude.

If Magrizza was unable to gain the protection of the Witch and her allies against the damages of the Black Serpent due to having incurred their displeasure with an unwanted wedding, could that have been called a blunder of their royal family?

Witch: "It was nothing so simple."

Before he knew it, a white table and tea set had manifested there, and the Witch responded to Aldebaran's internal thoughts as she pleased, bringing a cup to her lips. He wanted to delve into those details a bit more, but Aldebaran knew from experience that her current demeanor, holding her long-lashed eyes closed, meant that she would refuse going any further on this topic.

Even though it was a topic she had chosen, he found the Witch's whims to be quite troublesome.

Aldebaran: "But with how it stands, there are way too many ups and downs, so it surely can't be called a romantic story."

Witch: "Is that so? Well, when it comes to entanglements with the opposite sex, it's always the same old story. As I had said, I was unsure of whether it was a predicament that would live up to your expectations."

As a matter of fact, the Witch was an individual possessing outstanding talents, and an appearance so beautiful that the prince of a nation fell for her at first sight. Assisted by her own thirst for knowledge, she could likely make anybody fall in love with her if she so desired it.

Witch: "A waste, is it…? The reason why I am unable to grasp an accurate measure in the realm of love, is likely due to the poor examples I had in my vicinity."

The Witch, who can always read ahead in the happenings of Aldebaran's mind, gave a rather sad self-analysis after reading his feelings.

Nearby examples regarding love, what matched that description was—

Witch: “I have hinted at it many times now, but my parents were good-for-nothings. I learned many negative emotions, such as contempt and ridicule, from my parents. Though from their perspective, my very existence would have been a failed imitation, a result that they had not desired.”

Aldebaran: “Teacher…”

Witch: “Ah, but it is quite ironic how I, who despise my parents in such a manner, am now doing the same thing that they did. I suppose this could be called self-deprication or self-reproach?

Haha, even though a long time has passed since we parted ways, I still find myself learning new things from those two.”

Holding the cup, the Witch’s fingers trembled, and she cast her face down towards the table. Her bangs hung before her eyes, and no longer able to see her expression, unease burgeoned within Aldebaran.

Beyond that unseen expression, was the Witch angry? Was she saddened? She was probably not smiling, but whichever thing it might have been, it was not something he could ascertain.

Even so, Aldebaran did not do anything so tactless as to peer at it.

Aldebaran: “…”

Instead, Aldebaran gently hugged the Witch’s slender body from behind.

Witch: “…Even though, you do not fully grasp the situation?”

At Aldebaran’s deed, the Witch expressed her bewilderment while being embraced.

Hearing the Witch’s perplexed voice, Aldebaran began to regret what he had done, but that was overcome by the lone fact that she had not shaken him off, allowing him to continue hugging her, Aldebaran: “How should I say this, Teacher, anyone who says that you’re doing the same thing as your parents is way off the mark, so it’d be better if you don’t dwell on it too much, that’s what I think, therefore I am, or something.”

Witch: “That is a complexity unique to disorganized opinions. But, there are many holes in that logic. You claim I am off the mark, but my parents produced the existence known as myself for a purpose, and I produced the existence known as yourself for a purpose… in that case, you could say that I, who perpetuated the chain, am more malicious.”

Aldebaran: “That’s if you believe that me and you are the same, Teacher, and that the perpetrators of such an act are good-for-nothing. You have a nasty personality, you don’t understand people’s hearts, and if you add it all up, you’ve killed me around a million times, Teacher.”

Witch: “Simply put, I’m a heinous villain.”

Aldebaran: “But, I don’t hate you, Teacher. —With just that, these two cases are completely separate matters.”

The Witch had spoken of her parents as good-for-nothings, revealed that she despised them, and though she had not said it explicitly, she would have likely harbored resentment and grudges towards them. But, if she was reproaching herself for doing the same thing as them, then why did those same sentiments not exist within Aldebaran?

That was evidence that the Witch’s actions were completely different to those of her parents.

Witch: “Though, I also think it is entirely possible that you are simply a much better person than I am.”

Aldebaran: “Stop trying to tear down the premise we’ve established so far. Just accept your salvation.”

Witch: “Haha, very well.”

As the Witch scrambled to nitpick, she gently caressed the hands of Aldebaran who was embracing her from behind, and without shaking him off, she silently closed her eyes.

The Witch could run wild through his inner thoughts as much as she pleased, and yet he was completely unable to get a read on her feelings whatsoever, so it was quite an unbalanced relationship.

Even so—

Aldebaran: “I like you, Teacher, I really do. In this world, there might not be a single man who would fall in love with you for any reason other than your looks, but there is at least one right here, so rest assured.”

Witch: “…Though, I think there is no way that no members of the opposite sex has ever taken an interest in me for reasons outside of my appearance, but I suppose this is where I say thank you?”

Aldebaran: “Who’s to say? But normally, when someone confesses that they like you, you would respond with how you feel.”

Although he played it off as a joke, those words had taken quite a bit of courage from Aldebaran.

In response, the Witch placed a finger over her lips with a “Hm”. Right now, he could not see the Witch’s face as she leaned the back of her head against his chest, and the time spent in contemplation felt extremely long.

And then—

Witch: “I am a woman who does not know love. Hence, I will not say that I love you.”

Aldebaran: “…Ngh, well, yeah.”

Witch: “It is just—”

Receiving the words at the end of the Witch’s contemplation, Aldebaran attempted to quickly accept the result. But, speaking over Aldebaran’s evasive response, the Witch continued.

Witch: “If the sentiments I feel towards you can be classified as love, I think that would be nice.”

Aldebaran: “…”

With an unseen expression and a relaxed voice, just what sort of feelings the Witch had spoken those words with, was not something Aldebaran could tell in the slightest.

His days spent with the Witch were filled with such things. The Witch, faithful to her curiosity of wanting to know and understand, would not allow him to step into the deepest parts of what he wished to know and understand

Even so—

Aldebaran: “…I’m well aware that it’s no use even if I badger you with love talk, Teacher.”

Witch: “Good grief, what a thing to say to me after I have answered all of your whims. I wonder who it is you take after. I would love to see your parent’s faces.”

Aldebaran: “Even though you know it damn well…”

While cursing at her in such a manner, Aldebaran suddenly realized something that troubled him. —His arms were still embracing the Witch from behind, and he did not know at what time he ought to let go.

When it came to being unable to speak of any romantic stories involving lovers, it seemed like they were in the same boat.

To be continued

Comic Alive Collection 13

Royal Selection:
First Contact
(CA)
(LQ AI Translation)

1

—This had truly turned into a serious matter.

While she was at a loss amid a throng where she could not tell right from left, the girl's head was filled with unease.

Everything she cast her eyes upon was brand new, and no matter where she turned her face, her head swam. After all, having her field of vision filled to the brim with so many people was a first for her. Naturally, being wrapped in that many overlapping voices was also a first, and her ears, a little longer than a human's, twitched.

Voice: "—Lia, hey Lia, are you alright?"

At that moment, into her head already full of anxiety, a gentle, familiar voice resonated.

Understanding that it was the voice from the Crystal Stone hanging at her chest, the girl could not help but let out a breath.

Only then did she realized what a serious thing it was that she had even forgotten to breathe.

Had the voice not made her notice just now, she might have collapsed here in the very middle of the city from shortness of breath.

Girl: "That was reaaally close…"

Voice: "Mm-hmm, you cleared one hurdle. But it still seems too soon to let your guard down. Lia's hardships look like they'll continue a little longer."

Girl: “Mm, yeah. I can’t let my guard down. Because…”

With the hand that had softly patted her chest in relief, the girl drew close the collar of the robe she wore over her head.

As if believing that the robe could, even just a little, ease the prickle of anxiety stirred by the many things she could see, the many voices she could hear, and the many presences she could feel.

Even relying on that sensation, the girl was in the very center of a whirlpool of unease.

Because—

Girl: “I’ve completely gotten separated from Frederica… what should I do?”

As the girl, in the Royal Capital for the first time, murmured weakly, a large dragon carriage swept across her field of view at speed.

2

Emilia was a half-elf with silver hair and amethyst eyes, born and raised in the Elior Great Forest.

Having spent so long in a closed-off, isolated forest and knowing full well she was a naïve girl from the sticks, Emilia had steeled herself with a strong sense of tension for her first time in the big city. And yet, here she was with this result.

Emilia: “I was sure I was being careful, and yet I ended up getting lost…”

Puck: “Were you reaaally being careful? To me, you looked like you were wobbling over here, wobbling over there—your eyes were wandering to everything, and it seemed reaaally risky.”

Emilia: “But everything here is full of things I don’t know!”

Answering that exasperated voice, Emilia reflected on how fickle she had been. But as she did, she sharpened her tone just a little and—

Emilia: “If you thought I looked risky, Puck, you should have told me.”

Puck: “No, I did tell you. You just wouldn’t lend me an ear. Like when you were absorbed in that street performer’s act earlier, I was saying the maid girl isn’t here, remember?”

Emilia: “No way? Is that true? I got totally absorbed, so…”

She had tried to make him reflect, but the reply flipped it back on her, leaving Emilia at a total loss.

What he brought up were the traveling performers who had shown a little act earlier on a street of the Royal Capital: a lizardman who swallowed a dagger whole, a rabbitman with unbelievable flexibility, and a huge tigerman who juggled an old dwarven grandpa like a ball—each very interesting.

Emilia had even stopped in her tracks to watch their act from start to finish, and she had handed over the allowance she’d been given as a tip.

Puck: “Looking back, if you hadn’t handed over that tip, we might’ve had a few more options.”

Emilia: “Options?”

Puck: “If you’d had some allowance left, it might’ve helped with looking for someone or avoiding trouble, you know?”

Emilia: “I get what you mean, Puck, but…”

She had already given the tip to the traveling performers, so there was no taking it back now no matter what she said. And they had been very happy with the tip she’d given them. If possible, she would have liked to convey in more detail how impressed she was with each of their tricks, but since Emilia was poor at talking, she couldn’t express it well, and that was very unfortunate.

Besides, the allowance was something she had received from none other than Roswaal, Frederica's master—the very person who'd gotten separated from them. For a lost Emilia to use that money to look for Roswaal and the others felt kind of silly.

Emilia: "Mm-Mm, instead of dithering, moving sounds better. I think Frederica is looking for us too, so let's try retracing the way we came."

Puck: "My daughter is proactive and that's reaaally good. But, are you okay? Do you really remember which path you took?"

Emilia: "Oh, Puck, you're worrying way too much. I originally lived in a forest with no landmarks at all. Compared to that, the Royal Capital is full of things that stand out."

Smiling faintly at the worry coming from the Crystal Stone, Emilia felt her heart grow a little lighter.

To properly go back the way they came. Obvious as that was, it felt like a brilliant idea. Surely, they would find the separated Frederica in no time.

—And thinking that way had been terribly naïve.

Emilia: "…I've wandered onto a street I don't recognize at all again."

Puck: "Right? Where even is this? They really should write the names of the streets somewhere."

Leaning her back against the wall at the corner of the street, Emilia drooped her shoulders and answered weakly, Emilia: "Yeah."

She said "yeah," but "we got lost because the streets had no names" was not an acceptable excuse to Emilia.

After all, there was no direct connection between her losing track of the way she came and not knowing the name of the street.

In the same bustling cityscape as ever, while trying and trying to retrace the paths she must have taken, Emilia had probably chosen the wrong way at most of the forks. She thought she should at least have remembered how many turns she'd made, but it was too late for all of it.

By the time she noticed, not only did she not know where the first street was, she couldn't even find the street she'd just decided to backtrack to—checkmated.

Emilia: "If we were in the forest, I could get home even with my eyes closed."

Puck: "Well, there's no point comparing a forest you lived in for years to a Royal Capital you just came to for the first time. And a shop you remembered as a landmark closing up or moving isn't Lia's fault."

Emilia: "If it's a roadside stall, that sort of thing can happen, huh. Consider me taught."

Among the so-called street vendors, there were a few that made their stalls flashy to get people to stop, or decorated with weird eye-catching ornaments. Since those were so striking, Emilia had been using them as landmarks—but street vendors close up at certain times or change their decorations, so they were ill-suited as landmarks.

By the time she realized that, it was too late, and Emilia's lost-child status had reached its peak.

Emilia: "…I wish you'd come outside too and helped me memorize the way, Puck."

Puck: "Huh? Passing the blame to me here isn't like you, Lia. So getting lost hit you harder than you thought, huh?"

Emilia: "I don't mean to take it out on you. I don't, but…"

As she answered, her words trailed off bit by bit. She'd reflexively snapped back like that, but Emilia herself knew best this was taking it out on him.

As she lowered her eyes, a small laugh sounded by her ear—

Puck: “Good grief, what a handful you are, Lia. Don’t get so down.”

It wasn’t a voice that sounded directly in her head, but a whisper properly heard by her ears. There was the faintest weight on her shoulder, and the feel of soft fur tickling her cheek made Emilia narrow her eyes.

In a blink, perched on Emilia’s shoulder was an adorable little kitten, small enough to fit in her hand—no, the spirit in the form of a kitten: Puck.

At Puck’s appearance, Emilia’s amethyst eyes went round, and she immediately ducked into a nearby alley.

And—

Emilia: “Puck, you mustn’t come out. If people see you, everyone will be reaaally surprised, remember we were told that.”

Puck: “Of course, but if it’s to cheer you up, it can’t be helped. The surprised everyone are nowhere near as important to me as you are, Lia.”

Emilia: “Puck…”

Puck: “Plus, I don’t want you taking it out on me anymore.”

Emilia: “Puck!”

As he joked, swishing his long tail, Emilia’s mood started to recover.

Her gloom that had been about to settle in lifted thanks to Puck; no matter how lost she was, she wasn’t alone. That reassurance was very big.

Keeping that up, Emilia hid Puck, who was tickling her neck, with her own silver hair, and was about to head back out toward the street—

Man: “Hey, miss, you were throwing money around pretty generously back there.”

A big man said that as he blocked the entrance to the alley, and Emilia came to a halt.

Blinking rapidly, Emilia looked up at the man, huge both vertically and horizontally, who peered down at her with a nasty grin. She didn't know him.

—But she knew that face.

Back when Emilia lived in the forest, people who did bad things in the forest smiled with that same face.

Emilia: "So in other words, you're someone thinking bad thoughts?"

Man: "Hah! You said it. And you ain't wrong. Only, whether I end as just a guy thinking bad thoughts or become a guy doing bad things depends on you, miss."

As he said that, the man crooked his open hand, beckoning Emilia.

Man: "Come on, stepping into this alley was the end of your luck. Leave every bit of coin you got."

Emilia: "By "every bit of coin," you mean money? Why would you do that…"

Man: "Don't play dumb! I saw you, yeah? You handed over a nice chunk of coin to those traveling performers."

Emilia: "Ah, so that's why… but, I'm sorry. I gave all the allowance I had to them. So I can't share any with you."

Man: "Don't feed me a cheap lie! Who in the world hands every last coin to some roadside performers!"

Puck: "This Lia here… really did hand over the whole thing…"

Then, quietly, Puck called, Puck: "Lia."

Puck: "You know this already, but guys like this don't get convinced by words. If you can't drive him off, I'll do it for you, okay?"

Emilia: “No, I’m fine, I’ll do my best myself. Besides, the ones I know are people who do bad things in the forest; the ones who do bad things in the Royal Capital might understand if we talk…”

Man: “Hey! Quit muttering to yourself. It’s fine by me, y’know? You come from a house that gives that much allowance. If you ain’t gonna pay, then I’ll make your family pay.”

Puck: “I don’t think that’s the line—or the face—of someone you can reason with, Lia.”

With Puck sighing, Emilia too thought maybe her idea was naïve.

Even so, she wanted to save making someone feel pain as the very last resort. Of course, if she borrowed Puck’s power, or even without borrowing it, with Emilia’s own power, she might be able to do something easily—but she didn’t think that should be the first resort.

Emilia: “As for that proposal just now, I’m sorry, but no. I’m already always in Roswaal’s debt, so I can’t trouble him any further.”

Man: “—! That wasn’t a proposal. I was just kindly telling you what I’m gonna do!”

As his eyes flared and his face reddened, the man reached a hand toward Emilia. In that instant, Emilia braced herself, thinking she might already have to rely on her last resort.

However, that didn’t happen.

???: “That will be as far as you go.”

Hearing that voice, Emilia had the illusion it was wreathed in flame.

Her ear that heard it, the brain that understood it, the heart that became aware of it—she felt as if they were seared by a flame too hot to touch, and a sound almost escaped her throat.

Man: “N—gh…!”

Before Emilia, who barely held back that sound, the man who couldn't hold it back let out a small groan. The right arm he had stretched out to grab Emilia was being gently restrained. The one who did that was a slender young man who had somehow appeared at the man's side.

With hair red like blazing flames and eyes as blue as a cloudless sky, a calm, dignified profile fixed straight on the man, the young man, before she knew it, was shielding Emilia behind him.

???: "If you say you'll continue to bother this lady any further, then I will be your opponent."

Man: "…"

???: "If you back down here, I'll let this go. The choice is yours."

His words were gentle, and she could believe without argument that there was no lie in them. At the same time, there was an undeniable force that brooked no refusal, and Emilia could understand why the man gulped.

Presently, the man, sweat breaking out across his face, pulled his arm back and retreated a step.

???: "Thanks for doing that; that helps."

To the man backing down, the young man spoke in a tone that also rang true.

Unable to say anything to the young man, the man left the alley just like that. Right before he did—

Emilia: "Listen, don't do things like this anymore, okay? It's reaaally dangerous."

At this, which she felt she had to say, Emilia raised her voice. The face the man showed her at the last was bitter in a way hard to describe.

Puck: "He might reaaally turn over a new leaf."

Emilia: “…If so, that’d be good.”

Once the fleeing man’s back disappeared, Emilia murmured that in reply to Puck. Then she quickly turned to the young man before her—the one who had helped her.

Emilia: “Thank you for saving me. Thanks to you, you reaaally helped me out.”

???: “Not at all, I’m just glad you’re safe. I happened to see him heading into the alley and got a bad feeling. I’m not particularly sharp, but I’m glad I hit the mark today.”

Emilia: “Really? Then I must’ve been lucky too.”

Puck: “The guy earlier said your luck ran out, and you’re also currently very much lost, though.”

Smiling at the kind young man, Emilia pursed her lips at Puck, who just had to add one extra line. However, she held back from addressing Puck here so as not to surprise the young man.

???: “By the way, would I be correct in saying the one you’re with is a spirit?”

Emilia: “Eh?!”

Her restraint lasted only a moment—startled by what the young man said. With his blue eyes, he looked straight at Emilia—no, at Puck, hidden in Emilia’s hair. For some reason, he could plainly see Puck. If he spread the word, everyone around would be shocked and chaos would ensue.

Thinking that, Emilia considered somehow fobbing him off, but—

Puck: “Don’t force it, Lia. A lie like that doesn’t seem to work on this kid.”

Emilia: “Puck…”

Rustling aside her silver hair, Puck poked his face out onto Emilia’s shoulder as he spoke. At his forthrightness, the young man opened his eyes slightly.

???: “I’m surprised. You are… no, you are a high-ranking spirit.”

Puck: “The ones surprised are me and Lia. As you can see, I’m small and cute. I meant to go unnoticed… and appearing in front of you is pretty hard, too.”

???: “For that, I apologize for the trouble I cause.”

Puck: “It’s fine~, you seem to have a troublesome constitution yourself.”

With his long tail swaying, Puck washed his face with a paw, and the young man gave a faint wry smile. Not understanding the meaning of their exchange, Emilia tilted her head, Emilia: “What do you mean?”

Puck: “Roughly put, he’s got a body that easily draws in the Mana around him. A proper spirit like me isn’t that affected, but Micro Spirits would probably be all smitten just by getting close.”

Emilia: “Smitten…”

???: “I don’t know how I appear to the other side, but I do often get treated kindly by spirits. Though it’s odd to say this in front of a bona fide Spirit Arts User.”

Emilia: “Smitten…”

Rolling the unfamiliar word on her tongue, Emilia looked the young man up and down. It was rude to stare, so only briefly, but the fiery impression she’d received upon hearing his voice and seeing him remained; now he wore a gentle air.

Kind and a very good person. —But she also thought he was someone with incredible power.

Emilia: “Ah, sorry. Come to think of it, I haven’t even asked your name yet, have I? I’m Emilia, and this child is Puck.”

Puck: “Nice to meet you~”

Reinhard: “Emilia, and Puck. I’m Reinhard. One of the Kingdom’s knights.”

Emilia: “A knight! You’re a knight, huh. Now that you say it, that makes reaaally perfect sense.”

Looking at the white outfit of the young man—Reinhard—and the fine-crafted sword at his waist, Emilia nodded again and again at his word that he was a knight.

She wasn’t very knowledgeable, but Emilia had learned that a knight was someone who bore a sword to protect their country or lord. Reinhard’s actions were exactly that, she thought.

Puck: “Right, Lia. Since it’s perfect timing, why not ask Reinhard?”

Reinhard: “—? Is there something I can help with?”

Emilia: “R-Right. Um, the truth is, we got separated from the girl we were with… It’s our first day in the Royal Capital, so when it comes to looking for her, the streets are just a complete jumble to me.”

Reinhard: “I see. By the way, what are the features of the person you got separated from?”

Emilia: “She’s tall, a maid with beautiful long blonde hair. Her name is Frederica.”

He was very likely walking the Royal Capital right now searching for them—Emilia conveyed Frederica’s features and looked to Reinhard’s reaction with hope.

However, after murmuring “Frederica…” to himself, Reinhard slowly shook his head.

Reinhard: “I’m afraid no one comes to mind. But if you got separated in the Royal Capital, if you go to a guard post, you might be able to hear something.”

Puck: “A guard post, huh—like a lost-child information desk?”

Reinhard: “It serves that role as well. If you like, could I guide you there?”

Emilia: “It’d help me reaaally a lot, but… are you sure?”

Disappointed to hear he didn’t know, Emilia widened her eyes at Reinhard offering to guide them. Was it really okay to accept so much from Reinhard—once for the man who had tried to do wrong, and a second time for guiding them? She couldn’t help feeling uneasy.

At Emilia’s reaction, Reinhard’s gallant face softened into a gentle smile.

Reinhard: “A knight’s duty is also to aid the townsfolk. In other words, this too is my job.”

And with that answer, he indelibly impressed upon Emilia just how admirable a knight was.

3

Emilia: “And then, while I was watching those traveling performers’ acts, we got separated…”

Reinhard: “If it’s them, I think I saw them as well while patrolling the city. However, the street they were on was, I believe, quite far from the alley you were in, Emilia…”

Emilia: “That’s right. I tried to get back to the original route somehow, but it seems I took the wrong streets.”

Puck: “That guy targeted you because he saw how generously you tipped, and after that you were wandering all over the city, so you must’ve looked like an easy mark~”

Reinhard: “It pains me to say this as someone charged with protecting public order in the Royal Capital, but it’s difficult to keep eyes on every last corner of the city. This isn’t limited to you, Emilia, but at the very least, keeping a sense of danger yourself is the trick to not getting caught up in it.”

Puck: “Hear that, Lia? No more aimless wandering.”

Emilia: “Oh, Puck, you say that like it’s someone else’s problem.”

Irritated, Emilia rubbed her fingertip in small circles against Puck’s brow atop her shoulder.

On the way as they followed the route Reinhard had offered to guide them along, Emilia felt entirely at ease, noticed his gaze, and let out a small “Ah,” before—

Emilia: “Right, um, Reinhard, it’s about Puck, actually…”

Reinhard: “It’s better not to mention him to others, yes. I think so too. It’s almost unheard of for a Great Spirit to appear in the middle of a city, and there’s no reason to stir up a racket needlessly.”

Emilia: “I hadn’t even said anything yet—that’s amazing. But I’d really appreciate it if you’d do that.”

Reinhard: “Think nothing of it.”

At Reinhard’s relaxed smile, Emilia patted her chest in relief and nodded back.

His strength was one thing, but Emilia could not help being impressed by his attentiveness as well. Was this thanks to his work as a knight, or was Reinhard simply someone who was especially considerate?

It felt more like the latter to Emilia, since whenever the townspeople of the Royal Capital noticed Reinhard as they passed, they would call out cheerful greetings to him.

Men and women alike, adults and children without distinction—everyone was favorable toward him.

Emilia: “Reinhard, you know an awful lot of people. Everyone calls out to you.”

Reinhard: “I often patrol the city like this, so that might be part of it. There are also… other reasons why everyone knows me, but…”

As Reinhard spoke, he glanced over at her, and Emilia tilted her head. In response to her reaction, Reinhard continued with, “No,” and—

Reinhard: “It seems that has nothing to do with you, Emilia.”

Emilia: “Really? In that case, I won’t pry any deeper…”

Thinking he probably did not want to get into anything too involved, Emilia answered like that. She wanted, even if not to the extent of Reinhard, to have feelings of consideration and thoughtfulness too.

Just then, as the corners of Reinhard’s eyes softened at her answer —

Puck: “Could that be the guard post? The atmosphere’s different from the other buildings.”

At those words, Emilia looked up, and just as Puck said, she caught sight of a large stone building whose atmosphere was a stark change from the commoners’ district they had been walking through. Unlike the storefront buildings, this one had a somewhat rough-hewn impression, and there were armored guards at its entrance.

And then—

Frederica: “—Lady Emilia!”

Calling Emilia’s name in a high voice was the tall, slender, blonde maid—the very Frederica whose whereabouts they had been searching for ever since they were separated.

Catching the sight of Frederica as she came trotting over with a pinch to her skirt hem, Emilia’s eyes went round, and from the bottom of her heart she felt relief: “You really were here.”

Reinhard: “She is your companion, then, Emilia?”

Emilia: “Yes, that’s right. To meet her again so soon… Thank you, Reinhard.”

To Emilia’s words of gratitude, Reinhard returned a smile and a, “You’re welcome.” Just then, Frederica reached Emilia’s side and bowed deeply.

Frederica: “My deepest apologies, Lady Emilia. Though I was by your side, to have left you alone in the Royal Capital…”

Emilia: “No, do not apologize, Frederica. I’m the one who was careless at the roadside. And since Puck was with me, I did not end up all alone.”

Puck: “We also happened to run into a kind person along the way~”

To the abashed Frederica, Emilia and Puck spoke in turn. Straightening her back, Frederica then bowed her head to Reinhard as well, who stood at Emilia’s side.

Frederica: “You have looked after Lady Emilia most graciously. Despite my blunder, you safely escorted her here. No matter how many words I expend, they cannot suffice to express my gratitude.”

Reinhard: “It’s quite alright. As you can see, this is part of my job.”

Frederica: “Then you are a knight, sir. Forgive me, may I have your name—”

???: “—Huh? Isn’t that Reinhard, nya? Wasn’t today your day off, nya?”

Cutting into Frederica and Reinhard’s exchange came a third party’s voice.

The speaker was one of a pair coming leisurely from the direction of the guard post Frederica had run from—a lovely girl with flaxen cat ears and fair skin in an adorable outfit. Fixed by the girl’s big round yellow eyes, Reinhard lifted his brows slightly.

Reinhard: “Ferris, what about you?”

Ferris: “As you can see, I was out strolling all lovey-dovey with Lady Crusch~… buuut—”

Crusch: “On the way, we happened to see this lady looking troubled. I could not leave her be, and so we spoke to her.”

Picking up where the one called Ferris left off was the woman standing beside her, dignified in bearing; in contrast to Ferris, she wore a crisp outfit with a base of deep navy. Just looking at her made one’s spine straighten; coupled with the sharpness of her amber, narrow eyes, to Emilia she seemed like a well-tempered, slender sword.

Frederica: “Lady Crusch, Lady Ferris, thanks to you, I was able to reunite safely with the one I sought. I am sincerely grateful for your kindness.”

Crusch: “It was the result of your earnest efforts. What Ferris and I did was trifling.”

Ferris: “Nyaa~ Lady Crusch says that, but ordinarily someone as exalted as Lady Crusch wouldn’t just casually help with lost-people cases, so don’t forget it, ’kay?”

Frederica: “But of course, there is no way I would forget. —For it is not someone else’s concern.”

Apparently, while searching for the lost Emilia, Frederica had become quite friendly with those women—Crusch and Ferris. Since Emilia herself had caused them worry, she ought to offer thanks as well.

Emilia: “Um, may I thank you too? It looks like, because of me, the two of you took great care of Frederica.”

Crusch: “As I said earlier, we did nothing of import. In her desperate state searching for her companion, Frederica was in too much of a rush. Therefore I merely made the practical suggestion that she should gather information at the guard post.”

Frederica: “I am ashamed to say it had not occurred to me until Lady Crusch graciously said so…”

Emilia: “Then I definitely want to say thank you. Thanks to you, Frederica didn’t stay stuck in trouble the whole time. Thank you for speaking to her. Is “Crusch-san” okay?”

Crusch: “Ah, I do not mind.”

Ferris: “It does ma~t~ter!”

Thrusting herself forward from Crusch’s side, Ferris pointed sharply at Emilia.

Ferris: “Lis-ten up, okay? I told Frederica-chan this too, but normally, someone of Lady Crusch’s station isn’t the sort you can just chat up all willy-nilly, nya. Calling her “Crusch-san” is out of the question! Properly call her Lady Crusch, or else Duchess Karsten!”

Emilia: “Duchess Karsten… A duchess is a suuuper high rank?”

Crusch: “The title is accurate. That said, I do not require, as Ferris says, such stiffness. So long as you mind yourself to the extent of not being discourteous, there is no problem…”

Ferris: “La~dy~ Cru~sch!”

Crusch: “Good grief. My first knight is severe.”

Crusch gave a faint wry smile, shoulders slightly raised. Even so, Emilia glimpsed between her and Ferris a solid bond—something like what existed between Emilia and Puck.

They were surely nearly like family, or bound by a trust even stronger.

Reinhard: “Even so, what a coincidence. That I would bring Emilia here to the guard post, and Ferris would bring her companion Frederica as well. It makes me a little happy.”

Ferris: “Well, it’s one thing for Reinhard to be helping people all year round, but it’s rare for it to just happen to line up on the same day Ferri-chan went out chatting folks up. If Julius heard this, he’d be sooo jealous~”

Reinhard: “If it were Julius, I think he’d be impressed we each helped someone in trouble on the same day.”

Ferris: “Buuut, he’d still get all mopey that we met up without him on his day off.”

Reinhard: “It really was just a coincidence, though.”

Next, Reinhard and Ferris chatted like close friends.

Indeed, just as they said, in a city this large, for two friends to happen to help bring together the separated Emilia and Frederica at the guard post was quite the coincidence.

Because of that, Emilia had the slightly under-reflective thought that maybe getting lost hadn’t been so bad after all—but—

Frederica: “Lady Emilia, there is one matter I must inform you of.”

Addressed in a lowered voice by Frederica, Emilia gasped softly, “Eh”. Frederica’s serious voice and expression tightened the face and thoughts that had been on the verge of relaxing.

However, before Frederica could say it—

Crusch: “—By the way, you were Emilia, yes? Frederica disclosed her station to me, and I heard she is associated with Roswaal L. Mathers, the Margrave. Are you the same?”

Emilia’s cheek tightened slightly at the question Crusch cast her way.

It was startling to have Roswaal’s name suddenly brought up, but more than that, the way Frederica’s expression went taut beside her made Emilia tense up as well. —She probably had wanted to tell this before this topic came up.

But she could not. Therefore Emilia had to answer Crusch herself.

Puck: “Lia, if you’re worried—”

Emilia: “I’m fine.”

Sensing the atmosphere and meaning to show concern for Emilia, Puck began to speak, but Emilia shook her head to that kindness and faced Crusch squarely.

Emilia: “Yes. I am also currently under Roswaal’s care. …Crusch, are you acquainted with Roswaal?”

Crusch: “We aren’t close, but we are both high-ranking nobles of the kingdom. We sometimes see one another at assemblies. —No, you are more stout-hearted than I expected.”

Emilia: “Eh?”

Crusch: “It means I am not fond of roundabout talk either. —Ferris.”

Nodding as if satisfied with something, Crusch called to Ferris at her side. At that, Ferris straightened her back, took something from her bosom, and presenting it with due reverence, placed it in Crusch’s hand, which Crusch then showed to Emilia.

In the next instant, Emilia’s amethyst eyes widened—“Ah.” —Upon Crusch’s palm, the insignia worked with a dragon’s motif, its red jewel, shone.

More than beautiful or mysterious, Emilia knew exactly what that meant.

Emilia: “The insignia is shining… Then, could it be you too—”

Crusch: “As I thought, you too, eh. —I am Crusch Karsten, head of House Karsten, and one of the kingdom’s Royal Candidates for the next monarch. In other words, one who will vie with you for the throne.”

Emilia blinked her eyes several times at that clear declaration.

With her gaze, Crusch prompted Emilia to take the insignia shining upon her palm.

Led by Crusch, Emilia received the insignia from her hand. —Sure enough, the red gleam of the Dragon Stone continued to shine just the same upon Emilia’s palm.

Ferris: “This lady is the same… as Lady Crusch…”

Seeing the Dragon Stone’s glow, Ferris’s lips trembled as she spoke. Whatever complicated shades of emotion were in her voice, the red light of the Dragon Stone overruled them without question.

No matter what she might feel about Emilia, it was none other than the Dragon Stone that had chosen Emilia, and caused her name to be entered into the life-or-death matter of the kingdom’s Royal Selection—

Reinhard: “—I must beg your pardon for my great discourtesy, Lady Emilia.”

Emilia, who had, without thinking, clenched the insignia and hidden its red radiance, looked up with wide eyes. There before her, bowing deeply, was none other than her great benefactor, Reinhard. He had changed from the familiarity he had shown up to now, and directed toward Emilia a sincere gaze, but one filled with respect.

The change in that gaze felt very large to Emilia.

Reinhard: “Even if I did not know, my attitude toward a Royal Candidate was far too familiar…”

Emilia: “No, it’s fine, really. I was the one who didn’t tell you anything, Reinhard. And—”

Crusch: “Strictly speaking, Emilia is not yet a Royal Candidate. Correct?”

Answering Reinhard, who had grown formal, Emilia nodded at Crusch’s words and re-stated her present position.

Indeed, Emilia was one of those who could shine the Dragon Stone of the insignia—that is, one of those qualified to participate in the Royal Selection to decide the next ruler of the Kingdom of Lugunica, which was without a Royal Family. However, that qualification had not yet been officially recognized.

She would enter the Royal Castle, shine the Dragon Stone before those of proper station in the kingdom, and have Emilia's position rightfully acknowledged. —That was the purpose of Emilia's visit to the Royal Capital this time.

Ferris: "And at such a suuuper important time, the person herself getting lost in the city, nya."

Emilia: "Uu… How embarrassing…"

Crusch: "Ferris, do not say such mean-spirited things. If it is one's first time in the Royal Capital, it is entirely possible to struggle with its cityscape and winding streets and take a wrong turn."

Frederica: "Regarding that, it is my failure, and Lady Emilia bears no blame."

Ferris: "Aww, now both Lady Crusch and Frederica-chan are taking Lady Emilia's side. Reinhard? You're on Ferri-chan's side, right~?"

Reinhard: "I wonder. However, in a first visit to the Royal Capital, I can understand why Lady Emilia might have found it difficult to ask those around her for help when she lost her way. That's what I think."

No matter what anyone said, it was Emilia herself who had gotten lost. With that burden of guilt, even if Crusch or Frederica defended her, Emilia could not say anything back to Ferris. —Or so she thought, but then, at the last, Reinhard's addition made Emilia knit her brows.

It wasn't enough to call it "nagging at her." It might have been nothing more than that on her first time in the capital, everyone had looked busily in a hurry, making it hard to call out to them.

However—

Puck: "I wonder just how much he's seeing."

At Puck's words, who seemed to have been snagged by the same remark, Emilia let out a small breath.

Somehow, she could not shake the feeling that from the start Reinhard had seen through her secret—not the fact of being a Royal Candidate, but the other one—completely.

Emilia: “You said you weren’t very perceptive, but was that a complete lie?”

Reinhard: “If that’s how I made you feel, I apologize.”

At Emilia’s slightly narrowed eyes and probing, Reinhard gave a faint, wry smile. His reaction made Emilia decide that this was the moment to steel herself.

And so—

Emilia: “I can’t keep it covered forever anyway.”

So saying, Emilia removed the hood of the robe she had kept on up to now—the one woven with a cognitive disruption spell—and bared her true face to everyone there.

Her silver hair flowed down her shoulders; the slightly long ears that felt the wind twitched. Blinking her amethyst eyes as they caught the light, Emilia accepted the surrounding gazes head-on.

At Emilia’s action, everyone around her showed a different reaction.

Puck and Reinhard, who knew what she would do, remained composed; Frederica brought a hand to her mouth in surprise; Crusch’s eyes went slightly wide and her cheek tightened. The one who reacted the most—whose emotions were very expressive—was Ferris—

Ferris: “Nya, nya, nya—what do you think you’re doing…?”

Emilia: “Um, I’m thinking of being a Royal Candidate.”

Ferris: “No, that’s not… I mean, that is not what I am saying. The one I’m asking “what are you thinking” is not you—it’s the Margrave of Mathers!”

Ferris: “Even if you can make the Dragon Stone shine, there’s no way an elf can become monarch!”

She put into words what surely everyone first thought. Only, there was one point in her words that had to be corrected.

Emilia, who bore the qualifications of a Royal Candidate and had come to the Royal Capital intending to officially declare herself a candidate for the era’s monarch, was not an elf. —She was a half-elf.

A half-elf with silver hair and amethyst eyes—the kind everyone in this world made an unpleasant face at.

4

Frederica: “Lady Emilia, not in a place like this.”

Of those present, the first to return to her senses from Emilia’s action was Frederica.

Sidling close, she set the just-removed hood back over Emilia’s head. For an instant, Emilia felt the urge to stop her with a “why,” but—

Puck: “Lia, that cat-eared kid’s voice is drawing attention. The maid’s judgment to keep this from turning into a weird commotion is the right one.”

Emilia: “You’re right. Thank you, Frederica.”

Frederica: “No, I’m the one who was presumptuous.”

As Frederica bowed and offered a soft apology, Emilia’s brows drooped. Then she turned anew to face the three who were staring fixedly at her—Crusch, Ferris, and Reinhard.

Perhaps it was the exchange just now and the fact that Emilia had put the hood back up, but the flustered Ferris had calmed somewhat and was hugging her own arms, looking awkward.

Before Emilia could say anything to Ferris—

Crusch: “…I must say, I was quite taken aback. Emilia, that robe—does it have some special power at work? Or is it your own power?”

Emilia: “Ah, that I look hazy? That’s thanks to this robe. Roswaal had it prepared—it’s a special make, he said.”

Crusch: “I see. If it’s the Margrave Mathers, that follows. However, Knight Reinhard, it seems even that effect did not work on you…”

Reinhard: “That was due to the Divine Protection of Discernment. Illusions and blinding tricks do not mislead me.”

Crusch: “So it outstripped the Margrave’s sorcery. I’ve learned something. You have my thanks.”

Reinhard answered the arms-folded Crusch with a brief, “Not at all.”

Emilia too had wondered how he’d broken through the cognitive disruption, so hearing “Divine Protection” satisfied her. Once that exchange wrapped up—

Ferris: “…I apologize for raising my voice earlier.”

Ferris, who had apparently been waiting for a chance to speak, bowed to Emilia as she said this. But Ferris had no reason to apologize. If anything, the one who should apologize was Emilia.

Emilia: “No, I should be the one— I startled you, right. It was like that in the forest where I lived, too. When I take off my hood, everyone gets reaaally surprised…”

Puck: “It hasn’t just stopped at surprise—we’ve had some pretty awful things said to us, and yet you can say that here; I think you’re admirable, Lia. My girl is cute and tough.”

To Emilia, who fluttered her hand, Puck—who at some point had dissolved his materialization and withdrawn into the Crystal Stone—said that.

He was likely being considerate in his own way so that, with Emilia shocking everyone by taking off her hood, he himself wouldn't be seen and make them even more surprised.

Be that as it may—

Crusch: "Certainly, I would be lying if I said I wasn't surprised. Emilia, those features of your hair and eyes are…"

Emilia: "By birth. So I've had a lot said about me, and I know people will keep saying things, but even so, I—"

Clenching a small fist, Emilia put voice to her resolve.

She well understood by now how much people grimaced at a half-elf—especially one with silver hair and amethyst eyes. Surely many would dislike an Emilia intent on becoming monarch and say harsh things to her.

Even so, Emilia had left the forest in pursuit of a possibility that was not zero—because there truly was a way there to save everyone frozen in ice in the forest.

Crusch: "So it's with resolve. It seems you have circumstances, but I understand your thinking."

Emilia: "Crusch sa… sama."

Crusch: ""-san" or without honorific is fine. Apart from titles and ranks, we are equals. You have no objections, Ferris?"

Ferris: "If Lady Crusch puts it that way, Ferri-chan can't say a thing, nyaaa."

Relaxing her lips as if to confirm it, Crusch got that answer from Ferris with the severity gone from her face. At Ferris's response, Crusch dipped her chin, and Emilia instantly brightened.

Emilia: "Then I'll call you Crusch-san."

Crusch: "Very well. But I would have you never forget this, Emilia."

Emilia: “Never forget… what?”

Crusch: “That just as you have a reason to seek the throne, so do I. Being chosen by the Dragon Stone was chance, but I’ve decided to make full use of that opportunity.”

Confronted with Crusch’s forthright declaration, Emilia involuntarily held her breath.

Sensing in Crusch a resolve no weaker than her own from moments earlier, Emilia truly realized anew that she was a rival for the throne.

Whoever the opponent, there was only one throne Emilia had to obtain. Seeing the one she would contend with, she felt, for the first time clearly and close, the cruelty of that fact.

Crusch: “Meeting you by chance today makes it worth having come all the way to the capital.”

Emilia: “Crusch, you don’t usually live in the Royal Capital?”

Crusch: “I normally reside in the Karsten Duchy. However, a rumor reached my ears: that the Margrave Mathers would bring a new Royal Candidate to the capital.”

Ferris: “So it’s a reaaally big coincidence, nya. To meet not at the castle, but as a lost child at a guard post, nya~”

She’d been surprised enough already, but that answer surprised Emilia yet again.

Crusch and her companion had, in fact, come to the capital expressly to meet Emilia—to learn as soon as possible what manner of person a fellow contender in the Royal Selection was.

Emilia: “I’m reaaally glad I met you today, Crusch.”

Crusch: “Likewise.”

Smiling, Emilia and Crusch nodded to one another. Emilia was curious, and anxious, about what kind of people the Royal Candidates besides herself were.

But with Crusch as the first of them, she felt her heart considerably relieved.

Ferris: “Once again, I apologize for my discourtesy, Lady Emilia.”

Once her exchange with Crusch had wound down, Ferris again offered an apology. Emilia, however, didn’t think Ferris’s words and deeds had amounted to rudeness. So she answered, “I don’t mind at all,” but—

Ferris: “That won’t satisfy Ferri-chan, nya. So…”

Taking a step as she spoke, Ferris closed the distance to Emilia, and suddenly brought her lips near Emilia’s ear. Surprised by the unexpected tallness of the girl leaning in, Emilia’s eyes went round—

Ferris: “—The truth is, I’m not a girl; I’m a boy, nya.”

Emilia: “Eh?!”

Ferris: “Consider it an apology for making you take off your hood. I don’t usually tell people on a first meeting.”

With a tiny tongue-out and a mischievous smile, Ferris gave Emilia her biggest surprise of the day.

Perhaps even more than the traveling performers’ amazing acts or Crusch’s Dragon Stone shining.

Emilia: “I had no idea.”

Ferris: “Naturally. Experience and resolve, you see.”

So saying, Ferris puffed his chest out with a hint of pride. What struck Emilia was that behind Ferris, Crusch wore just as proud an expression.

Crusch: “My apologies, but I have an appointment after this. Emilia, let us make another opportunity.”

Ferris: “Thanks for having us~. Frederica-chan, see you later~”

After seeing Crusch and Ferris off, Emilia let the tension leave her shoulders with a “phew.”

A sudden meeting with a Royal Candidate had, naturally, made her nervous. Even so, the unexpected encounter had surprised her, but it was by no means a bad one.

Puck: “She had a dignified air. She’ll be a formidable foe for you, Lia.”

Emilia: “Yeah. Crusch felt like a reaaally proper person. I’ve got to pull myself together so I won’t lose.”

Puck: “If it’s a contest of “properness,” you don’t seem to have much of a shot, so let’s hope the criteria for becoming monarch isn’t about degrees of properness. It’d be nice if they judged Lia’s good points.”

Puck’s opinion was severe even before any proper comparison, but Emilia herself admitted that if they competed right now, she’d be at a disadvantage.

Be that as it may—

Reinhard: “Lady Emilia, it was an honor to be present at such a valuable occasion. However, I must return to my patrol soon.”

Emilia: “Right, of course. I’ve wound up relying on you for absolutely everything, Reinhard…”

Reinhard: “I told you, didn’t I? It’s my job. I’m glad I could be of help today, unexpectedly. I’m also rooting for you in the Royal Selection.”

Emilia: “—! Thank you.”

Buoyed by Reinhard’s words, Emilia found a natural smile rising to her face.

Parting from him as he returned to city patrol, she waved until his back was out of sight, deeply impressed by his conscientious attitude.

Puck: “In the blink of an eye, everyone’s gone, huh.”

Emilia: “Yeah. But I’ve got Frederica with me. I’m reaaally glad.”

Frederica: “I am truly sorry… It is the greatest blunder of my life. Had anything at all happened to you, Lady Emilia, I would not have been able to face the master.”

Emilia: “I made you worry a reaaally lot, didn’t I. But don’t worry—it’s okay. Puck and I were lost, but it only went as far as a bad person talking to me in an alley.”

Frederica: “A bad person in an alley?!”

At Frederica’s emerald-green eyes widening, Emilia hurried to dispel the hasty misunderstanding.

Emilia: “Reinhard stepped in there, and it was truly fine.”

Puck: “If anything, you might even feel bad for the guy who tried to do wrong, right?”

Frederica: “…With a Great Spirit present, no run-of-the-mill villain could do anything improper to Lady Emilia. That makes sense. Even so—”

Nodding at Emilia and Puck’s words, Frederica briefly gazed off into the distance. Her eyes turned toward the direction of the street where they had just seen Reinhard off.

Emilia: “Frederica? Is there something about Reinhard?”

Frederica: “You may not know, Lady Emilia, but that gentleman is famous not only in the Royal Capital… no, in the entire kingdom. That red hair and the sword at his hip—there is no mistaking the “Sword Saint.”“

Puck: “Ahh—Reinhard. I see, I see, that explains it~”

Emilia: “Hey, no fair, the two of you understanding each other like that without me. What’s a Sword Saint?”

Frederica: “To put it extremely simply… he is said to be the strongest not only in the kingdom, but in the world.”

Emilia: “…The strongest in the world? You mean, stronger than Puck?”

Puck: “If I’m brought up here, I can’t be so timid as to say I’d lose, can I.”

From within the Crystal Stone, Puck answered in a tone like he was washing his face with a paw.

—To Emilia, the strongest being in the world was Puck. When Puck had come to the forest to fetch her, Roswaal, who had traded magic with Puck on equal terms, had seemed to her like he might be the second strongest in the world.

Emilia: “But for you, who knows Roswaal so reaaally well, to say that about Reinhard… he must be truly amazing.”

Frederica: “It was also my first time meeting him in person, so I’ve only heard the rumors. But to happen to cross paths with such a person by chance…”

Puck: “It means my Lia’s a lucky girl.”

Emilia: “Lucky? …I’m empty-handed right now, though.”

There was nothing in her hands, and she had handed over her allowance in full to the traveling performers.

Strange as it was, despite Puck not being materialized, Emilia felt as if he and Frederica exchanged a glance and a wry smile at her reply.

Frederica: “At any rate, let us return to the inn. What was meant to ease your nerves before tomorrow’s audience at the castle has turned into quite the unintended interlude.”

Emilia: “Right. …If I tell Roswaal I got lost, will he be disappointed?”

Frederica: “With the master, I can already picture him laughing it off merrily… I don’t think he’d be disappointed, but if you’d rather not worry him, we could keep quiet.”

Emilia: “Mm, okay. Ah, but I might want to tell him we met Crusch and Reinhard. Especially Crusch—she’s a fellow Royal Candidate.”

Puck: “Hmm, I predict the slip-up’ll come out around the point where Reinhard enters the story.”

Emilia: “Don’t say weird things.”

Talking like that, they finally set off on the return leg of their first stroll through the Royal Capital.

Even on the way back to the inn, things didn’t go smoothly: Emilia nearly got sidetracked again by eye-catching sights, and having failed once, Frederica’s overprotective solicitude exploded at the street vendors calling out to Emilia.

As a final note: after Roswaal, who had been out on business, rejoined them at the inn, in the course of recounting the day, Emilia carelessly mentioned that she had gotten lost—making all the effort of coordinating stories with Frederica come to absolutely nothing.

5

The next day, granted the promised chance to enter the castle, Emilia passed beneath its gate.

In the Royal Capital, the ground rises the closer you get to the city’s center, and in the very middle of that round terrain a splendid castle towers. Because of that, even yesterday, as Emilia wandered lost through the commoners’ streets, the castle’s imposing figure was always within her view.

To be invited straight in through the front of such a splendid castle felt very strange indeed.

Roswaal: “That won’t do at a—all; you simply must get used to it. A—after all, when Lady Emilia becomes queen, this castle will be Lady Emilia’s ho—ome.”

Roswaal said this lightly as he led the fidgety, glance-darting Emilia toward the castle as her guide.

But Roswaal was right. It was only natural for the monarch to reside in the capital’s castle, and Emilia had chosen to leave the forest to seize that position.

And today, she was setting foot in the castle to be recognized as a Royal Candidate.

Emilia: “—I think I’ll get along just fine with Crusch, though.”

Clutching the crystal stone at her chest tight, Emilia thought of Crusch, whom she had met yesterday.

Though they were in the same position, vying against one another for the throne, from what Emilia had heard there were three more Royal Candidates besides herself and Crusch who could make the Dragon Stone of the insignia shine. Naturally, those three yet unmet would be Emilia’s rivals just like Crusch.

Even so, the encounters with Crusch, and with Reinhard, were hopeful ones for Emilia—because they had not been excessively afraid of her.

Emilia: “A half-elf with silver hair and amethyst eyes… just that is enough to make a reaaally large number of people scared.”

But Crusch and the others had not reacted that way. Of course, as Crusch herself had said, they had been surprised—somewhat. Even Ferris, the only one to react the way Emilia knew all too well, calmed down quickly after that first fluster.

So she allowed herself to hope—maybe. Maybe the people she would meet in this Royal Capital, the other Royal Candidates she would strive with from now on, would, when it came to Emilia—

That faint hope of Emilia’s—

Anastasia: "—Hmm? I'd heard a snippet and thought, "Is that really so?" but for the fourth candidate to truly be a half-elf… what a letdown."

Priscilla: "—Galling though it is, this vixen and I are of one mind. At long last, I heard a new candidate had emerged—one to wrest the throne from me—and I came, only to find it a wasted trip."

Those were the words and gazes that greeted Emilia as she entered the antechamber—gazes and words devoid of kindness in every sense, brimming with merciless hostility.

—Anastasia Hoshin and Priscilla Barielle.

Following Crusch Karsten, upon meeting these two other Royal Candidates in the capital, Emilia had her momentum truly cut out from under her, and could only stand there at a loss.

6

—It was at the very same time that the "Sword Saint" Reinhard rescued Emilia, who had gotten separated from her retainer Frederica and was wandering about the Royal Capital.

Russell: "—I always considered you a curious sort, an oddball, but I must admit I did not expect you to be such a thoroughgoing eccentric."

Roswaal: "O—oh my, oh my. To have someone I've known for over ten years say that about me means I'm not entirely washed u—up yet, does it no—ot?"

Russell: "How does anything in my present assessment lead you to such a twisted conclusion?"

Roswaal: "As far as I kno—ow, there's no one who prepares in all directions as thoroughly as yo—ou. To surpass even your expectations and imaginations is quite an accomplishment, wo—ouldn't you sa—ay?"

Smiling like that as he tipped his cup, Roswaal drew a faint wry smile from Russell Fellow.

The place was a run-down tavern in the Royal Capital's commercial district, one that had stood there since olden times; for generations it had been secretly owned by House Mathers. In normal times it was rented out and run by others, but when Roswaal needed it, he could have the place cleared out like this at will, which made it very handy.

Accordingly, there were only two people in the empty shop: Roswaal and Russell.

Roswaal: "Of cou—urse, that would be if you had truly come alone, ho—owever."

Russell: "A dull feint. We both get more than our fill of probing each other's bellies elsewhere. At least while sharing cups with a friend, I'd like to be free of the occupational disease."

Roswaal: "In—indeed. That's quite true as we—ell."

When Russell lifted the cup on the counter, Roswaal clinked his own against it.

As Russell said, their stations were what they were. Living in a world where schemes and stratagems swirled, backroom struggles and clandestine feelers were everyday affairs; it was only natural to want a breather now and then.

That said, Roswaal's image of Russell Fellow was of a man who, in practice, would bring subordinates with him—several of them, not just one. It was the sort of thing Roswaal found agreeable in a friend, and he had not the slightest complaint about it.

Russell: "So? What exactly are you playing at?"

Roswaal: "Wh—whatever could you mean?"

Russell: "Spare me the pointless dodging. I refer, needless to say, to the new Royal Candidate you've sponsored… the half-elf girl."

Faced with that straightforward cut, Roswaal narrowed his eyes in high spirits.

Naturally, he had not been trumpeting Emilia's existence. He had brought her to the capital to prove her eligibility to participate in the Royal Selection, but that too was a matter handled in utmost secrecy. Nevertheless, Russell had already grasped even her origins. Truly, there were no chinks in his armor.

Which was exactly why it had been worth the trouble to summon him like this.

Russell: "If I may be frank, I am surprised you were interested in the Royal Selection at all. Despite holding the station of Margrave of the western marches, you have until now shown no eagerness to involve yourself deeply in national politics. And yet, here you are, having on your own found a new candidate…"

Roswaal: "It simply mea—ans the kingdom's governance was stable. Even if I, who am fully occupied with the administration of my own domain, did not poke my no—ose in, the Royal Family and the Council of Wise Men kept the country running quite we—ell."

Russell: "And because that premise collapsed, you grudgingly bestirred your heavy hips? If so, the speed from rising to results is too fast. The search for the "Dragon Priestess," while not publicized, is a matter of national urgency. You accomplished that alone. Which leaves me little choice but to think this."

On his stool, Russell turned to face Roswaal head on.

With his intelligent, keen features tightening slightly at the cheek, he said:

Russell: "You knew in advance that the Royal Selection would begin—in other words, that the Royal Family would be severed."

Roswaal: "…"

To that suspicion, Roswaal answered with silence.

If, hypothetically, that suspicion were fact, it would be a grave matter. Needless to say, a Margrave was among the great nobles of the kingdom. For one to overlook a colossal crisis about to befall the Royal Family, and to fail to stem the root of the present turmoil, would be a betrayal beyond argument, deserving of just that brand.

On the surface, Russell was said to be the representative of the Royal Capital's merchants' guild, but given his true standing, such a thing was a great crime that could not be overlooked. Not even a decade-long association would be an indulgence; it was mistake enough to lead to a parting of ways.

However—

Roswaal: "That I foresaw beforehand the calamity that would befall Their Majesties, and secured a person in advance to sponsor for the Royal Selection to come; that I would rule the kingdom from the shadows and wield authority to my he—eart's content—all for that, you say?"

Russell: "Yes. From a bird's-eye view, that is the most convincing scenario."

Roswaal: "…"

Russell: "…But only if the one you sponsored were not a half-elf."

Before Roswaal's testing gaze, Russell let out a long, deep sigh.

He could feel the taut tension ruling the room slowly unravel. Roswaal's lips naturally loosened at that reaction.

Russell: "A natural line of reasoning—thrown out of joint by the final condition. There is no such thing as putting a half-elf on the throne."

Roswaal: "Is that so? Perhaps I, dazzled by power, dirtied my hands with folly without caring about appearances?"

Russell: "You're clearly objective enough to call it folly. …Indeed, if that were your aim, it would be folly. Which is why this baffles me."

Roswaal: "It is, certainly, an enigma—atic situation."

Russell: "Don't speak as if it were someone else's affair. You are the source of that enigma."

With a hand to his brow, Russell slowly shook his head; the menace had already left him.

From his perspective, Roswaal's moves were surely nothing if not baffling.

In the present kingdom, being a leading supporter of a Royal Candidate carried tremendous weight—but only if that candidate had a real chance of properly ascending the throne.

In the Kingdom of Lugunica, where fear of the "Witch of Envy" was deeply etched, no one would believe, much less accept, that a girl of the same origins—and even the same physical traits—as that "Witch" would become monarch.

Yet Roswaal had, despite that, deliberately sponsored that girl, Emilia.

Roswaal: "So, in you—our eyes, I am a gambler who, in the wake of the Royal Family's severance, was first to declare for the Royal Selection shown by the Dragon History Stone, only to flaunt a hand so tattered it has no chance of winning."

Russell: "Gambler? More like a jester. Your makeup backs that up."

Roswaal: "Ha—ha—ha, how se—evere you a—are."

Clapping his knee at the sting in that remark, Roswaal nodded magnanimously.

Even without being told, Emilia's present value was nothing more than making up the numbers in the Royal Selection. And for now, that appraisal was not a problem—indeed, it was desirable.

Roswaal: "People's hearts burn far more for a story of a weakling clawing up from rock bo—ottom than for a sure thing racking up victories by sheer competence, after a—all."

Russell: "Roswaal?"

Roswaal: “No—no, it’s nothing at a—all. Your worries are unfounded. I am a commendable Margrave who strove to steady the kingdom’s shaking foundations as swiftly as possible… let’s leave it at tha—at.”

Russell: “…”

Roswaal: “What a doubting look that i—is. Well then, not as proof, but there is one thing I’d like you to do.”

Meeting Russell’s suspicious gaze, Roswaal slowly raised one finger. Staring at the finger—and at Roswaal past it—Russell closed one eye.

Russell: “…I’ll say this first: the merchants’ guild intends to remain neutral regarding the Royal Selection. I do not plan to choose whom to support based on the length of our acquaintance, either. Don’t expect me to take sides.”

Roswaal: “But of co—ourse. I’ve always respected your fairne—ess. Taking sides? Perish the thought. If anything, what I’m asking is the opposite.”

Russell: “The opposite?”

Roswaal: “Spread a rumor. That the next, new Royal Candidate is a half-elf with silver hair and amethyst eyes.”

At Roswaal’s request, Russell’s puzzlement deepened further.

He rated Roswaal as not a man who did things without purpose. Yet both this request and his moves toward the Royal Selection were hardly what one would call orthodox; to Russell, it seemed there was nothing down that road but collapse.

Being able to keep upending this clever friend’s expectations was immensely delightful, but of course Roswaal was not playing a prank merely for a moment’s amusement.

He would not betray a friend’s expectations—Roswaal was a man who did not do anything meaningless.

Roswaal: “I’ll leave the method of spreading it to you; for now, it need not permeate the public. Keep it to the depth where it reaches only the ears of the keen, so to spe—eak.”

Russell: “…Ultimately, what is your aim, Roswaal?”

Roswaal: “N—nothing too difficult. Let’s call it this level of hope: that the one I want to hear the rumor will catch wind of it and be prompted to come to the castle to take a peek; that would make various matters progre—ess nicely.”

Russell: “…I knew it—understanding you is a hard task.”

Saying that, Russell knocked back his cup in one go and let out a long breath.

There had been many chances before to break off relations with Roswaal, saying he did not understand him. And yet, here Russell was, still keeping company with Roswaal like this.

Finding that strangely endearing, Roswaal generously poured the next cup into Russell’s empty one, to honor that friendship.

7

—And this was the day after Roswaal and his scoundrel friend’s little scheme.

Anastasia: “—Hmm? I’d heard a snippet and thought “Is that for real?”, but for the fourth candidate to actually be a half-elf… what a letdown.”

Priscilla: “—Galling though it is, this vixen and I are of one mind. I heard at long last a new candidate had appeared—one to vie with me for the throne—and came, only to find it a wasted trip.”

In the antechamber of Lugunica’s Royal Castle where she had come to present herself, Emilia was on a bed of nails.

Today, before the kingdom’s dignitaries, Emilia would make the Dragon Stone shine and thereby prove that she was a candidate in the Royal Selection to decide Lugunica’s next monarch.

Roswaal had left, saying preparations were needed, and Emilia had been left in the antechamber with her attendant Frederica, intent on somehow steadying her pounding heart—when she received an unexpected visit from the other Royal Candidates.

Emilia: "…"

Fixing their gazes on Emilia, who stood in the middle of the antechamber, were two girls whose impressions could not have been more different, yet who were both radiantly self-possessed.

One was a girl with pale-violet hair wrapped in a fluffy, warm-looking white outfit; the other, a girl whose orange hair was adorned with jewels, dressed in a luxurious crimson gown as red as blood.

Though they had yet to formally give their names, their earlier remarks as they looked upon the startled Emilia made it plain: these two were also Royal Candidates, the same as Emilia—

Puck: "Never thought we'd get two at once—color me surprised. Add in that dignified girl from yesterday, and that makes all the candidates we know about now, yeah?"

In stark contrast to Emilia turning stiff as a board, Puck inside the crystal at her breast was carefree.

Even so, prompted by Puck, Emilia nodded inwardly at once. "You're right."

Yesterday, during her stroll through the capital—she had gotten lost along the way, but—she had met Crusch Karsten, who was likewise one of the Royal Candidates.

At present there were four Royal Candidates found within the kingdom, Emilia among them. Which meant Emilia had now faced every candidate currently known.

She was not ready for it, but that was a little moving in its way.

Frederica: "If I may be so bold, ladies, just a moment of your time."

Stepping in for Emilia, who was still reeling from the unexpected encounter, was Frederica.

Tall and willowy, she straightened her back and, with graceful poise, took her place at Emilia's side. With emerald eyes she met the intruding candidates' gazes.

Frederica: "This antechamber was prepared for Lady Emilia here. To force your way into her room without so much as prior notice—what are we to make of that?"

Anastasia: "Oh my, ya got me there."

Priscilla: "And is an attendant maid, of all people, planning to address me as an equal here?"

Frederica: "I have no intention of pleading equality of station on the question of etiquette. I simply believe that those gifted with excellence of ability and rank ought to conduct themselves with the dignity that befits it."

Even Emilia, who was poor at reading between the lines, grasped that Frederica's answer to the two candidates was unfailingly courteous yet yielded not a single step.

And Emilia understood as well that this strength was something Frederica brought forth for Emilia's sake.

Therefore, if they took grave offense at Frederica's words, Emilia would have to stand in the breach and take it on herself—

Or so she resolved inwardly, but—

Priscilla: "Hmph. You are a maid with an impudent tongue. And yet, that you did not avert your eyes and lodged your protest for your mistress's sake is not bad. I shall forgive you for that spirit."

Anastasia: "Goodness, ain't the princess roundabout with her words. Me, I'll just say it plain: what the maid said hit home. We did get a li'l ahead of ourselves."

Priscilla: "Vixen."

Anastasia: “What? Glare all ya like, ya won’t get a single coin outta me.”

In an instant, the two girls stopped snapping at Frederica and began glaring at each other instead.

Relieved that Frederica was not being chastised, Emilia still very much wanted to avoid having either of them make a scene here, so she hurriedly interposed herself.

Emilia: “Um—wait, you two. Please don’t fight.”

Anastasia: “Fightin’? This ain’t even close to a fight. Right?”

Priscilla: “Indeed. If one would cross blades of words with me, one must be of fitting stature. A half-devil and a foreign vixen do not suffice.”

Emilia: “…”

Called a half-devil so baldly, Emilia’s throat tightened slightly.

Even Ferris, who had been surprised to learn Emilia’s origins yesterday, had not spoken that word aloud. It conveyed an even greater sense of rift between Emilia and others than “silver-haired half-elf.” It was a pain she had been on the verge of forgetting, living away from the forest among Roswaal’s people.

Anastasia: “I got my issues with how the princess said it too, but… what’s with yer reaction? Don’t tell me ya thought nobody’d ever say it to yer face?”

Emilia: “That’s not what I…”

Anastasia: “Had the crafty Margrave Mathers as yer backer, and with all the rumor-mongerin’ I was kinda expectin’ a certain sort of person… Feels like I got the rug pulled from under me.”

Narrowing her round, asagi-blue eyes, the girl in white turned a face that had already lost interest in Emilia.

That reaction stabbed Emilia’s heart worse than being called a half-devil.

So, on reflex, Emilia said, “Wait,” trying to make her turn back.

She had called out, but had not decided what to say.

Anastasia: “What? If ya got somethin’ to say, spit it out plain—”

Emilia: “—Your name!”

Anastasia: “…”

Emilia: “You still haven’t told me your names. Frederica’s… ah, I mean the girl next to her—you accepted what she said, didn’t you? Exchanging names is basic courtesy, right?”

She had blurted out the thought as it came, but Emilia felt like she had managed something not bad to say.

At her appeal, the girl in white blinked her round eyes and said:

Anastasia: “—Anastasia Hoshin. That’s my name.”

Then Anastasia turned to the other girl in the gown, who had been silently watching the exchange.

Anastasia: “Princess, how ’bout you at least givin’ yer name, too?”

Priscilla: “Are you about to preach that I ought to hold hands and match strides? Do you truly think your name and mine are of equal worth…?”

Anastasia: “If the princess ain’t gonna say it, I’ll just go ’n tell her myself. That fine by you?”

Priscilla: “Hah. You are a slippery merchant.”

Prodded by Anastasia’s lifted chin, the girl in the gown stepped forward.

Feeling heat even from the pressure of the confidence that poured off her, Emilia nearly shrank back.

But she bit that feeling down—she could not afford to lose—and raised her face.

Priscilla: “I am Priscilla Barielle, and without error I shall be Lugunica’s next queen.”

Emilia: “…The Royal Selection hasn’t even started yet.”

Priscilla: “To take time and have candidates compete is a foolish spectacle. Which among us is fit for the throne ought to be known at a glance. People will always insist on inserting roundabout, needless rites to decide who stands at the summit. I cannot comprehend such common thinking.”

Her manner—Priscilla, as she named herself—looked less exasperated than downright weary. As if she had experienced the same tiresomeness elsewhere, not only in the Royal Selection.

Emilia: “Have you been doing the same sort of thing somewhere else, too?”

Priscilla: “—You seem to mistake me for a child who expects any question to be answered if she but asks. Do you also forget what prompted the vixen and me to give our names in the first place?”

Emilia: “Ah—”

Priscilla: “You demand courtesy of others while neglecting it yourself? That shameless brass face must have served you well in life as a half-devil.”

Priscilla censured Emilia, who had spoken her thoughts and then forgotten to return her own name in turn. Color rose in Emilia’s cheeks; she opened and closed her mouth.

She had to give her name back even one second sooner, but her mind had gone blank.

Seeing Emilia’s hesitation, Priscilla narrowed her crimson eyes still further, about to say something—

Puck: “—I would like you to stop bullying Lia any more than this.”

—when a small cat-shaped spirit floated up before Emilia, along with a faint light, and cut in.

Leaving the crystal at Emilia's breast, Puck drifted up to eye level, softly bobbing; his appearance made all three—Emilia, Priscilla, and Anastasia—open their eyes wide.

Soaking up their gazes, Puck casually washed his face with a paw.

Puck: "Staring that much is embarrassing. I mean, sure, I'm cute enough to sing and dance."

Emilia: "Puck! All of a sudden like that… you'll scare everyone reaaally badly!"

Puck: "That was exactly the point. The flow had gotten a bit bad, so I went, "Okay, time to boldly, forcibly change the wind right here," y'know."

Emilia did not know what to say to Puck's twitching ears and wink. She did understand that her own demeanor had worried him, and that he had deliberately made himself the bad guy to break the mood for her sake.

In fact, while staring at Puck, Priscilla and Anastasia each said—

Priscilla: "A spirit… no, not a mere spirit. A Great Spirit in the form of a small cat."

Anastasia: "I heard there're all kinds of spirits, but one that can manifest this solid and talk this clear ain't exactly common. Color me surprised."

Puck: "Sorry for the scare. It is just a father's heart, popping out when his daughter is in a pinch."

Anastasia: "Hmmm? Is that so?"

Puck struck a jokey pose, rubbing his chin, and Anastasia's interest sharpened. Drawing out that reaction, Puck laughed and flicked a glance Emilia's way.

Even Emilia caught the cue in that glance—time to pick up the thread.

So she leaned on Puck this once and began, “That’s right.”

Emilia: “Puck is my precious family. Sorry for him leaping out. Also—”

She laid a hand over her breast and looked straight at Anastasia and Priscilla. She drew breath into her belly so she would not lose to the gazes aimed back at her.

And—

Emilia: “Allow me to introduce myself properly. I am Emilia—just Emilia. One of the candidates in the Royal Selection. It is a pleasure to make your acquaintance.”

She bobbed her head and at last managed the self-introduction she had failed to do earlier.

Arms crossed, Puck nodded and nodded; one step behind, Frederica patted her chest in relief. Anastasia brought a hand softly to her cheek and answered, “Well then, nice to meet ya.”

Emilia was relieved. But the other, Priscilla, snorted faintly.

Priscilla: “Even if you give your name with the help of your housecat, my estimation of you does not change. The one possessed of excellence is that spirit, not you.”

Puck: “Oh? But if I’m this super-duper strong and I am with Lia, does that not prove Lia is a pretty incredible girl too?”

Anastasia: “Whether a spirit stays with someone has less to do with strength and more to do with whether they like ’em… or so I heard somewhere, y’know?”

Puck: “Oof. Tough crowd.”

Puck’s long tail swayed as he winced at what each of them said.

To be fair, they were not wrong. It would not do for Emilia to stand behind amazing Puck and delude herself into thinking she was amazing too.

Emilia: “If I gave you the wrong impression, I apologize. Puck is my reaaally precious family, but I am the one who will challenge the Royal Selection. He is not the one competing.”

Puck: “Lia.”

Emilia: “It’s fine. Thank you, Puck. So, if you still cannot bring yourself to call me by name, Priscilla, I will accept that. But someday—”

Priscilla: ““Someday, that we may call each other by name,” is it? A half-devil wishing to make cozy with others is beneath contempt.”

Cutting Emilia off, Priscilla turned her back. She drew a fan from the valley of her ample bosom and hid her lips behind it.

Priscilla: “The mood is spoiled. I had not expected much to begin with… and indeed, I can only think that going through some grand rite called the Royal Selection is of no use to me.”

Anastasia: “My, how stubborn. With me and the Duchess Karsten both standin’ opposite ya, do ya won’t regret talkin’ big like that?”

Priscilla: “But of course not. —For the world is made to be convenient for me.”

Leaving those words behind, Priscilla walked out of the antechamber without looking back.

The closing door cut off the sight of her back, and Emilia had no words with which to call her to a halt.

Emilia: “…”

Once the door clicked shut, what Emilia felt was an overwhelming sense of isolation—and a sliver of relief. Relief that she would no longer have to face Priscilla in the same space. Which is to say, she had been overpowered by Priscilla.

Puck: “Do not let it get to you too much. That one—her self is very strong.”

Emilia: “But if I had done better, maybe we could have talked more.”

Anastasia: “Dunno ’bout that. I’m with the spirit on this one. That princess’s iron will ain’t the kind that softens easily.”

Emilia: “And you are…?”

Anastasia: “Ah, but that don’t mean I’m gonna go easy on ya, either. Whatever ya were born as, whatever hand of cards ya were dealt, yer the one who chose to play. So don’t expect any coddlin’.”

Told, in other words, not to rely on others’ kindness, Emilia found even Anastasia leaving her at a loss for words. And right then—there came a knock at the door that had only just closed.

Julius: “—Lady Anastasia, are you within?”

Anastasia: “Mm, that’s my man. Mind if I let him in?”

Tilting her head, she asked, and Emilia nodded. “Yes.”

Frederica, taking that, went to the door and admitted the new arrival to the antechamber.

He was a tall, slender knightly youth with beautiful yellow eyes.

Anastasia: “Julius, ya sure took yer time. Where’d ya stop off?”

Julius: ““Stopped off” is uncalled for. I was walking all over the castle looking for you when you were not in your room, Lady Anastasia.”

Anastasia: “That so? I told Mimi to leave ya a message, y’know.”

Julius: “…And it seems Mimi is not with you, either.”

At the youth’s faint wry smile—he was called Julius—Anastasia raised a hand to her brow.

They both seemed to be a little put out, but—

Julius: "I beg your pardon. I have not even given my name yet."

Emilia: "Ah, no, it's fine. It looks like you were in the middle of something important…"

Anastasia: "We can put it off—well, it ain't that casual a matter, but not introducin' ya'd be rude. Julius, this is the new Royal Candidate, Miss Emilia."

Julius: "—I see."

At Anastasia's introduction, Julius's long eyes narrowed. His expression tightened just a little; Emilia straightened her back without thinking. Sensing her tension, Julius added a brief apology.

Julius: "Allow me to introduce myself. I am Julius Juukulius, a knight of the Kingdom of Lugunica's Royal Guard, presently serving as Lady Anastasia Hoshin's first knight."

Emilia: "First knight…"

Julius: "Among the knights who serve a lord, it is the one who stands closest to that lord and has sworn to bear the sword for them."

At Julius's crisp answer, Emilia was duly impressed; Anastasia, for her part, seemed a tad proud.

By Emilia, Julius lifted his face and, with a serious look in his eyes, continued.

Julius: "Lady Emilia, might I have a moment?"

Emilia: "…Yes, what is it?"

Julius: "—Is that not a Great Spirit there with you?"

Puck: "Ah, me?"

Emilia, bracing for who-knew-what, was thrown for a loop by the question. When the one addressed—Puck—tapped his tail against himself, Julius bowed deeply.

Julius: “I must apologize again for the delay in my greetings. I did not expect to be so fortunate as to meet a Great Spirit of so high a station.”

Puck: “Oh, I see. I thought I was gettin’ that vibe—you have the sort of body that draws spirits, then.”

Julius: “I do. If this is disagreeable to you—”

Puck: “Nope, do not worry about it. I am head-over-heels for Lia, so even near you I just think, “Mm, smells nice in here,” is all.”

Julius: “You have my thanks for your consideration.”

Puck fluttered a paw; Julius was exceedingly abashed. Emilia did not follow what they meant, nor did Julius’s demeanor sit right with her.

Seeing Emilia’s profile, Anastasia called to her knight.

Anastasia: “Julius, she’s lookin’ left behind. Why don’t ya explain, huh?”

Julius: “Indeed. Lady Emilia, allow me to show you my buds.”

Emilia: “Buds—oh.”

Suddenly, pale lights rose around the smiling Julius—six distinct lights circling him in an affectionate orbit. Their irregular motions were those of beings with will; even without words, Emilia could feel that they were spirits.

Not as powerful as Puck; not as fleeting as Micro Spirits—Quasi Spirits.

Julius: “I style myself a Spirit Knight, a knight contracted with spirits. You, too, seem to be a practitioner of the Spirit Arts contracted with a Great Spirit, Lady Emilia. I ask that you remember me.”

Emilia: “Yes. It makes me reaaally happy to know there are others who are friends with spirits.”

Moved, Emilia clasped her hands before her chest at the self-styled Spirit Knight.

Emilia herself was a practitioner contracted with Puck, but much of her ability was self-taught, and she had never met another spirit user. There was one person who might just barely have counted, but they had been enemies—and in the end, he had been swallowed as he merged with a Great Spirit of flame, disappearing entirely.

So this was her first time meeting someone besides herself who truly communed with spirits.

Emilia: “I have things I have to do after this, so we cannot talk long now, but let’s talk again somewhere, Julius-san.”

Julius: “Please, call me Julius. You are a Royal Candidate, Lady Emilia; I am no more than a humble knight.”

Emilia: “Julius… All right. I will.”

Julius: “Thank you. As for your kind invitation—by all means, let us make the opportunity.”

Having politely corrected how she addressed him, Julius replied so, and Emilia smiled.

Since the moment Priscilla and Anastasia had entered the antechamber, it was the first time Emilia had felt even a moment’s rest. It lasted only until Anastasia cleared her throat with an “Ahem”.

Anastasia: “Okay, that’s enough. Julius, ya know she’s a Royal Candidate. Don’t cozy up too much. Don’t forget where ya stand, ’kay?”

Julius: “Forget? Never. I am Lady Anastasia’s first knight. In all situations, putting Lady Anastasia first is my duty.”

Anastasia: “Good. Then we’re fine.”

Anastasia shrugged at Julius's earnest answer and, stroking the fox stole around her neck, continued with a "Well then".

Anastasia: "We stayed longer than I thought. Emilia's got the next thing to get to, and I'm worried Mimi'll start tearin' up the castle, so how 'bout we take our leave."

Emilia: "Ah, you are going? Um, I could not even offer you anything…"

Anastasia: "Oh? So ya can worry 'bout that part proper-like. But we barged in on our own today, so don't ya fret. We did get our souvenir nice 'n proper."

Emilia: "Souvenir?"

Tilting her head, Emilia saw Anastasia wave with a vaguely mischievous smile. She took Julius along toward the door.

Anastasia: "See ya 'round, Miss Emilia."

Julius: "Please excuse us. —Until we next meet, may you be in good health."

The master casual, the knight solemn—leaving those farewells behind, the two departed the antechamber. After seeing them out, Frederica closed the door.

Emilia: "Haaah…"

And Emilia let out a very, very big sigh.

Puck: "Lia, I always tell you—if you sigh, happiness will run away."

Emilia: "…Mm, but you also always say you'll go catch the happiness that ran away and bring it back, right, Puck?"

Puck: "Oof—past me just stabbed me. That is a grievous wound."

Emilia: "Oh, stop saying such silly things."

Puck poked his own tummy and back with his long tail, clowning, and Emilia could not help but laugh. Letting Puck distract her, she looked at the closed door.

The two who had come—Priscilla and Anastasia—and the one she had met yesterday, Crusch—those were the ones who, like Emilia, would vie for Lugunica's throne.

Puck: "Each one of them looks like she will be no simple matter. But my daughter is the cutest. You should be confident; hold your head high."

Emilia: "Does cuteness have anything to do with whether you can become the monarch?"

Puck: "I would not say it does not, but if cuteness scores too highly as a criterion, that would make one uneasy about the selection process in its own way, so perhaps not."

Even though Puck had just said it himself, it did not feel very helpful as something to take confidence from. And Emilia could not quite bring herself to believe the talk of her being cute.

With anyone, what they felt upon seeing Emilia was fear, unease, and dread.

Frederica: "Lady Emilia, you handled those sudden visitors very well."

Emilia: "Ah, and you—thank you for staying with me, Frederica. I felt reaaally reassured."

Frederica: "No, forgive me. There were parts where I could not judge how far I ought to speak, and I fear I made you anxious in many respects."

Emilia: "No, it is fine. …I think that was the right way."

Shaking her head at Frederica's bow, Emilia thought Frederica's judgment had been correct.

Overawed by Priscilla and Anastasia, Emilia had barely been able to answer at all. That was her present standing, and simply the measure of the gap between them.

Feeling as if she had closed that gap by relying on Frederica's strength was a delusion.

Emilia: "It is no different whether I hide behind Puck or behind Frederica, after all."

Puck: "True enough. If you are going to hide behind one of us, though, you might fit better behind this girl than behind me."

Frederica: "Great Spirit, I am a little sensitive about being tall, you know."

Puck: "I think a svelte, model-like figure is great. And if I put my mind to it, I can be bigger than a cute, palm-sized kitty, so I shall not lose there."

Frederica: "To say I would compete against a Great Spirit—that would be dreadfully presumptuous."

Emilia: "Hee hee, you two…"

It felt like they had strayed from the main point, but thanks to Puck and Frederica's joking exchange, the tension that had been in the room seemed to have eased considerably.

Still, she could not let it all drain away—because Emilia had come to the castle for a purpose, and the main event of that purpose was just about to begin.

Emilia: "…Mm. I have to pull myself together."

Pressing a hand over her breast, Emilia firmed her resolve and murmured so.

8

—To cut to the conclusion, the resolve Emilia had steeled and the determination she had firmed up did not help.

It wasn't that she wound herself too tight and spun her wheels.

More plainly, she never even got the chance to voice that resolve or determination.

Roswaal: “Lady Emilia, you must be ti—ired after to—oday.”

Emilia: “Ah, Roswaal…”

Addressed from behind, Emilia turned to face Roswaal.

They were at the Royal Guest House—a residence opened for nobles visiting the capital from various regions—and Emilia was on its balcony, gazing out at the city at night.

Holding down her silver hair as the tepid breeze stirred it, Emilia was awash in a vague, hard-to-name feeling; she couldn’t bear to look at Roswaal’s face and dropped her gaze. At this, Roswaal lifted a brow with an “Oh?”

Roswaal: “What’s the ma—atter? This doesn’t look quite like ti—ired to me.”

Emilia: “…I’m sorry. I couldn’t do anything right at all.”

Roswaal: “You mean your statement of participation in the Royal Se—lection? As I said then and the—ere as well, to—oday’s rite was purely a formality. As per the Dragon History Stone’s inscription, once the fifth priestess—once the last one is found, the Royal Selection will truly begin. Tha—at will be the real thing.”

Emilia: “…”

Roswaal: “Or is it your exchange with the other candidates who visited your antechamber that lingers on your mi—ind?”

Emilia: “…I think… it’s both.”

Winking one eye, Roswaal fixed the yellow one of his mismatched eyes on Emilia. Feeling as if that eye saw right through everything, Emilia resigned herself.

—Emilia’s declaration of participation in the Royal Selection had ended smoothly, quietly, without incident.

After receiving the visit from Priscilla and Anastasia in the antechamber, Emilia had been summoned to a large conference room in the castle, asked there to make the Dragon Stone in her insignia shine, and she did so. Thus her qualification to participate in the Royal Selection—that she was a Dragon Priestess—was recognized… and that was all.

No more and no less; Emilia was given no chance to speak.

She did not know if, as Roswaal said, that was because it was purely a formality—but she felt it plainly: the indifference to, and avoidance of, Emilia as an individual by those who were there.

Roswaal: "My apologies. If you were fired up to speak, I should have told you in advance tha—at you likely would not get the chance to share your resolve to—oday."

Emilia: "…You're right. If you knew, I might have liked you to tell me."

Roswaal: "It was not abs—solutely certain. Had either Lord Miklotov or Lord Bordeaux attended—both were absent to—oday—you might have had the chance to speak your mind."

Emilia: "Really? That's…"

She wanted to go on with "a shame," but she hesitated.

It had been a long time, yet being subjected to that vortex of indifference brought it back.

—What those around her had thought of her and how they had treated her back when she lived in the forest with Puck. And that it was a cold wind Emilia, who would now challenge the Royal Selection, would have to endure constantly from here on.

Roswaal: "Leaving the conference room aside—how were the other candidates? I hear you met Crusch Karsten yesterday as we—ell."

Emilia: "All three of them were… how should I put it… they felt reaaally strong."

Roswaal: “Strong?”

Emilia: “Ah—by “strong” I don’t mean in the sense of fighting. I mean in heart, as people—they felt strong to me. I have to work hard, too.”

Clasping her hands before her chest, Emilia tried to psyche herself up.

Leaning on the balcony rail, Roswaal peered into her face and—

Roswaal: “And? Do you think you can defeat the—em?”

Emilia: “…”

The question was so guilelessly direct that Emilia blinked wide.

To win, to lose—she would now have to vie in just such contests with Crusch, with Priscilla, with Anastasia, and with the as-yet unmet one more.

And when that unavoidable winning and losing came to the test—could Emilia, against them—

Emilia: “I have to win.”

Roswaal: “Tha—at is closer to zeal… or rather, to a wish. “I want to win. I want to obtain it. I want to be happy.” Those are wishes, not winning cha—ances.”

Emilia: “Winning chances…”

Roswaal: ““I have this; therefore I can excel over the others.” Piling up and bundling those winning chances—that is the iron rule for bringing victory clo—oser.”

At his explanation, Emilia mouthed “winning chances” once more.

The difference in those winning chances was showing itself in how she and they stood and comported themselves.

From here on Emilia would have to study a great deal and spend her days filling what she lacked; if she stacked that up, would it become winning chances?

Even as they, in the same span of time as Emilia, would be stacking up different chances of their own.

Roswaal: “The—ere is also another way to earn those chances in large amou—ounts.”

Emilia: “Eh, there’s a way like that?”

Roswaal: “Yes. A way you can use only once—but if it works, the effect is la—arge.”

Emilia: “A-Amazing… Roswaal, you really do know everything.”

The anxiety and worry filling her chest were all at once drawn toward Roswaal’s words.

A way for Emilia, who could find no winning chances at all right now, to close in on the other candidates all at once. And that was—

Roswaal: “In a word—to have a good kni—ight.”

Emilia: “…A knight?”

Roswaal: “Yes. Well, it need not be a knight strictly speaking, but in a struggle over something as big as a kingdom, having powerful allies is an essential conditi—ion.”

Emilia: “…”

Roswaal: “Among them, a knight’s role is especially large. One who stands nearest the lord, swears loyalty, and, at times, does not hesitate to lay down their very life—an office that demands absolute tru—ust.”

Raising his hand toward the night sky, Roswaal spoke with a theatrical air. Emilia paid the theatricality no mind; her amethyst eyes blinked as she nodded in understanding.

To become the monarch at the kingdom’s summit meant being trusted by all one's people. And the one who knew best what kind of person that monarch was would be the one closest at hand.

For Emilia as she was now, that meant Puck. How Puck behaved and how great he was would often connect directly to Emilia's reputation.

Surely it would be the same with a knight—so thought Emilia, and then it occurred to her.

Emilia: "Could that be what a "first knight" is?"

Roswaal: "You've heard of it. Ye—es, just so. If you spoke with the other candidates yesterday and to—oday, their knights should have been at their si—ides."

Emilia: "They were. Ferris was with Crusch, Julius was with Anastasia… Priscilla came alone, so I didn't see anyone for her."

What Ferris and Julius had in common was that they trusted and cherished their lords—Crusch and Anastasia—very much. The strength of those bonds was something even Emilia, meeting them for the first time, could feel—those two would never, no matter what happened, betray their lords.

And Emilia felt as well that Crusch and Anastasia each had solid reasons—reassuring qualities—by which their knights could offer them such loyalty.

Emilia: "…But it's strange."

It was something Emilia had just been called on—and made to realize—by Priscilla that very day.

Even if she was contracted with Puck, a great spirit, that did not make Emilia herself a great person. She must not hide behind Puck and delude herself into thinking she had become eminent.

And yet, though a first knight should be something similar, neither Crusch nor Anastasia seemed to be hiding behind Ferris or Julius.

Roswaal: "That's because it is a relation of mu—utual support."

Emilia: “A relationship… of mutual support?”

Roswaal: “Not leaning on them too much, not seeming to lean on them too much, but supporting each other properly—becoming aids to each other’s progress. Somet—hing like that.”

It was odd phrasing—like hearsay—even though he himself was the one saying it; Emilia turned Roswaal’s words over and over in her mind.

They were the very best expression of the relationship she had seen between the candidates and their first knights.

Emilia: “Then I…”

If she had a first knight, could she catch up to them? She was about to think that too simply when Emilia stopped short.

It probably wasn’t that simple. First off, if it were anyone and anytime, that relationship would already exist between Emilia and Puck.

Emilia: “…Then, if Puck became my first knight, would that be good?”

Roswaal: “A Great Spirit as the first kni—ight would be, well, striking—but how much it would contribute to the Royal Selection is questiona—able.”

Emilia: “I see… that’s a shame.”

Even without Roswaal saying so, simply announcing “Puck is my first knight” would do nothing to change people’s impressions of Emilia, and above all, it would do nothing for Emilia’s own state of mind—so it would be no good.

What was needed was a relationship of mutual support. It was not enough that the first knight be a great person; Emilia herself had to strive to stand alongside that great person, or it would be meaningless.

Roswaal: “I’m gla—ad you understand.”

As if seeing right through her inner struggle, Roswaal smiled.

Roswaal: “No need to rush; there is still ti—ime before the Selection begins. You can take appropriate time choosing a knight. Depending on that—”

Emilia: “Ah—what about Reinhard? The knight I met yesterday—could we ask him?”

Roswaal: “—!”

Emilia: “Huh? What’s wrong, Roswaal? Your face just got suuuper bitter…”

Roswaal: “No, I was merely taken aback by an unexpected proposal. I see—the “Sword Saint,” Reinhard van Astrea…”

Blurting out Reinhard’s name drew from Roswaal a reaction Emilia had never seen from him before; she wondered if she’d said something wrong.

Thinking it over calmly, Reinhard was said to be the strongest in the world, and yesterday he had been patrolling the capital—he might be in a very busy position. To suddenly ask such a person to become her knight might well have been thoughtless.

Emilia: “It’s just… he seemed reaaally reliable.”

Roswaal: “You’re not wrong the—ere. In terms of strength, Knight Reinhard is undeniably the most reliable of presences… Even if we cannot make him an ally, he is one we would not want to make an ene—emy.”

Emilia: “—? “Even if not an ally”—isn’t that backwards?”

Roswaal: “Ha—ha—ha, perhaps so. I—it's just that where he sets his standard for things is a little ha—ard for others to gra—asp.”

With a rare bitter smile, Roswaal averted his eyes; it seemed he was not pleased with the idea of Reinhard becoming Emilia’s knight.

Perhaps the two did not get along very well.

If so, whether or not she would ask Reinhard to be her first knight, Emilia wanted them to get along.

Emilia: “They’re both my benefactors, after all.”

Roswaal had shown Emilia hope when she’d been alone with Puck in the Elior Forest; Reinhard had helped her when she was in trouble in the capital. The scale of the deeds differed, but both were dear benefactors to Emilia.

Royal Selection or no, it was better if they got along.

Roswaal: “There’s no need to hurry; let’s make our preparations step by ste—ep. Really, do not wo—orry. If Lady Emilia strives in earnest, you will without fail obtain what you nee—ed.”

Emilia: “—Mm. Got it. Thank you, Roswaal.”

Wanting to reassure her, Roswaal spoke; Emilia lowered her chin quietly.

She felt impatience, even fretfulness. Holding all of it dear, Emilia had to move forward—for those who expected things of her, and for her friends in the forest.

Emilia: “Someday, I’ll have everything I need.”

Roswaal: “Yes, indeed. —Otherwise I would be in tro—ouble.”

In too small a voice for Emilia to truly hear; yet the taut line of Roswaal’s profile as he spoke seemed terribly striking.

9

Emilia: “Frederica, if you were to have a knight of your own, what kind of person would you want?”

Frederica: “Eh—me?”

Having finished setting up the bedchamber and just about to leave the room when Emilia stopped her, Frederica covered her mouth with a hand, surprised by the unexpected question.

Looking up at the taller woman, Emilia nodded a simple “Mm, yes,” and waited for Frederica’s answer to the question she had thrown out. Perhaps seeing the seriousness in Emilia’s manner, Frederica thought for a moment, then said:

Frederica: “If it were me, I would wish for a knight who is sincere and who spares no words.”

Emilia: “Sincere means earnest and kind, right? But what do you mean by “spares no words”?”

Frederica: “That he would not conceal or omit his own thoughts or what he wishes to convey to the other party, but would speak in a way one can truly understand. Merely being treated so, I believe, naturally lets a relationship of trust sprout between you and that person.”

Emilia: “Then the opposite sort of person would be…”

Frederica: “Quite impossible to get along with. Especially one who presses on brusquely with “understand without me saying it,” and even if you somehow struggle through, not a single word of praise… There is simply no way I could ever be friendly with such a person. Indeed. Not at all.”

As Frederica spoke, something seemed to bubble up in her, and her gaze grew stern; Emilia thought she seemed to have a particular someone in mind, but she could not tell who.

Be that as it may—

Frederica: “Lady Emilia, please do not worry yourself too much. I expect I will have very few opportunities to accompany you from here on, but you have my heartfelt support.”

Emilia: “…Mm. Thank you.”

Seeing Frederica out after her parting for-the-night greeting and deep bow, Emilia was left alone.

Just as she had said, once this trip to the Royal Capital was complete, Frederica was to go on to another mansion at Roswaal’s direction. During the Selection, Emilia and the rest would live at a mansion closer to the Royal Capital, and the sisters Ram and Rem would be in charge there.

Emilia had known Frederica since those first few days after leaving the Great Forest of Elior—when, due to a small mix-up, she had imposed on the mansion of Roswaal's kinswoman, Annerose. So the thought of being truly apart felt a little lonely.

Emilia: "But I mustn't mope. Everything starts from here."

Puck: "Yep, yep, that's the spirit, Lia."

Emilia: "—! Puck, you're still up, even this late?"

Staying behind in the bedchamber, stiffening her resolve, Emilia widened her eyes at Puck's voice from within the crystal.

Because Puck was a very powerful spirit, he consumed a great deal of mana simply by living normally, so he generally kept as quiet as he could and, as a rule, went to sleep early at night. That Puck was up late into the night truly startled Emilia.

Emilia: "If you stay up too late, tomorrow will be hard, you know? What a naughty boy."

Puck: "Well, it was a big day for you, so I'll stay up late at least today. Don't you have all sorts of gripes and things you want to say?"

Emilia: "Gripes…?"

Puck: "Didn't even cross your mind? That'd just mean you'll bottle it up, which isn't good for you. C'mon—if you've got something to say, go on and lay it on me."

Though he was inside the crystal, she could almost see Puck thumping his own chest.

At Puck's words, Emilia touched a finger to her lips with a "You're right," and thought a bit. If it was "gripes," she figured she would have to let out unpleasant things and worries.

Emilia: “But, when you say such things out loud too much, I feel like it calls in an ill wind instead, so I’d rather not.”

Puck: “Oh dear, is my counseling office going out of business already?”

Emilia: “I mean—you’re the one who taught me that too many sighs and too much griping make happiness run away.”

Puck: “Ah, so I’m the one who put my own counseling office out of business…”

Though he was inside the crystal, she could almost see Puck washing his face with a paw.

Even with Puck’s offhandedness and light tone, he could properly stir up the murky feelings in Emilia—truly quite a family.

In any case—

Emilia: “What do you think about that thing we were just talking about, Puck?”

Puck: “About Lia and knights and whatever? Let’s see—if someone shows up who wants to be Lia’s knight, first they’ll have to pass my strict screening.”

Emilia: “Screening—what kind of screening?”

Puck: “Since I’d be entrusting my precious Lia to them, I’ll screen whether they’re stronger than me, whether they can treasure Lia more than I do, and whether their fur is fluffier than mine.”

Emilia: “Those all sound hard to clear, don’t they?”

Puck: “That’s why it’s a strict, proper, rigorous screening.”

Puck answered without a hint of shame, but if she believed him wholesale, Emilia’s search for a knight certainly looked like it would be rough going.

However—

Emilia: “Do you think I’ll really be able to find a knight like the others—one with that kind of relationship?”

Puck: “Are you anxious, Lia?”

Emilia: “More than anxious… it’s like—I just can’t picture it at all.”

She had asked Roswaal whether Reinhard might be a candidate, but when it came to picturing Reinhard as her knight actually acting on her behalf, she could not imagine it.

Other knights like Ferris or Julius—she might be able to get along with them, but it was hard to conjure up the shape of her as the mistress and them as the knight. To begin with, she had only just gotten used to being looked after by Frederica.

In the first place, Emilia was not at all familiar with having someone serve her.

Emilia: “But a knight—no, my knight is supposed to be a relationship of mutual support, so it’s surely different.”

Puck: “Heh heh, even if you don’t really get it yet, your head is full of knights, huh, Lia?”

Emilia: “Um… is that strange?”

Puck: “Nope, I think it’s adorable. What sort of child would make a good knight, I wonder? I already told you my criteria—but what are yours, Lia?”

Emilia: “My criteria? Let me think…”

Prompted by Puck, Emilia seriously tried to give hazy shape to her ideal knight—what sort of person would be reassuring, someone she could become close to.

There were conditions like strength and rank, like what Puck and Roswaal sought in a knight, but the first thing Emilia thought was—

Emilia: “…Someone who won’t be afraid of me.”

Puck: "…"

Emilia: "And I'd want them to get along with Puck, and I'd be happy if they could also hit it off with everyone in Roswaal's mansion. I haven't really talked to her much yet, but Beatrice, who hides in the mansion—she's like your little sister, right? I think someone who could chat easily with Beatrice, too, would be good."

Puck: "My my, once you started, they came out one after another. Could Lia be a bit greedy?"

Emilia: "Hmph, it's fine—I'm going to say every single thing that comes to mind right now."

Pouting at Puck's teasing, Emilia began counting her wishes off on her fingers.

Still imagining a knight whose face and name and very existence she did not yet know.

Emilia: "I think someone who laughs a lot would be nice. Also, someone who finds everything tasty. I have to work hard at my studies, too, so if they aren't lazy but a hard worker, it'll feel like we can work hard together. And also, reaaally fast on their feet…"

Puck: "I like that "fast on their feet" made the list."

As the things she counted on her fingers grew, Emilia surprised herself.

Today she hadn't managed anything right at all; she'd been disheartened by the gap between herself and the other candidates she had just met—and yet here she was, able to laugh like this and look forward to tomorrow.

Partly, that was thanks to Puck. But not only that. There was also the support of the people who stood with Emilia—Roswaal and Frederica.

And even that was not all.

Emilia: "My knight is amazing."

Just thinking like this about a knight she had never met made her heart feel so much brighter.

Without fretting that looking forward to “someday” was a luxury for her, Emilia kept excitedly talking about the topic until Puck, staying up late, let out a huge yawn.

—Afterward, shortly before the Selection actually began, Emilia, having returned once more to the Royal Capital, would meet a black-haired boy and be tossed about by countless happenings.

But that boy laughed a lot, found everything tasty, was a hard worker, could get along with Beatrice and everyone at the mansion, was friendly with Puck, and—

And he was a strange, lively child who wasn’t afraid of Emilia.

END

Once Upon a Time in Astrea (CA)

1

???: “—Pant wetter.”

With that, feeling as if he had heard a voice disparaging him, a tremor ran through the shoulders of Heinkel Astrea.

His eyes downcast, he looked over the state of his surroundings in the dressing room. Those perceiving him, and secretly gossiping about him— were none. Nobody was doing anything like talking behind his back.

That was only natural. The only ones present here were those whose qualification to enroll in the Kingdom of Lugunica’s Guard had been recognized; true Knights who had resolved themselves to not tarnish that honor.

In that case, whose disparaging voice had that been? —Nobody met those conditions, save for himself.

???: “Heinkel, we’re all headed to the Silver Shield after this, got any plans?”

Heinkel: “Huh? Ah, ahh, sorry. Tonight doesn’t work for me. The shopkeep… nevermind, it’s nothing.”

Invited by a colleague after having finished training, Heinkel forced a smile and vaguely ended the conversation. The colleague gave a brief response of “I see” before leaving the dressing room with his comrades.

Watching those backs depart, Heinkel let out a deep sigh.

Heinkel: “The Silver Shield… how could I possibly show my face before Conwood-san?”

That which appeared in his mind was the face of the shopkeeper of the Silver Shield, a bar of preference for those in the Guard— he was a person with whom the Astrea Family was long acquainted, and thus someone Heinkel had known since the days of his childhood.

With his current frame of mind, he did not want to encounter such a person, and he would not know what to say. Hence, despite not having anything to do, Heinkel declined his colleague's invitation, and began to head home by his lonesome.

As he avoided the gazes of others and left the training ground, the neighborhood had already grown quite dark.

The training ground of the Guard, adjacent to the Royal Castle Lugunica, was a place where Knights without any other duties which needed attending would gather every day to strengthen their bodies and mind by swinging their swords. Heinkel was no exception. Today, he had swung his sword to the point that the blisters on his hands had burst, and had lost so much sweat that his body felt light.

Through all of that accumulated effort, all of that sweat, he would mold his mind and body into those of a Knight. And once his body and mind had reached a sufficient state, the long-awaited moment would arrive— or it should have.

Heinkel: "…That would only be if I had the right."

Looking down at the blood-stained bandage wrapped around his palm, Heinkel muttered in a hoarse voice.

Feeling the sword inscribed "Astrea" weighing heavily on his waist, Heinkel's steps proceeded terribly slowly on his way back home. There was no mistaking that the white moon aloft in the night sky also found Heinkel's pace to be irritating.

Those steps of his, as if a snail's crawl, suddenly came to a screeching halt. —It was not that his weak-minded nature had reached its pinnacle. The cause was a peculiar voice that struck upon Heinkel's eardrums.

???: “At~, last~”

With a faint liveliness to it, it sounded like a woman’s breathing.

On a street quite deserted in the night, Heinkel turned his head at the strangely enthusiastic voice of a woman, widening his blue eyes in surprise. —After all, the woman was on top of a wall.

On the same street as Heinkel, she was taking dangerous steps atop a wall that was not very wide.

Heinkel: “Be caref-!”

Woman: “Eh? Au-!”

The moment he raised his voice, Heinkel flustered to shut his own mouth. But, it was too late. Her attention captured by Heinkel’s voice, the woman missed her next step in a grand spectacle.

Seeing the woman’s body tilting towards the other side of the wall, Heinkel momentarily forgot about his responsibility and regret, and immediately placed his foot on the wall, forcibly pulling the woman into an embrace as she was about to fall.

And then—

Heinkel: “…”

Catching a glimpse of golden hair gleaming in the moonlight, and wide, circular blue eyes up close, he was captivated by their beauty, and his breath involuntarily caught.

As a result—

Heinkel: “Shi—!”

He ought to have held his ground atop the wall, but the excess momentum from the woman carried over as he held onto her, and they both fell down the other side. —The other side of the wall, into the stream running through the Noble District, an inappropriate splash resounding through the silence of night.

—That was the first meeting between Heinkel Astrea, who had just formally become a Knight, and Louanna Hartley, his future wife.

2

Woman: “I’m truly sorry about all this~.”

Heinkel: “No, it was because of my inadequacy. To fall down from such a height, it’s shameful.”

Woman: “You aren’t shameful or anything of the sort~. You’re spoolio~!”

Heinkel: “Sp-Spoolio?”

Woman: “It means “super duper coolio”~!”

At the vigor of the woman, who clenched her fists as she emphasised that, Heinkel’s eyes widened, his appearance resembling a drenched rat.

The time was right after he had jumped out to save the woman as she was about to fall from the wall, and had messed it up. He had just barely managed to fall into the stream first, and thus had successfully lifted the woman to prevent her from breaching the water’s surface, but that conduct was far too shameful to be appraised as “spoolio” or anything of the sort.

Sitting on a stone curb by the side of the stream, Heinkel wrung out his tunic whilst thinking such things. And as Heinkel reflected on himself in such a manner, the woman dried his head with her own hand towel,

Woman: “Even though it was all because of my carelessness, you went ahead and got so soaked in my place…”

Heinkel: “Don’t worry about that. To be honest, it could’ve ended with neither of us getting soaked. It was me who messed that up, so me getting soaked was just my punishment for that.”

Woman: “—? Punishment is meant to be retribution for sins, y’know? You helped me out just now, so what could be the sin in that? This sort of thing is a misunderstanding on the part of the one delivering the punishment. A mistake of someone in the heavens… for example, the Divine Dragon-sama or something like that~.”

Heinkel: “That’s way too presumptuous, so I’d rather conclude that it’s my mistake…”

The hastiness of her words seemed as if it could lead to a direct confrontation with the Divine Dragon if left unchecked, prompting Heinkel to faintly strain a smile. Overwhelmed by the novel exchange with the woman, he realized he had forgotten to ask the things he ought to have asked.

Heinkel: “Let’s put off the matter of me being drenched for now. More importantly, there’s something I want to ask you.”

Woman: “Yes? Yes. —Ah! Nevermind~, I understand even if you don’t say it~.”

Heinkel: “Huh?”

Woman: “—I’m Louanna Hartley~.”

Placing a hand over her chest, the woman declared so with a somewhat confident expression. Understanding that to be the woman’s— Louanna’s name, Heinkel scratched his red hair.

Likely, she had intended to predict Heinkel’s question in her own way.

Heinkel: “Although, the thing I wanted to ask was the reason why you were up on that wall.”

Louanna: “…Ah~! I-Is that so? Of course. That makes sense. Actually that might’ve just been the most natural thing to ask, um, y’know. This is quite embarrassing.”

Heinkel: “No! I was also thinking of asking you for your name! After all, it would be inconvenient to talk to you without knowing your name!”

As he spoke, he felt pathetic, wondering if he could not have perhaps come up with a better cover, but at Heinkel's words, Louanna blinked her wide eyes, and then smiled.

Heinkel thought that smile would have surely perceived him as looking ridiculous, but.

Louanna: "You're quite the clumsy person. It's spoolio."

Heinkel: "…Those two things don't exactly go together, right?"

Louanna: "No, they do go together~. In society, there's also weirdos who like spicy food, isn't that so? In truth, it's sweet things that go together with yummy, right? But, for those people, spicy things are what go together with yummy. It's the same thing as that~."

Heinkel: "…I don't think it's that rare for someone to like spicy food."

Louanna: "Don't tell me, are you also someone who prefers spicy food~?."

Heinkel: "Nah, I wouldn't go that far. I prefer sweet things."

The exchange and dialogue being far too childish, even he himself was astounded. Or rather, he had allowed Louanna to seize far too much initiative. Perhaps it was so that Louanna did not wish to disclose her reason for being atop the wall to Heinkel. Normally, people did not walk on top of walls. That was, so long as this seemingly harmless Louanna was not involved with some sort of crime.

In that case, there was no way that Heinkel, being a Knight, could shut his eyes to it for the time being—

Louanna: "Ah, this won't do~. The reason why I was on the wall, right? I haven't answered that yet."

Heinkel: "Will you tell me?! That's… a relief."

Louanna: "Yes, I'll help out~… To tell you the truth, I'm being chased by someone."

He had thought it might be something she wished to hide, but Louanna immediately spoke out.

But, at her soft spoken explanation, Heinkel spoke “What?” as his cheeks tensed.

So it was a matter of being pursued by someone, and climbing on top of the wall in order to get away? In that case, it was a rather reckless action, but since there was context behind that recklessness, he could understand it.

As he thought so, Heinkel looked over Louanna before him.

Likely, she was either the same age as Heinkel, or one to two years older. Her beautiful hair, akin to golden threads of the finest craftsmanship, stretched down to her waist, and her blue eyes, shimmering as if inlaid with jewels, left quite the impression. Her facial features were soft and lovely, and there was a certain ephemeral nature to her such that it seemed like her white skin would melt into the night.

Only, contrary to her shapely appearance, the clothes she wore was a common civilian garb.

Considering that they were in the Noble District, there was a slight yet undeniable feeling of out-of-placeness.

Perhaps he could presume her to be the mistress of some noble, but —

Louanna: “I probably saw something that I wasn’t supposed to see. On the street, I saw a person being attacked~.”

Heinkel: “Wait, isn’t that an extremely important detail!”

Louanna: “Indeed~. A gentleman had collapsed, and the person who caused it looked in my direction, then, I ran as fast as I could to get away… I’ll reenact it now~.”

Heinkel: “You don’t need to do that. Please don’t lay on the ground. I already did my best to ensure you didn’t fall in the water.”

His unfounded suspicion completely demolished, Heinkel pulled Louanna upright as she attempted to lie down on the ground.

The matter was far removed from the likes of a quarrel between man and woman, and rapidly became tinged with crime. While that began to capture his attention, on the other hand, considering Louanna's conduct until this point, he also thought this.

Heinkel: "…By the way, how much of that story are you certain about?"

Louanna: "Of course, everything from start to finish~. Eh~, are you perhaps doubting me?"

Heinkel: "I don't think you have any ill intentions, but even with the best of intentions, it's possible to mistake things…"

Louanna: "Mm, I suppose so~. If you want to be that thorough, I can bring you directly to the… I'm sorry. I've realized that doing so would be dangerous so it's best if we don't."

Heinkel: "It's remarkable that you realized that on your own, I think. Yeah, remarkable."

He gave earnest praise to her self-restraint as she desisted right before getting too impulsive.

That being said, he could not just blindly accept Louanna's comments without any evidence.

At present, the only thing that could be said for certain was that Louanna was acting suspiciously on top of a wall in the Noble District in the middle of the night.

Hence, Heinkel was greatly troubled, and once he drained his woes, he said "Understood",

Heinkel: "We're in the same dragon carriage here. Let's go check to see if your story's true."

Louanna: "Eh~. But, you just said that it was remarkable that I realized it was dangerous by myself…"

Heinkel: “I wouldn’t let you go by yourself, but I’m, y’know, see?”

As he spoke, Heinkel tapped the Knight’s sword on his waist.

As for how persuasive that was, he had more doubts than anybody else, but it was far too deceitful.

However, upon seeing that, Louanna hummed “Mm-hmm”, and after humming a few more “Mm-Mm”’s,

Louanna: “Understood~, let’s do that. I was also worried about the person who got attacked.”

Heinkel: “Yeah, we’ve gotta check on him. Could you lead the way?”

Louanna: “Of course~. Let’s get going, Spoolio-san~!”

Heinkel: “…Spoolio’s something that you just said on your own, it’s not my name.”

Louanna: “Huh~, was that so? In that case, umm, I’m sorry. Would it be alright if I asked your name one more time?”

Heinkel: “Rather than one more time, I haven’t even given it to begin with. I’m… Heinkel.”

To the hurried Louanna, Heinkel hesitated to give his family name, and ended up not saying it. It was not because the other person was Louanna. No matter who the other person was, he simply did not want to say it.

Unaware as to his inner feelings, Louanna toyed with the name “Heinkel, Heinkel…” on her tongue over and over,

Louanna: “It’s a spoolio name~, Heinkel-san~.”

Faced with her smile, Heinkel could not bring himself to tell her that the name was not one that overlapped with the nuances of “super duper coolio”.

The place Louanna guided him to was a street that could be reached even without climbing over the wall.

It was part of the Noble District, but a block that did not get much pedestrian traffic. The row of houses was mostly composed of villas belonging to individuals with their own domains, and so when the owners were not staying only their custodians would be living on the premises. Hence, it was often used by women in positions or vocations that did not wish to draw attention, and was often referred to as the “Rendezvous Avenue”.

When it came to walking on that road in the middle of the night, Louanna’s objective was also—

Louanna: “So, I work at a flower shop in the Commercial District, but on my way back after delivering a flower order, I completely lost my bearings and ended up in this neighborhood.”

Heinkel: “Flower girl…”

Louanna: “Yes~, I sell flowers. Do you like flowers?”

Heinkel: “Eh, hmm. Relatively, I do like them, I guess?”

For a moment, Heinkel harbored a vulgar impression regarding the term “flower girl”, but the pure gaze of Louanna that followed pained his chest, and he responded.

In truth, he had never thought about whether he liked or disliked flowers. Only, Heinkel’s mother had a hobby of growing flowers, so flowers had been familiar to him ever since he was born. In that sense, it was natural to have flowers around as a decoration in daily life for Heinkel.

Louanna: “How spunderful~.”

Heinkel: “…Super duper wonderful?”

Louanna: “Yes~. As expected, you’re quick to catch on, Heinkel-san~.”

They did not know each other well enough for her to have such expectations of him, but Heinkel had correctly guessed what spunderful meant, so anything he said from here would be a futile resistance.

Regardless, it seemed like the had finally arrived at the street in question, but—

Heinkel: "—There's nothing."

On the street where Louanna had testified to somebody having been attacked, there was nothing.

Laying eyes upon that, Heinkel frowned, and beside him, Louanna panicked. She jogged up towards the street, and as she waved her arms and legs around,

Louanna: "This is it~, this is where it happened~. There's no doubt it was here, where a gentleman whose name I don't know, was attacked with a sharp blade by a gentleman or a lady whose face I didn't see."

Heinkel: "The assaultee was a man, and you don't know if the assailant was a man or a woman?"

Louanna: "Yes. The attack also happened in an instant, and there was no big scuffle, rather it was a schwabahhhh and a zhabaawam like the wind~! "

Louanna used large gestures to accompany her explanations, but for the time being it seemed like there was no doubt it all happened in an instant. Only, based on her way of speaking and her lifelike expressions, Heinkel did not think that she was speaking without giving it much thought.

That being the case, he contemplated the possibilities of her having mistaken what she had seen, or having gotten the street in question mixed up. Thinking that there might have also been some other possibilities, Heinkel surveyed the surroundings, and realized something.

Heinkel: "…No matter how you look at this, isn't this street just way too clean?"

There was routine cleaning to maintain the scenery of the Noble District, but on a street like this that saw little pedestrian traffic, it was difficult to imagine that so much effort had but put into the cleaning such that not even a single pebble was lying anywhere around.

That was to say, there was a certain credibility to Louanna's testimony.

Heinkel: "—Louanna-san."

Louanna: "Please wait, Heinkel-san~. At this rate, I think you'll end up seeing me as a liar. But you'd be wrong. The gentleman had collapsed over here… I'll reenact it now~."

Heinkel: "You don't need to do that. Please don't lay on the ground. I believe you."

Louanna: "Really~?!"

Pulling Louanna upright as she was about to lay down on the ground, Heinkel gave her a nod. Then, turning his back on the eerily tidy street, he tugged on her arm.

Heinkel: "I'll escort you back to your home tonight. For further details, you can report them to the Guard tomorrow."

Louanna: "The Guard… but, would they really listen to me?"

Heinkel: "They shouldn't flat out refuse you. Plus, I'll put in a good word for you."

Giving that response to the uneasy Louanna, in his mind Heinkel asked him "Really?".

Could he really make it so the Guard would not disregard her? Was it not possible that Heinkel's good word would end up backfiring, causing the credibility of Louanna's testimony to be lowered?

How much faith could be placed in the words of Heinkel Astrea?

Louanna: "Thank goodness…"

Heinkel: “Eh?”

Louanna: “I can rest easy knowing that Heinkel-san will be accompanying me. What a relief~.”

Heinkel: “—. Let’s get going.”

As she placed her hand over her chest in an exaggerated gesture of relief, he could not bear to look Louanna in the face as she said that.

She was unaware of Heinkel’s identity. Therefore, he knew that those words were not spoken out of any overabundant consideration or flattery. And knowing that, he could not bear it in the slightest.

If Louanna were to hear some of the rumors about Heinkel, there was no doubt that she would immediately realize that the sense of security she felt was nothing more than a papier mâché.

—When they arrived at Louanna’s home, it was a regular housing complex located within the Commoner District.

The ground floor was a kitchen for communal use, and the floors above were comprised of rooms where the residents lived; it was not anything that particularly stood out for a dwelling in the Royal Capital.

Only, Louanna’s room stood out so much that anybody outside would be able to guess her room on their first try.

Heinkel: “Um, is your room the one with all those flowers decorating the windowsill, Louanna?”

Louanna: “Waah, amazing~. How did you know?”

Heinkel: “…Just a hunch.”

Louanna: “A hunch~. Spamazing~.”

Among the row of rather plain stone-built residences, being able to guess the room covered with flowers that asserted themselves vividly did not seem like something worthy of being treated as "super duper amazing".

Nevertheless, it was decorated with enough flowers to be sold, so it seemed like it was true that she was an actual flower girl who sold real flowers. —Feeling the slightest bit of relief, Heinkel cleared the vulgar thought from his mind.

At any rate, he had safely escorted Louanna back to her home—

Heinkel: "Well, this is it for me. I'll come pick you up tomorrow."

Louanna: "Eh~, aren't you going to come in?"

Heinkel: "…You ought to be a bit more cautious around people. I'm a man, and we just met."

Louanna: "But, Heinkel-san, you're dripping wet… besides, I have a good eye for people."

As Louanna firmly pounded her chest and declared so, Heinkel frowned.

On this instance, he wished to disregard the objective contradiction that such a thing depended entirely on Heinkel, but even if he disregarded it, that was a statement that lacked any grounds for believability. They had only known each other for a short time, but Louanna was exceedingly defenseless. If she had somehow managed to avoid going through any bitter experiences with her appearance and good nature, it was nothing short of a miracle.

Heinkel: "Firstly, it'd be rude to your lover, or your family."

Louanna: "Anyone who would make an unpleasant face to you after you helped me out, Heinkel-san, are not the kinds of people I would accept as a lover or as family~."

Heinkel: "—. Setting lovers aside, family's not something you get to choose."

Louanna: "I guess that's true~. But, I don't have either of them, so c'mon, don't be shy."

Louanna vigorously tugged on his sleeve, and after hesitating for a moment, Heinkel shook off her slender fingers. Shoving his palm towards the dissatisfied-looking Louanna as she let out an “Ahh~”, he stopped her.

Heinkel: “It’s all the more if you don’t have either of them. I understand your philosophy, so please also understand mine.”

Louanna: “…Understood. It would’ve been rude to Heinkel-san’s lover and family~.”

Heinkel: “While I do have a family, I don’t have a lover. I’m sorry.”

Trying to soothe Louanna as she averted her gaze in a sulkish manner, Heinkel more or less turned down her invitation.

Then, he more or less ushered the reluctant Louanna into the building, and ascertaining that she had safely returned to her room by the light in the window— Heinkel hid himself away in a corner of the street.

Heinkel: “I don’t exactly know how useful my sense of unease might be, but…”

If his sense of unease regarding the unnaturally clean street where Louanna had witnessed an attack was on the mark, there was more than enough possibility that Louanna was really being pursued by someone.

He did not mention anything due to not wanting to frighten her, but thinking of the hypothetical, Heinkel had decided to keep watch.

Though it was now after he had finished drilling at the training grounds, Heinkel was fortunately confident in physical strength.

Were he to serve as the night watch for a night, there was no need to worry about his body’s response.

Only, he thought he might have ended up worrying the members of his household by not communicating and not returning home, but it was for the safety of the public. —If he made that excuse to himself, he could somewhat forget about his feelings of guilt for not wanting to return home.

Heinkel: “There’s no place for me at home, nor anywhere outside. What the hell am I doing here?”

As his damp body was chilled by the evening breeze, Heinkel slowly shook his head.

The discomfort of feeling like he had no place, was caused by a guilt that Heinkel was remembering of his own volition. Neither his colleagues at the training ground, nor the household members who had seen him off this morning, not a single person had done anything like reproach, ridicule, or scorn Heinkel for his weakness and fragility.

The one who did those things more than anyone else was Heinkel himself. That was exactly why, there was no escape for him.

No matter how desperately he fled, it would continue to follow him like his shadow.

In that sense, his meeting tonight had been rather convenient. If he could make an excuse by doing something for someone like this, the self-harm enacted by Heinkel’s mind would subside a bit.

The only problem was—

Louanna: “—Um, will you come in after all? I can serve some warm beverages~.”

The woman known as Louanna Hartley would not so readily neglect the solitary Heinkel Astrea.

4

Louanna: “I was surprised. When I looked outside the window, I saw Heinkel-san hiding in a corner of the street… I understood it right away. You were keeping a watch over me~.”

Heinkel: “…It’s not really like I was keeping watch over you, I guess it would be more accurate to say I was standing guard.”

Forcibly dragging Heinkel along to her room in spite of his resistance, he decided to nitpick one the phrasing in Louanna's language as she made tea. That said, given that he had been abruptly discovered by her while he was keeping a stealthy lookout, how much persuasiveness did Heinkel's words really hold?

Heinkel: "I know it might not be my specialty, but to think I would be discovered so quickly…"

Louanna: "No, not at all, didn't I tell you earlier? I have quite a good eye for people~."

Heinkel: "That expression isn't supposed to be for when you find someone who's been hiding…"

Or perhaps she meant it as saying that she was skilled at discerning people who were unskilled at hiding? Either way, Heinkel's loss of confidence remained unchanged.

Ultimately, that also went for how easily he went along with being brought into Louanna's room.

Louanna's room was on the third floor of the housing complex, and arranged with modest furniture and bedding, there was plenty of color from the flowers decorated all around. —This was Heinkel's first time in the home of a woman who lived by herself, his first time in the home of anyone living as a commoner for that matter, so he did not know if this sort of thing was typical.

And not knowing that, Heinkel's impression as he looked around the interior of the room was—

Heinkel: "It feels pretty cramped. Can you really live in a place like this?"

Louanna: "Ah, you might be asking that sort of thing, but this is actually on the tidier side… or rather, I just don't own a lot of things, but I pride myself on being good with space."

Heinkel: "…Being good with space, by that you mean…"

Louanna: "Like, people who make good use of all the space in their room. See, this area here or that corner, don't you think I've done it quite skillfully?"

Guiding his gaze towards the edge of the room where she had stored things away, Louanna asserted her talents of space usage, but, Heinkel's eyes were unable to evaluate the usage of space or how skilled it was, so he could not meet her desires for praise.

At his reaction, Louanna smiled with a "Did I put you on the spot there?", and placed a cup of tea in front of Heinkel, who had quietly curled himself up like a cat in unfamiliar territory.

At the faintly warm fragrance, Heinkel remembered that his body was freezing cold, so he picked up the cup.

Given the location, he did not have many expectations for the flavor of the tea, but—

Heinkel: "—Are these… Valneau tea leaves?"

Louanna: "Amazing~, you can tell? How spoolio!"

Heinkel: "I don't really think it's particularly cool, no?"

Louanna: "Ah, the spoolio just now, was a spoolio with the meaning of "super duper smart and not a foolio"."

The difference between the two spoolios was not something he could make out from Louanna's pronunciation.

Regardless, he was surprised that she had served tea brewed with Valneau leaves.

After all, Valneau tea leaves were quite the luxury item, and ought to have been somewhat out of reach for the masses.

Louanna: "Those are some valuable tea leaves, so please be sure to savor them. I also only drink it sparingly. Like when I have a guest over… so, this felt like the perfect occasion."

Heinkel: "…Whether you're frugal or not, I can't really tell at all, you know?"

Louanna: “A woman who makes no compromises when it comes to hospitali-tea, I’d be pleased if you took it as that. Despite how things may appear, I was originally a child of nobility much like Heinkel-san, after all~.”

Heinkel: “Coughk, gahgk!”

Louanna: “Wahh, H-Handkerchief~! Did something startle you?! Was it me?! Was it the tea?!”

Heinkel: “Just you… coughk, how do you know I’m a noble?”

Taking the handkerchief presented to him, Heinkel inquired as he held down on his choking throat. At his question, Louanna appeared to look at him in puzzlement, and,

Louanna: “I mean, the way you sit in that chair and the way you sip your tea, it was just way too perfect. So I just thought that you were someone who went through a lot of rigorous etiquette training.”

Being told so, Heinkel paid attention to how he was sitting, and how he was holding his cup.

Pinching the handle of the teacup, he had his other hand placed on the bottom to support the porcelain, and he was sitting deep in the chair with his spine straight. —He did not find there to be anything special about that.

Heinkel: “…Isn’t this just how everybody does it?”

Louanna: “Is that the case for your friends and colleagues as well? In that case, since you’re only ever together with those sorts of people, Heinkel-san must not just be a run-of-the-mill noble, but from one of the leading noble houses~.”

As the smiling Louanna repeated that, Heinkel tried to recall the hands of his colleagues, but he just could not remember the mannerisms of those around him when sitting for meals or on breaks. He did not have the time to focus on such details— no, it was not time he lacked, but capacity.

Regardless of whether their etiquette was the same or different, Heinkel did not possess the foundations to recognize it as such.

Understanding that, Heinkel slowly shook his head, and then,

Heinkel: “Nevermind about me. More importantly, you said you were formerly a noble?”

Louanna: “Yep~. Though it might have been small, there used to be a House Hartley. But, when I was still small, I lost my parents, causing the House to dissolve. We had debts to some other Houses too, so right now, I’m working myself to the bone, trying to live each day in a way I can be proud of.”

Heinkel: “That’s… I don’t know what to say.”

Louanna: “You could say “do your best!” to support me~.”

Heinkel: “D-Do your best.”

Louanna: “Yes~, I’ll do my best, Heinkel-san~.”

For someone who had just divulged some rather heavy personal circumstances, Louanna shone brighter than ever.

It seemed like she had already overcome all of those problems, but the death of one’s family, or the dissolving of one’s House, even the troubles of having debts to pay, were hardships of which Heinkel knew not.

Even though it would have probably been an experience more dreadful than Heinkel could ever imagine, Louanna’s undeterred energy overwhelmed him.

Heinkel: “So then, these tea leaves were from before your House dissolved?”

Louanna: “Yep~. I exchanged as much of the family assets for money as possible, but I set aside the tea leaves as well as a few pieces of tableware as mementos, and to actually use. It would be extremely difficult to afford something like Valneau leaves, after all.”

To her, the leaves she had offered to warm Heinkel, were the taste of precious memories with her family. Now that he knew that, he began to feel incredibly guilty for letting her brew it for him.

Louanna: “Didn’t I say earlier, the type of family who would make an unpleasant face if I served tea to Heinkel-san, is not something I have, nor would accept~.”

Heinkel: “…That wasn’t about tea, it was when we were talking about me entering your home.”

Louanna: “Huh~, was that so?”

As Louanna tilted her head and spoke with innocence, Heinkel suddenly cracked a smile. How to put it, he had finally realized how foolish it was to be nervous about putting on a bold front.

Seeing him do so, Louanna brought her own cup to her lips, and,

Louanna: “When you smile, you’re spadorable.”

Heinkel: “…That’s probably not something you should be saying to guys.”

Louanna: “Maybe. Sorry. It’s just that I’m honest to a fault.”

With that, seeing Louanna sticking her tongue out as she apologized, Heinkel could not help but let out another smile.

5

Louanna: “—Heinkel-san? What would you like for breakfast?”

Heinkel: “…”

Lifting his head after the sudden awakening, Heinkel stared at Louanna in front of him, dumbfounded.

Louanna. It was Louanna Hartley. Last night, after having witnessed a strange sight, she had climbed up onto a wall thinking that she might be getting chased, and had caused Heinkel to fall in the stream, and then—

Heinkel: "—Hk, Did I fall asleep?!"

Louanna: "And you slept so soundly at that. You must have been tired. But, you shouldn't have sat on the floor since you'd just wake up feeling as tired as ever~."

As Heinkel touched his own cheeks in disbelief, Louanna cautioned him about his mistake. To the extent that he could not even put together a response to her words, Heinkel was shaken to his core.

Last evening, Heinkel had unexpectedly entered Louanna's room, but he still endeavored to keep guard without sleeping, and thus having refused Louanna's proposal to use the sofa, he had readied himself to take on the night. And yet, in reality, he had been unable to accomplish even that to a satisfactory level as the morning arrived.

Heinkel: "Even after entering the home of a woman who lives by herself, to think I'd just fall asleep without fulfilling my duties…"

Louanna: "Um, I have both warm and cold beverages, which would you prefer?"

Heinkel: "I'm not the kind of man who deserves such charity from you, I'm just not…!"

Louanna: "Ehh~, but wouldn't it be hard to get the food down if you don't have a beverage~?"

As Heinkel listed out his own failures in condemnation, Louanna, who had finished setting the table for breakfast, groaned "hmm" at him,

Louanna: "I suppose that from Heinkel-san's perspective, you would certainly have some reservations about having slept until morning, but… I was also able to sleep soundly with full peace of mind. How's that?"

Heinkel: "How, what do you mean…"

Louanna: "I was thinking that maybe it could serve as a reason for you to stop chiding yourself and feel better, Heinkel-san. It seems like it wasn’t enough so I’ll move onto the next one now~. Heinkel-san also slept soundly! How’s that?”

Heinkel: “…”

Louanna: “I guess the problem was that you ended up sleeping in the first place, so this won’t do~. I’ve failed~.”

Placing a hand to her forehead, Louanna reflected with a “Gosh”, but her comment caused Heinkel’s eyes to widen, and as he placed his hand over his mouth, he chewed through the shock.

Indeed, he had slept until morning. It was difficult to deny that it had been a failure on his part, but to have slept until morning like this without seeing any dreams, when was the last time he had experienced that? No matter if he was at home or outside, living in reality or submerged in a dream, Heinkel always continued to be tormented.

Despite that, the nightmare he was forced to watch every single night, did not befall his rest on this night alone.

Louanna: “W-Well, nothing bad happened to either me or Heinkel-san, so it’s actually a rather good thing that we were able to sleep and recharge our spirits… would, that suffice?”

Heinkel: “Recharge, our spirits…?”

Louanna: “Yep~. It’s quite important to recharge your spirits, y’know? If your spirits are down, then you can’t do the things you normally can, and the things you normally can’t do will of course be impossible as well~.”

Perhaps taking Aldebaran’s reaction as an opening, Louanna vigorously encouraged him with lively words, pulling him to stand up by his arm with a “Come on now~”.

On the table were two portions of a modest, yet colorful breakfast.

Louanna: “Meals are also a good way to recharge. Well then, what would you like to drink?”

Heinkel: “…From yesterday, the Valneau.”

Louanna: “Uh. U-Understood. I’m a woman who prides herself on cutting no corners when it comes to hospitali-tea, so to back down now would be…”

Heinkel: “If you’re worried about the tea leaves, I’ll bring you some more next time.”

Louanna: “Though I didn’t have any intention of demanding more, your kindness makes me very happy~.”

Spinning her body around as if in a dance, Louanna made an attempt to meet Heinkel’s request. Feeling as if he could watch her all day long, Heinkel sat down in the chair that had been offered to him.

House Astrea employed servants who took care of chores, and his mother was someone who enjoyed preparing meals, so while home cooking was quite familiar to him, that of commoners was a different matter entirely. Considering Louanna’s circumstances, she might not fit the description of a full on commoner, but—

Louanna: “I’ll be glad if it suits your tastes~.”

As Louanna sat down opposite him after brewing some tea, while enjoying the scent of the fragrant tea leaves to the fullest, he began smacking his lips on her homemade breakfast.

The meal the morning after he had spared from any nightmares, even without taking his superb sleep into account, it more than satisfied Heinkel’s tastes.

Heinkel: “It might not be my place to be asking this, but were you able to rest well last night?”

Louanna: “Eh? Of course, Heinkel-sama was here with me after all~.”

Heinkel: “I see. Well, I’m sorry about that, for two separate reasons…”

Louanna: “Even though I can’t think of even one, how could there be two~?”

After finishing eating breakfast and tidying up, as they headed for the guard station as promised, Louanna was surprised by Heinkel, who wore a bit of a complex expression.

If it did not bother her much, there was no point in bringing it back up, but the first reason was because of the circumstances that had led to Louanna and Heinkel meeting in the first place. —Having witnessed a crime scene of someone being assaulted, such a thing was a scene so impactful that it would not be strange if it were to be seen again in a dream.

The other reason was simply because he wondered if she really had no apprehensions about letting a man she had just met into her home, but.

Louanna: “As I said, it was thanks to you being there that I felt safe, Heinkel-san, you know…?”

Heinkel: “Nevermind, it’s fine. I’m glad that you were able to sleep peacefully, Louanna-san.”

He could not deny the feeling that he had been forced to nod in agreement, but Heinkel’s complex reservations about being treated far too much like a man were just his own personal feelings, so there was no need to make Louanna understand them. In reality, it was extremely fortunate that Louanna had not been tormented by any nightmares. Heinkel too, for that matter.

Louanna: “Ah, Heinkel-san, we’re almost there.”

With that, Louanna tugged on his sleeve, and the consciousness of Heinkel focused back on reality.

Visible before the two of them, was the station of the Guard— not that, but the scene of yesterday evening’s crime. If they could find some evidence while the sun was shining before they went up to the Guard to give a report, things would be settled more quickly. When Heinkel proposed that, Louanna cheerfully expressed her agreement.

Heinkel: “The assailed man collapsed on the ground, and the perpetrator was standing close to him… is that correct?”

Louanna: “Yes~, I’ll reenact it now~.”

Heinkel: “You don’t need to do that. It would spoil the cute outfit you picked out.”

Pulling Louanna back as she attempted to show her acting chops by resolutely challenging the ground, Heinkel surveyed its surface.

He had felt it last evening as well, but this street had indeed undergone cleaning to the point that it was far too tidy. Even so, if there happened to be something like a bloodstain that was not visible last night due to the darkness, it would increase their credibility. —Confronted with the currently empty street, it was far more unreliable than even Heinkel’s offer to put in a good word.

Louanna: “Huh~?”

Next to Heinkel as he continued to look down by his feet, Louanna suddenly raised her voice.

When he looked in her direction, thinking she might have found something, she was gazing to the other side of the street. Using her hand as a visor, her blue eyes were carefully locating something from a distance. —The dull shimmer of light rapidly approaching her eyes, was caught by the reflexes of Heinkel’s sight.

Louanna: “…”

Immediately reaching out his hand, he intercepted the interval between Louanna and the oncoming light. That instant, a scorching heat ran through Heinkel’s right arm, and blood dripped from the dagger that had pierced him deep.

As irony would have it, that blood now soaked the ground with the credibility that Heinkel had desired.

???: “—We have him cornered! Don’t let him get away, Heinkel!”

The moment the sharp voice struck him, he felt a tension run through his entire body.

He felt the firm feeling of soil beneath his feet, the scent of the forest tickling his nostrils, the noisy heartbeat that sounded as if his heart had been pressed right against his ear, the heat of the blood flowing through his veins.

The hilt of the sword in his grip was cold, and his body had stiffened to a rock-like extent, motionless. But, it did not end at being motionless. The patter of footsteps, the sounds of breathing, were closing in on him.

That, was something Heinkel Astrea needed to intercept, no matter what.

And even though he needed to intercept it,

???: “—Heinkel-san~!”

His perception white from pain, a fervently unpleasant memory flashed through Heinkel’s mind.

That which had flashed through, was the nightmare he had just managed to miss seeing this morning— a recollection of an unforgettable disgrace. With that coming to a close in a fragmented state, Heinkel was currently crouched down on the street.

Feeling the sharp, burning pain in his right arm, Heinkel’s throat seemed like it would drown in screams. And yet, the reason he had avoided that death by drowning, was because of the warmth nestled close to his body.

Supporting Heinkel’s body after he sustained the attack, Louanna desperately called out to him. Her expression wrought with tension, she had been desperately calling to Heinkel.

Heinkel: “Nghh, RAHHH!”

Gritting his teeth, he drew the sword on his waist with his left hand, and cut down the subsequent silver light that was speeding towards her.

Parrying the second dagger with his sword, while feeling another surge of pain from the impact, Heinkel's head was filled with complaints that he ought to have done the same thing for the initial surprise attack.

If he had cut down the first dagger with his sword as well, Heinkel would not have sustained a wound to his dominant arm, and would not have ended up needing to swing the sword with his left hand. —Neither, would Louanna have had to see the blood.

Heinkel: "Stay behind me…!"

Louanna: "B-But… that individual, seems to be targeting me~."

Heinkel: "That's exactly why! If you leave my side, I won't be able to protect you…!"

Keeping Louanna behind him, Heinkel mustered all the Knightlyness within himself. Then, biting his lip to the point that it drew blood, he glared at the perpetrator across the street. —Standing there, was a being clad in a ridiculous outfit, black from head to toe, and decorated by a white mask.

For a moment, he thought that enigmatic appearance bore a close resemblance to the assembly of dangerous individuals known as the Witch Cult.

But—

Masked Figure: "—Heinkel Astrea-dono."

Heinkel: "—Hk."

Masked Figure: "On our behalf, we have no intention of harming you."

Called by his full name, Heinkel's mouth flapped open and closed as those words were spoken.

Naturally, it was a proclamation worthy of no belief. Even Heinkel, aware that the pain was dulling his thoughts, understood that it was not worth lending an ear to such convenient words. Despite that understanding, he had no idea what the hell the other party was plotting. Why voice in jest a matter of zero credibility? Was it merely to ridicule, and toy with him? He sensed no such haughty attitude from the other party.

The masked individual conveyed only a cold sense of reality, to the point of exhaustiveness.

Thus, that sense of reality spoke thus to Heinkel. —If there was no falsehood in the other party's words, then their aim was unmistakably Louanna.

Louanna: "…You're the person from yesterday evening."

Having reached the same conclusion, Louanna called out to the masked individual.

Thinking about the reason why Louanna had been forced up onto a perilous stage, naturally, it could have only been the events that transpired yesterday evening. That was to say, for the masked individual before them, Louanna having witnessed those events had been extremely inconvenient.

Masked Figure: "…"

As if to say he had no words to exchange, the masked individual gave no response to Louanna. On the other hand, the fact that they had not commenced any further attacks, perhaps was out of an intent to show good faith by waiting for Heinkel's response.

Heinkel: "In that case, my answer is, stop fucking with us… No matter what your intentions might have been, I've already been attacked, and I won't be allowing you to hurt Louanna-san. Not to mention, I'm a Knight."

Bearing the obligation of protecting others, an existence who would fulfill that duty with honed swordsmanship and heightened resolve. That was what Heinkel believed to be a Knight, and the manner in which he himself aspired to live.

At a juncture where he ought to fulfill that dearest wish of his, the likes of the other party's absurd demands—

Masked Figure: "—You are a Knight? Truly?"

At the interjection of a chilly query, Heinkel's breath slightly caught.

With his eyes widened as he had been trying to find words to say, he had ended up allowing the masked individual to continue. As a result, the fighting spirit Heinkel had mustered would end up being broken.

That was because—

Masked Figure: "Do you, unable to even swing your sword during your first deployment, truly have the right to declare yourself as such?"

Heinkel: "—Ah."

Masked Figure: "Having left your comrades to clean up your mess, unable to make any contribution whatsoever to the victory served to you on a silver platter, do you truly have the right to call yourself a Knight?"

Heinkel: "How, how do you know that, you… hk."

Masked Figure: "Moreover, with a heart so frail that you ended up soiling yourself before the enemy, do you truly have the right to call yourself a Knight?"

Heinkel: "SToOoOooOP!!"

Frozen, eyes wide open, Heinkel forgot the pain in his arm as his voice broke into falsetto.

The masked individual's matter-of-fact cadence, unmistakably exposing realities that Heinkel Astrea did not wish to be known, assailed him in broad daylight. —Heinkel's humiliating first deployment.

Heinkel: “Please, stop… hk.”

—As of right now, Heinkel’s first deployment would have taken place around two months prior.

A group of bandits who kept targeting a highway near the Royal Capital, with the forest they had been operating out of identified, the Guard had surrounded it and carried out a search-and-destroy operation. That had been Heinkel’s first deployment, and cooperating with veteran Knights, they had closed in on the bandits, defeating them one person at a time, and apprehending them.

It happened in the midst of that operation. When a bandit that was being chased by one of his allies, came heading in Heinkel’s direction.

He had fully intended on calmly swinging his sword, just as he had practiced. —But, Heinkel could not move a muscle, as if his blood had frozen over, unable to even unsheathe his sword.

Ultimately, it had been a different Knight who brought down that bandit— also on his first deployment, Marcos Gildark had defeated the most enemies out of all the Knights who had participated that day, an overwhelming contrast to Heinkel.

Having failed to even swing his sword on his first deployment, Heinkel had returned home in despondency, and realizing that he had soiled himself out of fear for the first time, he had cried bitter tears. —Ever since then, he would hear it.

Having incurred a great deal of despair and dejection, Heinkel would hear a voice that cursed him as “pant wetter”.

Masked Figure: “Stand down. Regardless of your opposition, the situation shall not change.”

As Heinkel’s voice quavered in a manner most pitiful, the masked individual who had shattered his spirit advised him so.

To stand down, to make way, just like how Marcos had moved him out of the way in that forest. Because there was nothing of use he could accomplish here, he had no such right to call himself a Knight; so he was being told.

It was none other than Heinkel who exposed his own contradictions, unable to fool himself—

Louanna: "—Heinkel-san, is a Knight."

Thus, the one retort could not have possibly been Heinkel, having fallen to his knees.

Retorting so as she gently supported Heinkel's body, was the hushed Louanna. With her own life being targeted, she had been given a thorough explanation about how Heinkel, her final ray of hope, was completely useless. Despite that, Louanna's assertion had been bereft of hesitation, of doubt, and of uncertainty.

How was it that Louanna could remain in this situation without falling to despair, without losing her optimism?

Louanna: "Didn't I tell you? I have quite a good eye for people~."

Heinkel: "That's… but, right now, how is that use…"

Louanna: "It is useful~. Heinkel-san is a Knight, and you promised that you would buy me new Valneau tea leaves, and after this, I'm sure I'll think of some other good ideas."

Heinkel: "…"

With her lips tightly pursed, Louanna placed her hand over Heinkel's wounded arm. Feeling a slight tremble in those fingertips, once more did Heinkel curse his own foolishness.

There was no way that she did not harbor any fear. There was no way she could remain without feeling despair or pessimism. Even so, Louanna wielded the only weapon in her powerless self's arsenal to the utmost, and had decided to fight back.

Unable to do battle, her weapon was that of hope, that of faith, and that of anticipation. Entrusted with that weapon, what would Heinkel do? What, would Heinkel Astrea do?

Heinkel: “I’m…”

In this moment, somewhat driving the pain away, he forgot all about his humiliation, and would use his everything for the sake of Louanna.

Heinkel had screamed earlier. And yet nobody else had come, likely because the masked individual was not operating alone, but was working with several accomplices. He could not move his dominant arm. He had also been trained in swinging the sword with his left hand, but he could not rely on it against a skilled opponent. He was worried that the battle would continue if nothing happened. —For what reason, had the other party attempted to get Heinkel to stand down? Precaution. That could not be it. They did not wish to cause any meaningless deaths. But they were hunting down Louanna, a mere eye-witness. In that case, the only possible reason he could think of—

Heinkel: “I… am a man of House Astrea…!”

Masked Figure: “…”

Heinkel: “Mothered by Theresia van Astrea! Fathered by Wilhelm van Astrea! Of the lineage of Sword Saints! The Sword of Lugunica! Hear me!”

As Heinkel raised his voice, he could tell that the demeanor of the masked individual had slightly shifted. Heinkel had no means of ascertaining whether that was for better or for worse, but he still decided to reel it in.

The reason why the other party was loath to harm Heinkel, was because of the name of House Astrea.

In that case—

Heinkel: “—She’s… Louanna’s the woman I’m to take as my wife. She’s my fiancée… in other words, she’s part of the Astrea Family! That being the case, can you really still target her?!”

Louanna: “Ehhh~?!”

Mustering all of his strength, Heinkel embraced Louanna, and asserted so to the masked individual. Of course, Louanna was also surprised by that declaration, but he did not have the time to get the story straight with her beforehand.

Clutching her slender waist, he held her tight so as to not let her go, and glared at the masked individual.

Masked Figure: “…”

A brief silence fell between the masked individual and Heinkel as he held Louanna.

If Heinkel’s judgement had been off, and the name of House Astrea did not work, then this would be it. Heinkel If Heinkel’s bluff was called, and the power of his family name did not extend to Louanna, then this would be it.

However, as Heinkel clung to that prayer—

Masked Figure: “I see, so you were a Knight after all.”

The masked individual spoke those words, and slowly began walking towards them.

Then, before Heinkel as he stood on guard, the other party picked up one of the daggers that had fallen to the ground, and slipped it back inside his garment. Then, he turned back towards them, and presented his empty hand. —The one, in Heinkel’s right arm.

They did not leave behind any evidence, nor would they. If that was the compromise the other party was offering.

Heinkel: “Louanna-sa… Louanna, could you pull it out for me.”

Louanna: “You want me to do it~?”

Heinkel: “It’s preferable to pulling it out myself. If it’s too difficult, I don’t want to force you, but…”

Louanna: “—. No, I’ll do it~. Please allow me to handle it~. Whether it’s one or two or however many~.”

Heinkel: “…One is fine.”

Louanna psyched herself up as she accepted that duty, and gripped the hilt of the dagger that was stabbed into Heinkel’s arm. Then, as they looked into each others faces, she extracted the dagger with a “One, two aaand three~”.

Gritting his teeth through the intense pain and bleeding, Heinkel pressed a cloth over the wound. As he did so, the masked individual received the dagger from Louanna, and proceeded to turn their back on the pair.

Leaving no further words, it was a silent withdrawal. Judging from their demeanour, it did not seem like they were just pretending to let them go. Then—

Louanna: “Heinkel-san, give me your arm~.”

As Heinkel had been directing his attention to the masked individual, Louanna took the cloth from his hand, rushing to tie it around the wound on his arm, and the blood began to stop.

Despite not knowing if they had fully escaped danger yet, Louanna’s concern was no longer on that, but rather was directed towards Heinkel’s arm.

Ultimately, his use of the sword had only amounted to cutting down the opponent’s weapon, so he did not have the opportunity to show off his honed skills, and in the end he had uncouthly relied on his family name to force his way to victory— no, it ought to be called a draw. No matter how he struggled, there was likely nobody who could call this a victory.

Heinkel: “Man, I really can’t act cool in the slightest.”

At the very least, his act of having protected Louanna served as Heinkel’s one and only achievement.

Indeed, Heinkel had derided his disgraceful self for being pathetic, but.

Louanna: “You’re spoolio.”

Heinkel: “Eh?”

Louanna: “No matter what anyone says, Heinkel-san is spoolio~.”

As she spoke, Louanna lifted her face and met Heinkel’s eyes, causing his breath to catch.

Her blue eyes, akin to jewels, were filled with tears, flickering with a pale radiance. With a blush on her white cheeks, she incoherently repeated “Spoolio, spoolio” over and over, using her utmost effort to withstand the tears, emotions, and various other things that were on the verge of overflowing.

Not knowing how to comfort or calm her, Heinkel was left flustered. And flustered as he was, he suddenly found the woman before his eyes to be lovely.

—Having been able to protect something as a Knight for the very first time, Heinkel Astrea had found the woman, Louanna Hartley, to be lovely.

7

Louanna: “—Heinkel-san, about what happened then…”

Indeed, as Louanna presented him with a plate of peeled appas, Heinkel tensed up.

Though he knew it would be unavoidable, he felt strong emotions when the expected moment did arrive.

They were in a treatment center; given the injury and blood loss from Heinkel’s right arm, he had needed to be hospitalized for a few days. He had ended up causing his mother and the servants a great deal of worry because of that, but in an interval when those aggressive visitations of his family began to die down, Heinkel finally got the time to talk to Louanna.

Incidentally, when Heinkel and Louanna went to report about the incident on the street to the Guard, an individual claiming to be the culprit turned themself in before long, and testified that what Louanna had witnessed had been a silencing related to a human trafficking organization. They claimed that because they had failed to also silence Louanna, and understood that there was no longer anywhere for them to escape due to having gotten Heinkel involved, and thus had turned themself in.

Based on that culprit's testimony, it seemed like the Guard had succeeded in uncovering an actual human trafficking organization. Unfortunately, the wounded Heinkel had been unable to participate in that, and had missed the opportunity to secure meritorious achievements.

Moreover—

Heinkel: "Were those guys really just something like a human trafficking organization?"

That was what his colleagues, who were worried and came to visit Heinkel at the treatment center, had said, but something about it did not feel quite right to him. It sounded plausible, but for mere human traffickers, the cleaning of the crime scene yesterday evening gave a strong impression of being far too well organized.

Above all, the dreadfulness of the masked individual who he had actually confronted was unthinkable for a trivial criminal. That person carried with them a certain sense of duty, no less inferior to that of a Knight—.

Louanna: "Heinkel-san~, are you listening?"

Heinkel: "Eh, ah, eh, sorry, what did you say?"

Louanna: "Like I said, about what happened then. At that time, in order to get that masked gentleman to withdraw, Heinkel-san went… I'll reenact it now~."

Heinkel: "No, you don't need to do that. It's alright. I remember, and I understand."

Louanna's actress soul was admirable, but to an even greater extent than he trying to lay down on the ground, he wanted to avoid letting her act out what had happened this time. Only, he had no intention whatsoever of making it so that had never happened.

Heinkel was descended from a House of Knights, a man of the Kingdom who ought to be honest and sincere.

Ergo—

Heinkel: "Louanna, I don't intend on letting what I said there conclude as a means to an end. I don't ever want to do anything that would embarrass you like that."

Louanna: "Heinkel-san…"

Heinkel: "The organization might have been crushed, but there's a worry that remnants might still target you. In order to extinguish that, it would be best for you to stay with us. So…"

Louanna: "…"

Heinkel: "So, won't you marry me for real?"

Louanna: "Let me see~, I refuse~."

An instant rejection.

At the cheerfulness and lightheartedness of that response, for a moment, Heinkel almost pat his chest in relief. As if the marriage proposal he had summoned all his courage into had gone well.

But, that was not the case.

Louanna had said it clearly. She refused.

Heinkel: "Wh-Wh-Wh-Why?"

Louanna: "Didn't I tell you? I still have to pay off my House's debts. With those circumstances remaining, I can't allow myself to get married, much less to Heinkel-san of House Astrea."

Heinkel: “Those debts, I’ll pay them on your behalf…”

Louanna: “But would that really be your own money, Heinkel-san? Not your family’s money.”

Heinkel: “No, that’s…”

Louanna: “If that’s the case, then it’s a no~. Or rather, even supposing it was actually Heinkel-san’s money, I could never allow you to pay it on my behalf~. This is my own problem, after all.”

Placing a hand over her chest, Louanna firmly declared so, leaving Heinkel at a loss for words. It was excessively upright and sound reasoning from a moral standpoint.

But, when it came to an undaunted sound argument, Heinkel also had one.

Heinkel: “But, the matter of the remnants could still very well be dangerous. In order to protect against that as well…”

Louanna: “…As well?”

Heinkel: “…Won’t you at least make the part about being my fiancée true?”

If he might say so himself, when he put it to words, he was astounded from the bottom of his heart at how ungallant of a confession it must have been.

If only he could have done it more smoothly, a flawless marriage proposal that would be blessed by everyone universally, akin to that of his parents that continued to be sung about in the Sword Demon Love Song; that would have been Heinkel’s ideal. Even now, Heinkel found himself unable to follow in the example of his parents.

Louanna: “Might I ask, why?”

Heinkel: “Eh?”

Louanna: “Why, are you willing to go so far for me, Heinkel-san?

Even if you say it's because you're a Knight, we're talking about the person you're going to be spending the rest of your life with."

Heinkel: "That's…"

At Louanna's earnest question, Heinkel gulped down his breath, and fell into deep contemplation.

What came to mind were reasons like, because he would not go back on his word, or because it was a man's duty to take responsibility. But, probably, it was neither of those things. Those words were borrowed, words that did not belong to Heinkel.

The reason why Heinkel Astrea had asked Louanna Hartley to marry him, that was—

Heinkel: "—Because, you're special. We still barely know each other, but I want to know you more, I want to speak with you more. I wanna be by your side. That's my reason."

Falteringly, yet with words that were not borrowed, Heinkel conveyed how he truly felt. Receiving that, Louanna placed a hand to her own cheek, and gazed at Heinkel.

Her blue eyes were moist, her white cheeks were blushing, and with a slight quiver in her voice, she spun her next words.

Louanna: "…Spoyous."

Heinkel: "Sp-Spoyous?"

Louanna: "Super duper, joyous~."

Hearing her response, Heinkel blinked his eyes, and this time, he did pat his chest in relief.

If it was in front of her, Heinkel Astrea could hold his head high as a Knight. —Without any evidence save for the warm feelings budding in his heart, Heinkel thought so.

—Heinkel Astrea, and Louanna Hartley who was now his fiancée. The passionate love between the two who would go on to be wed, would lead to a future that shook the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica, one that shook the very world.

However, in this very moment, unaware as to what their future held in store, the young man who had displayed his bravery, and the young woman who harbored a faint affection for him, simply shared a heartwarming moment, and that was all.

END

Short Story Collection 13

Royal Selection: First Contact (Translation Pending)

Royal Selection: First Contact After

1

Emilia: “—Victory!”

In the early morning, what rang out loud in the mansion’s yard was the shout that had become part of her daily routine.

Raising both hands energetically above her head, she called out from the pit of her stomach, full of spirit. That way, vitality would fill every corner of her body, all the way to the tips of her hands and feet, and her drowsiness would vanish far away.

She wasn’t very good at getting up early, so this effect of pushing her sleepiness away was a huge help. Given her position, going out in front of everyone with sleepy eyes was really not good.

Emilia: “Mm, it’s completely become a habit.”

Stretching her back with the sense of achievement and satisfaction at having finished, Emilia murmured that, her silver hair, gathered loosely today, letting the sunlight shine through it.

The radio calisthenics that had become their morning habit were a fun ritual for starting the day feeling good, thought up by the black-haired boy who worked as a servant at the mansion—Natsuki Subaru.

At first, Emilia had been the only one joining Subaru, but before she knew it, everyone working at the mansion, and even the villagers living nearby, had started taking part, and the number of participants was steadily growing.

Of course, they couldn’t manage to gather in a big group for radio calisthenics every single day, but even so, Emilia had heard a delightful report from Petra, who was reliably growing as a new maid, that even when Subaru wasn’t around, everyone in the village was voluntarily doing them.

Emilia: “I’ve completely gotten to where I can go all the way through even without Subaru’s calls now.”

Emilia’s eyes softened in contentment, but beside her there were none of the usual figures of Subaru, who should have been doing radio calisthenics together with her, nor of his partner, Beatrice. At the moment, the two of them were out on a job as a spirit arts user and his contracted spirit, calming the Micro Spirits in the region who were causing trouble.

Because of that, Subaru and the others had been away from the mansion for about two days, and for those two days, Emilia had been doing radio calisthenics by herself. To be honest, she felt a little lonely.

But she had heard that they would safely finish the job and be back today, so that lonely feeling was about to come to a pause—and right then, she went “Ah,” realizing something.

A moment ago, Emilia had thought of Subaru in her heart as the boy who worked as a servant at the mansion, but that wasn’t right.

Right now, Natsuki Subaru was—

Emilia: “—My knight, after all.”

Every time, feeling her own cheeks grow warm as she said that out loud made Emilia think that was something very, very happy.

2

It had been about a month since Natsuki Subaru’s investiture as a Knight, and the ceremony in which he had also been granted the position of first Knight to Emilia, a Royal Candidate.

In the uproar right before the investiture ceremony, their base of operations, the mansion, had burned down, and they had been kept busy dealing with those who wished to relocate from the now-opened Sanctuary, so this past month had been hectic to say the least. But that too had finally begun to settle down, and Emilia had just started to slowly feel the day-to-day changes—the differences between how things had been and how things would be from now on.

First and foremost, the biggest change for Emilia was—

Petra: "—Lady Emilia, you look really happy."

Being told that, Emilia involuntarily blinked in confusion, her eyes going round.

The one who had stopped her in the corridor and smiled at her like that was Petra, whose brand-new maid uniform still looked as if it sparkled.

Tilting her head at that "happy-looking" description, which she herself had not noticed, Emilia said,

Emilia: "Was I really looking that happy? I was just walking down the hallway, though."

Petra: "But the way you were walking was all bouncy, and you were humming… It was a song I have never heard before, but you were humming, right?"

Emilia: "You have never heard it? I heard "Sword Demon Love Song" is suuper famous though…"

Petra: "Ah, that was "Sword Demon Love Song"… Umm, now that you mention it, I think it might have been."

As Petra pressed her hands together in front of her chest, saying she remembered now, Emilia also nodded with a "That's right." Even so, she still had no sense at all that she had been that cheerful.

But if she had looked that buoyant even through Petra's eyes…

Petra: "You are happy that Subaru and Beatrice-chan are coming back too, Lady Emilia."

Emilia: "Yeah, I am. Because Subaru said that once this job is over, he'll bring back some reaaally interesting stories as a souvenir. A promise… I figured Subaru's more likely to really do it if we don't make it a promise, so I did not make him promise, but."

Petra: "Mmm, I understand. Even I cannot really take Subaru's side on that one."

The fact that Subaru was a habitual promise-breaker was already common knowledge within Emilia's camp.

It was not as if Emilia had gone out of her way to spread that around, but the fact that even Petra knew it probably meant Subaru's broken promises were not limited to just his dealings with Emilia.

Emilia: "That is something someone has to scold him for, right."

Petra: "Yes, that is right. But if anyone is going to scold him, it has to be you, Lady Emilia. Because Subaru is Lady Emilia's Knight."

Emilia: "…"

Petra: "Lady Emilia?"

Emilia: "Eh, ah, no, it's fine. I'm totally okay, really. Yeah, you're right. Subaru is my Knight, so if he does something bad, I have to be the one to scold him. Yeah, yeah… leave it to me!"

Petra: "That is so powerful…"

Thumping a fist against her own chest, Emilia accepted that role with great vigor in front of Petra.

After that, she parted ways with Petra as the girl went back to work, and Emilia also went on with the rest of her morning routine—chatting with the Micro Spirits she was contracted with, and taking care of her hair and skin every day as she had promised Puck. By the time she was finished with those, it was time for breakfast, and everyone gathered in the dining hall to eat together.

Garfiel: "Ooh, Lady Emilia, that's amazin'. Ya can eat peppir today, huh."

Emilia: “Eh? I was eating peppir? No way, it’s the green devil…”

Ram: “Garf, kindly do not say unnecessary things. Lady Emilia had just absentmindedly gotten rid of the peppir… the green devil.”

Otto: “Why are you looking at me while saying “green devil”! My clothes being green have nothing at all to do with the bitterness of peppir!”

With things going like that, the lively meal went on, and even as she trembled at the fact that she had eaten peppir, Emilia very much enjoyed the dining table she shared with everyone in the camp.

Originally, Roswaal Manor had a custom of everyone gathering to eat together, but it was only after Subaru joined them that things had become this boisterous. Back when she had lived in the forest with just Puck, Puck’s skillful talk had often made her laugh, but even then she would not have called it lively.

Now, there was not a moment without laughter, even during meals.

Frederica: “—Lady Emilia, you were very focused today.”

Drawing the results of the morning’s studies closer at hand and checking over the contents, Frederica offered those words of praise. Hearing them, Emilia patted her chest in relief with a “Thank goodness.”

Unless she had duties as a Royal Candidate or some special business, Emilia spent most of her day at her desk facing books and documents, devoting herself to learning the knowledge she lacked. The Wind Hour in the morning was for studying politics, the legal system, and history, and she had just had that work graded by Frederica.

The reason Emilia had felt so relieved at the grading results was, of course, that she was happy to have her efforts acknowledged, but beyond that—

Frederica: “Now you can go to greet Subaru-sama and the others when they return at the Fire Hour.”

Emilia: “Yeah. Making sure I don’t neglect my studies was the condition Roswaal gave me, after all.”

Frederica: “The Master really does think up such spiteful things as well… is what I would like to say, but.”

Emilia: “No, it’s important. Just because I am all fidgety doesn’t mean it’s okay to put important things off.”

At Frederica’s words, her brows slightly drooping, Emilia shook her head and answered like that.

Roswaal certainly was mean-spirited, and he had actually done mean things, but even when his phrasing was mean, he was often saying things that were correct. This condition was one of those cases as well.

Going out to greet Subaru and the others without doing what she was supposed to do would have been kind of strange.

Frederica: “You seem to be enjoying yourself, Lady Emilia.”

Emilia: “…Frederica said the same thing Petra-chan told me this morning. And at breakfast Ram also said I was spacing out. What kind of face am I making?”

Frederica: “Let me see… A face that is eagerly waiting for very happy news, perhaps.”

Emilia: “And that still looks happy?”

Frederica: “Waiting can also be a joyful time, after all.”

Seeing Frederica’s smile as she brought a hand to her mouth, Emilia somehow felt convinced.

Now that she thought about it, back when she had been living in the forest, if she got her hands on a fruit they could rarely obtain, waiting for it to ripen fully and sweetly had been fun. Maybe this was the same thing.

Emilia: “Mm, I think I get that. Subaru seems to reaaally like appa too.”

Frederica: “I feel as though your conclusion may be a little off, but… even so, once again, I am very happy that you were able to welcome Subaru-sama as your Knight.”

Emilia: “—? Frederica, you also wanted Subaru to become a Knight?”

Frederica: “Rather than that, I am happy that you were able to welcome a Knight, Lady Emilia. Previously, you consulted me once about your own Knight, did you not?”

Emilia: “—Right… You’re right, I remember. Frederica, you said you wanted someone who was kind and would properly talk about their feelings.”

Frederica: “Y-Yes, that is what I said. You remember it in such detail… Ahem, but you do not need to worry about me. I am not someone who stands in a position to have a Knight.”

Her cheeks faintly flushed, Frederica diverted the flow of the conversation away from herself. The face she made as she did so felt a little similar to how she looked when she was dealing with Clind, who had been coming and going more often since the mansion had been moved, but there was no opening to bring that up.

Instead, Frederica gently touched her own chest and continued,

Frederica: “At that time, I was the one who accompanied you to the Royal Capital, but when you met the other Candidates and their Knights, you looked very uneasy, Lady Emilia. I regretted that I could not properly stay by your side in that uneasiness.”

Emilia: “I do not think you “could not do it properly” or anything like that, though…”

Frederica: “It is what I thought, myself. That there were more things I could have done. So I am grateful that Subaru-sama became your Knight, and more than that…”

Emilia: “More than that?”

Frederica: “—I wanted to tell you, Lady Emilia, that you did very well.”

Hearing Frederica continue like that, Emilia caught a small breath and lowered her gaze.

The slow heat that welled up at the back of her eyes was proof that Frederica’s feelings had pierced her heart. It was not as if she had been holding onto feelings of pain or sadness or anything like that. But it was true that Emilia had been uneasy, and more than that, she had not really been able to grasp it at all.

The idea that she could have an absolute ally of her own, a first Knight of her own, not at all.

Emilia: “But you know, it’s amazing, Frederica.”

Taking a deep breath in and out, Emilia raised her face and began like that.

Emilia: “I was talking with Puck about what kind of Knight would make me happy… and everything I was thinking of back then, Subaru fits all of it.”

Frederica: “My, is that so… Would you tell me those conditions as well?”

Emilia: “Sure. —First, someone who laughs a lot, who can enjoy eating anything, who is hardworking, and who gets along with Beatrice and everyone in the mansion… See? That’s all exactly Subaru, right?”

Frederica: “Yes, truly. Subaru-sama is exactly like that…”

Emilia: “And I wanted someone who would not be afraid of me… Fufu, I never imagined he would even be someone who would say he likes me.”

Frederica: “…”

Unthinkingly, as her cheeks warmed at that fact, Emilia's lips relaxed into a smile.

Even those conditions she had just listed, when she had talked them over with Puck, she had thought she was being terribly greedy. At first she had not really known what she wanted, but once she started thinking about it, the conditions had come out one after another, and Puck had laughed and called her a greedy girl.

And yet Subaru had fulfilled all those conditions—even that very greatest wish of Emilia's, though in a slightly different form.

Emilia: "I am happy to have him say he likes me, but it makes me feel reaaally restless somehow. Frederica, what do you do at times like that?"

Frederica: "Eh?! W-Well… It is the same as between a Knight and their lord."

Emilia: "—? What do you mean?"

Frederica: "There are different ways of relating to each other in every case, so there is no single correct answer… Something like that."

Emilia: "I see, so that is how it is."

At Frederica's answer, Emilia nodded in agreement.

The relationship between Emilia and Subaru was different from that of Crusch and Ferris, from Anastasia and Julius, from Priscilla and Al, and from Felt and Reinhard as well.

There was no one correct form there. Frederica's opinion was right on the mark.

There was just one thing that she had, only now, started to feel uneasy about, and that was—

Emilia: "The truth is, my Knight was supposed to undergo Puck's strict screening, but since Puck is asleep, that part is not properly done yet."

Frederica: “—In that case, when the Great Spirit wakes, I shall put in a word from me as well. I will tell him Subaru-sama is absolutely perfect.”

Emilia: “Fufu, I am counting on you.”

With that promise from Frederica, such a reassuring ally, Emilia smiled back at her.

3

Before lunchtime, Emilia left the new Roswaal Manor and headed for the Industrial City of Costuul, the nearest town, to pick up Subaru and the others.

Her only companions on this deliberately a-little-bit-lonely adventure were Beatrice and Patrasche. Subaru had said he was thinking that chances for outings like this would increase from now on, and that was why they were doing it this way, but she remembered feeling just a little sad at the idea that there would be more times when they were apart.

At any rate, when she went to their agreed meeting place at the appointed time he had given in his message, she spotted a dragon carriage bearing the crest of the House of Mathers on the busy main street, lined with stalls and crowded with people. In front of that dragon carriage stood a ground dragon with jet-black scales, and beside it—

Subaru: “So here’s the thing, old man. We just got back from a job. Long trip, and it was our very first job to boot, so we’ve gotta celebrate with the very best appa you’ve got! Right?”

Beatrice: “Betty heard the appa from your stall are the best in town, in fact. Now, we shall see whether you can live up to Betty’s expectations, I suppose.”

Fruit Seller: “Good grief… You two sure know how to fire a guy up, kid and missy!”

Even amid the bustle of the street, Emilia could pick out the backs of Subaru and Beatrice, standing out as they bantered like that.

Subaru seemed to be negotiating with the owner of a fruit shop about something. When his profile came into her violet eyes, Emilia involuntarily blinked in surprise and pressed a hand to her chest. She could feel warmth soaking through her whole body from her heart, which was softly beating, just a little more lively than usual.

She understood it. She understood it, and it was far too much for her to bear all by herself.

Emilia: “Um, excuse me, can I just say something?”

Passerby: “Hm? What is it?”

Holding that feeling inside, Emilia stopped a passerby who just happened to be walking past beside her. To the man, who was not anyone she knew at all, Emilia pointed across the street.

Then, indicating Subaru standing over there—

Emilia: “—That over there, that’s my Knight.”

Passerby: “Huh? Ah, I… see. …In that case, um, I wish you both happiness?”

Emilia: “—Yes, thank you reaaally much.”

The passerby looked confused for a moment, but Emilia smiled at his words of blessing and then broke into a run. She did feel a little bad about leaving him standing there gaping, but Emilia’s heart was bright and clear.

Emilia: “My Knight is amazing.”

Saying that, just as she had once thought long ago when she imagined her ideal Knight, Emilia ran with a spring in her step toward her very first Knight, waiting for her on the far side of the street.

END

The Golden Lion and the Sword Saint:
The Lion’s Ferocity
(Translation Pending)

Lady Priscilla's Cheers for Me!
The Crimson Flame's Homecoming Part

(Translation Pending)

Provisional Rem's Paranoia: Night Parade of One Hundred Oni (Translation Pending)

Once Upon a Time in Astrea (Translation Pending)

Once Upon a Time in Astrea After

1

???: "—Young Master, is there not something you ought to say to me?"

Stopped like that at the entrance of the manor, Heinkel Astrea felt a chill run down his spine.

First, there was the fact that he had been surprised because he had not sensed her presence. However, that was something everyone else in the household besides him could do, and it had been startling him since long ago, so as a reason it was weak.

So the main reason lay in the other thing, the guilt he was feeling.

Heinkel: "Ah—uh, well, that is…"

???: "Please stop giving such halting answers. Conduct yourself with confidence."

Heinkel: "Ugh… sor—no, my bad."

He faltered, but his stalling for time with an obvious excuse was seen through at once. Before Heinkel could even turn around, a blonde woman with perfectly straight posture had stepped around to face him head on.

The woman with the long, narrow eyes who had aged with such grace was someone Heinkel had known since the day he was born, and in other words, for twenty years now their balance of power had not changed.

She was one half of the married pair of servants who served House Astrea, and she was also Heinkel's wet nurse.

???: "…"

Under that wet nurse's sharp gaze, Heinkel felt as though she could see straight through his heart. In fact, not once up to now had he ever succeeded in hiding anything from her.

Part of it was that Heinkel had no talent for keeping secrets, but above all it was due to the keenness of his nurse's eye.

So this time as well, Heinkel promptly gave up and took a paper bag from his breast.

The contents of that paper bag were exactly what he felt guilty about.

Carol: "Valnau tea leaves? It is the brand Young Master likes, but… why are you going so far as to sneak it out in secret? Are you dissatisfied with the way I brew it?"

Heinkel: "Of course not. I got to like tea because your tea is good, Carol. I was thinking of giving this to somebody."

Carol: "To somebody? —Do not tell me you are trying to show charity to someone again? You should have learned your lesson when the beggars in the Slums stripped you of every coin last time."

Heinkel: "D-Don't bring up something from that long ago. Besides, Louanna's not like that…"

Carol: "—Louanna. That is a woman's name, is it not?"

At his nurse, who was quick not to overlook his slip of the tongue, Heinkel let out an "Ah" and realized his mistake. However, that one word after his slip of the tongue was not good either.

As if to say that she needed no further verbal confirmation, his nurse lifted her slender shoulders in a shrug, and—

Carol: "I more or less understand the circumstances. If the reason you were trying to sneak tea leaves out behind my back has to do with a woman, then it makes sense."

Heinkel: "Well, yeah, that's… that's true, but…"

Carol: "Only, please remember, Young Master. You are the firstborn of House Astrea, the heir to this home. With some lighthearted feeling—”

Heinkel: “—It’s not lighthearted.”

Carol: “…”

Haltingly, his nurse had begun a lecture meant to make him more self-aware, and just as she was about to continue her last words, Heinkel hastily spoke over her and cut her off.

Catching the faint way his nurse’s blue eyes widened, Heinkel let out a breath and—

Heinkel: “It’s not lighthearted. …It’s not like that. Really.”

As he spoke, without realizing it, Heinkel touched his right hand—his upper arm wrapped in bandages—and thought of the woman who had been the cause of that wound and was seared so deeply into his heart.

What his nurse thought of that reply and the look on Heinkel’s face afterward, he could not know.

Only, after letting out a small sigh, she said—

Carol: “Very well. It seems my words no longer reach you, Young Master…”

Heinkel: “Don’t put it like that…”

Carol: “I am joking. Do you not have an appointed time to keep? You had best hurry.”

After pretending to cry, then smiling as she said that, his nurse made even Heinkel, who checked the magic crystal timepiece, genuinely panic that he was running out of time.

He stuffed the paper bag back into his breast and hurried to dash out—but before he did, he turned to his nurse.

Heinkel: “I’ll introduce her properly next time, so watch over me for a while.”

Carol: “—Yes. Please go and come back safely, Young Master.”

To the Heinkel who had said that, his nurse made a perfectly neat, beautiful bow. —The fact that he had been praised for learning from that refined motion was, in a way, one facet of the relationship between who he was now and her, and somehow he felt proud of it.

2

Louanna: “Ah, Heinkel, over here, over here, over heeere!”

Since he had left the manor later than planned, Heinkel had been a little worried about whether he would make it in time, but that worry was easily shattered and scattered away by her lively, bright smile and wave.

The commercial district in the royal capital, a flower shop set up in one corner of it—that was the place Heinkel jogged over to, and the workplace of Louanna Hartley, who was waving at him.

In front of the storefront, which carried with it a gentle waft of flowers’ fragrance, Louanna, who had already finished getting ready to go home, greeted the approaching Heinkel and ran over to him.

Seeing her like that, Heinkel felt relieved, and a warm feeling welled up inside him as he said,

Heinkel: “Sorry to keep you waiting. I thought you might have already gone home.”

Louanna: “Goodness, Heinkel, do you really think I am that impatient? If I know you are coming, there is no way I would go home.”

Heinkel: “…But the whole picking you up and seeing you off thing is something I am doing on my own.”

Louanna: “It is. It has completely become a habit.”

At Heinkel's awkward expression, Louanna stuck out her lips in a sulky pout for a moment, only to immediately break into a grin and show him a smile just like a flower blooming.

He was perfectly aware he was taking advantage of the fact that she never clearly refused. —Heinkel had used the excuse that the lingering grudge of the remnants of the human trafficking organization, and the possibility that their hatred might be turned on Louanna, meant someone had to escort her to and from her workplace, and had volunteered for the job himself.

Of course, that organization in question had already been dismantled by the knights, and the main people involved had either been cut down or put in chains, so the odds of there being any remnants left who would threaten Louanna were almost zero. Even so, the reason Heinkel wanted to guard Louanna was not because he was extremely overprotective. —That was not it.

In the end, Heinkel just wanted to spend even a little longer with Louanna.

Louanna: "…? Heinkel, there is kind of a metteki smell on you, is there not?"

Heinkel: "—Sharp… no, sharp nose, maybe? But you are right. Look."

Louanna: "Oh, could this be Valnau tea leaves?!"

Sniff sniff, Louanna twitched her nose, and with her exceptional sense of smell noticed the gift he had brought. Since she had noticed, there was no reason to hide it, so Heinkel took the paper bag from his breast and handed it to her.

Lightly opening the mouth of the bag, Louanna drew the wholesome aroma of the tea leaves deep into her chest.

Louanna: "Haa… I cannot get enough of this. Why is it that when tea is delicious, even the scent of the leaves is delicious…? Heinkel, can you solve this mystery?"

Heinkel: "Uh… I, I am gonna need some time."

Louanna: “Understood, I will look forward to your answer tomorrow.”

Just like that, she had arbitrarily made it into homework on pure momentum. However, since it seemed he was allowed to come see her again tomorrow, Heinkel made up his mind to show up tomorrow with an answer that would make her happy.

While he was forming that resolve, Louanna, beside him, pursed her lips and said, “But,”

Louanna: “Even if we promised, these are high-grade tea leaves, so just taking them and not giving anything in return feels wrong… so, in exchange, I would like to give you a flower, Heinkel.”

Heinkel: “Huh, that is a quick conclusion. What about my opinion that you do not have to thank me or give me anything back?”

Louanna: “I am all ears for that opinion… not. Now then, which flower would suit you, Heinkel?”

As if to say that her overflowing desire to reciprocate simply would not stop, Louanna leaned in to peer into the flower shop. Heinkel stared wide-eyed for a while, then soon let the tension slip from his shoulders.

He had never disliked flowers to begin with. As he had told Louanna, Heinkel’s mother had loved flowers, and the manor’s garden had been filled to overflowing with seasonal blossoms. Because of that, for Heinkel, flowers were always something close at hand in his daily life.

And among them, the ones Heinkel felt a particular attachment to were—

Heinkel & Louanna: “—Diana flowers.”

That was what Heinkel said at the exact same moment Louanna said it.

Heinkel involuntarily held his breath, and Louanna, with a puzzled look on her face, blinked her eyes a few times, then gently gathered up some of the Diana—the yellow flowers at the storefront—into a bouquet.

Louanna: “Hehe, that was pretty in sync just now. meggoi, was it not?”

Heinkel: “Yeah, I was meggoi surprised… Is this really for me?”

Louanna: “It is. Please think of it as a small token from me. Ah! If you like, I can also make you a flower crown. I am sure it would look good on you.”

Heinkel: “…Sorry, but I will pass on that.”

He appreciated the enthusiasm, but at his age he wanted to avoid wearing a flower crown if he could help it.

If Louanna actually gave him one, there would probably be no way for him to refuse to put it on, so the best move Heinkel could make was to avoid that outcome before it happened. Fortunately, Louanna did not suddenly pull out a “I have already made one” flower crown and offer it to him, so he felt relieved.

At any rate—

Louanna: “We have safely traded tea leaves for a bouquet, so shall we get going?”

Heinkel: “Yeah. I do not really want weird rumors starting up at your workplace.”

Louanna: “Weird rumors? For example, what kind?”

Heinkel: “…Like, that there was some big guy with a yellow flower crown on his head.”

Louanna: “That did not even happen. …Ah, I understand. Please look forward to tomorrow.”

Heinkel: “I do not think you understand, so wait a second.”

Thinking that he had said something unnecessary, Heinkel scrambled to use every word he could to explain himself to Louanna, who was suddenly fired up.

What he had wanted to say was that he did not want to cause trouble for Louanna, and that with some man picking her up and dropping her off every day, people might resent her for it—those were the kinds of worries he had, but—

Louanna: "Since everyone has it that you are my fiancé, Heinkel, I do not think anyone is looking at it that way."

Heinkel: "…"

Louanna: "On the contrary, because I get picked up and dropped off every day, my coworkers shower me with high-pitched cheers. Even I, before I know it, kind of end up walking around with my chest puffed out."

Heinkel: "Your chest, huh."

Louanna: "Exactly, like "hm-hm!" you know."

Louanna put her hands on her hips and boasted, and from that, Heinkel was able to feel relieved that it did not seem like his offer had become a burden to her.

As for the engagement she mentioned, that was nothing more than a verbal promise made between Heinkel and her—and even that had been another thing he had one-sidedly proposed, borrowing the power of that human trafficking organization's affair.

Of course, Heinkel was serious, and he felt that Louanna did not particularly dislike him either, but it was also true that she possessed a mysterious charm that made it easy to imagine her saying the next day, "Did I ever say something like that?"

Because of that, Heinkel had not been able to carelessly dig deeper into that topic. —And yet, Louanna went and said things like this so easily.

Heinkel: "…I am over here hesitating even to ask you out somewhere or something."

The stated pretext was that he was her guard, and he had even equipped himself with the noble cause that their engagement was in order to protect Louanna, so Heinkel had ended up binding himself hand and foot.

He was taking her to and from work “because it was dangerous,” and if he then took her out for meals or to the theater, those actions would run headlong into that premise, and the thought made Heinkel clutch his head.

Then, as he was struggling in that self-spun web, Louanna peered at his profile and said,

Louanna: “Heinkel, there is somewhere I would like to stop by on the way. Is that all right?”

Heinkel: “A detour? I do not mind, but… again?”

Louanna: “Yes. Come on now, it is a different place from yesterday.”

At Louanna’s smiling suggestion, Heinkel nodded back with an “All right.”

It had been several days now since he started picking her up and seeing her off like this, but Louanna very often did not go straight home from work, instead wandering off here and there to make little detours.

Of course, sometimes she would be picking up foodstuffs or daily necessities, but Louanna’s detours were not limited to those sorts of essentials—

Louanna: “Look, Heinkel. It is a doggy family.”

Following the sharp point of Louanna’s finger to the edge of the street, he saw three dogs with fluffy white fur, two puppies clinging to their large mother and snuggling up to her.

It was indeed an adorable sight, and he could understand why Louanna’s voice was so bright.

Heinkel: “Louanna, that is what you wanted to detour for?”

Louanna: “It is. I heard from a customer today. They told me that right at the corner of Sixth Street, there is a secret little spot for cuteness… They are mekkawa, are they not?”

Heinkel: “…They are mekkawa.”

Louanna adored the dog family, calling them cute, and while he found Louanna herself adorable, Heinkel echoed her and said as much.

—At that rate, Heinkel had a wild time: helping Louanna feed the dogs, giving his thoughts on a plan to find them new homes, getting chased all over by the dogs that took a huge liking to him, and then, for some reason, having to soothe Louanna when she sulked and called it unfair.

After they said goodbye to the dogs like that and left them, the sun, which had still been quite high when they left the flower shop, had dipped, and as the presence of night drew close to the royal capital, Heinkel finally saw Louanna safely home.

Louanna: “All right, we are here. Thank you very much for today as well.”

Heinkel: “Yeah, right, that is true.”

Louanna: “—? What is wrong? Did you forget something?”

In front of the apartment building where Louanna’s room was, Heinkel gave a halting reply, and she tilted her head at him. Heinkel shook his head and said, “No, that is not it,”

Heinkel: “It is just… with how hectic things were today too, I feel like I did not really fulfill the main duty of escorting you.”

Louanna: “What are you saying? You properly escorted me all the way home like this, and you kept me thoroughly entertained with our detours along the way. Playing with the doggies like that… I will reenact it, all right?”

Heinkel: “You do not have to. That would just be reenacting me getting chased around by the dogs, right.”

He did think he would like to see a reenactment of her playing with the dogs, but he tossed that hope aside.

In any case, as far as Heinkel was concerned, he wanted to first carry out his guarding duties cleanly and properly, just as stated in name, and then connect that to his next hopes. —Unfortunately, for that, he was getting a failing grade today as well.

Louanna: “If you are that dissatisfied, then… let me see… could you give me that bouquet?”

Heinkel: “Huh? This? But you are the one who gave this to me, Louanna. Are you sure?”

Louanna: “Yes, please, with all your might.”

It was not the sort of thing one needed to get fired up about, so Heinkel was a bit bewildered, but even so, the bouquet that he had been given by no one other than her at the flower shop, he went down on one knee and gently offered to her.

Louanna softly received that bouquet in both hands and hugged it to her chest.

Louanna: “Thank you very much. Heinkel, you are mekkoi again today.”

Heinkel: “…Yeah? If that is how it is, I am starting to feel like this was just fine, then.”

Louanna: “It is. Well then, see you tomorrow… Ah, would you like to come in?”

Heinkel: “No, I did not bring the courage for that today… maybe next time.”

He thought it was a terribly cowardly answer, but Louanna neither laughed nor looked disappointed. Instead, she smiled and said, “Understood,” and saw him off, waving her hand big and wide.

Seeing her wave him off like that and heading home, Heinkel found himself thinking once again. —Next time for sure, he would invite Louanna out somewhere himself.

—Of course, Heinkel had no idea, but these daily trips picking Louanna up and seeing her home, and the little detours that came with them, were recognized by the people around them as intimate rendezvous time between an engaged couple.

The only ones who did not know were the very people involved. —No, to be precise, the only one who did not know was one half of the pairing.

In addition, what awaited Heinkel when he returned home that day, full of resolve, was his wet nurse and, having heard the story from her, his biological mother, who both subjected him to a persistent round of questioning about how things were progressing with the one he had given the tea leaves to. Since he could only give flustered answers to that, he gravely disappointed both of his mothers—and that, too, should be added here.

END

Volume 43

Chapters 50-Curtains Close

Prologue:
End of the Dream

—Harbored by Aldebaran upon his homecoming to the Castle of Dreams, were emotions beyond any description.

A sight he knew, an aroma he knew, a soundscape he knew, a warmth he knew.

Welcomed by the familiar everblue sky and verdant plains, by the familiar sound of wind that carried with it the fragrance of grass, and by the familiar warmth of the rays of sunlight, Aldebaran stood frozen amidst a scenery of which he knew every last detail. —That instant, color was vibrantly breathed into the faded and clouded picture within his mind, shining with a brand new radiance.

Aldebaran: "…"

Unmistakably, this was the Castle of Dreams of which Aldebaran had dreamed.

Through the months an years long passed, he had doubted the veracity of its existence. At the sensation of it slipping away, he had even doubted his own sanity. Even so, permeated through every last bit of the flesh and blood that made up Aldebaran, as the school of his soul that he could by no means ever forget, that Castle of Dreams had continued to persist beyond.

—Spanning across years numbered both ten and four-hundred, Aldebaran had arrived home to that place.

???: "…"

Atop the hill, underneath a white parasol, he could see a slender, supple silhouette standing still. Black and white, the beautiful woman made up of naught but those two colors, was looking down upon Aldebaran at the foot of the hill.

Meeting her black eyes, the moment her beauty, evident even at a distance, scorched his retinas, Aldebaran was convinced that this was the Witch who had scorched him to the point of believing in his own irrationality.

For Aldebaran, this was a being who gave rise to countless indescribable emotions within him.

Aldebaran: "—Teacher."

Real. She was real. Here. She was really here. Existed. She had certainly existed here.

The Witch, the Castle of Dreams, Aldebaran's past: none of them were delusions made up by Aldebaran, unable to find a place in the world of the sane.

Aldebaran: "Teacher… hk."

There were so many things he wished to say to her. There were countless things he wished to tell her.

The words he wished to exchange with her, numbered far greater than the stars in the night sky.

Only, above all else, Aldebaran had wished to share his feelings with the Witch, his feelings of having survived, and finally reuniting with her after many, many long years.

With those impatient feelings in his chest, Aldebaran hastened towards the Witch atop the hill—

Witch: "—Aldebaran."

The leg with which he was about to step forth, was halted by that call.

The voice of the Witch he had continued to desire, to long for, to year for, was one filled to the brim with emotion—such was not the case. Aldebaran's leg had ceased for a different reason entirely.

The coldness of that voice, of Witch's gaze as it fell upon him, its sharpness, had caused him to freeze.

Aldebaran: “T-Teacher?”

Dominated by unease, Aldebaran halted his step as the Witch gazed upon him in silence.

She was ever eager to learn, a bundle of curiosity, the very incarnation of a thirst for knowledge. But, that which currently dwelled in the Witch’s black gaze, was decidedly different from that of the Witch whom Aldebaran had known.

With a form Aldebaran knew, with a voice Aldebaran knew, she ought to have been the Witch Aldebaran knew, and yet, her very nature was decidedly different.

The reason for that, that cause, the truth was—

Witch: “—The Witch of Greed.”

In response to the misgivings and anxieties Aldebaran held, that was the Witch’s answer.

Aldebaran: “—Ah.”

As the Witch spoke that and not a word more, her black eyes emotionlessly gazed over Aldebaran as if testing to see how he might respond, just as though he were some sort of lab rat.

He understood. He intuitively felt it. —He was convinced.

The woman before his eyes, was certainly the very Witch who had spent the same time alongside Aldebaran. And in a sense, that Witch had ended up being lost to eternity.

She had become compatible. The Witch had become compatible.

It required selfishness, yet no matter how much she yearned for it, she had never been able to make it her own, the qualification to become complete as a Witch in the truest sense—she had become compatible with the Witch Factor.

The Witch had been reduced. —Reduced from the one who guided Aldebaran, to the Witch of Greed.

Aldebaran had been defeated in the battle he could not afford to lose, and as compensation for that, the Witch had been placed on the verge of death.

On that boundary of death, after parting ways with Aldebaran, the Witch had been chosen.

—In exchange for her sincere love, she had been chosen by the qualification to become inhuman, thereby gaining the power needed to grant her wishes.

Witch of Greed: "—Why, must love fade?"

He did not know. The answer to the question that the Witch of Greed had voiced, Aldebaran did not know.

Only, there was one thing that he knew for certain.

Aldebaran: "Teacher… no, Witch of Greed, Echidna."

Witch of Greed: "…"

Aldebaran: "I, no matter what—will definitely kill you."

—Aldebaran had lost everything. Everything, save for his life.

Vic.ll20

Chapter 50:
Decisive Battle on the Ice

1

The hexacolor radiance that had pierced heaven and earth, gradually unraveled and faded away.

The sky that had faded to a dull gray slowly regained its natural color, and before long, as if having recalled why it was called blue, the azure sky began to clear.

Roswaal: “…”

With such scenery before him, Roswaal saw tears falling from the eyes of Ezzo beside him.

Whether they were of joy or vexation, it was clear that he had been overcome with emotion. Although it had taken two people to perform, Roswaal and Ezzo had nevertheless accomplished a great feat engraved for the first time in the history of magic.

The utmost extremity of magical control allocated into groupings of four and two colors, perfect formulation of a technique that did not permit any gaps whatsoever, and the ultimate harmony that could not have been manifested were there to have been a lag of even an instant—that, had surmounted the Divine Dragon’s dragonhalo.

Roswaal’s diligent studies and Ezzo’s research: if either were to have been missing, this hyper magic would have never been realized.

However—

Ezzo: “One day I’ll… I’ll even manage to manifest this technique by myself…!”

Even as Ezzo bombasted while shedding ceaseless tears, Roswaal smiled at his demeanor.

Neither was it out of exasperation, nor was it in sarcasm. —Indeed, that was the very essence of a magician.

Visualization was important in magic. If it could be visualized, then anything could be accomplished: that was magic.

Roswaal: “Isn’t that right, Teacher?”

As Roswaal muttered those words, his body began to tip over, and was about to collapse onto the ground. Ezzo immediately reached out to try to support him, but alas, given how immensely exhausted he was, he collapsed first.

Then, as the falling Roswaal seemed like he was about to crush Ezzo under him—

Clind: “—Made it in time. Good news.”

At a precarious juncture, that calm voice and those strong arms successfully saved Roswaal from falling down, and Ezzo from being squashed.

Roswaal: “…”

Glancing at Clind as he was supported by him, Roswaal let out a breath.

Having soared through the skies during the battle, it was the versatile steward who had gone so far as to shatter a star before returning to them. At some point he had put his monocle back on and retracted his black horns. However, it appeared as though he had not managed to entirely restore his perfect, everyday appearance, and thus was a rather unusual form with disheveled clothing.

Roswaal: “Even so, outside of your butler uniform, you are mostly unharmed, dragonkin truly are overpooowered~.”

Clind: “Master, if I may be so bold as to correct you. It is not because I am a dragonkin, but because I, as the dragonkin of the Divine Dragon, am simply special. Assertion.”

Roswaal: "…So you really are quite proud after all? It was your receptacle's fault that we've ended up like this, you know?"

Ezzo: "Don't point at me when saying that! It is merely that I cannot stand up because my back… no, because my entire body has gone limp!"

Having fallen face-first, Ezzo was unable to stand up, and yet did not admit defeat. As if to express sentiments of lament, Clind shrugged his shoulders at that demeanour, but truly, it was a wonderful quality.

Roswaal: "You've changed. You used to be more of a transcendent, detached type."

Clind: "In that case, I could say the exact same words to you. Return. —Were you not the one who was supposed to be clever and underhanded, content to remain a mere mediocre magician? Confirmation."

Clind narrowed his eye across his monocle, having perfectly guessed Roswaal's thinking.

Certainly, he had intended on that. And yet, Roswaal had not done so.

Getting back up after having failed, he had enacted a recklessness he never imagined he ever would.

But, that was—

Roswaal: "It's simply that I realized something… That all these days, I haaadn't~ been walking alone after all."

Clind & Ezzo: "…"

At Roswaal's answer, Clind fell silent. For some reason, Ezzo did too.

Roswaal: "Though perhaps that reason is a bit too obviooous~."

While only natural for Clind, with whom he had been acquainted a long time, when hyper magic had been invoked a moment ago, his consciousness had been on the verge of blending together with Ezzo's.

There, Roswaal had failed to fully conceal his own sentiments and prayers, after all.

Roswaal: "Speaking of that, I am quite accustomed to phenomena such as intermingling of the consciousness, but how did you manage to remain fine, Ezzo-kun? Normally, you would end up going insaaane~."

Ezzo: "Don't speak of such frightening matters so casually…! Likely, it is a boon of the Books of the Dead."

Roswaal: "The Books of the Dead, of the Pleiades Watchtower?"

Ezzo: "Indeed. While I was on standby at the Watchtower, I read over a dozen volumes of the Books of the Dead, but in order to do so I had to learn the necessary technique of closing off my heart…"

Clind: "I see. This is a magician. Understanding."

He somewhat felt like Clind had settled on a bit of a rude conclusion, but he would not touch upon it here. After all, Roswaal did not think Ezzo had done anything particularly strange.

Regardless, that which they ought to prioritize right now—

Clind: "Master, we have certainly fulfilled the duty with which we have been entrusted. Completion. However…"

Roswaal: "Ah, I'm awaaare~."

As Clind left his words half-finished, Roswaal silently breathed out and looked into the distance. The same direction as both Clind, and the grounded Ezzo—he cast his gaze beyond that horizon.

During the battle against the Divine Dragon, the rocky wasteland that had been completely terraformed from before, further beyond even that, the final destination of the Aldebaran Troupe—

Roswaal: “—The Grand Mogolade Geyser.”

Flashing through Roswaal’s mind as he muttered, was the final offensive of magic and Dragon that had sundered heaven and earth.

As the Divine Dragon had sent the dragonkin up to rise and intercept the star crashing down from the heavens, placed on the scales were two options: that of eliminating the two magicians who were weaving hyper magic, and that of fulfilling its own role.

It would assuredly win, such arrogance did not even slightly exist within the Divine Dragon at that moment.

Hence, the Dragon followed the conviction of the personality dwelling within its dragonhusk, and selected one of the two options—through its unleashed breath, it fired at an enormous opening in land far removed from the battlefield.

It was unclear why the Aldebaran Troupe was headed towards that location.

But, there was no chance that the Divine Dragon’s deed was unconnected to the Troupe’s objective, and even knowing that it would be defeated if it did so, the Divine Dragon prioritized firing its breath at that opening.

The meaning brought about by that action, would surely be verified from this point forward.

All that remained—

Roswaal: “—Is whether or not those you have cultivated will be able to surpass the opponent, Subaru-kun.”

2

—Irregular.

Rem recognized that this was the role expected of her, and the duty she ought to fulfill.

By utilizing the extraordinary Authority of “Turning Back Time”, Al had surmounted every single obstacle that stood in his way—in order to stop him, what was necessary were irregulars.

???: “Indeed, that helmet bastard’s Authority’s a fearsome thing. Frankly, even in all my years, I’ve rarely come across such an utterly irrational power. —But, no matter how powerful the ability, the one who’s gotta wield it ain’t nothin’ more than a human.”

???: “Hit that helmet bastard with countless things that he’d never expect, and keep on gettin’ ‘im ta use his Authority. The time he can turn back only goes so far. Overwhelm ‘im, overwhelm ‘im, ‘n overwhelm ‘im till ya take ‘im down.”

???: “If ya whittle away his remaining strength, even the helmet bastard’ll make an irreparable slipup. —That’ll be how ya snatch victory against that helmet bastard.”

Those were some words of advice from Rom-jii, who had once nearly driven Al into a corner.

In response to Rom-jii’s suggestion, those who were well-versed in tactics—Ram, Roswaal, and Clind—did not object. Therefore, Rem had full faith in that advice.

What they needed to do was bombard Al with enough unexpected situations until he broke. And if a contest of endurance was required, then Rem was not someone to be underestimated either.

After all—

Rem: “—After all, I’ve gotten to watch that person up close.”

If one were to ask what Rem’s best shot at seizing victory was, it would have been that.

Perhaps it was fortunate that Rem had been forgotten by everyone until very recently. During that interval bereft of Memories, the interactions she’d had with Al in the Empire could hardly be described as extensive. And if she was going to delve into her points of contact with him before that, in regards to the Royal Selection, it was even less so.

But, that was precisely the reason why Rem's actions had the potential to betray his expectations.

However—

Rem: "YAHHHHH!!"

Roaring, Rem swung her arm out with her full strength, and following closely behind, the unleashed iron ball ferociously streaked through the air.

The spiked iron ball spun around as it aimed directly for its target: the red-haired shinobi, Yae Tenzen—with the stage set as the five-thousand meter tall Agzadd Canyon, the battle raged on as they plummeted through the air, transitioning to the next phase with this prodigious shinobi as the opponent.

A discus of ice had been created in the air, serving as a platform for their contest of strength.

This was the result of Rem and Emilia working together to impose an irregular situation, but the very fact that they had been forced into such a scenario was frustrating.

It wasn't just Al's group that encountered an irregular. They had as well.

Rem: "…"

With a roar, a sharp, heavy strike cut through the wind.

The menace of that spiked iron mass, no matter how sharp the opposing blade, was not something that could be repelled even by something like bundling fine threads together. It surged forth in one swift motion towards the irregular Yae.

Yae: "—Hk."

Letting out a small noise at the approaching threat, Yae abandoned any attempts at interception and evaded with a cartwheel. Passing right by her as she rolled across the ice disk, the iron ball flew through the air in futility—

Emilia: “Eiyah!”

A sharp, almost carefree shout, met the iron ball with a resounding bang.

It was the pleasant sound of Emilia, standing on the other side of Yae, kicking the iron ball hurtling toward her with her feet clad in boots of ice. Emilia’s long, slender leg swiveled, and the iron ball was forcibly bounced back—chasing after Yae’s slender figure as she fled with a cartwheel.

Just like that, the iron ball mercilessly sunk its fangs into Yae’s side —

Yae: “Not gonna happen.”

Immediately after saying that, Yae pressed her hands against the ice disc while performing her cartwheel, and peeling up its surface using her steel threads to cover herself, it became a shield that intercepted the iron ball hurtling toward her body.

Of course, it was too thin a shield to completely stop a single blow. It would crack in half a second, snap after another quarter, and the spikes would pierce the other side after another eighth, so when exactly one second had passed, it would have fully broken through.

But, that single second was more than enough for the agile shinobi to make her next move.

Emilia: “No way?!”

And, it was Emilia who let out a cry of surprise. However, Rem was of the same frame of mind.

In their line of sight, after having evaded the pursuit with an impromptu ice shield, Yae set her bare foot on the fully extended chain of the Morningstar with a light leap, dashing across it in one fluid motion.

Emilia was stunned by the acrobatics and balance, while Rem was equally amazed by the footwork over the chains that conveyed no sense of weight whatsoever and yet the surprises kept coming. —

Together with a swing of Yae's arm, blades of ice and stone rained down one after another from above, targeting the two of them.

Emilia: "These are—"

Twenty seconds prior, Emilia and Al had forged these armaments of ice and stone in the air during their battle, leaving them suspended there. Yae had shot her steel threads up towards the heavens to bring them down, repurposing them as a perilous rain.

Emilia: "It's because I didn't clean up properly!"

Rem: "Failing to clean up properly goes for Al-san as well!"

Yae: "Let's just say that we both share the hardship of having masters who are bad at cleaning up after themselves, alright?"

Reflection, follow-up, and provocation all piled up, leaving Rem and Emilia scrambling to deal with the falling daggers. Emilia fended them off with her twin ice blades, but Rem was in trouble.

Her right hand was occupied by the Morningstar, which was currently being used as Yae's foothold, so she could not carelessly withdraw it. She had no choice but to defend with her unarmed left hand alone.

Rem: "Won't—"

Make it in time; it happened the moment she had resolved herself to tank the bombardment. —Someone gave a push to Rem's shoulders, and that same someone was impaled through the chest by a falling stone sword.

???: "…"

Rem's eyes widened at that sacrifice, furthermore her surprise deepened when she saw who had done it. The gallant figure, pierced through the chest, yet still bravely giving Rem a thumbs-up —

Rem: "—Subaru-kun!"

Before Rem’s eyes as she unwittingly let out a cry, it was Natsuki Subaru—or rather, an ice puppet bearing his likeness, that had been pierced through the chest. The exquisitely crafted ice Natsuki Subaru shielded Rem, flashing a brave smile as if he were the real thing, before collapsing.

Yae: “Uwehh~? That just now, don’t tell me that was Emilia-sama?”

Emilia: “Yes, that’s right. —And not only that, Subaru isn’t alone either!”

Immediately after she responded to the frowning Yae, six figures leapt out from behind Emilia. Each was an ice statue identical in appearance to the Natsuki Subaru who had just collapsed.

All of them so filled with individuality that it seemed as if they each possessed their own will, pulled a weapon from the ice disk where they had been lodged and leapt simultaneously towards Yae, who was running along the chain. If even one of those icy fingertips could reach her, it could serve as a stepping stone to corner the nimble Yae—

Yae: “Unfortunately, fighting a large number of people is what I’m best at.”

In an instant, twenty steel threads leapt forth, binding the ice Natsuki Subarus. The threads tightened around their necks, torsos, arms, and legs, mercilessly tearing the six bodies apart.

Emilia: “Subaru—!!”

Rem: “Subaru-kun!!”

The cries of Rem and Emilia overlapped as the ice Natsuki Subarus were reduced to pitiful wreckage.

Beyond the scattered fragments of the shattered ice statues, Yae continued running along the chain, heading straight for Rem below. In a split second decision, Rem released the Morningstar’s handle, robbing Yae of support from her foothold. As the shinobi would surely flail about in the air, Rem twisted her body and attempted to deliver a powerful back kick—

Yae: “As expected, I’d rather not get hit directly by an Oni’s kick.”

As Yae spoke, she released the tension in her knees to compensate for the bend in the chain; a movement that Rem glimpsed in the corner of her eye.

Yae dropped her hips downlow, maintaining perfect balance midair as the lethal thread released from her fingertips looped around Rem’s neck. Her head would be sent flying off, or she would be strangled to death—just before that could happen, under Yae’s feet, the chain snapped taut, defying her expectations.

Yae: “Wha…”

Yae’s eyes opened wide, and she instinctively flicked the chain with her toes and leaped away; nothing less could be expected from her. Her gaze caught sight of what had pulled the Morningstar’s chain in Rem’s stead.

Having been the first one to fall after being pierced through the chest with a sword, it was an ice Natsuki Subaru. —The ice Natsuki Subaru, who had never given up on the fight even after collapsing, had saved Rem.

Truly, this person was always doing reckless things for the sake of someone else—.

Yae: “It’s not even the real thing, you know!”

Rem: “Even if it’s not!”

As Yae curled her lips, Rem’s full-force back kick drove straight into the center of her chest.

3

—Irregular.

Yae recognized that obstructing this was the role expected of her, and the duty she ought to fulfill.

Within Yae, the assessment of Al as a dreadful, capricious monster would not be overturned. —But, there were irregulars piling up that would serve to exhaust and burden him.

???: “That’s the thing, yeah? Even I’ve ended up on the verge of death many times quarrellin’ wit’ those above myself, ya see? I’m sick ‘n tired of the fact that this world’s fulla nothin’ but monsters. —But, I’m the one who’s still kickin’ when all’s said ‘n done, so it means there ain’t nobody who can’t be killed.”

???: “When both sides’re performin’ their best, there ends up bein’ a gap that’cha can’t do nothin’ about. ‘N so, in order ta bridge that gap bit by bit, we’ve got our underhanded techniques untiringly refined ta perfection.”

???: “If ya can rob yer opponent of their ability ta perform flawlessly, the opportunity ta chop off the heads of those above ya will come around. —That’s the blood-reekin’ secret ta our success in life.”

That was the advice of the Vicious Old Man, the village chief who had instilled Yae with the way of life and techniques of the shinobi.

In regards to those ideas of the village chief, Yae had no objections. But, she had surprisingly few opportunities to test them. After all, most of Yae’s opponents were weaker than her. She would not lose to them, let alone ever engage them in a head-on fight.

The first defeat she had ever suffered was against Al, and it fundamentally distorted Yae’s way of being. Even now, merely being near him would cause her entire body to be filled with dread, and she wished for him to disappear even a second quicker. For that purpose, there was no other option but to have Al accomplish that which he desired, that which he wished for.

That was why—

Yae: “—I don’t wanna let anyone who can corner that person get near him.”

Distorted, twisted, full of contradictions. Yae was well aware that those things applied to her.

But there was no helping it. Yae liked spicy things and did not really care for sweet things. But, those were dispositions she was born with, and a predetermination that she could not alter herself.

Because she had been born into such a self, she would continue to live whilst staying true to that self.

Yae had her own ideal way to end her relationship with Al.

In order to accomplish that, Yae's contradictory way of doing things was to eliminate the irregulars.

However—

Yae: "—Hk."

Receiving a direct kick from the horned girl named Rem, Yae stifled the cries from deep within her creaking body, maneuvering her body to disperse the impact through her arms and legs. The shinobi techniques that transmitted one's will down even to their muscles and internal organs allowed for a means of survival.

But, even when that was applied, it did not equate to a complete negation of damage. The tips of her hands and feet went numb.

It was not as though she had underestimated the power of the Oni. However, for Yae, who could discern the capabilities of an opponent by observing their posture and the way they utilized their arms and legs, the Oni clan's trait of dramatically increasing their physical abilities by absorbing the surrounding Mana with their horn far surpassed her expectations.

In addition—

Yae: "Emilia-sama's adlibs really are quite troublesome, aren't they~?"

Bearing those bitter sentiments, Yae muttered with an expression still harboring some leeway.

In truth, they had been quite effective, but she could not afford to relay that. Shinobi would never relinquish information to their opponents. If they did, it would have been fabricated information for the purpose of manipulation.

With that level of kickback, not only Rem, but even Emilia would have been able to see that Yae had been dealt a considerable amount of damage. If Yae were to still act calm in spite of that, it would be in human nature to hesitate in pursuit.

Rem: “Emilia-sama!”

Emilia: “Yes! We continue!”

However, that was only if the opponent was proficiently adept in the ways of combat.

After delivering a blow, the duo paid no mind to Yae’s composed expression, and instead pursued hot on her tail after she was blasted away.

She would not call it thoughtless. It was desperate, and it was fervent. At present, that was the most troublesome thing.

Yae: “In that case, I’ll answer with my own nasty hand and footwork…!”

Counter; Yae greatly spread out her toes on both her right and left sides, and together with her hands, she controlled twenty steel threads.

The numerous swords that had pierced the glacial discus that was serving as the platform: snaring those constructs of ice and stone with her threads and flinging them up, she directly intercepted Emilia and Rem, poised for pursuit as they were.

Guided by the deftness of her digits, the daggers sliced through the wind as they whirled around, combining with the invisible, soundless steel threads to form a twofold assault of heavy and light, rampaging atop the ice as a rending gale that would confound any attempts to respond.

If one were to trace the path of the daggers with their eyes, the steel threads would entangle their limbs and rob them of their combat potential. Al had ordered her to abide by the “no-killing” rule, but even if she had to sever a finger or two, or even all four limbs, those requirements could be met as long as they retained their lives. With those thoughts in mind, Yae surged with a severing intent.

However—

Rem: “HAAAHHHH!!”

Emilia: “Yah! Tei! Tah!”

The defense of the howling Rem and fierce Emilia repelled Yae’s assault entirely.

A display of teamwork with Rem handling the daggers, and Emilia countering the steel threads. Rem coiled the chain of her favored iron ball around her arm and wielded it as an impromptu gauntlet while Emilia transformed her twin swords into a gigantic halberd; the pair perfectly defended against Yae’s attack with a certain coordination despite not having exchanged any words.

Yae: “How…?”

Their abilities were certainly enough to handle the visible daggers, but there needed to be an explanation to how they had managed to defend against the invisible steel threads.

Questioning that reason, Yae caught sight of a faintly white cloud of air as she muttered, and noticed. —A coldness biting at her skin, to an extent greater than that of being atop a great mass of ice whilst plummeting from an immensely high altitude.

Yae: “—Hk, ice fog.”

Miniscule ice particles fluttered down through her vision, twinkling to highlight the contours of the steel threads.

At the technique Emilia had employed to detect the invisible steel threads, and the sense needed to come up with it, Yae was struck with wonder. Then, even moreso by the possibility of things taking an even worse turn.

Emilia: “—Icicle Line.”

That instant, in accordance with the formulated incantation, the atmosphere began to let out a shrill screech.

The particles of ice that had made up the ice fog linked together with the particles adjacent to them, and the chill that had painted the world white bared its fangs with even greater ferocity. The first to fall prey to it, would be the steel threads that were lacking in mass.

The advantage granted by the steel threads’ greatest characteristics, weightlessness and thinness, would be crushed in a freezing world. Even if steel threads could slice through the winds, they could not slice through a blizzard. —Hence, her decision followed immediately afterward.

Yae brought the rings on her fingers to her lips, and at that instant, flames dashed across the steel threads, birthing an infernal explosion atop the ice.

A heat wave that jostled back even the icy gale, in exchange for relinquishing the steel threads’ strength of being “unseen”, clad them in the power to not succumb to the cold even amidst the icy fog.

Yae: “Please accompany me in this flaming dance!”

Letting her steel threads dressed in flame wreak havoc, the Crimson Sakura began to perform a dance whilst unleashing her scintillating thread attack. In contrast to that brilliant, fiery dance illuminating the canyon, the two who were bringing about the frigid ice and snow—no, counting the seven ice-sculpted bodies, nine silhouettes leaped forth.

Rem: “Invitation accepted!”

Emilia: “Sorry if I step on your feet!”

On the ice and armed with twin blades of frost, Emilia slid into

Yae's range as the latter manifested a maelstrom of infernal flame. She skated across the ice discus with boots of ice affixed with blades, and tracing a circular orbit, she moved in rhythm with the waltz of flames, commencing a gently curved, yet sharp and relentless onslaught.

Comparing favourably to the extreme tempo of Emilia's offense, Rem's decision to plunge forth whilst engaged in a scrum formation with the ice sculptures was more directly stunning to witness—

Rem: "AaahhHHHAAAAAAAA—!!"

Roaring out like a beast, Rem launched her bare white fists forward in a pummel.

Worthy of being described as a bombardment, what rained down seemed as though a storm of numerous fists; twisting, crouching, bending back, side stepping, and leaping over repeatedly, Yae evaded it as if merely flitting through the movements of her dance.

Yae: "If you're only using your bare fists, you'll spend eternity trying to catch up to me."

Even with the physical abilities of an Oni, if there were four limbs extending out of a torso, the flow of strength through the muscles was plain to see, and Yae's eyes would not fail to glimpse it. Rem's Oni strength was astounding, but it did not outpace Yae's reaction speed like the Sword Demon had.

With that logic, the irregulars that were actually betraying Yae's imagination were rather the seven ice sculptures of humanoid shape, reining things in with inscrutable movements during the intervals between Emilia and Rem's attacks.

At this rate, just as she had declared, Yae would end up spending an eternity engaging these two in combat—

Yae: "—No."

When Yae was on the verge of opting for the easy option, she put the brakes on herself.

This battlefield had been selected by her opponents. If she were to allow her opponents to have things their way, she would be playing right into their hands. In order to obstruct these irregulars, she would have no choice but to become the irregular to her opponents.

For the time being—

Yae: “This platform—”

A discus of ice that had been constructed in collaboration by Emilia and Rem, employed to split up Yae and Al. With its transparency harmed in proportion to the wind hitting it, Al’s figure on the other side of the cloudy white ice disk grew foggy.

Deeming this platform unideal, Yae dealt with Rem’s volley of punches, slipping under Emilia’s attack from behind, and used one of the ice sculptures trying to tackle her as a stool to leap into the air. Then, sending all the steel threads on her hands and feet in every direction of the discus, she exerted all of her might, and began to spin her body around.

As a result—

Yae: “I’m changing the situation. Is this also within your calculations?”

Guided by Yae’s might, the arena known as the ice discus was altered—as that disk began to spin like a top, a tremendous centrifugal force was applied to everyone on the ice.

With that, the battle transitioned to its next stage.

4

—“Irregewluhr”.

That had the meaning of something unexpected, and understanding that piling them up was their current greatest weapon, Emilia hyped herself up.

Whenever she got abruptly startled, Emilia would be unable to immediately think of the next action to take. The same thing could be said about Al. Al would have probably thought about a lot of things in order to plan what he was doing now, but he could not read all the way into the minds of Emilia and the others. That was the purpose of the “irregewluhrs”.

???: “Lia, whenever you’re in a pinch, you immediately try to use whatever strength you can to force your way through to some sort of solution, right? Though when that doesn’t work, you end up worrying over what you should have done to begin with… but, it wouldn’t be like you to come to a halt there, Lia, nor do I think it would suit you.”

???: “My adorable daughter has the power to smash through any problem with a bam. So, don’t just give up after the first go, how about you pile up a bunch of tries and do your best with that?”

???: “Don’t worry Lia, when the time comes, your body will naturally teach you whatever you might need in that moment. After all, you’re the daughter I’m so proud of, so you’ll inherit the most powerful genetics.”

Indeed, words that Puck had once spoken to Emilia were now affectionately resuscitated in her head.

These days, it was always Subaru’s words that she found to be reliable, but now that she knew Subaru was in danger, the first one to encourage Emilia was the teachings of Puck, as always.

Her joint offensive with Rem against Al was now in the midst of hard fought struggle due to the intervention of Yae—they had already passed two more engravings in the cliff, meaning they only had around thirty seconds left before they reached the bottom.

She felt extremely fretful. However, she could not afford to let it overwhelm her. This was not something she was particularly skilled at, but she needed to foist these feelings onto Al and Yae.

In order to stop Al—no, in order to properly talk things out with Al, this time for sure.

After all—

Emilia: "—Priscilla would have never desired this sort of thing."

The fact that voicing such a thing would be cruel to Al, Emilia knew.

Even now, thinking of Priscilla, it made Emilia's heart ache to voice her name, and she would feel a sensation of moisture in the corners of her eyes. She wanted to allow Al to vent those feelings.

In the past, Emilia had once been rescued by Al. Even without that, Emilia wished to become a source of strength for Al. Not just because they shared the same pain, it was not that, but as a more instinctual feeling, Emilia wished to save him.

That was why—

Emilia: "—Hk, Subaru!"

The heat-filled wind ferociously stirred the maelstrom, and the disk of ice revolved with Yae at its center.

Atop the disk of ice that had begun to revolve as vigorously as a spinning plate, the ice soldiers modeled after Subaru were unable to hold their ground after bearing the additional centrifugal force for a bit, and were subsequently blown away.

They would be unable to do a thing about being thrown off the face of the disk, and at worst would meet a fate of crashing and shattering against the cliff face of the canyon. But before that could happen, Emilia would not forget how one of them caught her hand just as she was about to stumble from the spinning, preventing her fall and saving her.

Emilia: "Rem is—"

Sliding across the revolving ice disk with skates of ice, Emilia tried to locate Rem in her vision, as she ought to have been cornered into a similar situation as her. No, what if she had been thrown off like the ice soldiers—then, before the worried Emilia erupted a thundering boom, and an even more enormous inferno.

The collision had occurred at the center of the disk, where Rem and Yae violently crashed into each other, and flared into a fiery blaze.

Once again wielding the iron ball that she had cast into the sky earlier, Rem swung it down, and Yae skillfully warded off that downward strike by utilizing the tensile strength of threads bundled together. As a result, Rem's large, sweeping movement was halted, and there did Yae thrust her toes squarely at her.

Rem: "Kah."

Letting out a cry of pain, Rem was repelled back and tumbled down onto the ice disk, slipping towards the outer circumference.

With the rotation of the disk and Yae's leg strength, there were no means to stop Rem's sliding body. Unwilling to allow that to happen, Emilia tried to devise a way to reach her, but—

Yae: "—Looking away is forbidden."

As soon as she kicked off the ice, Yae's counterattack closed in as if thrusting towards her.

An attack with the stone dao that had been snatched up by a flaming steel thread, and the second-stage follow up of the thread slicing not far behind it; at the two-stage assault that spanned a large range and necessitated evasion, Emilia began to ruminate—she tried to, but recalling the words of the reliable Subaru and Puck, she abandoned that endeavor.

Relying on her senses more than her thinking, Emilia soared towards Rem, who had been flicked away. —Quite literally, she had caught wind in her wings and flown towards Rem.

Yae: "Wha…"

Staring in amazement, Yae was taken aback by that shocking display.

It was the first time she had left herself completely open, but unfortunately, Emilia did not have the leeway to focus her attention there right now. Only, flying directly towards Rem, she scooped her up right as she was about to fall off the edge of the disk, and soared up.

—Emilia did, with wings forged of ice upon her back.

Rem: "Th-Thank you, Emilia-sama… these wings are?"

Emilia: "Subaru drew a picture of them before. Beings that grow wings on their back, they're called angels. Subaru would talk about them every once in a while, but I tried my best and I did it!"

Answering Rem's question after carrying her up, Emilia softened her cheeks.

But then again, these were fake wings that only resembled them in shape. They could not be flapped like a real bird's wings, and at best could glide on the wind.

Moreover, it was something that could only be realized in this particular situation, an instance of success for an extremely rare magic. Subaru would probably be delighted if she were to show it to him, but for that they would also need to fall together from five thousand meters up in the sky.

For that reason as well—

Rem: "Emilia-sama! Let's retaliate!"

Emilia: "Yeah!"

Emilia spread her glacial wings as Rem gave a valiant utterance within her arms, and nodded in agreement.

Retaliate, the first thing that flashed through her mind upon hearing that word. Intuitively believing it to be the same thing that Rem was thinking of, Emilia lowered their altitude directly above the ice.

Detaching her wings there, Emilia and Rem entered freefall, and began to spin themselves—striking their heels down in unison, the horizontally rotating disk of ice was forced into a vertical gyration with all of their might.

Emilia: "…"

As payback for the ice disk having been made to spin horizontally, they made the ice disk spin vertically.

It was very simple, but it was an incredible payback that neither of them would have been able to accomplish on their own, and so having remained on top of the disk, Yae ought to have been stupefied. As the platform turned over from up to down, and then back to how it was before, and then immediately upside down again, to normal, to upside down and to normal over and over and over, she was jostled about.

To make matters worse—

Emilia: "There's also still the horizontal spin!"

As a result, the ice disk spinning on both axes became a random battlefield that did not trace any expected trajectory. It was just like the wobbly and shaky "atrakshon" of the training ground that Subaru and Garfiel had made behind the Roswaal Mansion.

And precisely due to thinking of that, Emilia speedily dashed across the ice disk "atrakshon".

Emilia: "Yah! Tah! Toh… soyah!"

While altering the direction of the vehement force within a single second, Emilia relied only on the sensations from the bottom of her feet to receive that momentum, and use it to propel herself forwards.

She was somewhat relieved that she had been able to run on it. On the other hand, she was worried about whether Rem was alright or not, but.

Rem: "There is no need to worry!"

As Rem responded so, she thrust her iron ball into the ice disk, and with that as the fulcrum she pulled herself forward with her chain in one go, aiming for the center. Though falling a bit short of Emilia's momentum, it offered a far more reliable sense of stability.

Contrary to that, Emilia had to ensure that her own footing did not slip.

Emilia: “That girl…”

Either atop the ice disk that had been disrupted both vertically and horizontally, or possibly below, desperately clinging on in order to not be shaken off, Emilia searched for the figure of Yae in order to pursue her, and then blinked her amethyst eyes.

There she was. Unmoved, Yae was right in the middle, the spot on the disk with the weakest centrifugal force. Even so, that would not change the fact that she had been jostled about, and as she seemed like she was about to stretch out her legs, Emilia realized.

Emilia: “…”

Having folded her knees and leaned into the ice disk, Yae had not been affected by the gyration of the platform.

The reason was clear—she had excavated the center of the ice disk with her steel threads, creating a unique safety zone immune to the effects of the rotation as she lay ready in wait for Emilia and Rem.

—That instant, steel threads alight with flame bundled together, and a blazing flash of weighty silver engulfed her vision.

5

—A blazing, silver flash of crimson.

If one were to have had a bird’s eyes view of that, and if they possessed knowledge of that technique, they would have likely realized that what Yae Tenzen had unleashed was a steel thread iaido, the art of swiftly drawing a katana and unleashing a lethal strike before immediately returning it to its sheath.

Nobody would have imagined that something so thin, lacking any consistent form, could take the shape of iaido.

Not to mention, even amidst the long and storied history of the shinobi, the Steel Thread Technique was a legendary art that none save the most gifted of geniuses could even grasp the fundamentals of, let alone master.

The fact that Crimson Sakura, the most gifted shinobi throughout all of history, had polished that deadly technique to even greater heights, was something that not a single person, not even Aldebaran, had been aware of.

Therefore—

Rem: "…"

—Therefore, the fact that Rem had managed to defend against the silver flash of flames, could not be described as anything short of a miracle.

Rem: "—Priscilla-san."

Spun by her lips was the name of the woman bearing one of the reasons that had guided Rem to this point, and had gotten her standing back on her feet.

And now, she was the benefactor who had left behind signs so that Rem could continue clinging on to life.

—She had felt it. Something she had not been allowed to detect a single time up to this point, Yae's definite murderous intent.

The emotions of humans dwelled within Mana.

Those who excelled at perceiving such Mana could easily guess the emotions of others. The reason why Spirits could vaguely sense the thoughts of other people, was thought to be corollary to this sensation.

Thus, absorbing the surrounding Mana with her horn via her Oni transformation, Rem felt sensations that she normally could not grasp with an acuity several times greater than usual.

Rem: "Until now—"

She had not felt it. —No, it was a sensation she would not have noticed even if she had felt it.

There were various factors that played into her gaining the ability to sense this. The fact that she had restored herself, as well as the sense of duty she carried to take back Subaru. But, the number one reason lay elsewhere.

The number one factor was the influence of the days she had spent together with Priscilla in the Fortified City of Guaral.

Amidst the time that was by no means long, Priscilla would often present Rem with words that seemed like riddles, granting her an impetus to deeply come face to face with her own self. At the time, due to frustrations with her inadequate healing magic and uselessness, she had merely attempted to superficially follow Priscilla's words, but.

Rem: "Now, I feel like I finally understand it just a bit."

Even now, she would not say that she knew all the answers to the words from back then. She would think of it as an assignment that would last for her whole lifetime. And, she would never be able to check her answers anymore, either.

That was sorrowful. Lonely. Pained her heart.

Rem: "—Right now, I wish I could speak with you. Priscilla-san."

Muttering, she closed her eyes. Then, when she reopened them, Rem's gifts as an Oni awakened in those eyes.

What she keenly perceived mixed in with the Mana was a faint enmity, murderous intent, will to attack—to the place where that seemed to be tinged with color, Rem sent forth her iron ball with pinpoint precision.

The silver flash of flames that had drawn near in an attempt to bisect both herself and Emilia; slamming her Morningstar into a position that could clear it away in a single swing, the certain death unleashed was transformed into non-lethality.

The shrill clangor of steel on steel rang out, and as a vehement recoil was delivered to her grip, Rem’s counterattack met Yae’s brandish head-on.

Yae: “…”

Slightly aghast at that reality, Yae nevertheless stooped down and prepared for her next move.

Countless rampaging silver flashes; perceiving the murderous intent surging through the air before they could be unleashed, Rem preempted them, firing her iron ball, chains, and magic forth as if to trace the lines.

In a series of moments that almost seemed to overlap into a single instant, Yae's onslaught was thwarted by Rem.

Ahh, a breath spilled from her heart.

Ahh, this is it, this is the true scenery that the Oni Clan had gandered. —A mere sliver of the domain Ram had reached by birth, now, at this moment over a decade later, the tips of Rem's fingers had finally caught on.

Emilia: "—Rem!!"

Springing up her iron ball, Rem continued to fend off the tempest of blazing threads of steel, and Emilia called out to her.

The sense of urgency loaded in that voice was not out of gratitude for having been protected, but rather a cry to inform her of a change in the situation, and one for the worse at that.

She caught Emilia in the corner of her eye, stretching out her long legs as she clung to the surface of the ice discus, darting her eyes around the revolving view.

Emilia: "Al's gone! I can't find him anywhere!"

Rem: "—Hk."

At her wit's end, Emilia's voice caused Rem to finally realize that Al had disappeared from her own sights as well.

Below the discus of ice, Al was supposed to be in a position where he could do nothing but spectate the battle above, but he was nowhere to be found in the sky made perceivable from the disk's rotation having eliminated all obstructions to vision.

As soon as Rem thought about where he could be, realization struck her like lightning. —She strained her eyes to the distant sky.

As they plummeted down the Agzadd Canyon, beyond that long, massive fissure in the ground, far in the distance from Rem and the others, a silhouette could be seen receding into the distance.

Similar to what Emilia had done earlier, with wings on his back—catching the wind with wings forged of stone, Al was gliding away at ferocious speeds.

That instant, what flashed through Rem's mind was her joint attack with Emilia onto the ice disk. That had made the platform spin vertically, and had advanced the battle against Yae into the next dimension, but—that had been used against them.

Rem: "When Emilia-sama and I linked up in order to kick the platform—"

At that time, Al had clung to the bottom side of the ice disk, and using the momentum of the rotation from Rem and Emilia's kick, he gained a propulsion to launch him straight up into the distant sky.

Rem: "…"

If Al were to escape like this, the entire operation would come crumbling down.

By piling on the irregulars, they had been whittling away at Al's reserves, but if things proceeded this way, they would be unable to arrive at the trump card they needed to play. That must not happen; making a split-second decision—Rem and Emilia exchanged gazes.

Emilia: "—Rem."

And, the will of Emilia which she ought not have been able to hear, was delivered to Rem through Mana.

The things that the Oni horn perceived were not limited to just omens of hostility. By also taking in unshakeable trust and expectation, Rem was bestowed with unlimited power. It was to the extent that, rather than simply taking in Mana, she might end up believing that bearing those emotions was actually the source of the power.

Indeed, she had certainly been granted strength, and so—

Emilia: “—I’m headed off!”

Rem: “Take care!!”

Raising herself up, and then swinging down on the ice disk with all her might, the vertical rotation of the discus began to rapidly accelerate, and receiving that momentum, Emilia was launched straight up into the sky.

Clad in the glimmer of ice, Emilia once again caught the wind with wings of ice stretching out from her back, soaring above the Agzadd Canyon towards the distant sky in pursuit of Al, she soared, and soared away.

Then, entrusting Emilia with the pursuit of Al—

Rem: “—I won’t let you go after them.”

Yae: “That’s my line~.”

—Passing by yet another marking in the cliff face of the Agzadd Canyon, there remained twenty seconds until they reached the floor.

The two maids left standing on the plummeting ice platform—Rem and Yae faced off; the final clash between Oni and shinobi, between the Hero’s Confidant and the Crimson Sakura, commenced.

Chapter 51:
Yae Tenzen

1

—A shinobi must never give their heart to anything.

In the shinobi village of the Vollachian Empire, that was an absolute teaching imparted upon those forbidden to lead any way of life other than that of a shinobi; it was an ironclad rule that demanded absolute obedience even more so than the law of iron and blood rooted in the vast lands of the Empire.

If they were to yield their heart to something, the honed blade known as shinobi would easily come to rust.

Therefore, any and all who took on the mantle of shinobi, without exception, etched that ironclad rule into their soul, abiding by it no matter the cost.

And despite that—

???: “Hey, yer that, ain’t’cha? Same like me, ya can do just about anythin’ without so much as a second thought, ‘n so life kinda loses its spark, dun’it? Wouldn’t it be fine ta keep at least a single somethin’ in yer heart then?”

When the village chief had spoken those words, grinning with a tidy set of teeth left in spite of his old age, Yae recalled wondering to herself where exactly the ironclad law of the shinobi had disappeared to, and experienced some intense feelings of irritation.

—Included among them, was a firm belief that she would never be able to live her life in such a way.

2

—The Crimson Sakura, Yae Tenzen, was an unparalleled genius of a shinobi.

That was an unshakeable fact, and something that even Yae herself was humbly willing to admit.

Those around her had lauded her as possessing the greatest talents the shinobi village had seen since its founding, loudly voicing their admiration that her potential might even rival that of the Admirer of the Kararagi City-States.

To tell the truth, Yae herself had earnestly wished for them to stop comparing her to such an outrageous individual, but setting aside those feelings of the person in question, Yae's talents drew out a frenzy from the people of the village.

In practice, if the thing known as talent was something that allowed for an almost prideful extent of shortcuts to be taken past the many hardships within a given field, then Yae unmistakably possessed the innate talents of a shinobi.

However, contrary to that evaluation harbored by those around her, Yae fiercely hated the "special" treatment she received.

That was akin to a physiological sense of rejection, a resistance towards the idea of being "special", so perhaps it was a phenomenon that ought to be labeled as a "Special Allergy".

It did not bother her when others were given special treatment, but the moment she experienced "special" treatment for herself, she was assailed by an unbearable sensation, and began wanting to abandon anything and everything. It was that sort of visceral rejection.

For Yae, who possessed this violent allergy towards "specialness", the ironclad law of the shinobi that the village chief had personally denied in the introduction, was something she had exceedingly high compatibility with.

To give one's heart to something, was to create a kind of "specialness" within oneself.

Since she had an allergy towards such "specialness", Yae could obey the ironclad rule of the shinobi without very much effort. Certainly, it could be said that she was a woman who had been born to be a shinobi.

But then again, that was one of the reasons why those around Yae were giving her “special” treatment, so it was truly quite a quandary.

—Now then, to begin with, the path walked by the shinobi was a steep one, and it was not something that could be easily accustomed to.

Only one of a thousand trainees would become a genin, only one out of a thousand genin would become a chunin, and only one out of a thousand chunin would finally become a jonin—such sentiments were commonly repeated due to how high the hurdles were. To this day, whenever Yae heard that example, she would think about how it would require a billion shinobi candidates.

Well, it was a good thing that the senior shinobi had such awareness of just how grueling the path was, to the extent that it made them want to use such ridiculous expressions. No matter the torture, it was in human nature to want to undergo it whilst knowing “this is meant to target this part” rather than suffering through it whilst wondering “what is the point of this?”.

And in practice, the process to complete a shinobi was undoubtedly the harshness known as torture.

Yae believed that the shinobi training, which commenced around the age a child first gained awareness of their surroundings, was more aptly described as child-abuse than it was torture, but the immorality that went into the makings of shinobi was a list that went on endlessly, so stumbling at the entryway would prevent this digression from progressing.

First of all, the candidates for shinobi trainees were mostly children who had been abducted from other places.

As mentioned previously, shinobi training began during the early stages of childhood, but the drills levied upon them were so inhumane and unreasonable that an abundance of them would end up dying in cold blood. For the sake of efficiency, instead of babies, they abducted toddlers who were at a suitable age to commence training right away. Here, the fact that the shinobi skipped straight past the most laborious infant stage revealed just how truly nasty their inhumanity was.

And so, the first thing that the abducted children were subjected to, above all else, was the disposal of memories.

It was said that the methods consisted of drugs, signals, and techniques that had direct influence over memory, but it was not entirely clear. Only, through these methods, the abducted children were wiped to clean slates, completely forgetting about their families and hometowns. Yae did not remember her parents' faces either, nor did she even know her own real name. "Yae", it was a name that she had only received later on, and until then she had simply been called "Red No. 8" in accordance with her hair color.

Those without aptitude would fail first at this memory disposal. For some, the memory erasure would not function effectively enough, and conversely for others, it would function too effectively, leaving them as useless husks; it was a mess right from the start.

And so, Yae, to the extent that she even thought herself heartless, completely forgot her past in an instant.

It had slipped away so effortlessly that even the one in charge of her memory disposal, Fujirou Tenzen, was left speechless, so much so that he told her about it afterwards. —Incidentally, this Fujirou would later go on to be Yae's namegiver, and was the previous Tenzen whose family name she inherited.

But even if he had the title of her namegiver, their relationship was an emotionless, obligatory one of instructor and pupil, familial only in name. From Yae's perspective, her impression of Fujirou more or less amounted to someone in the village with whom she had a high frequency of contact, who had also happened to bestow her with a name.

Regardless, forcibly robbed of their heart's foundations, they would become a white canvas to be painted at the mercy of the black brush known as the shinobi—once the children stripped of their past were prepared, the true essence of the inhuman training facility that was the shinobi village would begin: not merely strengthening of the flesh and muscles, but the very restructuring of the human body.

Destruction and correction of the bones in order to achieve mastery over a soft body and acrobatics surpassing human understanding; training to build up a resistance to poison by gradually advancing from small doses to lethal ones; daily routines comprised of learning the dangers of martial arts and shinobi tools by the pain they inflicted upon the body; and being tasked with meeting a quota of broken bones, torn-up flesh, and shed blood.

Peers who had grown cold, unable to see the next morning, were scattered all about; since that too was a teaching material for their training to grow accustomed to death, it was forbidden to bury them, and instead the putrid odor of those corpses rotting day after day was drilled into their minds, causing some to end up losing their sanity.

All those so-called dreadful drills were easily completed by Yae. — No, even for her, calling it easy would be a lie. Yae had faced adversity in her own way. But, it seemed to Yae that the adversity she had faced did not even amount to a single ten-thousandth of that which her peers had experienced.

If that could be called talent, then she certainly had talent.

The destruction and correction of her bones flipped the switches for pain perception within her, and the agony of the poison that seemed to melt and scramble her entrails was kept to a minimum along with her bloody urine and stool; just by laying fingers upon a shinobi tool, she acquired a mastery as if she had been exclusively wielding it for ten years, and after experiencing a martial art just once, she could use it to take down an opponent larger than herself, and would never be hit by it ever again. Only the smell of the dead bodies was tiring, but she got used to that in the end as well.

So after such happenings, the very young Yae had become the first one of a thousand at an unprecedented speed.

Fujirou: “—From this day onward, you are to call yourself Yae Tenzen.”

The day Fujirou gave her that name, was the day she had qualified to be a genin.

Unfortunately, she harbored no particularly strong feelings on the matter. After all, she had been treated differently from her other peers since the point she had been called “Red No. 8”, so whether she had a name or not did not have any particular influence on Yae’s self-perception. Only, receiving such “special” treatment made her feel itchy, and she had thought it bothersome.

—For what reason Fujirou had named her Yae, she knew not even to this day.

She had missed her chance to ask. By now, she had taken somewhat of a liking to it, and the Tenzen part also had a nice ring to it. It was far better than ending up with something like Yae Dunkelkenn through some sort of mistake.

Upon hearing that sarcastic sentiment from Yae, the village chief had burst out laughing “Kakakakka! Yer startin’ ta say some cheeky things, ain’t’cha?!”. Speaking of which, there was not a single person in the shinobi village who bore the same family name as the village chief, but whether that was because the village chief was a poor teacher or because he had abandoned his duties, was unclear.

The former seemed more plausible, so that was what Yae suspected.

Either way, even if she had gone from being called “Red No. 8” to Yae Tenzen, Yae’s path as a shinobi, as well as the very way the world felt to her touch, stood unchanged. —That which had changed was not Yae, but rather the environment that surrounded her.

—Unmistakably, that was the prime reason why Yae had come to detest “specialness” so much.

3

—Now then, the fact that Yae possessed a “Special Allergy” has already been mentioned, but for her, the youngest and fastest-promoted genin in history, a certain situation arose that caused this allergy to accelerate.

Ultimately, everyone in the village ended up recognizing Yae's talents and abilities, but upon qualifying to be a genin, there was one who grew enchanted by her promising future. —Fujirou Tenzen.

As her namegiver, and as the senior who provided her with guidance, Fujirou was completely enthralled by Yae's ability to take the first piece that he taught her, and extrapolate the next hundred or thousand pieces, let alone ten.

Namely, that was an act that ran counter to the ironclad rule of the shinobi to never give their heart to anything.

He was left with no choice but to forge the unparalleled genius, Yae Tenzen, into an extraordinary shinobi with his own hands. —Fujirou had ended up blindly obsessed with that sense of duty.

Fujirou: "You have more than enough talent for it. Why can't you understand that?!"

As Fujirou exclaimed so with bloodshot eyes, he harbored a fanatical belief in Yae's talents.

Day by day, she felt the eyes with which he looked at her tinged with more and more ardor, but the damage brought about by their eruption was far greater than what Yae could have imagined.

With Yae's "specialness" seared into his mind, Fujirou had arranged the "Crawling Bane"—a rite structured in the same manner as the Imperial Selection Ceremony that was used to decide the next Emperor of the Vollachian Empire; dragging in thirty genin who were the same rank as Yae at the time, it was a reckless folly capable of spelling the demise of the village.

The genin were taken out to a forest far removed from the village, and there they were ordered to fight to the death until only one last person remained standing; without questioning those directions from their superiors, lives were expended in futility.

Just as Fujirou had hoped when he devised the rite, the only one still standing in the end was Yae Tenzen.

However, she never once took up the offensive against the others, instead using the tactic of turning the tables on any opponent who came after her, and in the end, when she let her final peer get away when he pleaded for his life, Fujirou had gotten exceedingly incensed.

—No, to be precise, it was not just him, it was all of them.

Enthralled by the talents of Yae Tenzen, Fujirou was not the only one who had gone astray.

Inspired by his words, or perhaps by directly witnessing Yae's growth, there were a great number of people who wished to have Yae shoulder their distorted expectations by holding the ritual they had named the "Crawling Bane".

Yae had betrayed the expectations of those who blindly believed in her; however, rather than causing their ardor to subside, their fervor only intensified, explosively flaring up.

If they had simply dealt with Yae after she betrayed their expectations, and then took their own lives, it would have still been somewhat endearing.

But, for those who had steeled their mistaken resolve to repeat the "Crawling Bane" as many times as necessary until Yae was established as the model of the ideal shinobi they desired, there no longer existed any remedy.

Fujirou: "You are, the one who shall overturn the very way a shinobi ought to be…!"

Collapsing as he spoke those words, Fujirou had died, believing in Yae's potential until the bitter end.

The throat repeating that grating assertion was gouged out, and ironically enough, the beautiful blossom of snow white sakura petals began to flutter down upon the corpses of her namegiver and his foolish comrades, face-down in a pool of their own blood.

Yae recalled those blood-stained cherry blossoms alongside an indescribable sense of futility.

???: "—Ohoh, now this here's quite the big deal, eh? Has a lass whose rump's still as pale as snow really gone 'n taken down all of 'em even tho' there were even jonin in their midst?"

Having hastened to the scene a bit later, the village chief gazed over Yae and the corpses of the young men surrounding her, and then let out those carefree remarks. It seemed like the secret operations of Fujirou and his allies had been grasped by the higher-ups of the village, so regardless of the outcome of the "Crawling Bane", there likely would have been no future for them.

She did not want to entertain the idea that the reason for this delayed response despite having such a grasp on the situation was because they had decided on leaving it entirely up to Yae to deal with the disruptive elements to the village.

Village Chief: "So, all of 'em ended up dyin'?"

And although that suspicion was not the reason, Yae lied in response to the village chief's question.

The reason why Fujirou and the others had been displeased, was the fellow genin whom Yae had turned a blind eye towards when he had pleaded for his life. —She concealed the fact that not only had she allowed him to flee the "Crawling Bane", but to run away from the shinobi village entirely.

That peer had suggested "Ahh, in that case, you also gonna flee with me?" to her, but Yae firmly refused his offer. It was not that she had wished to remain in the village, but that she simply had not wished to stand alongside him.

In terms of both skills and talent, Yae was vastly superior. And yet, her instincts were alarming her. —If death were to ever come for Yae, it would be when she stood by his side.

Genin: "—My bad, my bad."

And so, when that peer of hers took his leave and gave those parting words, she sensed his desire to eliminate every person who knew of his existence, but thanks to him being rational enough to abandon that goal, Yae and that fellow genin made it out of this "Crawling Bane" as the final survivors.

Because it ended without her being the sole survivor, Yae wondered if her own status as "special" might erode even if just a little bit, and as she thought such things.

Village Chief: "Well then, let's start headin' back now. —Crimson Sakura."

Turning his back towards her, the village chief called Yae by that alias for the first time.

Until the bitter end, Yae had not known why Fujirou had named her Yae. But, the reason why the village chief had called Yae by that alias was clear even without needing to say it.

—After all, on the night brimming with excessive shinobi deaths, the full bloom of the snow white sakura was lavishly dyed in blood.

4

—The Crimson Sakura, Yae Tenzen, was an unparalleled genius of a shinobi.

As the youngest to ever be promoted to jonin, that perception of her had become widely known as something unshakeable, so Yae's "Special Allergy" had worsened to a point beyond any help.

To Yae, being treated as "special" by others was something of a curse, a menace, an abhorrent interference that brought nothing but negative influences onto her life.

Things like expectations or hopes often had a strong positive impression, so there were far too many people in this world who would wave them around while blind to the fact that they could become blades gouging deep into others. Moreover, blades wielded blind made it difficult for both aggressor and victim to notice the wounds, truly a nasty characteristic.

Such things had held a great deal of sway over her life thus far, and Yae was completely sick and tired of it.

???: “Hey, yer that, ain’t’cha? Same like me, ya can do just about anythin’ without so much as a second thought, ‘n so life kinda loses its spark, dun’it? Wouldn’t it be fine ta keep at least a single somethin’ in yer heart then?”

And so, when the village chief said those things to Yae, despite being fully aware of the blades, he seemed truly odious.

The village chief was personally advising her to do something like break the ironclad law of the shinobi. She could not think him sane. To begin with, Yae did not seek anything like a spark in life. Such a thing would be a superfluous accessory.

A spark: namely, that was the act of harboring expectations for one’s own abilities, or placing hope in one’s own future. —It was none other than believing in one’s own “specialness”, that was undeniably Yae’s landmine.

Hence, Yae deliberately distanced herself from the image of the ideal shinobi that everyone seemed to be placing their hopes and expectations in.

That was the exact opposite of the ideal shinobi image that Fujirou Tenzen had staked his life attempting to complete—a frivolous attitude, speech and conduct that left nowhere to grip onto, and a friendly demeanor that would absolutely never get along with anyone.

Bearing such a facetious humanity, Yae Tenzen’s personality took shape.

She did not wish to be misinterpreted, so she would assert it here: this was the natural consequence of Yae spurning the notion of “specialness”, and was by no means something inspired by the village chief’s own nature.

Without getting deeply involved with anyone's life, without ever confronting anyone head-on, and without being held dear by anyone.

That was the very worldly wisdom that the Crimson Sakura, Yae Tenzen had arrived at, her life philosophy—

???: "—Surely you do not misconstrue that disgraceful way of being for your own nature, do you?"

Addressed in such a manner when the two of them were all alone, Yae held her breath before the crimson beauty.

Yae, with her "Special Allergy" having worsened, hated being treated as "special" by others, and at the same time, had developed a keen sense of smell for specialness within other people. In that regard, the woman with whom Yae was now in close contact was an individual who seemed to be the embodiment of nothing but "specialness", both inside and out.

But then again, her specialness was so glaringly obvious to anyone that having a keen nose was hardly necessary to ascertain it.

—The Bloody Bride, Priscilla Barielle.

For Yae, who had completed all sorts of missions as a shinobi, the days spent together with that woman who was fondly called the Sun Princess by the local population were quite striking, and profoundly memorable.

Originally, Yae's infiltration as a maid in Priscilla's vicinity had been something set into motion by Chisha Gold, one of the Empire's Nine Divine Generals.

Just what sort of significance a woman participating in the Royal Selection of the far away Kingdom of Lugunica had to the Empire, was not something Yae had been informed of, nor was it something she had even thought to question.

The essence of the shinobi was to obey commands without asking too much, and Yae considered that a preferable trait. The only one who would brazenly disobey was the village chief, and since Yae was not the same as him, she remained obedient.

That said, it was a bit of an illogical and enigmatic mission.

Fundamentally, her job was to monitor the target and report on her actions; she had not received any particular instructions for disruption or sabotage, nor was it simply a matter of a quick assassination. Since Yae had been designated to this task, there was no doubt that they were counting on her befitting skills and ability to return alive, but while she was undercover at the mansion, her days as a simple maid went on monotonously. —She was loath to say it, but this felt like a bit of a waste of the genius shinobi that was the Crimson Sakura.

In practice, the innate talents Yae had been bestowed were not just that of a shinobi, there was an all-purpose nature to her that allowed her to easily master most other things. And so, flawlessly mastering all the duties of a maid, Yae's infiltration of the Barielle Mansion was a job just as easy as all her other missions up to this point.

However, only when she interacted directly with Priscilla, did she need to pay extra careful attention.

Throughout her career, Yae had gotten all sorts of opportunities to glimpse important figures.

Counted among those were the White Spider who had ordered Yae on this mission, and for the most part, her village chief known as the Vicious Old Man was also an important figure in the Empire. She had also seen His Excellency the Emperor from a distance—back then, the Blue Lightning standing next to the Emperor had locked eyes with her and given a wave of his hand, leaving her with the trepidation that there would always be somebody on a higher level than her.

And so even from Yae's perspective, having encountered those sorts of first-rate individuals, Priscilla's insight had a somewhat unfathomable quality to it, making it impossible to anticipate just how much she had actually seen through.

Even though it should not have been possible, she had questioned many times if even her own identity as an assassin sent from the Empire had been seen through.

Only, if that suspicion were true, there would have been no reason to keep turning a blind eye to Yae, so her identity should have still been a secret. —But was that really so? Priscilla was so difficult to read that it was entirely possible that she would turn a blind eye even if she became privy to Yae's identity.

That could be called a disposition towards favouring danger without valuing her own life, or perhaps it could just be outright classified as the delusion she fully believed in without caring what anyone might think, repeating on a daily basis how the world would unfold however she wished it to.

Either way—considering it a misfortune, Yae pitied the "special" Priscilla.

Priscilla possessed exceptional beauty, of course, but she also harbored a bewitching allure that charmed others with her mannerisms, words, and even the manner in which she breathed; whether she desired it or not, that "specialness" would catch the eyes of all sorts of people, leave marks upon their lives, and stir their emotions.

A great number of people would likely place their hopes and expectations on her, only to be consumed by foul desires and emotions. —After all, even this pity that Yae felt, was something that had been brought about by the "specialness" possessed by that woman.

And as if reading right into Yae's heart, she had spoken the words mentioned prior.

Eyes cast down upon the book in her hands whilst sitting in her private room, just as Yae was serving tea, noticing how she did not pass even a single glance in her direction, Priscilla had suddenly spoken those words without any forewarning.

Regardless, as had been mentioned previously, Yae was always on guard when interacting directly with Priscilla. So even at this juncture, though she had received a bit of a surprise, she had managed to respond with her usual frivolity.

Mixing in a light playfulness, and acting as if she had no mind to earnestly grasp the meaning, she forged a smile.

And seeing Yae's unchanged attitude, Priscilla closed a single eye—

Priscilla: "—Someday, you too shall have no choice but to expend everything you have to offer. Be diligent, and keep mine words close at heart. Your preparations must be "perrfekt", yes?"

Yae never asked about the true meaning of those words.

Her shinobi instincts warned her that asking again might arouse suspicion. But, probably more so than that, Yae was loath to do so.

From the lips of the "special" Priscilla, she did not want such inconvenient words to be hurled at her.

For that reason, Yae did not grasp the true intent behind Priscilla's words.

Neither did she know the reason Fujirou had named her Yae, nor did she know the village chief's intentions in endlessly trying to get her to break the ironclad law of the shinobi to the point it felt like harassment; she knew nothing.

In order to avoid being treated as "special" by others, she continued to plug her ears and avert her eyes from all of that.

—After all, that was Yae Tenzen's life philosophy, not desiring to be "special", in order to not be desired as "special".

5

In the end, Yae's thinking turned out to be correct.

Having shone so radiantly, captivating great numbers of people with her flame-like, "special" way of being, even Priscilla had ended up laying down her life in those cruel and merciless lands of the Empire.

Thus, while fiery emotions with no place left to turn to scorched his soul, the one who had yearned for that “special” woman who was no longer among them, even now still wishing to repay her, was burning his life to naught in order to do so.

Yae Tenzen did not wish to live her life at the mercy of such “specialness”.

That was why, that was precisely why.

That was why, as soon as possible, she would rid this world of the “specialness” that had burdened her with such an undesirable fixation.

Unmistakably, that was the sole reason why Yae was willing to risk her life to assist the man abandoned by the “specialness” his heart had yearned for—

Yae: “—Hk.”

The discus of ice rapidly revolved on all axes without consideration for its surroundings, yet still using it as a platform whilst constructing the battlefield, Yae intercepted the incoming Oni girl—Rem.

A steel thread reeling out from her right hand dashed up vertically, and a steel thread from her left hand snagged a dagger to perform a horizontal sweep; the two varieties of precise, and difficult-to-avoid severing flashes pincered Rem from the front and behind.

—Due to the cooperation of her opponents, Yae had failed to stop Emilia from fleeing the battlefield.

Having grown wings of ice upon her back, Emilia received the momentum of the ice discus that had been forced into a spin, and caught the wind; chasing Al as he soared far off to a distant sky, she was rapidly gaining speed. As she got further from the two who could do nothing but plummet straight downwards head-first, she at last escaped the range at which a steel thread could still reach her.

It was not impossible to still use a thread to launch some projectile like a stone fragment or sword at her, but—

Rem: “Looking away is forbidden!”

With that, after countering the double layered attack from a moment prior by meeting the dagger with her chains, and bending down to evade the steel thread, Rem obstructed Yae, causing the chance to take such an action to slip through Yae’s fingers.

While gritting her teeth at that failure, Yae pivoted to getting away from Rem as she rushed her down, and using the steel thread she had sent out as a grip, she executed a wide turn, circling around to the other side of the ice discus,

Yae: “Isn’t it a bit unfair to become so formidable all of a sudden? For what reason—”

Rem: “—It’s love!”

Yae: “…Shouldn’t have asked!”

Chasing after Yae as she went over to the other side of the ice disk, Rem smashed through the ice by sheer force. Distancing herself at an apt medium range from the barbarity of the Oni girl whose vitality surged along with the brightness of the horn on her head, Yae’s footwork managed to sidestep the iron ball wielded by the stout arm, and sticking to the revolving platform, she spun around behind Rem.

It was a high velocity, but although there was a certain randomness to the direction of the ice disk’s rotation around its origin, the speed of rotation itself had a fixed rhythm to it. As long as she kept to that, there was no risk of losing the platform, and so Yae freely danced across the ice, leaping and bounding as if in flight.

And contrary to Yae’s magnificent mastery over the ice disk, Rem’s movements were plain and simple—

Rem: “Won’t let you do that…!”

As Rem firmly declared so, she struck the ice with a pointed hand, with the tips of her toes, and with the iron ball held close in her grip; using them as wedges to secure herself, she ferociously pursued Yae with beast-like movements.

Far removed from refinement or grace, the hunting style was like that of a savage carnivorous beast—and yet, she was fast. As Yae fled in a dance, the distance between the two of them was shortening in the blink of an eye.

Yae: “Aren’t you way too unconcerned with appearances, and isn’t that totally improper conduct for a maid?”

Rem: “Unfortunately, there is only one quality our master requires from his maids—utmost effort!”

Raising her face, Rem twisted her body with three of her limbs as anchors, utilizing the rotation of the ice disk to launch an attack of her iron ball with minimal movement. Its might was dispersed through the mobilization of the steel threads, but as she had needed to fire them directly to her side, Yae internally clicked her tongue.

A battle to decide on the best maid between the two factions—Yae did not have the leeway to joke about such things.

Superior in skill, Yae could even assert that she was three stages higher in terms of strength, but against Rem, Yae simply had a poor affinity. The Morningstar wielded by Rem was a weighty weapon, and those kinds of heavyweight attacks that aimed to guarantee a kill with a single blow were the most troublesome to defend against using steel threads.

The strength of steel threads was that they had the potential to defend against any attack so long as they were bundled and intertwined together, but that necessitated an adequate amount of time as well as a suitable number of threads. For Yae to defend against Rem’s blows, she needed to use at least seven fingers to guarantee safety.

If she was unwilling to do that, then she also had the option of dodging, but—

Yae: “The aim is way too accurate…!”

Despite how unstable this platform was, Rem was able to launch her iron ball in a way that came biting at Yae as if it were a great serpent.

Each throw followed a trajectory straight towards the exact middle of Yae’s body, and although she would not fail to defend against it even if she held her eyes closed, the rhythm of her own attacks was collapsing.

And to top it all off, the fearsome combat capabilities of the Oni Clan would now be thrown into the mix.

Rem: “RAHHHhhhhh!!”

With all four of her limbs planted in the ice discus, Rem’s entire body discharged red steam as she roared.

That was the result of the low temperature from falling thousands of meters from a high altitude, the Oni Clan trait of invigorating all the Mana surging through her body, and finally, rapidly regenerating from the lacerations given to her from Yae’s steel threads.

Until now, while Yae was evading Rem’s lethal blows, she had carved her with many wounds that aimed to render her incapable of fighting. But, none of them could outstrip the Oni’s regeneration.

And, above all—

Yae: “Sh—!”

Bringing her rings to her lips in a kiss, the steel threads were once again swallowed by tongues of flame.

That instant, after Yae had blanketed Rem’s vision in flame, she aimed for the neck of the enemy on the other side of this heat wave, and with a flick of her arm—with a speed nearing that of sound, the steel thread flashed as it aimed to perform a decapitation.

That was one of Yae’s original techniques that could not be found written down anywhere in a book of secrets, and was the fastest brandish possible amidst the Steel Thread Technique employed by Yae; something that Al might have called an “ultimate move”. She had confidence that this invisible thread attack of undiscernible range, a flash of absolute death, could vanquish any opponent. —And yet, Rem had avoided it.

And that was not just once, but twice.

Yae: “—Hk.”

In its initial reveal, it had been an attack that aimed to take out both Rem and Emilia at once.

Since that had been averted, this time, she aimed not just for the neck, but for the chest, unleashing the single flash so that it could not be dodged by the retraction of the head. It sliced through the wind as if to proclaim that it would not allow any fluke evasions—hence, the fact that Rem managed to avoid it was no miracle or fortuity. It was inevitable.

Rem had fully seen through Yae’s Steel Thread Technique.

The ice fog had already vanished from their surroundings, so this was a different method to how Emilia had perceived the steel threads based on how the ice particles were being sliced. Though, she had no way to confirm the exact principle behind it.

Yae: “Won’t let you do that.”

No longer keeping up the appearances that were meaningless to keep up, Yae muttered as she tensed the corners of her mouth.

Won’t let them do that. Won’t let them go. Won’t let them stop him. —Yae would thwart both Emilia and Rem.

Yae: “…”

Stretching out his wings of stone, Al had fled to the sky without waiting on the outcome of this battle.

Even if he had left her behind, Yae would not take that as him abandoning her. It was not impossible that he had abandoned her, but Al had a tendency to be frugal. He would not easily give up on the pawns and cards in his arsenal.

And so, Yae would take Al's breakaway as him entrusting it to her. She would interpret it as an order to stop the two who were chasing after him, no matter what it took.

Hence, Al had granted it to Yae. —A license to kill.

Yae: "—Even if it means killing you, I'll stop you."

I'll stop them, I'll stop them, no matter what it takes, I will stop them.

She would see to it that Al accomplished his objective. Anything that might get in the way of that would be removed. Everything was so that she could have Al, floundering after having lost Priscilla, who was his own "specialness", disappear from the world as soon as possible.

After all, if she did not do so, Yae Tenzen would be unable to return to the self who obeyed the ironclad law of the shinobi, to the self who would never give her heart to anything, and to the self who loathed being "special", who distanced herself from it at all costs.

6

???: "—Your stars were bad."

Indeed, the monster who had taught Yae Tenzen the meaning of dread, uttered those same words over and over again.

Her days at the Barielle Mansion, sent there as an undercover operative, abruptly came to an end.

Performing her daily maid duties, teasing the adorable butler apprentice, and joking around with the clownish Knight who did not receive any Knightly treatment; working for the tremendously dazzling Sun Princess had been not so bad.

But, Yae's own emotions would not matter in the slightest once she received the order. She would fulfill her duty and disappear without leaving a trace.

Thus, in order to carry out the assassination directive that had been passed so suddenly, Yae attempted to sneak up on Priscilla in her bedroom, but in a dark corridor of the mansion, she was stopped by that man.

Leaving no room for excuses, obstructing her as though he had known all along, the man—Al, battled Yae in a death ballet.

Even if she called it a death ballet, the difference in their abilities was evident. Although he was the Knight of a Royal Candidate, Al's strength was far inferior to Yae's, so the outcome was decided in an instant—or so it ought to have been.

Al: "—Your stars were bad."

The man whose heart she had certainly gouged out hurled those words at her in the same tone. Even when faced with that abnormal situation, Yae's body acted without delay, stripping him of his life for a second time.

Someone who would not die even when killed; this was not her first encounter against such an individual. There were a great number of bizarre and astonishing people in this world, and she had even fought against someone who had not just two, but three hearts. All she had needed to do was crush all three hearts for that person to properly die. The important thing was to just keep killing them until they died.

She lopped off his head. Bisected his torso. Burned his whole body. Plucked off all his limbs. Tore out his throat. Smashed his skull. Gouged out his eyeballs. Peeled all the skin off his back. Shattered all of his bones. Crushed his organs. Fed him poison. Plunged him into the ground. Plunged him into water. Wrung his neck. Wrung everything other than his neck. Testing out all manner of shinobi techniques on him, she robbed him of the life benamed life, enacting every conceivable manner of slaughter as she drove the act of killing to its absolute limit.

Al: “—Your stars were bad.”

But, no matter how many times she killed him, Al would get back up, hurling those same words at her.

Wielding the entirety of the shinobi techniques in her arsenal, and attempting every countermeasure that came into her mind, Yae finally abandoned rationale and tried yielding herself to her instincts, but she still could not kill him. She had failed to fully kill him.

Al: “—Your stars were bad.”

She attempted to put him through torture that would make him regret being born. It was all for naught. She attempted to abandon her mission and get away. It was all for naught. She attempted to drag other people into the fray. It was all for naught.

After finally having enough, she even attempted to put a thread around her own neck and end it all.

Al: “—Your stars were bad.”

Even that, was all for naught.

Al: “—Your stars were bad.”

The repetitions of the same dialogue, an unending helix loitering in the interval between death and death; conferred with those same things for a time that seemed to stretch on forever and ever, for the first time in her life—Yae Tenzen knew dread.

Al: “—Your stars were bad.”

If it meant she could be saved, she was willing to do anything. She vowed to do anything.

If it meant she could put an end to this, she was willing to do anything. She vowed to do anything.

Al: “—Your stars were bad.”

Even with dread newly awakened in her heart, she won no pardon from Al, from the man, from the monster.

Al: “—Your stars were bad.”

Even after her heart was exhaustively shattered beyond repair, the monster’s indifferent cruelty showed no signs of stopping.

She was unable to even keep count anymore. There existed none in this world whom Yae had fought to the death as much as this monster.

A countless number of times, Yae had killed him, and a number of times she wished not even to count, Yae had been killed by him.

Al: “—Your stars were bad.”

This kind of individual, there was nobody else like him. Such a thing was not needed. She did not want to even consider the chance of there being another.

Even now that she had been released from that endless torment on the monster’s whim, even now that she had pledged obedience to him and was devoting her entire being to his objective, it had been engraved into the depths of her soul.

Al: “—Your stars were bad.”

There was no choice but to have the monster, to have the man, to have Al, disappear as soon as possible.

After all, no matter the trigger, no matter the reason, no matter the relationship, Yae Tenzen’s heart must never be shackled to anything.

Al: “—Your stars were bad.”

—After all, her heart must never, be shackled, to anything.

7

Yae: “—Your stars were bad.”

As Yae's lips spun those words, an invisible light of decapitation surged forth, aiming for Rem's slender neck.

Perceiving that alongside the sensation of goosebumps on her skin, Rem reflexively swung her arm gripping the Morningstar, swatting away the flash by wedging the chain into its trajectory.

The boundary of death, unmistakably, they were standing on the boundary of death.

It was the type of high risk situation that Rem had not encountered when she had lost her memories and fighting strength in the Vollachian Empire, and at present, Rem was in a state that she had never managed to reach before having lost her memories, even in the battles against the Sin Archbishops and the White Whale.

Rem: "—Subaru-kun."

Amidst sensations that seemed as if her organs were quaking and her blood was boiling, the greatest heat was stored within the horn sprouting from her head—vividly experiencing the strength, emotions, and pulsations of the world pouring in from there, Rem roused her soul by calling out the name of that darling boy.

Synergizing the advice she had received from the dazzling Sun Princess with the swell of feelings towards her beloved, the Oni Clan blood flowing through Rem's veins was finally able to exhibit its original specs.

Even so, the gap in abilities between Rem and Yae was vast, so the fact that she was able to persist so much against someone ranked among the foremost powerful individuals Rem had witnessed until this point, was not solely thanks to her own strength.

In order to stop Yae—to stop Al and his group, this was the culmination of the many forces who had endlessly refused to back down.

Starting at the Pleiades Watchtower, a clash with the Felt Camp and then a battle at the Royal Capital, followed by Otto's relentless pursuit, by using this divide and conquer tactic and steadily piling on the irregulars, Al's group was bound hand and foot by the inescapable chains of attrition.

What had allowed the gap in strength between Rem and Yae to be temporarily bridged, was the weight of those chains. In addition to that, an ironic twist of fate had become a tailwind for Rem.

That was—

Yae: "—Hk."

Yae grit her teeth as one of her fingers sprung up, sending a thread reeling out as it sliced through the air in an onslaught towards Rem.

As countless severing flashes rained down upon her, Rem keenly sensed them through her horn; chaining together perfect evasion after perfect evasion, she made it out with the life that ought to have been cut short, ferociously clinging to the battlefield.

The secret to that evasion, seemingly brushed by the hand of the divine—no, by the hand of an Oni, lay in but one thing.

Rem: "—Bloodlust."

She could see it. She felt it. It was coming through to her. —Through the horn of the Oni Clan, her opponent's intent was transmitted.

That vividly colored boundary of death, evading it, tracing it, and bouncing it back, Rem closed in on Yae.

Just before Emilia had set off, and just after Al had fled the battlefield, Yae's attacks had started to be tinged with a definite bloodlust. A boisterous dance of bloodlust, showing no hesitation in Yae's will to decapitate her or slice off all four of her limbs, vehemently stimulated her Oni Clan instincts, ironically yielding a state of hyper-reactivity within Rem.

If Yae had kept to the initial policy of "no-killing" and faced off against Rem, she would have likely rendered Rem powerless much sooner. —As the result of starting to go all-out with her true abilities as a shinobi, Yae's attacks had lost their ability to reach

Rem.

If not an ironic tailwind, just what could this be called?

Rem: "…"

Digging her toes into the revolving ice disk as she supported her body, Rem grasped Yae within the field of vision glistening with ice shards flying about, the smile gone from her face as she stared at her.

The figure of Yae sharpening her almond-shaped eyes was so captivatingly beautiful as she regulated her heart; as for what was sustaining her supply-tempered body, Rem understood perfectly.

What had filled Yae's slender body to the brim, was a sense of duty.

A wish that she needed to fulfill at all costs, and a prayer that she wished to accomplish no matter what it took; those were the things that granted Yae extraordinary power, giving her the resolve to not even care about making an enemy of the world.

Thus, as for where that sense of duty originated from, Rem was well aware.

Rem: "After all, I'm… Rem is, the same way."

With a horn growing out of her forehead, her entire body littered in wounds, while plummeting down head first from five-thousand meters up high, the reason why Rem was standing here now was also because of a sense of duty.

A wish that she needed to fulfill at all costs, and a prayer that she wished to accomplish no matter what it took; those were the things that granted Rem extraordinary power, giving her the resolve to throw everything away in order to save a single person.

Thus, as for where this sense of duty originated from, Rem had no reason to keep it hidden.

That was—

Rem: “—Love!!”

Yae: “One who knows little often repeats it… hk!”

As Rem howled, Yae’s voice filled with irritation in response.

The expression of the shinobi, of congealed or perhaps fabricated emotions, that would by no means ever reveal her true feelings, slowly began to unravel. However, Rem would not interpret that as conceit, carelessness, or lack of experience.

Gritting one’s teeth was only natural. —That is, if one was to devote their everything for the sake of another.

Rem: “…”

In the corner of her eye, amidst the fierce battle, a line engraved into the cliff face grazed Rem’s attention.

The Agzadd Canyon, five-thousand meters, the final stretch, all that remained until they reached the bottom was—

Rem: “—Ten seconds!!”

Yae: “—Hk.”

While fighting off the thread storm that seemed as if a tidal wave closing in, Rem deliberately called that out.

She would give her information. Increase the factors for decision making. Disrupting her thinking, and causing hesitation in just one or two of those twenty digits on her hands and feet. She would irritate her, strip her emotions down bare, and make Yae hate her. Making her overflow with malice, enmity, and murderous intent, she would slip past it, slip past, slip past slip past slip past slip slip slip—.

And then—

Rem: “Here!”

Just as Rem and Emilia had planned—five seconds after the final ten seconds commenced, an impact from directly below would mercilessly perforate the ice discus.

8

Al: “—Your stars were bad.”

Indeed, the monster residing in Yae’s heart would often mutter those words.

Even now, the man’s voice that Yae felt like she had heard however many thousands and tens of thousands of times, still haunted her dreams.

At first, she had found that catchphrase of Al’s to be rather odious. After all, even the stars would eventually get tired of being blamed for anything and everything, and would end up wanting to object.

Even though it was not the stars’ fault that Yae’s heart had been chipped and shattered, and was rather unmistakably the monster’s fault, how could he dare to shift the blame like that?

Only, she gradually came to realize that she had been mistaken, that this was not the man shifting blame.

Al: “—Your stars were bad.”

Whenever he spoke those words, Al was by no means celebrating his triumph.

Present there was nothing like contempt or scorn, but rather, things akin to pity and compassion.

As proof of that, the monster, the man, Al, had refrained from saying it.

Following the death of Priscilla Barielle, he did not resort to saying the stars had failed him.

When his own worthless self had failed to save her life, he did not resort to saying the stars had failed him.

Al: “—Your stars were bad.”

Whenever the monster, whenever the man, whenever Al spoke those words, it was always on the occasion that his own outrageous power thwarted the desires or goals of an opponent. Those words, spun out of pity, compassion, and feelings of guilt, were always to impart this sentiment unto the other party.

—It isn’t your fault; such was its significance.

Ahh, how unpleasant.

How unpleasant, how unpleasant. How truly unpleasant.

She had not wanted to realize such a thing.

Al’s words, the man’s gaze, the monster’s heart, she had not wanted to realize any of those things.

Yae did not want to discover any motivation other than dread from Al. She did not want to embrace it. She did not want to feel it.

Therefore, as soon as possible, she wanted to put an end to it.

—Upon this “specialness”, she did not wish to bestow any name other than dread.

9

Yae: “Everything… is the fault… of the stars…”

Hearing those sounds spill from her own lips, Yae snapped back to reality after her consciousness trailed off for just a moment.

At that moment, she could tell that her body had been blown into the air, and that her field of vision was spinning around.

A crash, yes, there had been a crash.

Something had struck the ice discus from below, and the impact that shattered the ice had also run through Yae.

When she glanced down at the edge of her consciousness to see what had shattered the ice discus, there was the summit of an enormous mountain of ice that had been erected at the bottom of the canyon in which they had fallen down thousands of meters—freezing the great river that ran through the ravine floor, it had been shaped into a dreadfully colossal mass of ice, lying in wait for the falling ice disk.

Factoring in the momentum of their descent, the air resistance, and the number of seconds they had been falling, she estimated that the distance of the fall was roughly five thousand meters—the only geography matching those specifications that she could think of was the Agzadd Canyon, the largest canyon in the world; witnessing the great feat that was freezing the river that ran along its bottom, Yae realized just how extraordinary Emilia's magic truly was.

But, what had struck her the most deeply was—

Yae: "…You're quite the tough woman, aren't you."

Amidst her revolving vision, fragments of the shattered ice disk sparkled like diamond dust within the breathtaking scenery, and therein did Yae catch sight of Rem, crowned by her shining horn.

At the moment of the crash, Rem had fled to the sky in order to avoid the impact, and using the scattered ice blocks as platforms to accelerate, she was about to come charging at Yae, who also still remained in the sky.

She had been tricked into thinking that there were ten seconds left until impact, when in reality, there had only remained five.

To lose one's composure, was a blunder unbecoming of a shinobi. To lag behind, was a folly unbecoming of a maid. And to go against the duty entrusted to her, was a deed unbecoming of the Crimson Sakura—

Yae: "—Your stars… were bad."

Neither was that directed towards the Oni girl drawing near before her eyes, nor towards herself as she put on such a disgraceful display, but rather, towards the one no longer present here, towards the monster who had soared far, far into the distance, Yae spoke.

With the same nuance that the monster would always attach whenever he hurled those words at another, she spoke those words to the monster.

Yae: “—Ah.”

The impact Yae had been struck by had caused her entire body to creak, and she was even unsure if all her limbs were still properly attached. But, this numbness was nothing. She had already overcome numbness back during her poison resistance training. This sensation in her hands and feet was nothing. All the bones in her body had already been broken back during her torture drills. This cloudiness of mind was nothing. She had already surmounted the training to fight in a near-death state, with vast amounts of blood drained from her body. The fact that every single one of those things was now useful to her made her feel like she could hear the village chief’s wily laughter, which aggravated her.

It aggravated her, but—

Yae: “—Ahhh.”

Thousands, tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands, millions, tens of millions of times, she had repeated the same movements.

The steel threads that had seen no wielder in several hundreds of years, that which demanded the delicate skill to move one’s fingertips by millimeters at the utmost precision, in a state of numbness, low on blood, and with a clouded mind, Yae operated them.

Even if seventy percent of her lifeforce poured out of her body, the digits pulling those steel threads would not err.

Yae: “—AHHHHHHHhh!”

She pulled tight on her extended arms and legs, and in that moment, the chunks of ice bound by those steel threads ferociously bolted through the sky.

The fragments of the shattered ice discus, ensnaring them with her threads, Yae had them whirl violently through the air to match her body's rhythm, slamming them right into the side of Rem as she charged towards her.

Rem: "…"

A thunderous crash rang out, and Rem was sent flying away by an ice chunk with vehement vigor.

And as if to kick Rem when she was down, the ice chunks caught by the steel threads crashed into her one after another, after another, and after another; the barrage of powerful blows rained down upon her as she slammed into the summit of the ice mountain.

A white spray of snow was blown up into the air, and with blood mixing into the enshrouding ice fog, the ice mountain would be made into the Oni's gravestone. —That instant, the gravestone was perforated, and the iron ball shooting straight out of it thrust directly into Yae.

Yae: "—Uh."

The spikes accompanying that heinous lump of iron gouged into Yae's torso, deeply penetrating the side of her abdomen.

But, she had avoided damage to her vital organs by shifting them aside. Through the inhumane shinobi modifications to her flesh, Yae could shift the positioning of her internal organs. The spikes pierced a cavity with nothing in it, scattering blood from her back.

However, this was a blow she had deliberately taken.

Tightening her muscles, she trapped the spiked iron ball in her own body.

Subsequently, emerging out of the enshrouding white fog of snow was the blood-stained Oni, ferociously leaping upwards as she followed the chain of the iron ball that had stuck into Yae.

Her trajectory was perfectly straight, bereft of any twist or artifice, a straight line following her heart—awaiting in her path as she soared up, was a deployment of steel threads laid out in a web.

Rem: "…"

Voluntarily diving into the steel thread birdcage that would tear her body to shreds, it birthed countless lacerations upon Rem's white skin as it attempted to cut her body up into hundreds of little chunks of meat.

But, just before that could come to fruition, Rem's lips spun an incantation,

Rem: "Huma."

It was a spell that created ice, one that she had thoroughly borne witness to throughout the course of this battle.

For Rem to opt for that in this eleventh hour, Yae's entire body was on guard for where the ice would be created, exercising her senses in the three-hundred and sixty degrees of every direction around her, she readied herself to defend against any kind of surprise attack.

However, that had been unnecessary. There was no surprise attack. The ice took shape right before Yae's eyes.

The stream of feedback from the steel threads that ought to have carved Rem's body to shreds came to a halt. Taking a look, the steel threads that had dug into her flesh had been stopped by red ice—by her own frozen blood.

As soon as Yae comprehended that, her kiss set the steel threads alight with flame, and the explosive heat melted the frozen blood, and attempted to recommence the lethal thread attack. But, it was too late.

Rem: "YAHHHHH—!!"

Without overlooking the momentary bending of the threads, Rem howled as she raised her fist against Yae.

A blow imbued with the resolve to settle this battle, alongside the power to make that happen; the fact that Rem's bloodstained white fist held such might, was something that Yae perceived from her measurements.

Hence, she would not take this blow. She could not afford to take this blow. After all, she still had Emilia to take care of.

In order to reach that point, she drew her trump card.

Yae: "…"

The mobilization of steel threads utilizing all twenty of the digits between her hands and feet, had been evaded by the enemy.

But, it was not over. It was not over yet. The trump card of Yae Tenzen's Steel Thread Technique, sticking out her red tongue as if to provoke her opponent—

Yae: "Behhh."

Out from a ring placed on the tip of her tongue, her final flash of severance was unleashed.

True to its aim, it struck the slender neck of Rem as she ferociously approached, rending her life in a single brandish.

10

—The Crimson Sakura, Yae Tenzen, was an unparalleled genius of a shinobi.

The Vicious Old Man, Olbart Dunkelkenn, held her talents and capabilities in a very high regard.

The person in question very much hated being praised so highly, but that averse reaction seemed only to fuel Olbart's sadistic delight, and so he had never let her hear the end of it.

Given his years of experience, he was likely stronger than her overall.

But, her raw talent far exceeded his own, so with enough years of experience, she would easily transform into the strongest shinobi, untouchable by anyone. Hence, he could somewhat understand why some might have had big dreams for Yae.

Be that as it may, he was his own person, and other people were other people.

There was no point in dreams that were fulfilled by somebody else. Hence, still harboring big dreams of his own, the only thing Olbart could do for that genius girl was offer her some heartfelt advice—no, a warning.

Olbart: “Ya don’t wanna? Listen, I’ve been there myself. Remarkable folk like the two of us end up livin’ longer than most ordinary shinobi ‘thout even realizin’ it, ‘n we end up seein’ tons’a things. So occasionally, there’ll be times. Times when you’ll hafta end up breakin’ the ironclad law of the shinobi.”

Olbart: “Hm? Ya think it’s a matter of people who don’t hold anythin’ dear ta ‘em bein’ weak? Nah, nah, y’ain’t gettin’ what I’m sayin’. It’d be somethin’ more like, ya can’t deal with a poison that’cha don’t know, yeah?”

Olbart: “Ya make brats drink poison when they’re young so they won’t die from it later. ‘N so, tellin’ ya that it’d be fine ta keep at least a single somethin’ in yer heart, was just some advice ta keep ya from dyin’.”

Olbart: “After all, never’ve I loved, nor ever been loved. Makes ya end up incredibly weak, that sorta thing. —I’m tellin’ ya, the first time a shinobi goes ‘n starts holdin’ someone dear… Kakakakka!”

11

With the brandish of her trump card, a steel thread bolted out from the ring placed over her tongue, and without err, it reaped the slender neck of the Oni girl leaping towards her, severing the connection between head and torso.

Annulling the “no-killing” restriction, she had succeeded in the elimination of one of the obstacles standing in the way of Al’s objective.

Thinking of that fact, and anticipating Al's reaction when he learned of this, Yae felt a grating sensation in the depths of her chest—

Yae: "—Hah?"

Just before she could digest that heartache, Yae widened her eyes, doubting the sight before her eyes.

Beyond any shadow of a doubt, Yae's steel thread had severed Rem's slender neck. She had distinctly felt the sensation that accompanied cutting away a prey's life, and she had certainly heard the rasp of the wind that blew upon severing the blood and flesh and bone that made up a life.

And despite all that—

Rem: "—I wasn't exactly playing fair either."

Yae's crimson eyes intersected Rem's pale blue ones. And, there was still light to be found in those eyes.

Then, the red line emblematic of her reaped life, one that certainly ought to have been left as a mark on her neck, slowly faded away. —Neither had she protected against it, nor had she evaded it; the blow that by all means was supposed to have taken her life, had been cancelled.

That was not something that could simply be explained by the regeneration possessed by the Oni Clan; a miracle that should have never happened. Even in this vast world, the likes of someone capable of wielding that level of healing magic was—

Yae: "—Al-sama."

The monster who, even when making an enemy of the world, seemed like he would absolutely never lose; she had wanted to assist him.

She had hoped that by doing so, she would be able to erase the “specialness” living within her own heart.

And yet—

???: “—Your stars were bad.”

Shutting her eyes, she once again heard the dreadful words that seemed to make all her hairs stand on end.

Though oddly enough, right now, in this moment alone, the feeling they inspired within Yae was not dread, but instead.

Yae: “The cause of my defeat…”

Rem: “—Is love.”

The powerful arm unleashed alongside that answer, smashed into the iron ball stuck within Yae’s torso.

Far more lethal than the fall from five-thousand meters, the Oni’s thunderbolt exploded—atop the icy crown of the mountain amidst crags of the Agzadd Canyon, cherry blossoms fluttered down as though in requiem.

—Before the Blue Oni, the Crimson Sakura known as Yae Tenzen, ephemeral as her namesake’s petals, was scattered to the wind in violent splendor.

Chapter 52:
Aldebaran I

1

Witch: “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.”

Aldebaran recalled the Witch imparting those words upon him as if it were yesterday.

In real time, it would have been close to twenty years ago, but in terms of perceived time, it was a completely different order of magnitude.

Even if he remembered the number of attempts he had needed for individual deadlocks, he had not memorized the total number of attempts he had taken across everything; not to mention, the amount of time that had passed throughout all of that would have been so outrageous that he did not want to even think about it. Only, it was an absolute truth that he was expending far more time than a single lifetime would usually allow.

Be that as it may, even after going through all that time, it would be incorrect to assume that Aldebaran had reached the same mental state as the elves who lived for hundreds of years in perennial youth.

If the human mind was something that started out as immature before eventually maturing enough to reach a state of aged wisdom, that was because the passage of time would allow one to experience both the sweet and the sour, granting the mind ample room to grow.

But, all the time Aldebaran spent outside the passage of actual time was, so to speak, a series of stagnant moments used to break through whatever difficulty was laid before his eyes. In practice, those would range from a few seconds to a few minutes at most, and just by repeating those small intervals countless times, a human could not hope to grow.

Ergo, Aldebaran believed that the accumulation of time repeated by his Authority was time spent in futility, something that only ever served to abrade his heart, and never to foster its growth.

Even if it was time spent in such futility, when it got to the point of repeating several hundreds, tens of thousands, hundreds of millions of times, the brain would automatically begin filtering memories, attempting to rob Aldebaran of his genuine recollections.

Nevertheless, there certainly existed memories that did not fade; recollections that, rather than his brain, seemed to be etched into his very soul, and the aforementioned words were undoubtedly among them.

But then again, if in addition to already lacking memories of all the time he had lived, Aldebaran were to also say that he did not even wish to remember all of it, he could picture that Witch, the very incarnation of a curiosity who eagerly wanted to know everything, quietly muttering to herself “I see, what a shame”.

Although she boasted that she could not understand emotions, the Witch was an expert at putting on an act to bend others to her will. And despite knowing that, Aldebaran could not defy the Witch’s words or attitude.

That was the manner in which he had been disciplined, in which he had been reshaped—were he to phrase it in such a way, it might have been a fair matchup against the inhumanity of the shinobi village that he had happened to hear bits and pieces about from Yae.

In this case, it was tossup between whether it was the shinobi village, treated as equal to the Witch, who were the crazy ones, or if it was actually the Witch, single-handedly contending against the entire history of the shinobi village, who was truly insane.

—Either way, the current Aldebaran was a product of the Witch’s creation.

Witch: “Even if you say that, you do have the right to live your own life. That alone is a domain that even a creator must not one-sidedly intrude upon. Hence, supposing you sincerely believe that you cannot follow me from the bottom of your heart, you may withdraw from the plan at any time. That is your freedom.”

On occasion, the Witch would say such things as though to question Aldebaran’s resolve.

It was an unusual concern for a Witch to bear. Fundamentally, once she had secured the other party’s consent, the Witch’s usual strategy was to always maneuver in such a way that the promises she had coerced could not be taken back.

In fact, among the lessons and assignments that the Witch had levied upon Aldebaran, there had been plenty with contents nightmarish enough to have made him hesitate had he not agreed to not giving up in advance. Whenever the Witch made him do such things, she would never ask him if he wished to stop once she had gotten him to agree.

And yet, when it came to the root of it all, his initial, and most foundational resolve, she would often press him about it.

Aldebaran interpreted that as potentially being Witch’s own way of expressing her sense of guilt or inner turmoil, but was that really so?

The Witch proclaimed herself as unable to comprehend emotion, however, there was no way that she did not know the likes of rage, joy, and sorrow. If she was capable of expressing those sorts of human emotions, then would it not also be possible for her to harbor a sense of guilt or apprehension toward the future?

At the very least, throughout the time Aldebaran had spent with the Witch, even if there were times when he had thought her a Witch incapable of comprehending the human heart, he had never once thought her a Witch bereft of a human heart.

In the interval between “not having” and “not understanding”, there lay a completely different landscape.

Could it be that this simply manifested in the form of the Witch's questions? If that were the case, then for each time she had voiced that question, had the Witch perhaps felt lost?

Lamenting the harsh path that she would eventually have Aldebaran walk, and desiring to respect Aldebaran's own will, letting him choose his own life; had such a turmoil existed within her?

Maybe, just maybe, on the one in a million chance, on the one in a billion chance that the Witch did have such feelings—ironically enough, that became the exact reason why Aldebaran would not go back on his resolve.

Therefore—

Witch: "—I see."

Hearing the same answer Aldebaran always gave, the Witch's reaction had also been the same as ever.

Perhaps he was being played.

Perhaps from the very moment Aldebaran had been created until that day, the Witch had been pouring ample amounts of time into brainwashing him. Perhaps the Witch harbored none of the feelings of guilt or hesitation that Aldebaran had anticipated.

Perhaps, she truly was such a wicked Witch.

But, even if he were to pose that question directly to her, the Witch, putting on that beautiful smile of white and black,

Witch: "Naturally. —I am a wicked magician, after all."

In such a manner, voicing answers that gave no clue as to their sincerity or deception, she toyed with Aldebaran.

2

Basking in the roaring winds, Aldebaran glided through the air at furious speeds.

He thought the sight of him spreading wings of stone on his back, catching the wind as he soared, would have looked terribly ridiculous, but he had no need to concern himself with appearances.

As Yae held back their opponents, he would need to gain as much distance as possible, as well as eliminate the difference in elevation.

Aldebaran: “Though, I can’t imagine that they were targeting my Territory.”

Even as those words spilled from Aldebaran, he concentrated the majority of his attention on the formulation and operation of the stone wings on his back.

The construction of the stone wings demanded an extremely delicate balance, with the size and hardness also requiring very fine adjustment. If they were too big, they would be tossed around too much by the wind, but if they were too small, the objective could not even be realized in the first place. Hardness and density were also tied to weight, so tuning them too much or too little would inevitably lead to a crash.

Aldebaran: “Gotta hand it to Icarus for getting it right on his first try…!”

Speaking of taking to the skies with man-made wings, the one who came to mind was Icarus, the great predecessor who had fashioned wings of wax; setting aside the fate he met, the fact that his wings had not only been able to glide, but had been able to flap and carry him up close to the sun quite honestly filled Aldebaran with wonder.

Just how many times had Aldebaran crashed on account of poorly constructed wings? —That would have been exactly what the opponent wanted, so after tackling the problem again countless times, he had finally managed to fashion his current wings of stone.

Even that was an intense feat that could not have been realized without utmost concentration and scrupulous caution, but—

Aldebaran: “I couldn’t afford to continue falling like that.”

That reality and his impatience: they were the greatest reasons behind Aldebaran's ability to level up his Level 1 stone wings with great haste, getting them to a level capable of flight for the time being—although Aldebaran had confidence in himself as the user of an invincible Authority, it was not as though his Territory had no shortcomings whatsoever.

The enemy's ambush on this occasion was something that had inadvertently struck two of those weaknesses simultaneously. Strictly speaking, it could perhaps be better described as an attack on the same weak point from two different angles.

For Aldebaran's Authority, "Territory", there existed a valid range of effectiveness.

The teleport brought about as a result of the ambush had thrown Aldebaran outside of the established area of his Territory. On top of that, factoring in that the destination of the teleport was a free fall from an extremely high elevation, it served as an attack against Aldebaran that would cause the destruction of the second Territory.

As a result, amidst his descent at furious speeds, Aldebaran had made sure to commit suicide before he fell outside the bounds of his Territory, restarting from the middle of the fall many times over. Amidst those repetitions, he deemed that it would be impossible to break out of this high altitude situation as he fell with his freedom of movement so severely restricted; after testing a variety of different plans, he arrived at attempting to escape on stone wings.

At the very least, this slowed his descending change in elevation, allowing him to maintain his Territory with relative ease. And just as Aldebaran had finished untying that troublesome knot—

???: "—Al!!"

Indeed, sharply calling out to Aldebaran as he exerted all his efforts to maintain balance, was the voice of a silver bell.

Turning his head to glance back, from a considerably lower altitude than Aldebaran, he could clearly see the figure of an angel—no, of Emilia, flying in the same direction as he.

Bearing wings forged of ice upon her slender back, she was rapidly closing the distance; despite using the same method as Aldebaran, hers established an overwhelming lead in terms of its striking visual appeal.

Aldebaran: “Unbelievable.”

He hoped it would be clear that there was no helping the dumbfounded, nearly admiring groan that had escaped him.

The amount of hardship Aldebaran had endured to complete these stone wings, unshapely as they were, had already been described. Precisely because he had gone through all that effort, he felt respect towards Icarus and his wax wings.

But, just like the Icarus of myth, Emilia’s senses had succeeded in crafting artificial wings on her first try, achieving the same result as Aldebaran despite his innumerable failures; rather than feeling respect towards that, he merely felt the definitive gap between them, furthering his sense of defeat.

Aldebaran: “Even if the idea that I’m just being a bumbling idiot who crashed over six hundred times is slightly better than the idea that the lil’ miss is a genius, it’s not any solace whatsoever.”

The strength of Aldebaran’s Territory lay within its war of endurance, allowing him to persist over the course of an unlimited number of attempts until even the slightest chance of victory arrived. His greatest advantage was his ability to continue playing the cards in his hand until his opponent blundered, giving rise to a situation in which Aldebaran could gain the upper hand.

However, while this also applied to his battle against Reinhard, there existed rare individuals in this world capable of consistently arriving at the correct answers. Those right answers would vary from person to person based on their individual abilities and their objectives for victory, but what they had in common was that unlike Aldebaran, they were all loved by fate.

—Aldebaran was hated by fate itself.

It was no longer clear whether Aldebaran had come to despise fate first, or if fate had been the one to initially hate Aldebaran, but that alone was an unshakable truth. Regardless of whether he was loved or abhorred by other things, fate was Aldebaran's absolute enemy.

Therefore, he had no choice but to slay it. —Even if it meant making an enemy of the world, he would slay fate, no matter what.

But since it did not wish to be killed, fate had been sending its own favored pawns after him one after another in the form of assassins. Here and now, it had selected Emilia and Rem to act as its implements.

Aldebaran: "—. Just my luck."

Just who had it been to suggest that Rem should be chosen as the first surprise attacker?

Regardless of who had proposed it, she was by far the most suitable candidate in terms of creating a momentary void within Aldebaran's mind. When she had been a victim to the Authority of Gluttony, Aldebaran had failed to notice the abnormality of her existence as a result of that influence, unwittingly forming a proper relationship with her.

Hence, after the death of Priscilla, the moment he had been hit by that flash grenade of memories and discovered that Rem had been released from the yoke of Gluttony, his mind had been consumed by a much greater void than the others.

—After all, he had come across a being who should not have been present here, one who by all means should have been dead.

Aldebaran: "…"

As for how that outcome had been achieved, there was no room for debate.

Doubtlessly, he had pulled it off. In his struggle against fate, Natsuki Subaru had managed to conquer it. The power to do so dwelled within Natsuki Subaru. Rem's very existence was proof of that.

But, regardless, despite all that—he did not save Priscilla Barielle.

Aldebaran: "—If that's how you're gonna play it, I'm not showing any mercy either."

The tears he had shed, the fists that had punished him, the consideration he had attempted to offer; meaningless, all of it.

After all, that which Aldebaran desired was neither tears, nor wounds, nor consolation. It was simply the life, of a single person.

Aldebaran: "—Hk."

Within his helmet, clenching his teeth to the point that he could taste blood, Aldebaran looked to his rear. As he simultaneously modified the angle and thickness of his wings, all the while keeping the drop in speed and maneuverability to a minimum, in mid-air he crossed gazes with Emilia amidst her pursuit of him.

The beautiful wings of ice truly suited Emilia, but no matter how cute of an angel she was, she could not flap those artificial wings to gain speed or elevation. She had gained her initial velocity from the recoil of Rem bashing the ice discus, but after that, there would have been no other method for her to gain on him—

Emilia: "Yah! Tah! Tei!"

Similar to whenever she would launch an attack, Emilia raised those lackluster battlecries, and with each shout, her altitude and speed would increase by a step, and then another step higher. The methodology was plain and clear—using her magic to create an icicle as a foothold in the air, she kicked off of it in order to gain acceleration and vigor.

After a moment of stillness, the created icicle was kicked down towards the ground by the strength of Emilia's legs; however, it immediately dispersed into Mana and returned to the atmosphere before being born anew as yet another foothold. Once again, she kicked off from it to boost her momentum. By repeating this process, she had been able to relentlessly close the distance on Aldebaran.

Aldebaran: “That’s fucking ridiculous…!”

Having an extraordinary sense for magic, it was a brute-force solution made possible by her ability to get the most out of a vast supply of Mana.

Thanks to the path which linked him to “Aldebaran”, Aldebaran could draw from the power of the external Mana tank known as the Divine Dragon, but even if he was asked to perform the same feat as Emilia, he simply would not be able to do it.

It was not a question of Mana capacity; there was just far too great of a gulf in their sensibilities and physical abilities. —Even if he could bridge the gap in sensibilities through a limitless number of attempts, the gap in their physical abilities could not be spanned.

The canyon stretched on for a great, long distance, and the cliff faces which flanked both sides of the two aviators stretched just as far. So long as they both continued in the same direction, Emilia’s pursuit would never cease.

As Aldebaran grasped that reality, Emilia kicked off a newly created icicle, and while there still existed some distance between them, her elevation finally matched his. Then, while keeping the balance of her ice wings—

Emilia: “—Al! I’m begging you, let’s talk this out! I’ll properly listen to what you have to say!”

Aldebaran: “That’s rich coming from you. Weren’t you all “ask questions later”, coming at me and trying to freeze me with no mercy. If I had continued to fall all the way to the bottom like that, you were planning on freezing me along with the entire river, weren’t you?”

Emilia: “But! That plan already failed!”

Aldebaran: “You should be careful about being too upfront, Royal Candidate!”

The route of looking on passively and descending to the bottom was a surefire pattern of completely falling right into the opponent’s trap.

In order to escape that, he had gone all or nothing on choosing a path that veered away from the ice disk's falling trajectory; even if he had failed to lose both of them at once, should he perhaps count the fact that he had managed to split up Emilia and Rem as a win?

The answer to that—

Aldebaran: "It's time to find out. —My attitude from the Royal Capital still hasn't changed!"

Deciding to take measures to shake free from Emilia's pursuit, Aldebaran raised his hand aloft and created stones mid-air, assailing her with a barrage of such projectiles.

Unexpectedly, that scene unfolded as if something right out of a shooting game had been brought into real life, and greeted by that barrage of stones, Emilia, with a flash of her wings,

Emilia: "I'll say it as many times as it takes. I don't want to cry believing that there was nothing that could have been done about someone's passing anymore!!"

Proclaiming so in a loud voice, Emilia plunged into the barrage, and the shrieks of the shattering and the freezing atmosphere, resounded across the Agzadd Canyon as a shrill melody.

3

—The reason for his existence as the Following Star was not something that Aldebaran had ever worried about too much.

After all, it seemed that at least once during adolescence, just about everyone would wonder why they had been born, wonder where life came from and where it faded off to, and experience something like a rebellious spirit against their parents for no reason, but for Aldebaran, these were all notions that felt quite alien to him.

In Aldebaran's case, it was a bit difficult to establish exactly who the parent he ought to rebel against would be, and due to the nature of his Authority, he never truly got the sense of his life fading off whenever it was lost. When it came to the purpose of his birth, he had been provided with a precise answer, and as for why he had been born, he supposed that, perhaps, the answer was "love".

And so, Aldebaran had never grappled with the notions that ought to have been entertained during one's adolescence.

Neither did he consider that as some failure on his part, nor as something that he had missed out on.

In society, it seemed like there was the idea that people should challenge themselves with hardship while young, but experiences that would just end up becoming an embarrassing dark past upon entering adulthood held no actual value. It was fine to miss out on experiences that were not worth going through. —Just as how it was fine for death to be something that everyone only experienced once at the very end of their life.

Witch: "I see, so you have no desire for any of the emotions or impulses typical of adolescence. That is a bit of a shame. I had even been considering various ways in which I might deal with your rebellious phase depending on how it might have manifested."

That was the lamentation of the Witch, and though he did not consider her to be lacking a heart, she often made such heartless comments toward Aldebaran, who had seen a quick upbringing without causing much trouble.

For Aldebaran, the Witch was the person with whom he had spent the most time with since his birth, but she had a bad habit of wanting to bear witness to every single choice and emotion of humans, every last possibility.

Furthermore, in the majority of cases, the inability to hold back such desires was in the nature of a Witch.

Aldebaran had been acquainted with Witches other than her, yet, while it was to varying degrees, the fact that not a single one of them could defy that nature struck him as horribly blasphemous.

Hence, the Witch's attitude, awaiting Aldebaran's adolescence with an air of dissatisfaction, was something brought about by a nature that could not be defied, and when he thought about it like that, he could see that there was no helping it. Nevertheless, he saw no point in pretending to go through adolescence just to make the Witch happy. —In a sense, that almost felt like the very rebellious spirit indicative of adolescent emotions.

Witch: "As expected, maybe it is too convenient for me, someone who is not even a parent, to attempt superficially initiating such parental experiences…? If that one created Beatrice, were they perhaps able to experience it?"

As the Witch began to pose such questions to herself, Aldebaran was certain that this sense of loneliness he felt was completely unrelated to adolescence, and instead was something else entirely. Only, it was difficult to seek a concrete answer as to why he felt that way, and their relationship was a bit too complex for him to ask.

And so, just how the Witch had established, the relationship between Aldebaran and herself was—

Aldebaran: "—Teacher."

And, when he called out to her, the Witch in the midst of enjoying a stroll through the labyrinth of her own thoughts lifted her face.

Whenever Aldebaran found himself reflected in those black irises, seeing her hair of pure white cascading down her shoulders as she tilted her head in a "What is it?", he could not help but think about what an unfair Witch she was.

Even though she was always immersed in her own affairs, staying true to her desires without ever so much as trying to show consideration to the hearts of others, whenever Aldebaran called out to her, she would meet his eyes without fail.

The fact that he had never felt any sort of adolescent rebellious spirit against that Witch was but a matter of course.

To begin with, the incentive to do so was shallow, and both his body and mind had long yielded to the futility of defying the Witch. Purporting it as performance testing to help him master the use of his Authority, the Witch had subjected Aldebaran to Death over a million times, and had already concluded her assessment of him.

But then again, no matter how much he brought that up, the Witch in question gave no meaningful reply, only responding “I do not recall even a single one of those times, so even if you tell me to feel some responsibility, I am at a bit of a loss”.

Regardless, he could understand why the Witch would go to such lengths.

After all, at present, the only Witch who still remained alive, not counting the one before his eyes, was the individual who either directly or indirectly caused the deaths of all the other Witches. The point of contact Aldebaran had shared with those Witches was not something that had taken place during their time amongst the living.

He could not meet with them anywhere outside of the finite space that had been prepared by the Witch. By the time he had gotten the chance to meet them there, they were already long dead, their existences naught but gathered souls.

Thus, as for the one who had done that to them; under the Witch’s instruction, Aldebaran would need to—

Witch: “—You must kill her no matter what.”

That was the reason for existence that Aldebaran, the Following Star, had been granted before even experiencing adolescence, the benchmark of his life that he would need to fulfill even if it meant dying a million times.

In order to make Aldebaran this way, the Witch had been reproached by the other Witches, having severed ties even with her companions, so her resolve would have needed to be absolute.

Witch: “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.”

Her act of speaking those words to him was something Aldebaran took pride in, and it served as the very foundation of his being.

In all honesty, he thought the Witch had a horrible personality, and he had many reservations about her teaching methods and her way of giving instruction, but even so, he had no doubt that he would be able to live up to the Witch’s expectations.

He had believed that he would be able to do it.

Back in those days, when Aldebaran still had his left arm, he had still been able to believe so. After all, even if he knew Death, he had not yet known true defeat.

He had never experienced adolescence, but—unmistakably, that was the foolish dark past of his that could never be erased.

4

Aldebaran: “Tch—!”

As Emilia plunged head-first into the incessant barrage of stones, Aldebaran stifled all the hesitation within his heart, mustering up his full, unrestrained firepower.

As was also the case for their clash in the Royal Capital, Aldebaran had an instinctive weakness when it came to Emilia.

At this point, it was clear that this was an example of a weakness inherent to all life, and due to that, he had been unable to bring himself to take the sort of drastic measures he might have otherwise taken had it been a different opponent, even in the Royal Capital.

Back then, he had borrowed the strength of “Aldebaran” to hurl down a colossal boulder, preventing Emilia’s pursuit of him by occupying her with the protection of the Royal Capital; but here, there was nobody else he could drag into the fray.

In that sense, the decision to drop him in the middle of a massive canyon showed that she had clearly reflected on their previous encounter.

Aldebaran: “Though, you’re not exactly giving me enough leeway to appreciate your growth right now!”

Unfortunately, Aldebaran’s heart was not currently relaxed enough to rejoice in the growth of himself or his enemies. For a moment, he felt reluctant to define Emilia as an enemy, but he forcefully shut his eyes to that.

That resolve was something he had settled a long time ago, long before he had even met Priscilla.

Even if, strictly speaking, the target of Aldebaran’s resolve was not the Emilia before his eyes—

Aldebaran: “Even if it’s recycled resolve, it’ll still be about as useful as papier-mâché.”

Holding aloft that resolve despite fully knowing it was but papier-mâché, he moved to sever Emilia’s pursuit.

Diving straight into the storm of rocks the size of fists, Emilia’s ice wings boldly shimmered.

The attack had been intended to delay her movements, even if only slightly, by forcing her to evade or to take a defensive stance, but just as his unpleasant hunch had suspected, Emilia adopted the straightforward approach by taking the shortest path—icy wings adorning back, icicles for footholds, and now, firing stakes of ice to counter the barrage, fending off any that made it through that interception by parrying with the twin swords of ice in her grasp.

The Witch had taught him that the simultaneous activation of magic was difficult, even for a proficient magician.

Even if it was magic of the same attribute, the talent it required was akin to an unreasonable task such as taking a pen in each hand, and trying to write an essay with the right hand while attempting to draw an illustration with the left. When it came to different attributes, it seemed to require the drastic measure of adding an extra brain for each additional attribute, and Aldebaran had even seen the Witch wielding five of the attributes at once. Honestly, it was to the point that he had seriously questioned whether the Witch's smaller-than-average head could truly house five small brains.

Even setting aside that extraordinary digression, and even if they were all under the same attribute of fire, with the wings, icicles, ice stakes, and twin swords, the simultaneous activation of four varieties of magic was a sufficient feat in its own right.

And adding on to that, in order to implement her absurd manner of chase, she had to put on a display of athleticism greater than that of an Olympic athlete, giving him the feeling that he had already exhausted his daily quota of surprise points.

Aldebaran: "That's why, I've gotta meet her with minimal discomposure!"

Emilia had opted to overcome the storm of rocks and stones solely through courage and brute strength. But, setting that courage aside, what would she do if faced with a threat that could not be surmounted by physical might?

Emilia: "…"

Emilia was determined to close the distance, but in the face of the next threat, her cheeks tensed.

Unfolding before her all at once, providing her no path of escape, were objects even tinier than the stone projectiles, an encirclement of gravel whose potential damage could be easily overlooked. Similar to leaping into a torrential rain, so long as she did not possess the absurd ability to dodge the rain while mid-air, it would be impossible for there to be zero hits.

Of course, it was not as though the only objective of that deployed sand was to obstruct her vision, rather—

Emilia: "—Hk, it's heavy?!"

Upon attempting to wipe off the sand that clung to her, Emilia raised a voice of astonishment as she flailed her arms about.

The grains of sand that had made contact with her arms, legs, and white clothes began to consolidate with the surrounding grains of sand, obstructing her movements through their heft and hardness. It was a debuff attack he had also launched against Reinhard at the sand sea—Reinhard had torn free from it by breaking the sound barrier, but not even Emilia would be able to replicate that method.

Moreover—

Emilia: “My wings—”

The gravel’s primary aim had been to hinder the wings of ice that sustained Emilia’s flight.

Having plunged into the sandstorm, the grit had eroded her frozen wings, stripping them of their intrinsic ability to catch the wind. Then, Emilia’s balance crumbled, and she immediately started to plummet headlong towards the ground—to prevent that from happening, Emilia promptly discarded her impaired wings, and by returning from being an angel to simply being an angel-like girl, she evaded the hardship.

Aldebaran: “—Purged!”

But, that was precisely what Aldebaran had aimed to accomplish.

Even though she cast away her ice wings, it was possible for Emilia to deploy another pair of wings right away, allowing her to restart without losing any of her previous momentum or altitude. However, when it came to her physical abilities, no matter how unorthodox they might be, they would not allow her to catch up to an impromptu hang glider exceeding a hundred kilometers per hour.

Henceforth, in order to prevent Emilia from deploying another pair of wings, Aldebaran doubled down.

Jutting out of the cliff face accompanied by a rumbling roar, a colossal arm of stone attempted to snatch Emilia out of the canyon’s sky. If that could hamper her momentum, then even if Emilia succeeded in forming another set of wings, she would lose the ability to catch up to Aldebaran's unceasing speed.

Not to mention, the colossal arms obstructing Emilia did not end at just one or two. —Utilizing the raw materials of the cliff faces, the rocky arms protruding out totaled a count of several hundreds.

Aldebaran: "Respect to Thousand-Armed Kannon… or rather, it feels more like the backstage of a haunted house."[14]

As a staple of haunted houses, a bunch of hands would suddenly pop out all at once from behind sliding paper doors; it had a similar impression to that. However, unlike the empty threat that those frights posed, these colossal arms were serious in their attempt to seize Emilia.

If even one could just grab her by the leg, this chase sequence would be completely finished, and this do-or-die situation would conclude with Aldebaran's successful escape—

Aldebaran: "Think you can—Emilia: "—I'll do my best!!""

Get past this; as he had attempted to finish those words, they were drowned out by her high spirits.

He had not intended for it to be something that she could do anything about simply by doing her best, but Emilia's ability to do her best and somehow wind up pushing through was one of the most fearsome aspects about her.

Having lost her wings, Emilia put that fearsomeness on full display—swinging a glacial sword in her grasp, she hewed the fingers off of the first giant arm to approach her, and having neutralized it, she used it as a platform to perform her next leap.

Her momentum had yet to perish. Her elevation, too, was recovering significantly.

However, even if the behemoth arms did not quite reach the count of a thousand, there still numbered over a hundred awaiting her—

Emilia: "—Soldiers, lend me your strength!"

Following Emilia's call, the ice soldiers with their repugnant appearance made their entrance once more.

The soldiers of ice, who ought to have been shattered to naught during the fall of the ice discus, admirably stood up against the giant earthen arms swarming Emilia; some used their entire bodies to stop them, some delivered punches to knock them off course, and some were crushed while striking a pose after being overpowered; they performed a diverse array of contributions.

What irritated Aldebaran above all else, was the individual who had taken Emilia by the hand, guiding her away from the evil clutches of the colossal arms, and flinging her forward to aid her in her advance.

The Natsuki Subarus of ice, seven in total, would shatter whenever their duty was fulfilled, only to be born anew to serve Emilia; repeating a cycle of destruction and rebirth, they never exceeded a maximum of seven at once, and protecting Emilia from the hundreds of evil stone hands closing in, they continued to assist her.

—Magic was something that gave form to feelings and desires; the Witch had said as much.

He had thought that it had been a surprisingly romantic sentiment for that Witch to have said, but considering how wind could take the form of a blade if one wished to slice up their opponent, and how flames akin to a crimson lotus could be birthed to scorch everything in a rage, there was likely no room for debate that it was but a manifestation of feelings and desires.

In that case, at this moment, the sight of Natsuki Subaru-shaped ice soldiers aiding Emilia before Aldebaran's eyes, just what sort of desire could it possibly be the manifestation of?

It made his stomach churn. That was not in the figurative sense, but rather, with the unmistakable, true meaning.

As those negative emotions boiled within him, Aldebaran linked together the next attack.

That was—

Aldebaran: "—Sorry for rehashing the same punchline, but it's the return of my trump card."

Upon speaking those words, in the air above Aldebaran, Emilia, and the ice soldiers—filling the breadth of the Agzadd Canyon to its fullest, an enormous, mighty boulder began to hurtle straight down.

An inescapable crushing force by a tremendous mass—it was the second coming of the trap he had set back in the Royal Capital.

5

What had been desired—nay, what had been required, was but a singular victory in his life.

It would be no exaggeration to say Aldebaran's life existed solely for the sake of that victory.

Since the very moment of his creation, every gift bestowed upon Aldebaran, every lesson poured into his vessel, every blessing graced upon him: all had been ordained for the sake of guiding him toward that victory, to ensure that he would rise, claim it for his own, and stand exalted in triumph.

The weight and significance of it all were things Aldebaran had fully understood—or, so he had thought.

However, when the hour came for his conviction to be tested, that tempered resolve, those carefully wrought plans, his very soul, refined to perfection as it ought to have been; all of it was rendered meaningless.

Witch: "—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created."

Those words, bestowed upon him by the Witch, had been the benchmark of Aldebaran's life.

So long as he heeded those words, no obstacle placed before him could ever hope to halt his advance. And so, the thought that he might one day lose faith in the Witch—he would never utter it aloud, nor ever wish her to hear it, but that notion had always seemed utterly impossible to him.

Thus, in accordance with the Witch's words, he had convinced himself that he would never be defeated by anyone.

—The day that faith was shattered, in a sense, was the day Aldebaran had truly died.

"Death"; that was something he had experienced so many times that even keeping a count seemed a fool's errand.

And though he had always considered keeping count to be a fool's errand, he did so anyway, simply because he had been told to. Yet even as he kept track of the actual number, the absurdity of it all never faded in the slightest.

Even so, he believed that on that day, at that moment, he had tasted Death in its truest form.

Having gone so far as to build up Aldebaran for the sake of her dearest wish, the Witch had prepared for him the sole battle in his lifetime that he absolutely could not afford to lose.

And yet—

Witch: "—At the juncture where you could not afford to lose, you were defeated."

A familiar plain of lush, verdant grass, and the form of the Witch, sat by the white table of the tea party, enjoying the aroma of tea; upon seeing her, Aldebaran was immediately stricken with despair, crushed by the depth of his own sin.

Employing only black and white, the highest pinnacle of beauty that could be achieved was the Witch. And now, the fact that there existed not a single wound upon that odiously attractive figure of hers, was proof that this was indeed a world of dreams.

After all, when Aldebaran had failed to win the battle he had needed to win no matter what, the Witch had sacrificed all four of her limbs to shield him, leaving her a wretched figure able to do nothing but await death.

As he had stared at her in shock, Aldebaran had found himself vaguely thinking the painfully obvious: even the Witch had red blood coursing through her veins.

The heat, the odor, the feel; that blood could not have possibly been a lie.

In that case, this world, where all of that had been lost, where make-believe had painted over the reality that should have been, was naught more than a blatant bundle of lies.

Witch: ""Make-believe"; I am rather unfond of that expression. While, strictly speaking, it is not the same word, I cannot help but be reminded of an unpleasant individual."[15]

Whether that was the Witch's own way of joking, or if she had just wished to express how she felt regardless of whether it was an appropriate time to say it, Aldebaran had been unable to grasp the Witch's true feelings, even at the very end.

Only, he was convinced she hated him. Or perhaps in despair, he thought she might have completely forsaken him.

However—

Witch: "Your arm, it seems unlikely that there is any way for you to get it back."

The Witch's gaze fell upon Aldebaran's left arm, taken by shadow from the shoulder down.

There was no pain. That only served as more proof that this place was the Witch's Castle of Dreams—were he to return to reality, his brain would likely be scorched by unimaginable pain. And, that was something that could no longer be overturned by means of Death, a true injury that would never fade.

Witch: "Robbed of your arm, you lost the battle you could not afford to lose. It appears as though my plan has ended in failure. I can just picture my friends saying all sorts of things. —Ultimately, it shall be left up to those who seek to carry on Flugel's will. How frustrating."

The thought that his defeat would take everything from the Witch, was unbearably painful.

Without seeking anyone else's understanding, she had parted ways with her fellow Witches and the companions who had journeyed alongside her, all so she could attempt to fulfill her wish; but, Aldebaran had ruined all of that.

The cruelest part of it all was that, even though he understood that much, the passion and determination he had carried before his defeat would not return to Aldebaran's hollow soul.

Having lost a battle he could not afford to lose, Aldebaran's heart had been shattered.

The sole battle in his lifetime where defeat was not permitted, had ground Aldebaran's heart to tiny little pieces.

That was, by witnessing the inevitable death of the person closest to him in this world, the Witch, Aldebaran would likely suffer a wound beyond recovery in the truest sense.

Witch: "—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created."

Hence, Aldebaran did not understand the meaning of those words, spoken to him once more.

Witch: "Now that it has come to this, we need not concern ourselves with appearances any longer. Let us change the victory conditions. We shall leave them to deal with her… meanwhile, we shall focus on preventing secondary damages."

The Witch was both wise and selfish.

Disregarding Aldebaran, who was still left at a loss, his mind unable to think straight due to his immense feelings of guilt, she came to a conclusion all on her own, leaving no room for objection as she forced the conversation along.

The altered conditions for victory, the newly presented objective of preventing secondary damages—regardless, he did not even believe that was something he could accomplish. After all, Aldebaran had already failed.

He had failed, and yet—

Witch: "—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created."

Aldebaran could not fathom what had caused the Witch to say that.

Without saying much to Aldebaran, still stunned as he stood fixed in place, the Witch rose and began slowly walking towards him, before coming to stand face to face with him.

The Witch's face, the one he had gazed upon more than any other in his lifetime—on it, there emerged an expression he had never before witnessed.

Witch: "—Your stars were bad."

It was not Aldebaran's fault; he could tell that was the meaning underpinning those words.

Before he could come to terms with the emotions welling up inside of him, the Castle of Dreams abruptly came to an end.

Akin to tearing up the very paper stage of kamishibai, it was a terribly violent manner of conclusion; that which awaited him on the other side was a grim reality. That instant, his brain was dominated by pain and feelings of loss, fresh blood and the din in the air undermining his comprehension. Heaven and earth had been stained with a black so somber that there no longer existed any semblance of time, and Aldebaran's wails were drowned out by the screeches of the world crumbling, unable to even reach his own ears.

Merely, in a world where just about everything had fallen apart, despite being in the midst of a cacophony so loud he could not even hear his own voice, he somehow managed to properly hear that blurred, frail, gasping sound.

A voice he wished not to let slip, the Witch's final incantation—

Witch: "—Ol Shamak."

V!c.1120

× × ×

The next time Aldebaran's consciousness returned, was after everything had ended—or rather, when that which had ended began anew, and that new beginning came to a new end, before beginning and ending all over again. It seemed like after that had repeated many times, over, and over, and over again, the world had been left without any traces of the Witch.

Whether it was due to a difference in preconditions, or simply because it had been performed by the tremendous power of the Witch, the shock he felt at how the spell's efficacy differed from when he himself had wielded it lasted for only a moment—

???: "—Hey you, where'd you come from? Who are you?"

That question, was delivered by the voice of a person completely unknown to him.

The man, dressed in attire that was every bit as shabby as Aldebaran's disheveled appearance, stared at Aldebaran with trepidation and caution tinging his eyes.

The words, he could understand. His experience with human interaction was scarce, but in a sense, that was not a problem either.

What mattered was figuring out where he was, and when.

???: "Ginunhive… it's the Gladiator Island. Witch? That's the thing from like hundreds of years ago, right?"

The man seemed puzzled, as if he had been asked something strange, and receiving his words, Aldebaran let out an exhale. Gazing over that, the man's expression shifted from puzzled to startled.

After all, as his exhale morphed into sobbing, Aldebaran crumbled to the ground, a flood of tears streaming down his face.

Witch: “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.”

The words of the Witch whom he had left hundreds of years behind in the past, still clung to his soul, refusing to let go.

For the sin of having turned that person into a liar, Aldebaran had wished to die.

But die he could not.

Chapter 53: Aldebaran II

1

Aldebaran: “—Sorry for rehashing the same punchline, but it’s the return of my trump card.”

Upon declaring so, a boulder of immense mass came hurtling down from straight above.

His plan resigned to be naught more than an unoriginal rehash, Aldebaran watched as Emilia’s expression shifted mid-flight, evading the colossal stone arms reaching out toward her from the cliffsides.

Emilia: “…”

First widening her eyes at the sight of the massive boulder, then as the regret of having completely allowed Aldebaran to escape at the Royal Capital emerged on her cheeks and her canthi, she firmly held her eyes shut to ensure her heart would not be claimed by the same sense of defeat; after a momentary feeling of weakness spent wondering “Can I really do it…”, the giant boulder was reflected in her reopened sights, and she fired herself up as if to say “I have no choice but to do it!”, facing forward with even more strength in her gaze than there had been before that moment of doubt. —These many shifts in her expression had transpired over the course of a single second, so it was incredible just how quickly she had regained her composure.

Aldebaran: “But, motivation alone ain’t gonna cut it.”

Scraping and chipping away at the craggy cliffs of the canyon, the giant boulder plummeted.

The first maneuver Emilia attempted with her renewed motivation, was to conjure a massive ice cap in the trajectory of the falling boulder in order to catch its weight. —However, Aldebaran countered by firing a stone cannonball with his magic, blasting through the canyon wall to nullify her gambit.

With the jagged walls demolished, the ice cap could no longer fit perfectly across the canyon's breadth, merely becoming another falling obstacle alongside the massive boulder.

Emilia: "In that case—!"

As soon as she saw that the ice cap had failed to catch the boulder, Emilia immediately moved to the next countermeasure.

Once again carrying wings of ice upon her back after they had been purged, she enacted the rebirth of an angel while bending her long legs. Then, positioning the soles of her feet on top of the legs of the ice soldiers kicking up from directly below—receiving leg strength that the original Natsuki Subaru could never have mustered, she soared through the air.

Emilia: "…"

Caught off guard by Emilia's ferocious acceleration, the hundreds of arms emerging from the cliffs all failed to catch her, allowing the angel to escape—no, allowing her to charge Aldebaran.

While Aldebaran had been diverting his focus to intercepting her, his momentum had fallen, allowing for Emilia's rush forward to rapidly close the distance.

Yae had been left behind to buy him time, but he had completely forfeited the advantage she had created for him, so he could hear her bitter voice saying "Trying to support you truly is pointless, Al-sama~."

Aldebaran: "Though, that's only if I get caught here!"

Retorting to the imaginary words of Yae, Aldebaran met Emilia's charge with a barrage of stone bullets. But, Emilia sublimely twisted her body through air to avoid the next rehash following the falling boulder.

Aldebaran: "Seriously?!"

The fact that she had accomplished that with artificial wings that by no means should have allowed such freedom of movement, left Aldebaran aghast.

Naturally, the angel wings made of ice could not be flapped. The true origin of Emilia's three-dimensional maneuver just now, were smaller ice wings that had been added on below the main ice wings —by overlapping several wings of ice, she had yielded a change in how they sliced the wind, providing functionality that allowed her to apply edge control by tilting her body.

Even that aerodynamic solution was undoubtedly accomplished by her natural senses.

Emilia: "I'll catch up—!"

Even if she veered side-to-side in order to evade, Emilia kept her loss of speed to a minimum.

As she exclaimed, the distance between the two of them vanished. At that speed, Emilia would likely make it out of the falling boulder's blast radius in time. With the blow he had intended as a trump card so easily sidestepped, Aldebaran's situation was truly dire—or, that was what should have been the mutual perception of the two parties involved.

Emilia: "—Hk."

Emilia's large, amethyst eyes opened wide, painted in a color of shock.

From her point of view, Aldebaran had not taken any exceptional action. While he still continued firing a volley of stones that failed to hit her, neither had he deployed any new magic, nor had he performed any extreme maneuvers to evade her.

The same went for his response to Emilia's flight, momentum bolstered by borrowing the strength of the ice soldiers; at this rate, she would catch up to him, and he would no longer be able to avoid her freezing fingertips.

That was to say, Emilia had met her victory conditions in this situation. —Nevertheless, there was no delight or satisfaction to be found in Emilia's eyes.

That was because—

Aldebaran: "—Didn't I tell you? Same punchline."

A colossal boulder plummeting down; in exchange for the prevention of the damage it would bring about, Aldebaran had been allowed to escape his battle against Emilia in the Royal Capital.

Hence, even if it was uninspired, he carried out a plan that had already proved successful once. However, this time, there were no innocent people here who could get caught up in this. —Indeed, no innocent people.

Emilia: "—AL!!"

As she shouted, Emilia recklessly reached her hand out toward Aldebaran. —Toward the sole being other than Emilia who would be caught up in the wrath of the falling stone.

2

???: "—That settles it! You've done well to survive Sparka! From this point forward, you can count yourself among the gladiators of this Gladiator Island! Welcome him aboard, you damn good-for-nothings!"

The raucous welcome and cheering were indistinguishable from the sound of angry jeers.

Following that reception, Aldebaran fell to his knees and leaned against the massive corpse as coarse and vulgar cheers engulfed the arena.

He was languidly resting against the remains of a Witchbeast, the Guiltilaw that had died from the sword deeply piercing its thick neck. Having lost its right foreleg along with both of its rear legs, the Guiltilaw had died with an expression that conveyed bewilderment and confusion more so than it did agony.

Beholding that pitiful, deathly visage, Aldebaran was taken by a deep sorrow as his shoulders heaved with ragged breaths. —Though, he was immediately disgusted with himself for how terribly deceitful that sympathy was.

???: “You managed to survive, huh? Color me surprised.”

Greeting the tattered Aldebaran, was a man of shabby appearance—he was a gladiator of the Gladiator Island, the very one who had found Aldebaran when he had initially woken up.

The man’s expression was complex, likely because he found it utterly incomprehensible that Aldebaran had managed to survive the rite of passage for newcomers—Sparka. From his perspective, having been ordered to tend to Aldebaran’s needs as the unlucky person who had first discovered him, he might have felt that Aldebaran dying in this Sparka would have prevented those troubles from dragging on for too long.

Regardless, Aldebaran’s survival had been a shock to the man, but he was not the only one who had been surprised.

Aldebaran, too, could not hide his astonishment at his own survival.

—Having suffered defeat in a battle he could not afford to lose, Aldebaran had been left deserted in these foreign surroundings.

An unknown environment, unfamiliar people, and rules lacking sufficient explanation; to Aldebaran, this was certainly an uncivilized land, as if he had been cast into a brand new world.

The only thing of which he could be certain was that he had likely lost all value in his own existence, and that he had probably even lost the only one who would have mourned his loss in worth.

That was why—

Gladiator: “Even tho’ you said you wanted to die, I guess that was all talk.”

Equal parts sarcasm and spite, the man’s words carved deeply into Aldebaran’s heart.

With the defeat of his first battle, upon realizing that he had survived the end that surely ought to have awaited him, Aldebaran was consumed by unceasing feelings of loss and remorse, yearning for death from the depths of his heart. That was why Sparka, the trial by which newcomers were tested on the Gladiator Island, seemed all too convenient for Aldebaran at the time.

The blunt, offhand explanation had been mercilessly unkind, but in short, they were being forced to put their lives on the line through trial by combat, where for any who failed to prove themselves as gladiators, death alone would await.

For Aldebaran, who could not help but wish to die, it was all far too convenient.

In fact, when Aldebaran was taken to the arena along with four other newcomers in the same circumstances, and thereupon forced to face off against a Guiltilaw, he had fully intended on being killed without offering up any resistance.

But, despite all that, Aldebaran had survived.

The other men fought back, ran away, or pleaded for their lives, only to be slaughtered all the same, leaving Aldebaran as the last man standing. The Witchbeast's claws tore into him, shattering his ribs as it trampled him underfoot, and he was supposed to have met his death there, blood frothing at the mouth.

And yet—

???: "—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created."

In the instant those words had flashed through his mind, Aldebaran had expanded his Territory.

Compared to the opponent he had challenged hundreds of millions of times, yet still could not overcome, this Sparka, which had only managed to kill him three-hundred and four times, was no agony to Aldebaran whatsoever.

After all, the true agony only came after, in the self-questioning that haunted him for having survived.

—Why? What for? For what reason… had he not died?

Gladiator: “Hm? You wanna hear about the outside? Even if you ask me, it’s been a long time since I arrived here…”

Recognized as a gladiator, Aldebaran had gained the right to live on this island.

Within the island cut off from the outside world, he had learned that this was a part of the Vollachian Empire, that the gladiators imprisoned here were forced to fight in deathmatches for spectacle, and that public order on the island had collapsed. But, there was still much more he wished to know.

As a result, the one subjected to Aldebaran’s persistent questioning, was the gladiator responsible for taking care of him.

Gladiator: “If you say it’s not about anything recent, but history that you wanna learn about… I don’t know all too much about it either, yeah? Well, if it’s about a Witch… I at least know about the Witch of Envy, but…”

When he had asked just to be sure, he was first surprised that the gladiator had even known about a Witch. And recited as if it were too terrifying to speak aloud, the Witch’s legend as it was known today—it delivered unto him an even greater shock, for the tale had come to refer to only one: the Witch of Envy.

The Witch of Envy, who, threatening to plunge the world into ruin, had been sealed away at the hands of the Three Heroes.

This world possessed no legends of any other Witch, and records pertaining to the Witches of Sin were nowhere to be found. Moreover, hearing that it had been nearly four-hundred years since those events had transpired, Aldebaran fell into despair.

Four-hundred years; that long, long passage of time had erased any trace of the Witches of Sin from this world, but to think that it would go so far as to even forget the existence of the Witch, the very Witch who had attempted to fulfill her promise even if it meant giving up everything.

But, what was even more cruel—

Gladiator: "—The Witch of Greed? The hell's that? Some kinda delusion of yours?"

Aldebaran had no words with which to respond to the man's suspicions.

There was no way it was a delusion. The days Aldebaran had spent alongside the Witch were certainly present within him; her teachings, the touch of her fingertips, the words she had spoken to him, he remembered all of it.

In this world, against the Witch who concealed dreadful power, there had certainly been another Witch who had attempted to fight back. —Aldebaran was her student, and he was the Witch's trump card.

Gladiator: "Shit! The fuck's wrong with you?! Even tho' all I did was answer everything you asked me, you start swinging at me outta the blue!"

So spat the man who had been struck by Aldebaran, the latter enraged upon being denied the existence of the Witch.

Having been tossed into this environment—no, into this brand new world, that was how his relationship ended with the benefactor who had first shown him kindness. With the other gladiators as well, things broke down in a similar fashion, isolating Aldebaran from his fellows.

—A deviant enthralled by the Witch; many times he had heard such rumors about himself. It seemed that his benefactor had taken the initiative to spread them around, but in a sense, it was a valid assessment. He had no intention of correcting it.

However, it aggravated him to be likened to some incomprehensible group known as the Witch Cult.

Upon asking, it seemed like they were a group who heralded the revival of the Witch, going around and committing acts of terrorism all over. Once more, he flew into a rage, demanding them to not lump him in with such individuals, but this only caused his reputation to be tarnished even further.

Gladiator: "…A Witch-crazed nut like you… you'll never die a decent death."

During the deathmatch arranged at the discretion of the then-Governor of the Gladiator Island, those were the dying words of the first benefactor to show him kindness, slain by the barbarian sword in Aldebaran's hand.

Wiping the blood of his benefactor off of him, Aldebaran took a moment to ponder those final words of spite, "you'll never die a decent death", before nodding deeply in agreement that there was no doubt about those words.

With his Territory going strong, Aldebaran had continued to survive his deathmatches on the Gladiator Island.

Those who had called Aldebaran a Witch-crazed nut were all eventually pitted against him in deathmatches, and without fail, they all fell before his barbarian sword.

He did not care about enacting revenge. Nor did he have any desire to clear the Witch's dishonor. To begin with, rather than being dishonored, the fate that had befallen the Witches was that of having their very existence erased.

Hence, Aldebaran did not seek a reason for his continued survival from the Witch. —Only, he wished to learn why he had been allowed to live.

In order to ascertain that reason, he could not afford to die.

Surviving the initial Sparka, and continuing to survive the deathmatches thereafter, it was all for that purpose.

And so, using his Territory, while suffering hundreds of deaths each time he crossed blades with an opponent, he trampled the lives of all sorts of gladiators underfoot, and lived. He lived. And he kept on living.

And then—

Governor: "—You've done well to survive. I take my hat off to the devilish luck that allowed you to best even one so far above yourself."

Indeed, upon witnessing the triumph of Aldebaran, who had grasped even the most infinitesimal chance of victory in order to slay an opponent who had utterly outclassed him, the Governor voiced words of praise that were not quite discernible as either astonishment or admiration.

Casting aside his broken barbarian sword, Aldebaran turned his back to the arena, scarce on cheer as it was.

—From the moment of his awakening, his first decade on the Gladiator Island went by in a flash.

3

???: "—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created."

Those ten years were long, relentlessly scraping away at Aldebaran's humanity.

The face, voice, and warmth that he ought to have vividly recalled whenever he closed his eyes were instead being painted over by the deathly visages, death throes, and cold blood of those he had killed with his own hands.

???: "—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created."

That was correct. Those words were correct. Certainly, nobody could kill Aldebaran.

Over his past ten years on the Gladiator Island, he had been summoned to Sparka on many occasions, faced countless brushes with death in the arena matches, and had come to kill many of the experts and inhuman beings who utterly outmatched him.

In response to Aldebaran's repeated upsets, it was not merely once or twice that deathmatches were arranged to try to kill him, and since there was always a promising gladiator killed on those occasions, Aldebaran had begun to acquire somewhat of an untouchable status.

???: “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.”

After a decade, the faces on the Gladiator Island were completely different than when he had first arrived.

Aldebaran had long since become one of its oldest members, and there no longer remained a single person aware of the rumors that he was a deviant enthralled by the Witch. Ever since Aldebaran had learned of the taboo regarding the subject of the Witch, and the fact that most people did not know anything beyond the surface of the legend, he had completely stopped bringing the topic up.

However, that was not a change brought about by things such as disappointment or resignation from not getting any of the answers he desired; rather, it was something far more serious.

???: “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.”

For ten years, forced to fight to the death while stranded on the Gladiator Island, in that place where transactions of life and death were repeated ad nauseum, what had consumed Aldebaran was a sense of immense despair.

Had the Witch truly existed? It was a despair that called her very existence into question.

???: “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.”

If he closed his eyes, he could certainly hear that voice. He remembered it being spoken to him.

But, even so, was that truly something that had happened?

???: “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.”

The Witch’s face, he could no longer recall.

The Witch’s voice, he could no longer recall.

The Witch's warmth, he could no longer recall.

For ten years, his recollections wore thin, like a videotape he would watch back whenever he had a moment to spare. Even if he tried to splice the torn tape back together, playback remained impossible, with even the tape itself eventually turning to dust.

When the memories themselves scattered away in such a manner, and the dust completely fell through the gaps between his fingers, Aldebaran was no longer able to tell.

—Had the Witch truly existed?

—Were Aldebaran's memories events that had actually happened?

???: "—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created."

At times, he would feel an overwhelming urge to destroy his own existence.

Whenever that happened, Aldebaran would enter a deathmatch whilst deliberately undoing his Territory, and by allowing himself to be thoroughly beaten up with his life truly at stake, he would attempt to gaze into the abyss of death. —No, not only did he gaze, he would even think about just letting himself fall in.

However, only on such occasions, the Territory would save Aldebaran by taking on an unexpected form.

???: "—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created."

As if to validate the words of the Witch who possibly did not exist, there were several times when an opponent on the verge of killing Aldebaran abruptly succumbed to mental collapse right before his eyes.

Each time an opponent's eyes went white, having lost both sanity and fighting spirit alike, Aldebaran would feel as if there were some invisible force keeping him alive, and overcome with frustration, he would lop off the opponent's head.

Even after a decade, Aldebaran still did not understand the purpose for which he had been kept alive.

On the contrary, he was not even sure if there really was anything that had tried to keep him alive.

???: “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.”

Only, he was terrified.

That everything that had shaped him was a lie, that the Witch’s efforts and words had never truly existed, that Aldebaran truly was just a lunatic enthralled by the Witch; with such self-doubt gnawing at his heart, he endured many years of sleepless nights.

???: “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.”

Those words once served as Aldebaran’s lifeline, the very foundation upon which his being had been shaped, but now, they were terrifying beyond recognition.

That this was all just a product of his delusions, that the duty Aldebaran had carried, the encounters and partings he ought to have had, might never have existed at all; such doubts only continued to haunt him.

???: “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.”

An unending spiral of self-questioning.

A sensation as if he were mired in a swamp of unanswerable, bottomless despair, sunk up to his chest and unable to move.

And so, that time in which only the manner of his death remained unsettled seemed as though it would stretch on forever. —However, on a certain day, Aldebaran’s long days of stagnation quite suddenly arrived at a turning point.

That turning point being—

???: “—Hear me, rabble scattered across Gladiator Island!”

—Booming through the speaking tubes across the island was the voice of a young girl, tinged with heat as fierce as flame.

4

—The simultaneous revolt of the gladiators, and the plot to assassinate the new Emperor by using that revolt as a diversion.

That seemed to have been the reality of the turning point that had befallen Aldebaran.

Be that as it may, there was no way all the details would have been granted to a mere gladiator of the Gladiator Island, nor did Aldebaran even want to know any further details. For the time being, since there had been no change in the management of the island, he simply assumed that the administration had not been overthrown either.

At the very least, a change of Emperor at this point in time was not something Aldebaran had known about.

But if there was just one thing during this incident that had caused Aldebaran to truly feel a profound transformation within himself, it was obvious—he had rescued a silver-haired girl who had fallen into dire straits.

Of course, that incident had nothing to do with Aldebaran’s original objective.

The silver-haired girl was a young dogperson whom he had happened across, and she had no connection whatsoever to the silver-haired individual with whom Aldebaran had been involved. However, the fact that he had saved that girl, and the voice of the flame-like girl amidst the revolt that had demonstrated an attitude of selfishly following one’s own path, had allowed Aldebaran to make up his mind.

—He would venture beyond this closed off world, in order to verify the existence of the Witch.

???: “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.”

After being killed over and over again by the aquatic Witchbeasts let loose in the lake, Aldebaran finally escaped the island which had held him captive for over ten years, and disembarked on a land that was not surrounded by water. —Strictly speaking, the world as a whole was encircled by the Great Waterfall, so it could be said that there was actually no land that was not surrounded by water; the fact that he could come up with a quip like that showed that he was still able to at least fake some cheer.

???: "—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created."

To Aldebaran, those words were a malediction, a consolation, a binding, and a forgiveness.

In order to discern the color, the heat, the uncertain certainty of that ambiguous and directionless wellspring of such overwhelming emotion, Aldebaran had decided to pursue the traces of the Witch.

There was not much time to spare. During the decade he had spent on the closed off island, the world Aldebaran walked had unexpectedly been drawing closer to the world Aldebaran remembered.

All that remained, was to ascertain whether the things within Aldebaran were genuine or not. And so, what was required to ascertain that, was evidence of the Witch—

???: "—For what reason, does the Gospel hold no account of your existence?"

Speaking those words was a Sin Archbishop of the Witch Cult who tilted his head far more than was necessary; although Aldebaran had a rough idea as to the reason why, he fiddled with the metal fixtures of his helmet and gave an evasive comment.

The jet-black steel helmet he had begun to wear in those days was a parting gift he had taken with him from the Gladiator Island, and he found that its sturdiness and full-face cover often came in handy.

It seemed like this profusely loud and animated Sin Archbishop did not take kindly to the fact that there was not a single account of such a conspicuous person in his oh-so-precious Gospel.

Sin Archbishop: "—You are truly Slothful, aren't you?"

In all honesty, the battle against this Sin Archbishop was among the most challenging encounters of Aldebaran's life.

To begin with, winning without dying a single time was something he lacked experience in, but even so, this was a formidable enemy who made it difficult to seize any chance of victory. In the end, while he might have satisfied the conditions for victory, he did not win.

Even when compared to the Witches of Sin—to the women who, just like the Witch, potentially did not exist, his viciousness seemed to stack up favorably.

Anyhow—

???: "—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created."

With his honor preserved by those words, and having secured the information he desired, Aldebaran had pondered. —In order to ascertain the existence of the Witch, the ones most likely to possess the information he sought were the members of the heretical organization he had often heard about even on the Gladiator Island, the Witch Cult.

They seemed to be a group who hid themselves away in places completely unknown, but that was only if one was attempting to track them down, as luring them out was not particularly difficult. —Certainly, if rumors were to be spread about the Witch of Envy so worshipped by the Witch Cult, there were some who would come rushing to the scene.

But then again, if one could not handle whatever came rushing their way, they would simply suffer through the world's most foolish way to die, being mercilessly robbed of their life.

Sin Archbishop: "You must cease at ONCE! That is BLASPHEMY! Satella! Any other than Satella! To speak of any Witch other than the Witch of Envy! It is the height of SACRILEGE! As the one who graces me with the favor of her love, she is the only one worthy of once more descending upon this world, HER ALONE!!"

He knew not just how much credence he could give to the utterances of the Sin Archbishop whose aberrant demeanor and conduct bereft of sanity had accumulated to an extremely vast amount.

But, even if that madman's ramblings held no meaning to anybody else, they held meaning to Aldebaran.

???: "—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created."

Tenaciously retrying his encounter with the Sin Archbishop, he would draw out the words, engage in the necessary back and forth, and give up his life each time he triggered a fit of rage, then back to the beginning—by single-mindedly accreting that process, Aldebaran obtained the information he desired from the Sin Archbishop.

Then, passing right by the Sin Archbishop who had come rushing to the scene, he had made it so that their encounter had never happened.

Sin Archbishop: "Ahh! Ahhhh! AHHHHHH! SLOTH SLOTH SLOTH SLOTH SLOOOOOOOOOTH—!!"

As Aldebaran evaded the Witch Cult's encirclement and absconded, he pictured the Sin Archbishop letting out a bloodcurdling shriek after failing to catch him, but that no longer mattered to him.

At this moment, there existed but one desire within Aldebaran—the confirmation of the Witch's existence.

Of how the lives of the Witches of Sin had been extinguished, he was aware.

The Witch of Wrath had perished in madness after being caught in a trap, the Witch of Lust had been immolated in a great fire, the Witch of Gluttony had withered to death in the sea of sand, the Witch of Pride had drowned in a great flood, and the Witch of Sloth had fallen into the Great Waterfall as she massacred the Dragon.

Then, the Witch of Envy had been sealed away at the edge of the world, and the final Witch—

???: “—I see. The ability to enter this place from outside the tomb is quite the structural flaw indeed. Just like the mechanisms of the Sanctuary, the finishing touches are rather lacking. Though, I suppose some aspects of that were unavoidable.”

A plain of lush, verdant grass beneath an unrealistic blue sky, stretching out as far as the eye could see. As a cool breeze blew across, a white table and parasol were placed atop a small hill.

Unmistakably, that was the scene of the memories which had been on the verge of fading from within Aldebaran.

Present right at the heart of it all, was a beautiful being who could be described with just the colors of white and black—

???: “—Why, must love fade?”

After many twists and turns, he had finally made his homecoming to the Castle of Dreams.

Doubting his own sanity, Aldebaran had almost believed that it might have even been an illusion.

A reunion which spanned over a decade for the student, and across four centuries for the other party; with her existence verified, the Witch—nay, the Witch of Greed, wearing a smile bereft of blood, voiced that celebratory remark.

5

Aldebaran: “…”

Aldebaran had lived life with one arm longer than he ever had with two.

Hence, he hardly ever felt much of a handicap for only having his right arm, but regardless, he still found it to be an inconvenience on extremely rare occasions.

For instance, the times when he had no choice but to carry an unconscious person.

Aldebaran: “Please bear with the ruggedness.”

Carried in Aldebaran’s arm as he uttered so—held together with the magic stone-forged prosthesis, was the limp, unconscious body of Emilia.

Emilia’s aerial chase of Aldebaran that had commenced in the vast canyon had come to a conclusion with Emilia collapsing due to Aldebaran’s use of foul play.

It was nothing substantial. The trump card was the same one that he had played in order to escape Emilia’s clutches back in the Royal Capital.

Emilia, kindhearted as she was, could not allow anybody to be lost in the midst of battle. —She too was one who, with the passing of Priscilla during the Empire’s Great Disaster, had sustained a deep wound to her heart.

Therefore, in order to protect Aldebaran, who had remained in the trajectory on course to receive a direct hit from the falling boulder, she did not hesitate to throw herself in harm’s way.

Aldebaran: “Even though there wasn’t any other way to reliably land an attack on her, it’s a scummy strategy even for me.”

Of course, that was Aldebaran’s conclusion after having attempted various other stratagems in trial and error.

He had tried adjusting the positioning of the boulder’s fall, smashing the boulder to create a rock avalanche, setting its trajectory with a barrage of stone projectiles, and incorporating all sorts of different magic, but outside the stratagem of using himself as a hostage, Emilia always managed to find a flash of inspiration and intuitive judgement for the circumstance, admirably surmounting all of them.

None of the foolish Aldebarans who had enacted those other stratagems had managed to avoid a future of being frozen by

Emilia's fingertips, so it could be said that he had no other means but to rely on such a desperate measure.

Aldebaran: "Though, that doesn't make the guilt go away, nor does it mean I'll be forgiven."

An excuse for no ears save his own, so childish that not even Emilia would forgive it.

Shielding Aldebaran, Emilia defenselessly brushed the mass of the huge crag, and as the powerful impact ran through her entire body, even she would let go of her consciousness. From what he could tell from appearances, it did not seem like she had sustained any lasting injuries, just a strong concussion at worst. —To ensure that was the case, many careful adjustments had been made.

Aldebaran: "Seems like I've been put on quite the detour… Waiting on Yae wouldn't exactly be the smartest move, now would it?"

Now that the fall from high-altitude and chase sequence with Emilia had ended, he finally had enough leeway to ascertain his surroundings. What he had gleaned by doing so, was that this place was likely the Agzadd Canyon, the largest canyon in the entire world, and the fact that he had been placed at a significantly different elevation from his destination of the Grand Mogolade Geyser.

They were already past the national border with the Kingdom of Lugunica, and were well into the Kararagi City-States, but it would take a considerable amount of time to climb back up the thousands of meters he had fallen so that he could return to his original route.

Besides—

Aldebaran: "Setting Alter aside, is it even possible to reconvene with Roy and the old man…?"

Amongst the henchmen he had pulled ahead from, he had no anxiety regarding "Aldebaran's" strength, but he was greatly concerned about the abilities and humanity of Roy Alphard and Heinkel. Of course, Roy's actions were restricted by the curse mark, so he would not break the rules if he valued his own life.

Aldebaran: “Either way, the best I can do is expect everyone to gather at the meeting spot.”

The maximum priority for Aldebaran was reaching the Grand Mogolade Geyser, and accomplishing his objective.

He would need to borrow “Aldebaran’s” strength for that objective, but in the worst case, it was not as though he had no means by which to do something about it even without “Aldebaran”. In addition, the power of Roy’s Authority of Gluttony was indispensable to dealing with the aftermath of the calamity he had employed for the sake of this plan.

Hence, he would need to find a way to reconvene after he fulfilled his objective, and somehow get them to follow his instructions.

Aldebaran: “Trying to avert secondary damages only to cause tertiary and quaternary damages, some help I am.”

Spilling those words, Aldebaran inclined the wings of stone on his back, and while maintaining his speed he slowly descended towards the bottom of the canyon, and by the bank of the great river running through, he somehow managed to make a smooth landing.
—That was a lie. He had crashed and burned six times while carrying Emilia, and on the seventh attempt he finally succeeded in landing.

Aldebaran: “It’d be a laughing matter if I became unable to get back on my feet here.”

One time, he had been incapacitated not only in his legs, but from the waist down, which brought him dangerously close to total paralysis and made him incapable of gulping down his poison. He had managed to roll himself into the river and drown to death, but he did not wish to repeat the same failure.

In any case—

Aldebaran: “I’m sorry, Emilia… lil’ miss.”

To ensure she would not drown if the water in the great river rose for some reason, Aldebaran laid Emilia down not on the ground, but in a cavity of the cliff face that was a bit higher up.

And in his final comment before leaving her there, he slightly hesitated on how to call her. Hesitating, he ultimately settled on referring to her as he usually did, as Aldebaran. —Now that their relationship had lost its rightful form, he did not have the courage to address her in any way that pertained to the true relationship between the two of them.

Aldebaran: "—Hk."

Right after cursing his cowardly self, Aldebaran was struck by a dizzying headache, clenching his teeth.

Having overcome a difficult situation, the moment he let his mind relax, the debts he had accumulated began threatening to erupt. Doing his best to hold that back, he gave himself ten seconds to take deep breaths before gulping down his poison—repeating that over and over, he stabilized his mind.

Albeit, even if he could give his heart a breather through this method, it was unable to grant a rest to his body—and in particular, to his brain.

In real time, he had already kept his brain constantly running for nearly a hundred hours.

Along their journey, "Aldebaran" had used its healing magic on him to conceal that reality from his mind, but until his body and mind completely shut down, this overheating would likely not subside.

Be that as it may, he persuaded himself to just hold out for a little bit longer.

???: "—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created."

Aldebaran: "Ahh, that's right, Teacher. —Nobody, can defeat me. That's right. That's precisely right."

When he closed his eyes, those words were resurrected within

Aldebaran's mind.

Using that as support, Aldebaran would—

???: "—Look at that, it is…"

Aldebaran: "…"

???: "It is mine—"

Aldebaran: "…"

???: "Mine—"

Fragmented and indistinct, a voice sounded within him.

To whom it had belonged, when those words had been spoken, and just how deeply they would scorch his soul; since he knew the answers to all of those questions, Aldebaran closed off the ears of his heart.

He would not halt his tracks. So he had decided. His mind was made up.

After all, he could not afford to halt his tracks, so he had decided.

His mind was made up, and so—

6

—The moment was just after Aldebaran, having closed his heart's ears, had at last managed to climb out of the canyon, resuming his hurried march towards the Grand Mogolade Geyser.

Aldebaran: "Wha…"

And thus, what had escaped from Aldebaran's lips, was a husky exhale.

It was only natural that he had let such a voice spill. After all, it was an accident that had flown in from outside his consciousness, an unforeseen event he had dismissed as impossible in the back of his mind. —In Aldebaran's path, around two meters ahead of him, a behemoth of an icicle had been pierced.

Aldebaran: "…"

Swallowing his saliva, Aldebaran looked back down at the bottom of the canyon—he understood that Emilia, the one left down there, had been the one to plunge this extremity of ice here.

But, the damage she had taken was severe. It would still be a few hours before Emilia regained consciousness, so in other words, this was a hail mary she had delivered whilst unconscious.

Aldebaran: "That's some outrageous persistence…"

Regardless, considering that, if Aldebaran had climbed up only five seconds faster, he would have been crushed under this ice pillar just now, it could be said that he had evaded tragedy in two senses.

Of course, even if he suffered a direct hit, Aldebaran would redo it with his Authority, and draw out the result of not getting hit, but for both Emilia's sake, and for Aldebaran's peace of mind, it would be best if she did not have the chance to intervene from here on out.

Even so—

Aldebaran: "In battles, it's something that'll crop up every so often, but it's damn frightening."

Even in the Sparkas of the Gladiator Island, in the midst of life-or-death battles, there were times when an opponent who had sustained a fatal wound would muster all of the life force left within them, unleashing an attack that aimed to bring him down with them. Among Aldebaran's experiences, there was even someone who had tried to kill him after having their head sliced off.

Actions with the resolve to accomplish what they set out to do, such that even if one's consciousness or life were lost, the vestiges of their feelings left behind in their limbs would attempt to carry out their will.

Emilia's hail mary just now, was the form taken by her feelings of wishing to stop Aldebaran no matter what, and so—

Aldebaran: "—Wait."

As he attempted to praise her force of will, Aldebaran held his breath.

Before his eyes, the ice pillar had barely missed Aldebaran to thrust itself into the ground—that was a colossal spear of ice, one that seemed like it might be wielded by a giant from legend. But, for that to have been fired with the objective of killing Aldebaran, was far too much of an exaggeration, no matter how one might see it.

Something this massive, it was just as if—

Aldebaran: "—An anchor."

Indeed, it happened right after he let that mutter slip. —With the ice spear Emilia had fired as a landmark, new assassins were dispatched to Aldebaran as he attempted to push on towards the Grand Mogolade Geyser.

That was—

???: "—Yo, helmet bastard, looks like you got roughed up pretty badly while I wasn't looking."

Aldebaran: "…I could say the same for you, and it also seems like you've wound up with quite the foul-mouth, haven't you, Filóre-chan?"

Having each surmounted their preliminary battlefields, they were fellows who had risen to the next stage.

The Combined Forces headed by Filóre Lugunica—no, by Felt; just like when they had hit him with a flash grenade of Memories, they now stood in his way once more.

Chapter 54:
Warlock VS Witch

1

???: "—Just like you, I am a complete failure of a girl."

Aldebaran would never forget the somber expression upon the Witch's visage as she spoke those words.

And so, he had thought.

Did even the Witch, with a face that seemed to know just about anything and everything concerning this world's providence, with demeanor that seemed to disseminate the roots of knowledge through every nook and cranny of this world, who conducted herself with an air of understanding every aspect of the universe, did she too have moments in which she grieved her own powerlessness?

Witch: "Of course I do. If you would like an example, then your very existence… the very fact that you are currently like this, is proof that I was lacking, after all."

Hearing that, Aldebaran's feelings were complicated.

Within Aldebaran, this Witch was a great existence, and though he was loath to admit it, she was even a tremendous one. Although there were few to whom he could compare her, she was someone who always felt greater than any comparison.

For that Witch to consider herself a complete failure, was of no joy to him whatsoever.

Only, if the Witch had been bereft of such self-acknowledgement, her current relationship with Aldebaran would not exist. If the Witch had been in any position to not deem herself a complete failure—

Witch: “Then, you and I would have simply remained in our rightful places. You are free to daydream about a future that did not unfold in such a manner, but unfortunately, you ended up being dealt the worst fate of all. Though I am sorry to say, it was rather fortuitous for myself.”

That deliberately wicked phrasing seemed to be an equal blend of the Witch’s humor and the Witch’s sincerity. As for which one it actually was, he could not tell.

After all, always boasting of her inability to comprehend the human heart, the Witch’s true feelings were unclear to even Aldebaran, who had been in her company for so long, leaving him with nothing to latch onto.

But, supposing the Witch’s words were correct, it was rather strange.

After all, even though the alignment of the stars was at its absolute worst for Aldebaran in his current circumstances, he did not consider his days with the Witch to be a misfortune.

Though certainly, with her putting him through the experience of being killed a million times under the guise of being a trial, calling him by a name he disliked even after objecting to it in disagreement, there was no doubt that these circumstances were far removed from any ordinary notion of happiness.

Witch: “To think you could find value in living alongside a complete failure of a Witch, you are truly a pitiful child.”

This was a complex muttering, containing both self-deprecation alongside a firm deprecation of the other party.

However, Aldebaran would not fail to hear the gentle timbre that could not be fully concealed therein.

Even if they were meager, even if they were easily lost in the mix, even if they were difficult to understand, earnest emotions did dwell within the Witch. Searching for evidence as a basis to believe that, was a pastime of Aldebaran’s.

In truth, he did not really know for sure. It might have just been a misunderstanding or a misconception.

What mattered was how Aldebaran felt; the Witch's true intentions were her own to keep. —What was the truth for Aldebaran, was for Aldebaran alone.

Witch: "The way you separate those things is remarkably reminiscent. As expected, the thing known as influence is not to be trifled with."

Narrowing her black eyes, fiddling with her white bangs, thus spoke the Witch.

While simultaneously looking past Aldebaran to somebody else, and at herself reflected within Aldebaran's irises, the Witch muttered those words reminiscently.

Influence, it was only natural for such a thing to exist. In birth, and in upbringing.

In Aldebaran, and in the Witch.

Failure, inadequacy, imperfection. —Was that past of hers really so shameful for the Witch?

Was it a curse for him to think that thanks to it having turned out that way, his days with the Witch were able to continue?

If only one thing could be said, it was—

Witch: "—Aldebaran."

A reunion spanning a decade for Aldebaran, and stretching across four centuries for the other party, when the figure of the Witch—nay, of the Witch of Greed, present amidst familiar scenery, was one that contradicted the complete failure she had spoken about back on that day, Aldebaran was overcome with unbearable feelings of loss and despair.

—Fiddling with the metal fixtures of his black helmet, Aldebaran surveyed the situation.

Before his eyes, having used the almost divine colossal anchor of ice as a landmark, the lineup of personnel boldly squared off against Aldebaran.

The group opposing him was one centered around Filóre—no, around Felt, so Aldebaran made no effort to question the meaning of them having assembled here.

Even without needing to ask, he understood. —Roy and Heinkel had been defeated.

He could not imagine that even "Aldebaran" had been defeated, but since the Dragon had not hastened here, it seemed that it was being contained through some means.

On top of defeating the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, even if he may have been restricted with his Authority and with the "no-killing" rule, the fact that they had even devised a countermeasure for the Divine Dragon was quite honestly beyond Aldebaran's imagination.

Just what sort of stratagem had they prepared; he would likely not get an answer even if he asked, but—

× × ×

—Two-hundred and forty-six.

Aldebaran: "—No matter how you slice it, a Witch Factor's just way too far for your resolve, Lil' Miss Petra."

???: "—Hk."

At Aldebaran's straightforward remark, an air of tension ran through Felt's group.

The one whose cheeks had stiffened the most was naturally Petra, given that her name had been called out. From their perspective, Petra's Authority was their trump card, something that was supposed to have been top secret.

In fact, that policy had been firmly shared by all their personnel.

Yet, even the most iron of hearts could not remain unfazed before an unforeseen stab.

In response to Aldebaran's questions, everyone had kept up appearances, but through even the slightest shifts in gaze or attention, he would just keep testing over and over again, relentlessly probing in those directions. As a result, by pursuing the minute differences in their reactions, Aldebaran had arrived at the answer he desired, standing steadfast before him. —Though, he had been considerably shocked when it turned out to be Petra, who had taken in a Witch Factor.

Aldebaran: "In the first place, I predicted that when either Lil' Miss Petra or Lil' Miss Meili read that, they'd be completely incapable of returning to the front lines."

Having sealed Natsuki Subaru and Beatrice away at the Pleiades Watchtower, and after getting Garfiel and Ezzo out of the way, Aldebaran had let Petra and Meili go without any harm.

Not only was that because there had been no need to eliminate them, it was a stratagem in anticipation of what was to follow.

In order to keep Reinhard contained, it had been absolutely necessary to manifest the Witch of Envy.

As the trigger for that, Aldebaran had selected Petra and Meili as the candidates to read Natsuki Subaru's Book of the Dead. In reality, the intrusion of the Witch of Envy had granted Aldebaran a way out from his prolonged fight against Reinhard, successfully eliminating the greatest obstacle to his plan.

However—

Aldebaran: "…Even though reading anyone's book usually has a high chance of causing a mental breakdown, to think she was able to endure reading Natsuki Subaru's Book of the Dead."

A precedent, did exist. —Aldebaran happened to know that all too well, but even so, the reason he did not believe that anyone could accomplish that same feat was due to the absolute nature of Death.

The Book of the Dead belonging to Natsuki Subaru was a special-grade cursed object that, depending on the situation, could be used as a trump card to defeat a higher-level opponent. It was highly unlikely that there were many who could face it without having their hearts shattered.

Aldebaran: "…Or rather, I've got a bad habit of underestimating others."

Regardless of what Aldebaran thought, it was a matter of fact that Petra was now standing here.

Not only had she avoided having her heart shattered by the impact of reading the Book of the Dead, she had even gone so far as to perform the outrageous act of housing a Witch Factor within herself. In all likelihood, the experience of reading the Book of the Dead had led Petra to doing so.

???: "—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created."

Flashing through the back of his mind, those words of the Witch were intended to rouse Aldebaran's spirits, never to fill him with arrogance or cause him to stumble.

If he got that mixed up, Aldebaran would lose the Witch for good this time. —This time for good, he would lose the Witch who, reduced to the Witch of Greed, had lost the heart she had certainly once possessed.

Aldebaran: "—In the end, I guess I just can't leave fate in the hands of others."

Suppressing the sentimentality gripping his heart with deep breaths, Aldebaran faced forward.

The enemy was strong, the obstacles many, he was bereft of allies, with nothing to be proud of—even so, he decided to proceed.

That instant—

???: “—ORAHHHHH!!”

—Ablaze with rage, the stout fist of the golden tiger furiously drove into Aldebaran’s head.

3

—God, Buddah, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never partake in celebrations.

4

—Sixty-one people in total.

After the conclusion against Roy Alphard of Gluttony, that was what composed the Aldebusters—the combined strength of the Emilia Camp and the Felt Camp, reorganized for the final battle against Al.

Right after that fierce battle had ended, when the team was reorganized without taking a moment to breathe, Petra could not help but feel gratitude and admiration that so many still chose to remain. However, that was by no means condemning those who did not accompany the reorganized team.

???: “After all, neither Otto nor Meili can be pushed any further than that.”

Just as the Imaginary Subaru said, for Otto and Meili—both individuals who had served as deciding factors in the clash against Gluttony, withdrawing from the front lines was necessary; it was only natural for Otto, whose Memories had been eaten, and Meili, who had vehemently exhausted herself by overworking her Divine Protection to detain the Black Serpent.

And it was not just them. Roy’s trump card, unveiled in the eleventh hour, using the Authority of Gluttony to force them to relive pains of the past, had abraded some of their minds to the limit. Unlike wounds to the body, abrasions to the heart could not be easily restored even with Petra’s Compression. But then again, Meili had still continued to insist that her recovery time be Compressed so that she could return to the front lines, but—

Petra: “If you took out an advance payment on your life, Subaru wouldn’t be too happy, you know?”

And so, persuaded by Petra, Meili had reluctantly, truly so very reluctantly, accepted her withdrawal from the battlefield.

To be honest, Petra’s maiden circuitry felt a subtle discomfort upon witnessing Meili’s attitude in response to a persuasion that cited Subaru, but since it was the result of her own actions, she did not speak much of it.

Moreover, she also had the duty of keeping an eye out for the Black Serpent that had been summoned by Gluttony, having vanished after combat had concluded. Petra felt apologetic that she was unable to grant her a complete rest.

“Subaru”: “We’ve got no choice but to have the capable ones to fill in where they can. With that said, there’re still some crazy guys who’ll rush into the most high-risk situations even without their memories.”

Petra: “It’s incredible, isn’t it? You can’t help but think that Otto-san’s that way, even without his memories.”

“Subaru”: “I guess it’s just his innate disposition? He might be a risk junkie.”

If the person in question were to hear that remark, whether he had memories or not, he would likely retort in a deeply emotional tone, “Could you please refrain from saying such disreputable things about me?!”; but, there was no avoiding him being thought of in such a manner.

Either way, Gluttony had firmly weakened their precious fighting strength, limiting the cards in their hand for the climax. She was glad for Garfiel’s return, but the fact that they could not devote the entirety of their forces to Emilia and Rem was regrettable for both Petra and “Subaru”.

But, even so—

Petra: “—We’re going to win, Subaru.”

“Subaru”: “Yeah, let’s go and win. After all, we can’t let everything we’ve built up to this point be for nothing.”

5

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never speak of my dreams to another.

6

Aldebaran: “—In the end, I guess I just can’t leave fate in the hands of others.”

An offhanded remark, yet with a tone carrying resolve, that which was spoken by Al had served as the signal.

Garfiel: “—ORAHHHHH!!”

With the raging Garfiel at the vanguard, the Aldebusters simultaneously sprung into action.

Keeping her eyes trained over those movements, Petra grasped her hands tightly over her chest.

—With the ice anchor Emilia had fired as a landmark, Petra had Compressed the distance to the current location with the Aldebusters in tow, barring Al’s path once more.

In all honesty, the fact that Emilia and Rem were not present, and the fact that the kunoichi assigned to accompany Al, who had unexpectedly been carried off with him, was nowhere to be found was certainly a cause for concern, but,

“Subaru”: “—Al’s side has no reason to lift their no-killing restriction.”

Using that as reassurance, perhaps that was placing a bit too much hope in their opponent’s abilities and convictions.

But, when considering Al’s fighting style with his Authority of “Turning Back Time” until this point, that was the foundation. Since his Authority was far too strong, in a sense, Al had gotten away with being underestimated by his opponents up until now.

And that premise, even now that his allies had been stripped away from him, ultimately would not change.

Garfiel: “Gahguh-!”

Having rushed straight ahead without any preparatory movements, Garfiel raised his voice in pain.

The reason for this was his collision into a stone slab that had suddenly appeared along his trajectory. Having slammed his face into the stone slab that had preempted his initial strike, Garfiel’s body rolled over mid-air. And slipping past from underneath Garfiel, Al moved to intercept the fighting strength which followed after the golden tiger.

Coming after him was the trio of Ram, Flam, and Grassis.

“Subaru”: “Oddly enough, it’s the pink-haired sisters! Well then, how’s it gonna go?!”

7

—Thirty-seven.

Intercepting Garfiel’s rush with a stone slab, he slipped underneath as the former reeled backwards.

The timing had been unexpectedly tight. If the stone slab was deployed too early, it would have been easily pulverized, and deploying it too late would allow Garfiel to pass right by it. Perfecting the necessary timing to strike him in the face, he put it into practice.

Garfiel: “Gahguh-!”

Hearing the cry of pain behind him, Aldebaran charged forward as three shadows swooped down upon him.

He was flanked on his left and right by Flam and her sister, in sync with Ram who came at him from an upward diagonal. He could expect that sort of high precision coordination between twins, but Ram's ability to match them on first sight highlighted the abnormality of this teamup.

Thereupon—

Aldebaran: "Lil' Miss Rem was crushed flat at those cliffs back there."

Ram: "She wasn't. Do not underestimate Ram and Rem's sisterly love."

Neutralized by the sisters' synesthesia, the venom in his words failed to exhibit any effectiveness.

Given her lack of discomposure, there was likely no falsehood in Ram's statement. Inferring how that signified Rem's safety, as well as the unknown fate of Yae, it merely ended up serving as venom against himself.

However—

Aldebaran: "—Earth Brand Arts."

Using the Mana coming to him via his pathway with the Dragon, Aldebaran surrounded himself with swords of stone. In order to avoid the tips of the swords shooting up from the ground one after another, the twins deftly maneuvered their bodies to perform evasions, yielding a momentary delay that shifted their three-way coordination into a solo-attack from Ram.

With Ram singled out, he grabbed one of his stone daos and thrust it toward her head-on—

Ram: "That's fine. I'll be borrowing it."

Having scooped up his sword with wind magic, Ram slammed it right into the side of his jaw.

× × ×

—Ninety-one.

Ram: “That’s fine. I’ll—not be borrowing it.”

Declaring so, Ram allowed the stone sword she had pulled toward her with wind to pass by, brittly crumbling as it flew past her; as she had failed to take the sword, Aldebaran delivered a blow unto her.

Ram parried that blow with wind from her wand, skillfully controlling the wind currents to build air pressure and push past the clash of blades. Grabbing her leg with a stone prosthetic, he hurled her behind him while being bombarded by an onslaught of wind blades.

Ram: “—Hk.”

Leaving Ram gritting her teeth behind him, Aldebaran pressed onward, and the delayed sisters of Flam and Grassis swooped down on him once more.

Readying himself for their approaching agility that could not be underestimated on account of their youth, Aldebaran spread out his real right arm and artificial left arm, and roused a surging wave of sand to clear away everything in the one-hundred and eighty degree field of view in front of him.

The girls were engulfed by the billowing sand, becoming encaged within the ground—

???: “—Warrior ta Yin Six! Magician ta Wind Five! King ta Flowers Eight!”

A surging force abruptly slammed into him from the front, plunging him into the sea of swords he had forged behind himself.

× × ×

—One-hundred and twelve.

???: “—Warrior ta Yin Six! Magician ta Wind Five! King ta Flowers Eight!”

As soon heard it, he forcibly closed in his outstretched arms, fixing the muzzle of the wave of sand directly in front of him—the large bearded man who appeared there a beat later basked in the billowing wave, ending up in the same predicament as Flam and Grassis.

Thereby averting that misfortune, Aldebaran would attempt to overcome the enemies as he jumped out diagonally—

???: “UL GOA!!”

Still in his mid-air leap, he was struck by an unavoidable fastball of flame, scorching his insides.

× × ×

—One-hundred and forty-six.

???: “UL GOA!!”

After trapping the twins and the large man in sand, he deliberately delayed his advance in response to the approaching fireball. Instead, what ended up basking in the inferno was a poorly made clay doll that Aldebaran had manifested in the spur of the moment —a poor knockoff of the magic Emilia had used to recreate Natsuki Subaru with ice.

The fireball aimed to strike Aldebaran’s head as he leaped forward, so amidst a combat requiring split-second decisions, it was easily baited by the poorly made earthen doll.

???: “Wha?!”

The skinny man who had casted the spell, with his mean-looking eyes and tongue piercing, gasped at Aldebaran’s countermeasure.

So long as he was not an expert magician, he would not be able to unleash Ul-tier magic in rapid succession. Flipping up his artificial middle finger to that expression of shock, Aldebaran moved to advance even further this time—

???: “—Fire!!”

From an oblique trajectory behind him, a light was fired as a shock wave that speared through Aldebaran's back; the luminosity of the corona that seemed to scorch the world painted even his consciousness white.

× × ×

—One-hundred and forty-seven.

???: "—Fire!!"

Turning to face the direction of the gallant war cry, Aldebaran recognized the identity of the perpetrator as Felt, baring her high canines in a valiant expression, in her grasp the magic staff that sourced the beam of light.

That was the Meteor known as the Star Staff, something the Witch had once used during her lifetime to make even the Divine Dragon cry; in other words, it was one of his mentor's loose ends.

Aldebaran: "For Teacher to be getting in my way here, what kinda damn bug is this?"

At the untiring challenge that would stretch endlessly on ahead, at the wall he would have no choice but surmount at all costs, and at the fact that it was something originating from none other than the very Witch who had guided Aldebaran's path, a tinge of melancholy burgeoned in his heart.

As Aldebaran contemplated, the white light mercilessly engulfed him once again.

Well then—

× × ×

—One-hundred and forty-eight.

Felt: "—Fire!!"

—The approach of this white light, just how on earth could it be conquered?

8

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never bestow a gift upon another.

× × ×

Aldebaran: "—The Authority of Tristitia, just what exactly is that power capable of?"

9

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never wave at anyone.

× × ×

Aldebaran: "—It can't just be a simple warp. There's no way it's just that, it's an Authority."

10

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never pray before going to sleep.

× × ×

Aldebaran: "—It ought to be manifesting some sort of concept. Right? Tristitia, Tristitia, huh?"

11

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never comfort the wounds of another.

× × ×

Aldebaran: "—Feeling blue, a downer, cloudy skies, depression, feeling crushed… Crushed?"

12

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never find joy in a clear sky.

× × ×

Aldebaran: "—Is it crushing? Things like intervals and distances? No, it's not just those things being crushed, is it?"

13

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never lament a rainy day.

× × ×

Aldebaran: "—It's crushing and filling in the insufficient time for thinking, isn't it? But, Witch Factors aren't…"

14

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never gaze upon a rainbow in the company of another.

15

Aldebaran: "—Witch Factors aren't anything so convenient, now are they?"

That instant, hearing Al's words as he broke through the encirclement of the Aldebusters to finally stand right before her, a chill ran down Petra's spine.

She was unable to actually see Al's eyes, concealed by his steel helmet.. —Yet, their eyes did meet. That sensation made Petra feel as if her innermost thoughts had been laid bare, a sense of urgency gripping her heart.

It seemed to be exclaiming that somehow, Al possessed a deeper knowledge of the Witch Factor than even Petra.

"Subaru": "Petra!!"

???: "—Witch ta Flowers Eight!!"

Petra: "—Hk."

As the command of the cornered husky voice overlapped with the cry of her beloved within her mind, Petra performed Compression on the hesitation that had sprouted within herself, before distancing herself from Al to escape his clutch—that entire process was Compressed, separating them in an instant.

Aldebaran: "Oi oi, so you can even crush space for yourself…!"

Petra turned to look back, having vanished from right before Al's eyes, and watched as he clicked his tongue at his failure to catch her.

As Al's shoulders heaved up and down, his distance from Petra had been set back to square one. Between the two of them as they glared at each other, the Aldebusters, whom Al had exhausted all his efforts to overcome, rose to their feet. In order to reach Petra once again, he would have no choice but to surmount the same hurdles.

However, Petra did not feel as though she had bested him in the slightest.

"Subaru": "Petra, what Al just said a minute ago…"

Petra: "I know… He really is resetting."

Hearing the words of the Imaginary Subaru as he floated beside her, Petra narrowed her eyes and gave a nod.

It was not as if she had really been doubting it up to this point, but after witnessing Al's "Turning Back Time" firsthand, she could not help but feel astonished by how extraordinary it was.

Garfiel's preemptive strike; the coordinated onslaught of Ram, Flam, and Grassis; the three-pronged enclosure by way of Compression consisting of Gaston, Rachins, and Felt; the obstruction of fifty people mobilized in accordance with Rom-jii's orders: Al had flawlessly dealt with it all.

He had surmounted all of that with nothing but the most optimal of solutions.

“Subaru”: “Though, our compression of thoughts should be able to produce similar results…”

Petra: “That’s just thinking as hard as possible in order to come up with the right answer. As expected, it’s a bit different from the powers that Subaru and Al-san hold.”

“Subaru”: “…If that’s true, I guess I should be this strong, too.”

Scratching his head, “Subaru” lamented his worthlessness. But, Petra did not see it the same way.

Subaru, in his own Subaru way, had confronted his own Authority head-on, and holding tight to the many that ought to have been lost, he had saved Petra and the others. There was not a single shred of worthlessness about him.

And on the other hand to that line of thought—

Petra: “…How many times did you need to restart before you got the chance to reach your hand out towards me?”

As far as Petra was aware, Al’s strength as a warrior was modest—that was to say, it fell far short of the likes of Ram and Garfiel, on a level that could not even contend with Heinkel. Nevertheless, Al had made sport of the Aldebusters all by himself, and was on the verge of putting them into checkmate.

“Subaru”: “Not even just ten, he might already be on his twentieth try.”

Petra: “…I think it might be a bit more.”

Hearing “Subaru’s” naive estimation, Petra anticipated the possibility that it would have actually been ten or twenty times that.

In fact, supposing it was Petra in the position of needing to outmaneuver the Aldebusters, even if she had an Authority that allowed her knowledge of upcoming developments, she was not confident that she would be able to clear it in even a hundred attempts. Not to mention, Al had also managed to sidestep Reinhard, even if he had also needed to borrow the Dragon's strength to do so.

In order to accomplish such a feat, just how much of one's heart would one need to kill?

If Al's "Turning Back Time" was truly what Petra and "Subaru" envisioned, if it was truly a power that came at the cost of Death like Natsuki Subaru's, then standing there was a dreadful Warlock, masquerading in frivolity.

Al had already conquered the fear and loss of Death—no, there existed no human capable of conquering that. If it had to be said, it was not conquest, but numbness.

A being who had gone numb to even the instinct of all living things to fear and distance oneself from Death—that was the secret behind Al's strength, and what was tied to his absolute nature as a Warlock.

In order to surpass that absoluteness, she too would have no choice but to pay a worthy compensation.

"Subaru": "—Petra."

Petra: "It's alright, Subaru… I'll be alright."

He was a being who existed only within her mind.

Only to the Imaginary Subaru, and him alone, had Petra's secret been revealed; one that had neither been disclosed to any of the Aldebusters, nor to any members of the Emilia Camp.

It was something that the Warlock before her, deeply knowledgeable about Witch Factors as he was, had said to her.

—Upon the one who styled herself the Witch of Tristitia, the likes of a convenient fate smiled not.

Petra: "Even so, something like that isn't any reason for me to stop."

Deceiving even herself in such a manner, Petra Leyte—the Witch of Tristitia, exercised her Authority.

In exchange for interfering with the rules of the world, the existence known as herself was relinquishing its future; no matter how precious and irreplaceable that future was, the newly-birthed Witch did not hesitate whatsoever.

16

—Seven-thousand and eleven.

Petra: “Even so, something like that isn’t any reason for me to stop.”

Seeing Petra’s lips spin those words from afar, Aldebaran could not help but take his hat off. He did not go so far as to actually remove his helmet, but it was to the point that he wanted to do so.

After all, was that not so?

Aldebaran: “…Truly, Natsuki Subaru’s one unforgivable guy.”

Grinding his teeth, Aldebaran, in his clash against the Combined Forces—it seemed like they called themselves the “Aldebusters”. He liked the flair. Though, he did not wish to consider its origin.

Anyway, in his clash against the Aldebusters until this point, he had uncovered that Petra had taken in the Witch Factor of Tristitia, along with the majority of specifics of how its Authority functioned.

As with any battle, it was essential to gather as much accurate information about the opponent as possible.

This was especially true in battles against Sin Archbishops or Witches, and it was often the case that if one confronted such an opponent without a grasp what sort of Authority they were up against, it tended to end in a one-sided killing. —The ability to overcome being killed in the first encounter was an advantage possessed by both Aldebaran and Natsuki Subaru.

Putting that advantage on full display, Aldebaran had grasped the Authority of Tristitia; it was quite the ridiculous ability. The power to crush—to Compress space and time, was utterly unrivaled in its adaptability and irksome nature.

To top it all off, it seemed like this Authority was also capable of performing Compression on thoughts, so even within a single second of combat, they were able to think things through thoroughly, and pounce at him one after another with conclusions honed to a razor's edge. Even with Aldebaran's Territory, it was a difficult problem that could not be easily solved.

In fact, in order for him to just slip past a mere eleven seconds of combat, he had needed seven-thousand retries.

And yet, even after enduring all that, he had failed to catch ever-important Petra. —Now that the same amount of distance had been opened between them, it would likely take the same, or an even greater number of attempts to reach her again.

Aldebaran: "Be that as it may, Valga's affinity with the Authority of Tristitia is just the worst…"

Among the members of the Aldebusters, the figure of Valga Cromwell, who had given him a thorough amount of torment, was present.

While not making any use of the large build he had been blessed with, the resourceful monster had been granted an unlimited amount of time to think freely, allowing him to overwhelm Aldebaran by finding the most optimal solutions.

It was a nightmarish combination, one akin to arming a gorilla with a machine gun.[16]

If Aldebaran were to dance in the palm of Valga's hand, there was a risk that he could suffer a complete defeat once again. Hence, even if he managed to rob them of their time for thinking, he would not be granted many opportunities for trial and error.

Not to mention, it was not Aldebaran's intention to keep allowing them to use the Authority of Tristitia.

That was because—

???: “—The Witch Factor of Tristitia is a defective article. It is a one-of-a-kind Factor that was prepared for the Valiant, so it is not capable of compatibility with any other. From a different angle, however, it could be said that it is compatible with anyone who is willing to pay the compensation, but humans are creatures who can sell off far too much in exchange for their resolve.”

Information about the Witch Factor of Tristitia, told to him by the Witch in the past.

Perhaps because she had many reservations on the topic, the Witch had not been very eager to divulge much concerning the two Witch Factors that ought to be classified as supernumerary, but after running out of patience, her explanations had been surprisingly loquacious.

To make a mostly-irrelevant long story short, the main points were as follows:

—The Witch Factor of Tristitia, would invoke its Authority in exchange for the holder’s will.

—The compensation used by the Witch Factor of Tristitia, could only be paid by the holder.

Aldebaran: “—Natsuki Subaru.”

When his thoughts arrived at that point, Aldebaran once again felt his indignation surge towards Natsuki Subaru.

Of course, Aldebaran did not blind himself to the fact that his own plan of having Petra read the Book of the Dead had played a role in the events that led her to take in the Witch Factor of Tristitia. But, if it was Aldebaran who had created the impetus, then it was Natsuki Subaru who carried a significant portion of the responsibility.

Considering the relationship between Aldebaran and Natsuki Subaru, saying that much was only natural.

The large shadow that hung over Petra’s life was something that had originated from Natsuki Subaru. Aldebaran would not say that he had harbored malicious intent, nor did he believe that to be the case, but the influence he had over her went without saying. And not limited to just Petra, it could be said that he had exhibited a certain fateful power over even the Aldebusters—no, over many scenarios even preceding this battle. “—Co” Regardless, it was a bit ironic to call it a fateful power. After all, even though it was none other than Natsuki Subaru and Aldebaran who despised fate the most, “—m” it would have been no exaggeration to say that their actions were what decided fate. “—p” Upon thinking that, what flashed through Aldebaran’s mind were the words of the woman of such brilliant crimson. Back then, “—re” the words of praise she had spoken to him in their final time together, were attempting to scorch Aldebaran’s heart. Deliberately, he averted his gaze, and plugged his ears. “—ss” At this stage, it was far too late for him to reflect on his own actions. That which now sustained Aldebaran was not she whom he had lost, but the Oath he had sworn to his Teacher. “—A” The purpose for which Aldebaran had been born, that which he had been made into Aldebaran to accomplish, the culmination of all that was now being put to the test. For that reason, he had not the time to halt his tracks and think—wait, wait wait wait. Isn’t this too long? Just a moment’s pause, a chance to take a deep breath before the battle resumed. “—go” That’s what it ought to have been. His opponents did not wish to allow him any breathers. He also did not want to grant his opponents much time. “—n” Even though they should have been at such a consensus, how could Aldebaran be engaging in such deep thought— “—y”.

Shit. This is strange. What is this? What did she say? Far in the distance, he could tell that Petra had moved her lips. One syllable at a time, he would pick up the sound those lips had weaved. Everything that had been thrown in while he was thinking, he picked it all up, and collected it together. Slow. Sluggish. Far too laggard. Collect the meaning, collect the significance, collect the intent. —. —. —. It was no use. He could not silence his thoughts. He would just have to think. “Compress”? Crushing, huh? Crushing, what exactly? “Agony”? Pain? Anguish? Suffering… suffering? Concerns, thoughts, unraveling. Fuck, she got me. They’ve been Compressed.

—My thoughts, they’ve been Compressed!!

17

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never divulge this important secret.

18

Petra: "—Compress Agony."

A Compression of thoughts by way of the Authority of Tristitia—a powerful buff effect consisting of speeding up her allies' thoughts, omitting any need for discussion, and allowing them to take the most optimal measures after thorough consideration from everyone; conferring that unto Al was one of the countermeasures Petra had prepared against him.

Petra: "When you have too many things to think about, your head will get punctured."

While it might have been presumptuous, Petra prided herself on being the third most knowledgeable in the world about the "Turning Back Time" of Return by Death, just behind Subaru and Al.

Petra had acquired that scholarship from the vicarious experience of the Death tasted by Subaru, so she had discovered a way to nullify—no, to overheat the seemingly invincible Authority of Al.

That being, to overload his mind with accelerated thoughts.

In the past, when the Royal Selection had first commenced, Subaru had gotten into a fight and parted with Emilia in the Royal Capital, and the large amount of stress and mental burden that came as a result had worn down his heart.

Inadvertently, Rem's devotion and his anger toward the Sin Archbishop had given him the chance to get back on his feet, but it was a fact that he had lost his will to fight, ending up as an empty husk, even if only temporarily. —She would recreate that effect.

Since Al had already gone numb to the fear of Death, it was likely that he would not lose heart no matter how many Deaths he accreted.

Nonetheless, even if he had decided to make an enemy of the world, Al was still human.

Rifts would form in his mind, and he would be unable to avoid having it come apart at the seams. She would make it so.

For that purpose, no matter what she needed to give up in exchange—

Aldebaran: "—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition."

While tormented by the acceleration of thoughts, Al could be heard silently voicing those words.

His mind might have been under a high burden, but this situation was still a double-edged sword. The odds were even; either Al's heart would give out from extreme exhaustion, or he would make full use of the Compression of his mind like the Aldebusters to fend off Petra and the others.

Hence, the battle from this point onward was do-or-die for the Aldebusters in the truest sense—

Petra: "—Everyone! It's only just getting started! Don't lose focus!"

Everyone: "—YEAHH!!"

At Petra's encouragement, her allies whose interactions had been Compressed cheered in response.

Finding that to be reliable, she was about to look out over the decisive battle against Al starting from square one—then she noticed.

Among those who had just given her that reassuring response, there was someone whose voice she had not heard.

It was possible that they had just missed the timing. But, feeling a peculiar sense of discomfort in that, Petra glanced over in that direction, searching for the figure of the person who had given no response.

And then, she found him.

Petra: “—Rom-ojiisan?”

She found the figure of the Great Strategist who had given no response, the old giant who bore the duty of observing the battlefield and giving timely and accurate commands, his eyes having gone white as he slowly collapsed onto the ground.

19

—Let us rewind the clock to mere moments prior.

Aldebaran: “—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition.”

Indeed, upon hearing Aldebaran declare those words, a tremor ran through Rom-jii’s large shoulders.

Upon bearing witness to the sight of Aldebaran standing still before the Combined Forces, Rom-jii felt an unnatural discomposure settle within him, causing him to stiffen as he motionlessly widened his eyes.

Rom-jii was well aware of Petra’s stratagem that applied the Authority of Tristitia.

Her strategy revolved around accelerating Aldebaran’s thoughts, placing a burden on his mind to fully exhaust him in one fell swoop. Rom-jii had also deemed it a necessary step in order to take down Aldebaran, given his ability to perform something akin to “Turning Back Time”, and thus he had promised to cooperate with it.

He had harbored some apprehensions towards speeding up Aldebaran’s thoughts, but since they were also Compressing their own thoughts to arrive at the best possible answers, he accepted that it would just boil down to their overall strength. If that was their course of action, Rom-jii also felt like he could lend his own strength.

And as it so happened, the battle against Aldebaran had gone just about exactly how Rom-jii had expected it to.

His comrades mobilized quickly, and successfully managed to drive Aldebaran into a corner. —But, much to the shock of Rom-jii, his discomposure would commence from that moment onward.

Aldebaran: "—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition."

Indeed, as Aldebaran declared so, Rom-jii's position shifted in an instant. —No, it was not only Rom-jii whose position had shifted; the positions of Aldebaran, Felt, and everyone else participating in the battle returned to where they had stood a mere ten-odd seconds prior, and recommenced from there.

And, Rom-jii had already experienced that same phenomenon five times now—

Rom: "—What in tarnation, is this situation?"

Craning his neck all around, Rom-jii gathered that he was amidst the same scenery he had witnessed five times now, and wrung those words out in a solemn tone.

Nobody other than Rom-jii had noticed the abnormality of this situation.

Petra: "—Everyone! It's only just getting started! Don't lose focus!"

Everyone: "—YEAHH!!"

As proof of that, everyone other than Rom-jii responded to Petra's rousing voice of leadership.

Then, they all faced Aldebaran, and sprung at him in unison.

Felt: "Rom-jii! Give us orders!"

Failing to notice his discomposure, Felt searched for a position to attack from with Star Staff in hand. The allies other than Felt who also possessed techniques that could serve as the deciding factor were also running while awaiting Rom-jii's commands.

Watching their backs, Rom-jii gulped down his bitter saliva, and shouted out commands differing to the ones from just before—

Aldebaran: "—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition."

—Now for the sixth time, the final battle against Aldebaran commenced.

Chapter 55:
Aggressor of the Territory

1 —Aldebaran's Territory was an Authority linked to a Witch Factor.

However, Aldebaran was not the holder of a Witch Factor.

The Witch had called this "supernumerary" or "a special case", but Aldebaran believed that instead of such sweet-sounding words, it ought to be declared as "appropriated" or "unenumerated".

This phenomenon had a precedent; for instance, having once possessed Authorities, the Witches of Sin still retained the same powers even after being reduced to souls post-mortem.

On this matter, the Witch had likened Witch Factors to keys with the capacity to open the door that granted one the right to interfere with the world; she had conjectured that once the door was open, it would perhaps remain open even if the key was lost.

Albeit, in that case, even if it could explain the Witches of Sin, it would be unable to explain Aldebaran or even the Witch herself, so in conformance with this, she had proposed the theory of inheritance.

That possibly, a profound connection to a being who was compatible with a Witch Factor would innately open the door to the right to interfere with the world, to an Authority.

However—

Witch: "Just as how a being with wings might find it difficult to explain the sensation of moving their wings to someone bereft of them, it is difficult to explain our Authorities, as they were not appended post-haste. You could say that our doors were half-open by birth."

The reason why the Witch had worn a smug grin as she said that, was likely because it was her best attempt at humor. Unfortunately, Aldebaran did not laugh in the slightest, but he could at least assent to the point she was making.

Certainly, if the door had been fully open, the airflow would have likely been much better.

He was merely peeking through a gap in the door with poor airflow, trying to reach his hand through to the other side. Hence, the door would obstruct him, trapping his hand, and causing unforeseen consequences.

If, like the Witch, he could be satisfied without opening the door, perhaps it would have been better for him. However, Aldebaran was far too banal, and far too helpless for that.

If he did not keep the door open, Aldebaran would have had no chance of fulfilling the duty the Witch expected of him.

In that case, Aldebaran had no choice but to keep the door open, even if it was only ajar.

Ergo, just like a half-opened door, there were many opaque aspects to Aldebaran's Authority.

From his hands-on experience with using it, as well as the Witch's own inferences, he had a grasp on around eighty percent of the complete picture. Even so, Aldebaran faced no impediments to the use of his Authority, nor did he ever hesitate to use it.

That might be perceived as dangerous, but it was the same as how using a cellphone without fully knowing how a cellphone worked would not pose any threat to one's life. But then again, Aldebaran's Authority was intimately tied to life, so the circumstances might differ slightly to those of a cellphone.

In any case, although his Authority had accompanied him through a perceived time that spanned the length of over ten lifetimes, the Territory was largely a black box. —The bug that would sometimes occur, was the utmost extremity of that.

The bug that would occur within the Territory was the phenomenon whereby the holder of initiative within the established Matrix would be transferred from Aldebaran unto a different target.

Normally, by creating a Territory of his own volition, Aldebaran would be permitted an unlimited number of attempts only within that defined space and time. During that interval, it was a given that Aldebaran would maintain his own continuity of memories, carrying out different approaches with each attempt as he searched for a breakthrough.

However, whenever some discrepancy in the starting parameters caused this bug to occur, the right to redo events within the Territory would transfer to another person within the Matrix, and until the Territory was lifted, they would be stuck repeating in an unending Matrix in perpetuity.

This bug, which had never manifested back during his days with the Witch, was something Aldebaran suspected had developed as a result of having lost faith in his Authority following his defeat in his first battle.

In fact, the bug invariably occurred at points when Aldebaran doubted his own Authority.

One such example was long ago on the Gladiator Island, when he had been pitted against a formidable enemy in a deathmatch he had nary a chance in a million of winning. Thereafter as well, when Aldebaran had wavered on his position in a clash against Leip Barielle, or when he had fought Yae after she was sent to assassinate Priscilla, this bug had occurred.

Above all—

???: "—How fascinating. Transferring the initiative of an Authority unto another party, I have never heard of anything like it."

When Aldebaran challenged the Witch of Greed who greeted him at the Castle of Dreams, that had occurred.

Witch of Greed: "It was quite the uncommon experience. I see, so that is the world you behold. Certainly, if you are unable to decipher what might be causing it, it would likely be a rather maddening phenomenon.”

He had slashed at the completely altered Witch of Greed, demanding that she return the Witch he knew.

Having launched attacks on her from every conceivable direction, when his creativity and trial and error had proven completely ineffective, what sprouted within Aldebaran was a skepticism towards his Authority, and as if to prove that, the bug surfaced.

Witch of Greed: “An alteration yielded from uncertainty towards the absolute nature of your Authority… that is to say, a power derived from your weakness. A pity that it seems to be completely ineffective against those already lost to madness. That goes for her, and for me.”

As Aldebaran stood baffled, the Witch of Greed spoke in depth of the hell she had tasted.

Certainly, that was the world of the Territory Aldebaran knew, while also something decidedly different at the same time; just how on earth the Witch of Greed had managed to endure it, he knew not.

As the Witch of Greed had said herself, was it because she was not sane?

Witch of Greed: “In the majority of cases when you exercise your Authority, you are the weaker party. You cling to the Territory in order to locate an infinitesimal chance of victory, wrench it open, and at last grasp onto it; the Victim, so to speak. Thus, if we declare the party who forces your use of the Territory as being the Aggressor, this would be an exchange of initiative between Victim and Aggressor.”

Watching as the Witch of Greed gleefully divulged the reality of hell, Aldebaran felt all the blood throughout his body grow cold, understanding that it was none other than a nightmare of his own creation.

The Castle of Dreams having been turned into a nightmare, the bug that had been yielded in the Territory, it was all the result of Aldebaran's weakness—it was a punishment born by the unforgivable sin known as weakness.

Witch of Greed: "The plan is still underway. The primary objective may be stuck at an impasse, but the secondary objective remains intact. The best we can accomplish with what little we have… that is the purpose for which both you and I are currently here. Is that not so?"

That sin was his cross to bear, yet as it weighed too heavy on his shoulders to carry it on his own, he had nearly abandoned it. And so, the Witch of Greed sneered at him, agreeing to drag it forward alongside him.

Indeed, at that smile, one he had longed to see, yet one he had not wished to see, Aldebaran resolved himself.

Aldebaran: "I, no matter what—will definitely kill you."

—The Territory's bug: even that power derived from his own weakness, even that branding of his defeat, by putting it to use, Aldebaran would carry out his duty as the Following Star.

Witch of Greed: "—Why, must love fade?"

The Witch of Greed whispered such a musing, but the answer to it, Aldebaran did not know.

He had lost the Witch who sought love, lost the Sun Princess he had loved, and yet, still, he did not know.

—Neither did he wish to know.

2

His thoughts, were accelerating.

Amidst the thoughts that had likely been condensed by the Authority held by Petra, Aldebaran was unable to establish a priority order for the flood of thoughts ceaselessly inundating him, pushing his mind to the verge of bursting.

Aldebaran: “—Shit.”

It was a fearsome Authority.

Unlike Divine Protections that could be a hit-or-miss in their effectiveness, most Authorities would invoke supernatural powers far transcending the norm, and Petra’s “Compression” was no exception. Authorities tended to be as powerful as the Witch Factor holder’s mind was flexible, but in that regard, her adaptability was far too high.

It was either the result of unnaturally strong convictions, or flexibility born out of weakness. —The talent to draw out a powerful ability from a Witch Factor was greatly tied to one’s mentality. The Witches of Sin and the Sin Archbishops would have been the former, while Aldebaran and Petra would likely fall into the latter category.

Thus, whether it was people blessed with Divine Protections, people compatible with a Witch Factor, or even people with no abilities whatsoever, the ones who perceived Aldebaran to be formidable always fell into the latter category.

In fact, the attack that had aimed to Compress Aldebaran’s thoughts had been as immediately effective as his opponent had hoped. For Aldebaran, who wished to avoid mental exhaustion, it scored full marks on nastiness as it whittled away at his remaining strength.

Disregarding his Authority, Aldebaran was also on the weaker side. In a battle that necessitated moment to moment decision making, he fully understood the usefulness of a power that always allowed one to find the best course of action. But usually, no matter how much one endeavored during a battle, they could never hope for perfection. Ergo, it was necessary to eventually make a decision, cease one’s thoughts, and take the leap into action. Petra’s Compression forced the blank spaces in thoughts that would have originally been discarded to be filled, imposing over double the amount of exhaustion just to even reach the same conclusion.

Hence, in exchange for that enormous waste of his mental capacity, Aldebaran had to keep up the utmost extremity in responses, akin to threading a needle as he formulated the most optimal maneuver against the highly-motivated Aldebusters.

And then, right in the middle of that exhaustion—

???: "—Rom-jii!!"

Just after tiding over the offensive of the Aldebusters, what struck his ears was a voice akin to a scream.

With that exclamation, Felt stood wide-eyed, watching as the large man of advanced age collapsed in the distance. That instant, not only Felt, but other members of the Aldebusters too, experienced a sense of unease tremor through their hearts.

Before they even knew what had transpired, Valga Cromwell had fallen.

Aldebaran: "…"

Naturally, even if they did not know the method, there was only one person who could have been responsible. As a result, excluding the ones who went rushing to Valga's side, the hostility of everyone else was concentrated on Aldebaran. While receiving their animosity, Aldebaran, unseen to them from within his helmet, was motionlessly widening his eyes with the same shock that the Aldebusters had received.

Aldebaran: "—He became the Aggressor of the Territory, didn't he?"

It was not as though he had aimed to activate it. But, since he was the cause, he knew exactly what had transpired.

The Territory's bug had occurred, causing Valga, one of the Aggressors, to be handed the initiative. Then, it was likely that the old giant had repeated these brief few moments enough times for his heart to be crushed.

Aldebaran: "Tch."

At the arrival of a chance that could have been described as being rescued from the brink of death, or as a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity, Aldebaran did not welcome it.

As mentioned previously, the occurrence of the bug was unrelated to Aldebaran's volition—at the very least, it was not something he actively invoked. Thus, the activation of the bug was something Aldebaran took no joy in.

After all, in the majority of cases, the bug would destroy the hearts of whomever it targeted.

Aldebaran: "On Gladiator Island, with Sir Leip, even with Yae…"

Facing off against Aldebaran, those who were engulfed by the Territory's bug, caught in an inescapable loop of Death, had all ended up suffering some mental abnormality.

The gladiators whose hearts were shattered proceeded to have their heads chopped off by Aldebaran; Leip Barielle lost his sanity, entirely forgetting about his long-held ambition; and Yae Tenzen succumbed to dread, and was thus transformed into his loyal servant.

Having levied the condition of "no-killing" upon the execution of his plan, the way Aldebaran saw things, the Territory's bug, distorting the hearts of its victims beyond recognition, could only bring about an end synonymous with Death.

Hence, Aldebaran took no joy in this conclusion. —Was that really true?

???: "—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created."

The voice of the Witch he had once betrayed, her expectations, her ideals, now sounded within him.

Faced with the tenacity, strategy, and unity of his opponents, he exercised fear toward the one-in-a-million, uncertainty toward the one-in-a-billion, and doubt toward the one-in-a-trillion; in doing so, the conditions to invoke the Territory's bug were met. —Those were, so to speak, because Aldebaran had questioned his Authority, himself, and the Witch.

???: “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.”

Once again, he heard the Witch’s voice.

—Then, he watched as the subsequent Aggressor collapsed to the ground, their eyes having gone white.

3

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never cherish silence.

4

Petra: “—Rom-ojiisan?”

The situation shifted. —And in an unfavourable direction for Petra’s side, at that.

Watching as Rom-jii’s large body suddenly began to sway, collapsing to the ground, Petra greatly widened her eyes. Surging forth within her chest was a multitude of emotions, composed of shock, bafflement, incomprehensibility, and discomposure; they seemed as if they were about to overwhelm her entire body, but—

“Subaru”: “—Petra!!”

Petra: “—Hk.”

A loud bark from the Imaginary Subaru was just barely able to keep Petra’s consciousness from going over the edge.

It was fine to be surprised by unforeseen circumstances. There existed not a single person who could remain unshaken after receiving a hit from outside their consciousness. However, as the Witch of Tristitia, there was something Petra needed to do before being surprised.

In response to the events that had unfolded, she needed to Compress every last reaction.

Felt: “This isn’t a joke, something’s happening! Someone get Rom-jii back up!” / Gaston: “Don’t be unreasonable, his eyes just went white all of a sudden! What the hell, what happened to him?!” / Camberley: “Oi, what’re we gonna do! Without the old man, who’s gonna…” / Garfiel: “Shit! It’s Ram! S’gotta be Ram!” / Ram: “—I suppose it can’t be helped. The queen will be leaving the board. Do keep that in mind.” / Doltero: “If we don’t move right away, we’ll be no better than pigs waiting for scraps. I’ll make the first move.” / Rachins: “Goddammit! We can’t lose after coming this far!” / Flam & Grassis: “Naturally!!”

Compressing the unrest that had spread around all into a single instant, Petra fulfilled her duty as the Witch of Tristitia.

The cause had yet to be identified. However, they immediately decided on how to respond, with everyone beginning to search for the best course of action in unison. —Naturally, Petra was no exception.

Leaving the situation to Ram, who had taken on the role of commander from the collapsed Rom-jii, Petra invoked the Authority of Tristitia to Compress the traversal distance between herself and Rom-jii.

Petra: “Rom-ojiisan… hk.”

Having fallen flat on his face, Rom-jii’s large body could not be lifted by Petra’s slender arms. But, peering into the side-turned countenance of the old giant, Petra choked up at the evident abnormality. —Rom-jii’s visage appeared lifeless, giving off a sense of fatigue as if he had aged a hundred years in an instant.

“Subaru”: “Though, he never really looked like he was bursting with lively energy to begin with…”

Petra: “He wasn’t like this up until a moment ago, that’s for sure. Besides, if he thought there was something strange with his physical condition, Rom-ojiisan would have surely done the proper reporting, contact, and discussion.”

Rom-jii was well aware that if he carelessly concealed the abnormality in his condition, it would only serve to benefit the enemy.

If the Authority of Tristitia had been placing an abundance of burden on him, and there had been signs he would faint like this, he absolutely would have informed them himself.

“Subaru”: “What about the unfunny theory that Rom-jii used up all his remaining lifespan due to the rapid firing of the Authority?”

Petra: “That’s really not funny, so theory rejected… still, I don’t think it was my Authority. Al-san had to have done something to Rom-ojiisan.”

“Subaru”: “But, what exactly?”

Ending up at the same dead-end question, Petra and “Subaru” puzzled for an answer.

Even now, since the Aldebusters were operating under Ram’s commands, fighting on in an effort to corner Al, Petra could not afford to divert all of her attention to figuring out Rom-jii’s collapse.

With that in mind, Petra was about to stand back up—

Felt: “—You goddamn idiot! That’s the priority!”

Petra: “…”

Indeed, with her back facing this direction, Felt corrected the order of priority without hesitation.

As Petra stared in wonder, Felt, with the Star Staff in hand as she flashed her sharp high canines,

Felt: “If you can’t somehow figure out what just happened, we’ll all be taken down with the same method.”

As if to prove Felt’s words as she grit her teeth in frustration, the members of the Aldebusters who ought to have been driving Al into a corner were decreasing. At a glance, several people had fallen to the ground, left behind by the fierce battle unfolding.

From how Felt had put it, the reason they had collapsed would have been the same as Rom-jii—

Felt: “Rom-jii wouldn’t go down without a fight! Keep searching! There’s gotta be something!”

Having expended a few seconds in her interaction with Felt, Petra looked at Rom-jii’s large body. She also considered Rom-jii to be someone who, without any oversights, would live up to Felt’s expectations. Hence, if Felt believed that there had to be something, then there was undoubtedly something.

“Subaru”: “I mean, if you suddenly get hit with an Authority, there’s no way you’d be able to leave any clues behind…!”

Petra: “…You think, it’s an Authority?”

“Subaru”: “It’d be strange if it wasn’t! Nee-sama would’ve realized if it was magic!”

Petra: “Right.”

Felt’s insistence × faith in Ram’s insight.

The multiplication of those two factors lent credence to the idea that it was Al’s Authority that had toppled Rom-jii. And so, if Rom-jii had truly left something behind—

Petra: “—! Here!”

Upon thoroughly investigating Rom-jii’s body, which was lying languidly sprawled on the ground, Petra noticed that the old giant’s finger was covered in dirt. And what had caused it to be dirtied, was the mark he had scratched into the ground with his finger.

Falling, and using that impact to shift the giant’s body, Petra tumbled down and discovered the message that Rom-jii had left on the ground.

That was—

“Subaru”: “A mark? Kanji… nah, some sort of map symbol…?”

Petra: “Not that, it’s more simple!”

At “Subaru’s” speculation upon witnessing the same thing, Petra put the brakes on his theorizing in a loud voice.

The mark that Rom-jii had inscribed on the ground—it was a thick horizontal line, with four small vertical lines layered over it. It was not kanji or a map symbol, it was “tally markers” that counted up the number five in a single unit.

In other words, just before Rom-jii had lost his consciousness—

Petra: “—He was… counting something?”

5

—The Territory’s bug had begun to encroach upon Aldebaran’s plan.

Aldebaran: “Shit…”

Faced with that aggravating reality, a curse escaped through the gaps between Aldebaran’s clenched teeth.

The first one to fall had been the strategist of the Aldebusters, Valga Cromwell. Despite the loss of their commander, was it Petra’s Authority that had allowed them to recover so quickly? But, if its effect was just crushing the interval, then it meant that everybody had managed to collect their emotions through their own individual strength.

Each time he keenly felt the strength in each and every one of their hearts, Aldebaran’s own weakness was brought into focus.

Aldebaran: “Shit…!”

In that instant as he thought about his own immaturity, the Aldebusters suffered yet another dropout. A thug brandishing a large machete fell to his knees, fainting as he spewed yellow gastric juices.

Aldebaran made no counterattacks of his own. He could not. As a fundamental tactic, he was being repelled by Garfiel, whose base stats were on a much higher level, leaving him unable to mount a counteroffensive. Even so, his opponents had gradually been bleeding strength as the result of Aldebaran's unintended bug.

???: "—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created."

Once again, he heard the Witch's voice.

As soon as he did, the subsequent bug was activated, and another body hit the ground.

That was difficult for Aldebaran. It was painful. Unbearable. —The mental abrasion produced by the Territory's bug, the fact that it sometimes would beget an outcome more repulsive than Death of the body, was something Aldebaran had come to learn in his days since waking up on the Gladiator Island.

Hence, Aldebaran did not desire any such unintended conclusions to be brought about by the Territory's bug—

???: "—The hell are you doing blaming others for?"

Aldebaran: "—Ah?"

???: "It's obvious even without needing to see your face. It also pisses me off when people like Reinhard wear a face that seems to say that everything's their own fault, but… yours is way worse than his could ever be."

Shaping a gap and forcing his way through the breach, Aldebaran found Felt glaring at him from across the human wall of the Aldebusters. Dwelling within her sharp crimson gaze was a stern, scornful ire directed towards Aldebaran, bereft of lie or falsehood.

This was an ardent fury, one that she had not even displayed when he had taken her hostage, nor when he had ordered Roy to eat her Memories, so he could not fathom what he had done in this moment to truly incur her wrath.

Neither the fall of the giant who was like family to her, nor the near robbery of the path she had forged until this point, the source of this ire that Felt now directed towards Aldebaran was—

Felt: “When that princess was around you’d do whatever she told you, so now that she’s no longer among us, you’re just gonna do whatever a totally different person says like a puppet? Even though you’ve got the nerve to talk all big and declare yourself the enemy of the entire world, do you really have no personhood to call your own?”

Aldebaran: “…”

Spoken with an expression of anger from the very depths of her soul, Felt’s words caused Aldebaran’s cheeks to stiffen ever so slightly, and following that, his rage began to well up at the jabs of this utterly ignorant teenage girl.

To say he had no personhood; even thoughtless declarations had their limits. Without even knowing the reason why Aldebaran could never call himself anything but Aldebaran, how dare she claim that Aldebaran had no personhood.

Indignation scorched his entrails, and he sensed a nostalgic pain in his arm bereft of its forearm.

This kind of useless rage ought to be cast aside. It was supposed to be his strong suit. To dismiss things, to scorn them, to ridicule them as being naught but obstacles in his way, and to cast them aside. Getting entangled with such things and losing sight of his objective would just be putting the carriage before the ground dragon; after all, avoidance of confronting his raw, genuine emotions was Aldebaran’s special skill—no, it was a certain kind of worldly wisdom that he had acquired during the eighteen years since he had been released from that black orb.

And so this time, he would do the same—

Garfiel: “‘S exactly as th’ amazin’ Felt told ya!” / Rachins: “Pay for what you’ve done, bastard!” / Gaston: “Drop dead, you moron!” / Camberley: “Nobody’s got your back anymore, bastard!” / Flam: “Al-sama, prepare yourself.” / Grassis: “The hour of judgment.” /

Doltero: “Go ahead and cry like a pig.” / Ram: “—Truly a fool.”

Aldebaran: “—Hk.”

With the force of a surging wave, a torrent of abuse crashed into Aldebaran like a tempest of disdain. He attempted to ignore them like he usually—with his thoughts Compressed, he was forced to confront them all. With his processing circuits shortened to speeds far beyond normal, he was left being made to process every last superfluous thought and emotion.

???: “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.” / ”—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.” / “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.” / “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.” / “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.” / “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.” / “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.” / “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.” / “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.” / “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.” / “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.”

As Aldebaran felt an urgency to not allow such a progression, a voice drowned out everything within his mind. Loath to surrender himself to that, Aldebaran searched for the girl at the root of the situation.

To the Witch of Tristitia who had forced Aldebaran to deliberate over every last thing, he would—

???: “—He was… counting something?”

Aldebaran: “…”

Having spotted the Witch of Tristitia, Petra Leyte, in the distance, he could make out that she had muttered those words upon discovering some sort of message left by the collapsed Valga Cromwell.

That instant, a thick, blackish, ardent impulse began to brim over from within Aldebaran, taking on the form of words.

Aldebaran: "—Your stars, were bad."

Felt: "Yeah, there you go. You're nobody's puppet. Now your true feelings are finally showing."

Hearing Aldebaran's words, woven by a voice tinged with torrid fury, Felt flashed her teeth.

Even though no part of that should have resembled her in the slightest, not whatsoever, not a single millimeter nor a single shred nor a single iota, it appeared to him as a smile of the same nature as the one Priscilla Barielle would often display.

A nightmare. —As such, he must extinguish it.

Thus, for the first time in his life, Aldebaran willfully invoked the bug of the Territory.

Aldebaran: "—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition."

6

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never wish for kindness from anyone.

7

Aldebaran: "—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition."

As Al's voice spoke those words, Petra turned around whilst sensing a certain alteration.

She had already heard that battlecry several times over the duration of this battle, and likely, it was some sort of activation requirement for Al's Authority. In a Territory, with a Matrix; as Rom-jii had surmised beforehand, in exchange for the limitations on Al's "Turning Back Time", it seemed to be quite a powerful ability.

Its time frame was far shorter than Natsuki Subaru's Return by Death, yet it was consciously activated.

"Subaru": "If it was possible to manually save in a baseball game, then you'd be able to save and load for each ball in the batter's box, remember what type of pitch it is, and then keep hitting homeruns every time."

Petra: "I get it, but it's tricky to understand. Can you really do that sort of thing?"

"Subaru": "It's a bit difficult to explain to a girl who only knows the concept of the game on a surface level…"

For having read Natsuki Subaru's Book of the Dead, she had intended on understanding it past the surface level, but in the sense that they were Memories that did not come alongside firsthand experience, what the Imaginary Subaru was saying was correct.

Although she was peering into Subaru's Memories, Petra's sensibilities remained entirely her own. Though of course, as with her feelings toward Emilia and Rem, what mattered most in that regard was how large a portion those emotions occupied within Subaru.

In any case—

"Subaru": "—You can't let him out of sight."

Petra: "I know."

With the change in his voice and demeanor, the battle against Al was likely advancing to the next stage.

All the while, he had been whittling down their combat strength using the same method he had used on Rom-jii, yet miraculously, the Aldebusters' main force, centered around Ram, Garfiel, and Felt, still held strong. There was no doubt that the Compressed thinking and communications were proving to be a great help, so Petra found it worthwhile to extract the absolute most value out of utilizing the Authority of Tristitia, shutting her eyes to its many demerits.

Felt: "Let's get him, you bastards!!"

Everyone: "—YEAHHH!!"

As if to substantiate Petra's determination, the overall morale of the group erupted with Felt's rousing cry.

The pressure being applied by the Aldebusters was certainly chipping away at Al's reserves, abrading his mind as it drove his heart and body to a lethal point of exhaustion.

It would all come down to whoever's willpower ran out first, a test of endurance until one side could no longer remain standing—indeed, it had happened at the moment Petra clenched her teeth, with her body and mind roused to high spirits.

Petra: "Huh?"

In spite of herself, her tightly clenched jaw dropped agape, leaving Petra dumbfounded.

That was only natural. After all, it was only just a moment ago that the Aldebusters had fired themselves up, brimming with motivation as they triumphantly launched their all-out assault on Al. —Those members of the Aldebusters, without any warning, suddenly began toppling down where they stood like dominoes, unable to do a thing about it.

Petra: "…"

That included Ram, and Garfiel too. It of course included the members of the main force, Felt, Flam and Grassis, Rachins, Gaston, Camberley, Doltero, and even the rest of the members of the Aldebusters all lost their strength; not a single person was left standing. Some fainted, some had their eyes lose focus as a result of extreme exhaustion, and some were petrified like dolls, becoming unable to move.

Everyone, it was all of them. —No, there was still one person who remained standing.

Aldebaran: "—It's the stars."

Climbing over the wall of collapsed Aldebusters, the person who had stepped forth, while fiddling with the metal fixtures of the black steel helmet on his head, spilled those words.

As they reached her ears, Petra felt as if a part of her brain had gone numb, unable to put her head to good use. She could not afford to cease thinking. Even if Compression could fill in the intervals between events that happened, it would serve no use in filling an expanse of void.

Aldebaran: “Your stars, were bad.”

Declaring so as he approached her, Al removed his hand from his helmet and reached out to Petra, standing motionless as she was.

Right this instant, she needed a way to deal with it, a response, a countermeasure—

“Subaru”: “—PETRA! FALL BACK WITH COMPRESSION!!”

Petra: “—Hk.”

Reflexively following the angry-sounding plea, Petra Compressed space, retreating a great distance backwards. Having created a much greater distance between them than simply jumping backwards would have, Petra’s knee trembled as she gazed at Al across the rocky terrain.

Receiving her gaze, Al repeatedly opened and closed the hand that had failed to grab Petra and breathed a long sigh. Then, with that distance opened between himself and Petra, he glared directly right back at her—

Aldebaran: “—Play ball.”

× × ×

Al: “—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition.”

It was the moment she thought she had heard Al say the catchphrase that was typically used to declare the start of a ball game.

As if to overlap with that expression, a different declaration of Al's followed just after. At that phenomenon of simultaneous utterances from the same person, Petra's brain momentarily came to a halt as it attempted to grasp the situation.

But, as that stagnation would have been fatal, she immediately attempted to pull herself together—

???: "Let's get him, you bastards!!"

???: "—YEAHHH!!"

Petra: "Eh?!"

The very next moment, a courageous cheer and response shook the air, and she was stupefied.

Spread out before her, alive and well, were the figures of the Aldebusters, who were supposed to have been plunged into a catastrophic state mere moments ago. In a battle formation with Ram as the commander, Garfiel as the vanguard, and Felt readied with the Star Staff as the finisher, they were about to clash with Al.

But—

"Subaru": "Oi, oi oi oi, oi, this is…"

Astonished, the Imaginary Subaru floating beside her voiced his bewilderment. Even if she knew that bewilderment was the same sensation she was feeling, no peace of mind came upon Petra's heart.

Only, receiving a tremendous discomposure, the situation moved faster than she could speak any words to stop it.

Petra: "—Uh."

Undoubtedly, that was a replay of the scene that had unfolded just earlier.

The members of the Aldebusters all collapsed in unison, causing the exceedingly reliable group to crumble. As the powerful and brave

Ram, Garfiel, and Felt keeled over, Petra once again crossed gazes with the last person remaining, Al.

Aldebaran: “—It’s the stars.”

Petra: “…”

Aldebaran: “Your stars, were bad.”

That too was the exact same proclamation, followed by the exact same movements, so without needing to be prompted, Petra relied on the emotions in her heart, and leaped backwards through Compression.

Once again, glaring at Al across the distance opened between them, she heard his voice breathe out a sigh.

That was—

Aldebaran: “—Play ball.”

—That marked the beginning of Petra Leyte’s unending hell.

Chapter 56:
Petra Leyte

1

—Petra Leyte was a country girl born in Arlam Village, a village in the Kingdom of Lugunica.

She had been born with a remarkable appearance and a natural shrewdness, but other than that, there was nothing particularly noteworthy about her. Originally, there would have been no room for her to become involved with events that would be engraved into history, and she would have likely lived out her entire life as a mere villager, with any prospect of visiting a city being nothing more than a dream.

Ergo, having veered off her “original” route, becoming involved with several larger-than-life incidents that would go on to be etched into history, Petra’s current state of existence was a result that had been warped through interference.

The fact that her fate had been distorted, was something that even Petra herself was aware of.

“Originally”, Petra was a cringeworthy girl who prided herself on her cuteness, under the mistaken impression that she could lead all the nearby adults and children around by their noses. Surely, the “original” Petra would have never corrected that misunderstanding, instead spending her days selfishly acting like the ruler of her own miniature world.

She did not think that would have been a particularly bad life. She believed such a life would have been happy and enjoyable in its own way.

Only, now that she had strayed from the “original”, Petra’s values simply did not allow her to view that as happiness.

Petra: “After all, none of the people I currently love would be there, would they?”

Subaru would not be there. Frederica would not be there. Emilia would not be there. Beatrice would not be there. Meili would not be there. Ram would not be there. Rem would not be there. Ryuzu would not be there. Annerose would not be there. Garfiel would not be there. Otto would not be there. Clind would not be there. Roswaal, well, that could wait for now. —But, everyone would not be there.

Petra: “That sort of thing, it’s horrifying.”

If her “original” self was the one who had never met the people she loved, and herself that was standing here now was the result of some collision of fate, then she was truly glad she had strayed off from it.

As the result of taking a route that was not the “original”, one after another, she had been subjected to difficult experiences, painful experiences, sorrowful experiences, bitter experiences, experiences that made her think she was going to die, and experiences that almost made death seem like the preferable outcome.

But, beyond even those tough experiences she had been put through, there were things she had been given, things she had managed to grasp for her own.

Hence, Petra Leyte believed this from the bottom of her heart.

Petra: “Even if I could redo my life over and over, I’d still choose to stray from the “original”.”

Then, I’d meet you again and again, just so I could tell you this.

That person who knows the same suffering as you, despite looking so pained and so anguished, is still wishing upon the stars, after all.

Petra Leyte would—

2

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never see off another's departure.

3

Petra: "—Hk."

With a sharp exhale, she kicked off the rocky ground, running with reckless abandon.

Correcting her form, leaning forward, getting off to a start so ideal that it even amazed herself, she ran faster than she ever had in her entire life, and ran, and ran, and ran.

The sound of blood pumping roared through her body, her heart pounding out of her chest as if it would burst, and, leaving her own ragged breaths far behind her, she ran.

But even when she ran that hard—

Aldebaran: "—Play ball."

The moment that cold declaration reached her from behind, her vision completely shifted.

Before she knew it, the fastest sprint her legs had ever run in her life had come to a halt, leaving her standing frozen in astonishment upon the rocky terrain. Laid out in front of her was the familiar scenery to which she had assuredly turned her back, and within it, the man clad in steel helm muttered.

Aldebaran: "—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition."

That was the signal that the man, with his face concealed behind the helmet of jet-black, had commenced some undertaking by use of his Authority.

This span of time would always commence with that declaration of his, followed by her allies within her field of vision, knowing nothing of that man's undertaking, fiercely raising voices that shook the air.

Felt: "Let's get him, you bastards!!"

Everyone: “—YEAHHH!!”

Centered around the battlecry of the courageous young girl, the group’s morale swelled to a zenith, and exploded. Spurred forth by that momentum, they all charged at the steel-helmed man in unison. —But, it was no use.

The result was plain to see. Their outstretched hands could not reach the other party no matter what they did.

Petra: “…”

As though a thread had snapped, all thirty-seven individuals collapsed on the spot.

It appeared as though they had all collapsed at once. But, by carefully observing the manner in which each and every one of them collapsed, she had long since figured out that the way they fell actually had a very precise order to it. But, then again, there was only a difference of around two seconds between the first and the thirty-seventh person to fall.

There was no room to interrupt in those brief few seconds, and any attempt to do so had ended in futility.

???: “It’s not like it was futile. Learning that a method isn’t going to work, isn’t futile.”

Harboring such a bleak sentiment, her eardrums were thus struck by a voice—no, it was not her eardrums. This voice was not one delivered by vibrations in the air, so it was not her eardrums that had resonated.

If it was not her eardrums that had resonated, then, just what in the world had it been?

???: “That’s a given, isn’t it? It’s the heart.”

The heart. —Yes, that’s it. That’s right. It was because her heart had resonated, that she had been able to hear it.

Her heart still had enough leeway to resonate. As proof of that, he was there.

And so, mustering forth that name of his—

Petra: "—Subaru."

"Subaru": "Yeah, I'm right here, Petra."

Petra; as those lips of his called out her name, she breathed a sigh of relief.

That was right. She was Petra Leyte, she still clutched onto that, refusing to let go.

After all, if that was the case, then, therefore, that was why, it would mean.

Aldebaran: "—Play ball."

—Petra Leyte had no choice but to continue on this tour of hell.

4

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never accept the charity of another.

5

Aldebaran: "—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition."

Aldebaran: "—Play ball."

An interval, commencing with that declaration, and concluding with that proclamation.

Just how much time had Petra spent trapped in this loop exceeding not even a single minute?

Petra: "…Though, not even a single second has passed."

With such a riposte to the whisperings of her own heart, Petra exhaled a raspy "hah".

Even she found it to be a terribly cynical mutter, one of self-ridicule that seemed to despair over the world. To think that she could utter a voice clouded by such deeply blackened emotions, it was a shock to even herself.

But, it was certainly neither some sort of mistake, nor a matter of having misheard the voice of another.

After all, in this place—

Petra: “The only voices present are mine, those people’s, that man’s, and Subaru’s.”

Flopping down on her backside, Petra pressed her forehead against her knees and grumbled so.

Before her eyes, the group of thirty-seven people attempted to charge at the lone helmeted man, and once again did the moment unfold in which they were all dispatched with nary a sound.

Truly, they were all out of their minds. Why couldn’t they just understand?

Petra: “Are they all just slow in the head? Why do they keep charging straight ahead without any strategy, even when it’s clear they’ll be taken down…”

See, there it happened again. Everyone was falling down, one after another.

An all-too-familiar sight, one far more absurd than the figures of villains that would be defeated incessantly by champions of justice on the morning Hero Time on TV.

Over, and over, and over and over and over, and over again —.

Petra: “—How stupid.”

There ought to have been clever individuals in their ranks, yet, why, for what reason, did they have no strategy? Even though they had been defeated time and time again, why did they not consider trying out any different approaches?

She knew. Those people were unaware that they had already been defeated countless times. They had no idea that they were being defeated over and over again, nor did they understand that they would only continue to be taken down over and over again.

If one knew not what lay ahead, then there was no avoiding being engulfed by that predetermined progression. She was just venting her anger toward them. It was unreasonable. It was illogical. She knew that. She knew, but.

Petra: “Even so, you’re all grown-ups, so just do something about it already…!”

Upon her folded knees, again and again and again, she slammed her forehead.

It hurts. It doesn’t hurt. It hurts. It doesn’t hurt. It hurts. It doesn’t hurt. It hurts. It doesn’t hurt. It hurts. It hurts.

Petra:
“AAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAA
Aldebaran: “—Play ball.”
AAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAA

× × ×

AAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAA
Aldebaran: “—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition.”
AAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAA

Across both the terminus and commencement of the loop, she had succeeded in raising her voice. So what?

At the eccentricity of Petra suddenly raising that strange cacophony, a shift was born in everyone who had been about to charge at the man helmed in steel. They all turned their eyes towards her, aghast at the sight of Petra scratching at her head and clamoring out.

Felt: “Oi, what’s wrong?!”

Garfiel: “Petra! Th’ fuck’s happenin’, did he do somethin’ to ya?!”

Ram: “Fall back, Petra! You are the cornerstone for Ram and the others!”

Voices hurtled towards her. Worrying for Petra, who had raised a strange cry upon being subjected to some abnormality, everyone in that moment produced fresh voices and words, trying to comfort Petra.

That made her glad. Thank you. I love you all. Really. Truthfully. But, I’m sick of it.

Petra: “…I already know all that, you know?”

What manner of voices everyone would raise if Petra broke down like this, she knew.

That they would all do their best to rack their brains if Petra earnestly tried to explain the loop to them, she knew.

The fact that everyone would lend an ear if Petra proposed that they all run away and scatter through Compression, she knew.

She knew. She knew all of it. She had seen it, heard it, referenced it, divulged it, imparted it, discussed it, pondered it, challenged it, strategized against it, tried to defy it, tried to abandon it, picked it back up, then cast it aside again.

Petra: “Say something different already. Show me something different already. Be different already. Different from just now, different from before, different from what’s next, different from this time, just do something different already…!!”

With a crumpled up face, the very visage of ugliness, Petra’s voice fractured with unseemly cracks, raising an incomprehensible string of words as she scratched at the ground to the point that her nails were starting to peel off. Beholding that, everyone was rendered speechless, but immediately pinpointing the cause to be the man in the steel helmet, they directed the brunt of their rage towards him, baring their fangs.

Ram: “Petra, stand up. Ram will lend you her shoulder.”

As the group charged towards the man in the steel helmet, one person had broken away from the crowd and extended her hand out to Petra.

How kind. Even in this situation, even with her sharp voice and steely expression, her hand was kind. I love you.

Petra: “But you see…”

Aldebaran: “—Play ball.”

× × ×

Aldebaran: “—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition.”

Indeed, her disheveled face, her peeled-off nails, her worn-out voice: all were restored.

The concern they had shown her, their uproar of righteous indignation, that distress towards one’s protegee, all of it had been reset. —Having been reset, they would savor the unspoiled beginning and end with brand new feelings.

Felt: “Let’s get him, you bastards!!”

Everyone: “—YEAHHH!!”

How nice it must have been for everyone. With feelings so fresh, they could still cry out in such high spirits.

But she could not. She couldn’t. She had tried to do her best with them, and had done her best with them over a hundred times. But, that would change nothing, everyone would still collapse so selfishly before her with their eyes gone white; it was truly unfair.

Petra: “Maybe I should also get a bit unfair.”

With a pout upon her lips, she blurted out such words.

As she did so, everyone had already gone beddy-bye, so before Petra, the man approached with disorderly steps as he fiddled with the metal fixtures of his helmet.

Petra: "…"

Then, leisurely, the man reached the very hand that had been fiddling with those fixtures towards Petra.

This was just a passing thought, but did he properly take care of that helmet? He would need to make sure to oil it, wipe it with a dry cloth, and do all the proper maintenance, wouldn't he? Realizing that this person had been fighting constantly without even the chance to bathe, she felt a bit of resistance towards the hand that was extending towards her. But, she would endure it. Enduring it and enduring it, she waited for the outstretched hand to reach her. It might be harder if she kept staring at him. In that case, she'd shut her eyes so that he could catch her while she did so. Alright, oooone, twooooo, threeeee…

× × ×

Aldebaran: "—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition."

Right. Thought so. Even getting caught is no good. Ahahaha, just die already.

6

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never speak of my failures.

7

Aldebaran: "—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition."

When she initially realized that she had been caught in a loop that commenced upon that signal, Petra had managed to maintain her composure without being greatly perturbed, even in the face of such an aberrant situation.

She had naturally been a bit shaken, but it was far less than one might have expected.

That was because—

“Subaru”: “Petra! We’re looping through a short timespan! It’s Al’s next trick!”

Shouting that out in lieu of Petra, was the sole entity who was sharing in the loop that Petra had been caught in, the only one who had experience with the flow of repeating time: the Imaginary Subaru.

The presence of “Subaru”, and the message left by Rom-jii that she had seen just before being trapped—the marks etched into the ground as if tabulating something, had suppressed Petra’s discomposure.

Petra: “Rom-ojiisan was also put through what I’m experiencing now.”

One horizontal line overlapping four vertical ones; that was a method of keeping count known as “tally marks”, which, when using kanji, would typically be done by drawing the “正” character.

By leaving that engraved upon the ground, Rom-jii had conveyed the situation he had been placed in to Petra.

It was difficult to imagine that Rom-jii had ended up in that state after only the five times he had marked, so what he had intended to convey was not the actual number of times he had looped, but rather the fact that he was looping in itself—having already fallen into the same predicament, the information might have seemed too late for Petra, but that was not so.

The message Rom-jii had left behind, was a clear warning to Petra.

In other words, that which Rom-jii had wished to say was this:

Petra: “If I keep on repeating this forever, I’ll end up like Rom-ojiisan.”

The collapsed Rom-jii had sustained no external injuries, and it was not as though he had ended up like this due to being tormented by wounds accumulated through the repetitions. —No, in a sense, there was no doubt that it was a result of that which had been accumulated.

In other words, across the time that Rom-jii had repeated, his mind had been completely whittled away.

Without a doubt, that was precisely the same tactic that Petra and the Aldebusters had attempted to use against Al, so it could be said that he had turned it around on them as an act of revenge.

She did not think that Al had been aiming for such a revenge, but either way, if she had been caught in this situation without any preparation, Petra might have suffered the same fate as Rom-jii.

“Subaru”: “Nah, it’s not just Rom-jii. From the looks of it, the same thing happened to Ram and the others.”

Petra: “…Right. Al-san is using his Authority on everyone who’s charging at him in the same way… but, the timing of when the loop starts, is when everyone is still conscious, isn’t it?”

“Subaru”: “Sure seems that way… It may be a repeating situation, but maybe it’s something like, it also reflects the real-time events outside the loop? So after someone gets taken down, it exits and moves onto the next, or something? In that case…”

Petra: “—I’m already the only one left.”

The meaning concealed within “Subaru’s” words was far too hopeless, causing Petra’s cheeks to stiffen.

Supposing that by the time Petra’s turn in this loop arrived, the fates of her allies in the Aldebusters could no longer be altered,

Petra: “Even if this loop were to come to an end…”

“Subaru”: “Wait wait wait wait, don’t be so pessimistic. Even… even if, even if that turns out to be the case, you know? We’ve got the Authority of Tristitia. With that, we could Compress their cooldown time or something…”

Petra: “…Compressing the time that they’re fainted, so they can suddenly get back up?”

“Subaru”: “Yeah! It’s never been done before, but wouldn’t it be amazing if we did it?”

As Subaru snapped his fingers and proposed his idea, Petra’s breath caught slightly.

In truth, she could imagine that such a feat would be rather difficult. It was possible to use her Authority to Compress time for discussion or the interval it took to acquire a new skill, but it required a comparable amount of energy.

In a nutshell, if Petra were to Compress a single day for herself, it would consume a day’s worth of energy. For three days, it would be three days’ worth, for seven days, seven days’ worth, and so on. If it required a month, or even somewhere in the denomination of years, to recover a heart worn thin, then there would be no way to supply the energy necessary for Compression.

Compression was by no means omnipotent. —But, even if that was the case,

Petra: “—Yeah, I think it would be really amazing. We might be able to do it.”

“Subaru”: “Right? That’s why, you’ve first gotta drill it into your head. Once you escape the loop, the first thing you need to do is get everybody back up on their feet. If you don’t, you’ll be overwhelmed in one fell swoop.”

As “Subaru” constructively planned for the events that would transpire upon the loop’s nullification, she nodded in agreement with him.

Then, looking back, she believed that Rom-jii had probably thought the same thing. Likely, even if it wore out his heart, the wise old giant had prioritized inscribing a message into the ground unconsciously; by accreting that motion over and over and over again, he had managed to lock in that action for when the loop had come to an end.

In that case, she ought to accept “Subaru’s” plan of deciding on the actions to take immediately after the loop concluded.

Only—

Petra: “…How many times did Rom-ojiisan need to reset to ingrain that into his body?”

Even with his mind worn thin, fallen into a state where he could not preserve even his sense of self, Rom-jii had successfully managed to scratch the ground right after his loop had ended. To memorize that action, engraving it into his soul so that he would be able to perform it even if his heart was shattered, just how much had he accreted?

Petra: “…”

“Subaru”: “Petra, let’s do some testing. In the past, Beako devised a looping hallway that went on forever. If the rules are the same as that, then there’s gotta be a condition to end the loop.”

Petra swallowed hard, and “Subaru” informed her of their next course of action. Smiling back a “Yeah!” with a nod, Petra once again faced forward.

Felt: “Let’s get him, you bastards!!”

Everyone: “—YEAHHH!!”

Even during the conversation Petra and “Subaru” were having just now, the sequence of her fellow Aldebusters challenging Al, before toppling down before him, had been repeating.

In all honesty, as she had gleaned from his Book of the Dead, the way Subaru would cherish each and every loop, carefully storing the details of all the events within himself, was something she respected and thought of as cool; but, it would be difficult to pull off the same thing in this loop that exceeded not even a single minute.

“Subaru”: “I gotta say, even I think it’s unreasonable to expect you to properly mourn each time they all get taken out in a situation like this. But, there’s something you gotta make sure you remember.”

Petra: “The number of times it repeats?”

“Subaru”: “Well, that too, but for each of those times, Petra, you need to remember the anger you felt, the regret you felt, and the sorrow you felt. Remember that, no matter what.”

Petra: “—Mm, that’s right.”

In this world of repetitions, amidst the loop that only continued to go on and on and on, she was the only one who could carry these feelings forward, so just as “Subaru” said, she had to ensure that she remembered.

After she exited the loop, even if Al had no idea of what Petra and the rest had endured, she would never forgive him. No matter what, she would hammer into him exactly how much they had suffered.

With that vow in her heart, Petra nodded at “Subaru”, and faced to the fore.

Aldebaran: “It’s the stars. —Your stars, were bad.”

Then, facing off squarely against the approaching Al—

Aldebaran: “—Play ball.”

Petra: “—Play ball.”

“Subaru”: “—Play ball.”

Indeed, they bravely declared their intent to embark on this tour of hell.

8

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never let anyone tie up my hair.

9

—And so, her resolve having been steeled, Petra continued to wander the depths of hell into which she had plunged herself.

Petra: “…What should I do?”

Grasping her knees, slamming her forehead against those knees, again and again, she questioned herself.

What should she do? What was it that she ought to do? How could she put an end to this loop?

Petra: “What’s the condition?”

There was a condition for this loop to terminate. —That person had said as much to Petra.

And Petra was of the same opinion. It was standard practice for these types of situations, the kind where the same events would play out repeatedly without end, to have some sort of end condition that would serve as the trigger. A formula. A foregone conclusion. A rule, and since it was a rule it had to be kept. It just had to. Surely it was being kept. Because it was kept, there would certainly be a way to put an end to it. Yes, that’s all. This argument is over. Since it’s over, it’s time to think about the condition. The trigger to end it, what could it be?

Petra: “I tried all sorts of things, you know?”

Employing Compression to the fullest, she had surely attempted an array of methods much more vast than any ordinary person would have.

She had worked with her allies to defeat this man in the steel helmet, and when it was clear that taking him down was not a viable option, she had attempted to let everyone flee by means of Compression. Of course, Petra had also tried getting herself as far away as possible, tried deliberately letting herself get caught by the outstretched hand of the steel-helmed man at the end, and she had even tried leaping straight into the arm of the man in the steel helm on her own accord. It had all been for naught.

Considering the possibility that one of her allies might have possessed some method of breaking the deadlock, she had even tried discussing with each and every person, deeply probing all of their individual circumstances, laying bare their secrets, hearing all about their family situations, upbringings, and hometowns, and finally sharing the sorts of things that people would typically not even disclose to close friends of over ten years. It had all been useless.

Wondering if the correct answer was perhaps to approach the steel-helmed man, she had tried speaking to him, tried giving him the cold shoulder, tried winning and losing against him in a one-on-one fight with none of her allies, tried winning and losing against him in a fight without using Compression, tried running away, tried mocking him, tried lauding him, and had tried singing. It had all been meaningless.

Petra: “So then, what the hell should I even do?!”

She had done it all. She had, hadn’t she? She had done just about every last thing she could possibly think of, hadn’t she? Even though she did, had it not all been for naught? Even though she did, had it not all been useless? Even though she did, had it not all been meaningless?

Felt: “Let’s get him, you bastards!!”

Everyone: “—YEAHHH!!”

Petra: “SHUT UUUUP!!”

Even though they were unable to do anything at all, those spirited shouts pissed her off. If they weren’t going to help, the least they could do was to not get in the way of her thinking. Ahh, I’m just venting my anger on them. I hate this, I hate this, I hate myself. I don’t want to have these kinds of thoughts. What the hell’s that about, trying to act all goody-goody? This is the real me, isn’t it? Everyone there, I don’t even like them or anything of the sort. I just like the version of myself who seems so unprejudiced and tender and compassionate and big-hearted to be saying that I love all those people so so so so much, isn’t that right?

Petra: “SHUT UP SHUT UP SHUT UP SHUT UP SHUT UP…!”

Right and left and up and down and front and back and past and future and present and today and tomorrow and yesterday and the day after tomorrow and the day before yesterday and last year and this year and next year and past life and current life and next life absolutely all of it everything everywhere all at once and all of everything just shut up.

Aldebaran: “—How many times has it been now?”

Shut up. Just die already. Or maybe, I should just kill you?

Aldebaran: “It continues.”

Thought so.

× × ×

Aldebaran: “—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition.”

Back to the same place. Now wasn’t that a surprise? Sometimes he’ll even say something other than play ball.

During this loop, since all the others present here aren’t simply puppets, they’ll react if something is said to them, and they’ll respond accordingly if something is done to them. And that wasn’t just limited to them, it went for the man in the steel helmet too.

Maybe it was obvious, but it seemed the man helmed in steel could tell what she was going through.

Petra: “So what?”

Even if he knew, this world would end, and when the next one starts not even he as the instigator would follow her there.

Petra was always alone, constantly restarting in the same world without cease. Nobody could understand Petra’s struggle and suffering. She was all by herself, all by her lonesome. Completely alone. Was I completely alone?

Petra: "—Hk, Subaru! Subaru?! Where?! Where are you?!"

"Subaru": "PETRA!"

The moment she remembered him, as if a flash of lightning, his figure suddenly appeared right before Petra's eyes. Seeing that, Petra immediately knew that he was Subaru, and she breathed a sigh of relief.

Everything had seemed to be on the verge of blurring and fading away, slipping from her grasp, but even so, it was not as if she had forgotten everything, nor had she been abandoned.

Petra: "Subahrhuu… hk!"

As tears immediately began to overflow and sully her disheveled face, she rushed over to him. She leapt towards him. He promptly held both of his arms out, and attempted to embrace Petra. —He could not.

She passed right through him. Upon the desolate ground, she tumbled down without any attempt to catch her fall. It hurt. She fell flat on her face. Subaru—no, "Subaru" did not catch Petra. Of course. It was always that way. After all, "Subaru's" hands were always occupied with somebody else.

Petra: "In that case, don't even bother reaching your hand out to me!!"

"Subaru": "Petra…"

Petra: "Back then… back then, wouldn't it have been better if you'd just left me there to die?! If in the village, if you had done nothing, if you had just left me to die to those Witchbeasts, wouldn't it have been better…?!"

She knew. If Natsuki Subaru had not interfered, Petra would have died long ago.

Even though she had died, she was still alive. She had ended up living. Because she had ended up living, she was now going through such suffering, with such painful thoughts, and none of it would come to an end.

“Subaru”: “I’m sorry, Petra… I’m sorry! But please hang on! Don’t talk like that…”

Petra: “Hah, hahhh?! What’s that?! Even though I’m going through such a hard time, you’re scolding me?! Even though I’ve been hurting all this time, over and over and over again, crying like this… y-you’re s-s-scolding?? You’re scolding me? Hah, ahah, ahahah, JUST STOP IT ALREADY!!!!”

“Subaru”: “…”

She exploded. She had done it. —She had really gone and done it now.

There was “Subaru”, a look of sorrow and concern painted on his face, and Petra began wanting to vomit blood. Began wanting to gouge her own heart out. Began wanting to blow her own head off. Actually, why not?

Petra: “The most straightforward trigger, to end the loop…”

With those words, she formed a finger gun, and pressed her index finger against her temple. Concentrating Mana in that fingertip, a dim, white light began to illuminate.

Beholding this sight, “Subaru”, petrified, reached his hand out towards Petra. Even though he couldn’t touch her at all, see, it went right through.

“Subaru”: “Petra, wait! Don’t be so hasty! I get it, I really do, but please hold off on that sorta method! If the opponent’s aim is to make you do that, then…”

Petra: “Then, marry me already!!”

“Subaru”: “—Hk.”

Petra: “Make me your bride already! Become my Subaru already! Make me your number one! You saved me so marry me! Embrace me for the rest of my days! Claim my life for yourself already! If you do, then fine. But you won’t do that, now will you? In that case, my life is my own, isn’t it? If it’s my own life, then just let me use it as I please!”

Vic.ll2o

Even she herself did not understand what she was trying to say.

Anyhow, everything was making her angry. Not a single thing was turning out how she wanted it to. She was angry at all the people who were not doing anything about the situation, and at the man in the steel helmet who had caused the situation. She hated it. Hated it, hate it. But I love Subaru. Hah. I don’t get it. He’s not doing anything for me, is he? But, he’s always been doing stuff for me, and even now he’s still trying his best to do something for me, isn’t he? He won’t marry me, though.

Petra: “What’s the deal with that, how stupid.”

“Subaru”: “Pet—”

Ah, I didn’t mean it that way, you know? I wasn’t saying that to Subaru, you know? I’m the one who’s stupid, after all.

Ah~hh, a head like this, I guess I don’t need it anymore. Bye bye.

With that thought, a white light shot out of the finger gun with a “bang”—

× × ×

Aldebaran: “—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition.”

—.

——.

———.

————.

—————Right. Thought so.

Ahahahaha. Ahahahahahaha. Ahahahahahahahahahahahahaha.

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never hope for fortune’s favor.

11

—The Witch of Tristitia, Petra Leyte, had confronted the battle with an unshakable resolve.

The Witch Factor she had received from Clind, and the possibilities of the Authority of Tristitia it invoked, were so extraordinary that it made her believe no power in this world could match this Authority’s efficacy in rigging the game in one’s favor.

So naturally, in order to wield such power, worthy compensation was required. —As the saying went, with great power comes great responsibility. Maybe it was a bit different.

Either way, since she was deliberately taking on those enormous drawbacks, she had to make sure that the benefits would play their part to the fullest. If she could not manage that much, then Petra, having resolved to keep lying even to her loved ones, would never find peace.

Petra: “I’m glad Frederica-neesama isn’t here.”

If Frederica had joined the Aldebusters, Petra was not sure if she would have been able to keep up the lie. Rather than it being a matter of Frederica’s insight, Petra was simply weak to Frederica.

In Frederica’s presence, Petra’s heart lay bare; she owed her too much love and respect to be able to hide anything. Surely, she would have ended up pouring out everything she felt in her heart, crying, depending, and clinging onto Frederica.

If it were just a matter of keeping things hidden, the same thing could have been said about Ram and Otto when they were in top shape. Only, Ram was in a merry mood thanks to the restoration of Rem, and Otto without his Memories could not fully exhibit his natural insight, so neither of them had noticed Petra’s lie.

Petra: “I wonder exactly how much Clind-niisama knew about, and still chose to overlook?”

Age unknown and motives unclear, yet still believed to be an ally at the very least, it would not have been strange if Clind had entirely seen through all of Petra's intentions, but on the other hand, perhaps it would not have been so strange for him to be completely blind to the subtleties of the human heart, given how close he was with Roswaal.

Either way, right at the beginning of all this, Clind knew that Petra had made an enormous sacrifice.

His position was thus one in which either outcome was conceivable: that she would offer up nothing else, having already paid such a huge price, or that she would easily offer up more, having already paid once.

In that case, it worked best for Petra to interpret it as a silent push of encouragement for her resolve.

Regardless of Clind's true intentions, Petra had already rolled the dice.

Petra: "By now, how many have I done…?"

To never imbibe. To never pen a missive. To never clutch a stuffed toy. To never put needle to thread. To never sing. To never play with children. To never visit places of fond memories. To never hold beautiful flowers. To never partake of her favourite food. To never return to her hometown. To never shed a tear in the company of others. To never wipe the tears of another. To never speak of fond reminiscences. To never retell her favourite stories. To never call others by terms of endearment. To never invite another into her home. To never nurse the deathbed of another. To never hold the hand of another. To never desire reconciliation with another. To never display weakness to another. To never watch the morning sun in the company of another. To never be picky about anything. To never cry for another. To never wish upon the stars. To never rendezvous with another. To never walk in the sunset with another. To never tread upon the shadow of one who walks beside her. To never speak of her dreams to another. To never partake in celebrations. To never bestow a gift upon another. To never wave at anyone. To never pray before going to sleep. To never comfort the wounds of another. To never find joy in a clear sky. To never lament a rainy day. To never gaze upon a rainbow in the company of another. To never cherish silence. To never divulge this important secret. To never wish for kindness. To never see off another's departure. To never accept charity. To never speak of her failures. To never let anyone tie up her hair. To never hope for fortune's favor. —There were a lot.

There would be no end to it if she began to count everything she had offered as compensation, and it could even be said that Petra had a very bleak life ahead of her.

Petra: "Even so, this is still quite a bit better than it could be."

The trick to telling a good lie was to mix in a grain of the truth. —That was a well-known maxim, and Petra's lie had ended up taking on a similar nuance.

—The price for the Authority of Tristitia was being paid not just by its holder, Petra, but also by a great number of other people.

This was the condition Petra had proposed to gain everyone's consent for her to take on the Witch Factor; however, this method could only compensate for Compressions focused on the Authority's effective target.

If Emilia desired a Compression to move herself, it was possible for it to be invoked with compensation from Emilia, but if Petra thought Emilia was in danger and used Compression to move her, it would have been Petra who paid the compensation. —This was something that only the holder could have been aware of.

Every little conference between the Aldebusters; when she tossed Al to the Agzadd Canyon together with Emilia and Rem; whenever she promptly withdrew her allies out of sticky situations; when she had Compressed everyone's vehement pain into a single instant: Petra had been the one to pay the compensation for all of that.

She believed that the more precious a sacrifice was, the greater the capacity would be for the effects of the Authority of Tristitia.

Whenever it influenced the world, it also weakened Petra's own ability to interfere with that world. If Petra were to ever simply offer up her entire life, the Witch Factor of Tristitia would likely bring about an even greater power.

Petra: “But, I won't do that.”

Even if the Authority encroached on Petra Leyte, making her sell off her life bit by bit, diminishing her hopes for the future, and making her relinquish a great deal of happiness, Petra would never do anything like throwing her life away in despair or resorting to other such extreme options.

Petra: “That sort of thing, it's uncool.”

She did not want to show him any part of herself that was uncool. She did not want to do anything that was uncool.

During her fight against the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, Roy Alphard, it was the same. —So long as those feelings continued to sustain her, Petra would never compromise her sense of self.

After all, to the stars, Petra would, Petra Leyte would——God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never hold up the back of another.

12

13

Aldebaran: “—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition.”

Why must I go through this sort of thing?

Did I do something bad? I've been a good girl, haven't I? I tried to be a good girl, you know?

So why, and how, did things end up like this? Someone just explain it already.

???: “Let's get him, you bastards!!”

???: “—YEAHHH!!”

What should I do? I’ve tried just about everything, you know? I’ve done it all countless times, you know?

I’ve tried every last thing that I could manage to come up with. I fought and won, you know? I fought and lost, you know? I fought and let him die, you know? I fought and died, you know? I died without fighting, you know? I ran away, you know? I shed tears, you know?

Aldebaran: “It’s the stars. —Your stars, were bad.”

I tried dying so many times. I tried finishing him off so many times. I tried running away so many times.

I apologized to him so many times. I raged at him so many times. I cried to him so many times.

It was all so, so scary. It was all so, so painful. It was all so, so agonizing.

Aldebaran: “—Play ball.”

Thought so. It never ends, does it? He won’t let it end, will he? Even now, in this moment as he listens to my weeping, he refuses to show me any concern, and he’ll just end up forgetting after ten seconds anyway. Mm-mm, it’s not that he’ll forget. He’ll just cease to know. He’ll leave me behind. He’ll leave me, and only me, behind.

Aldebaran: “—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition.”

I’m sick and tired of it. I hate everyone. I hate them, I hate them, I absolutely loathe them.

Why won’t they try to help me? Even though I’m crying out as hard as I can like this, why won’t they?

It never ends. It won’t end. He won’t let it end. And he won’t let me end it. Even now, I’m still…

???: “Let’s get him, you bastards!!”

???: “—YEAHHH!!”

Even if I weep, even if I scream, even if I clamor, even if I curse, the same events will just endlessly repeat.

Amazing. I was mistaken. I was so conceited to think that I might be able to do something about this. My reliable… reliable? Even though they won’t do anything for me? Well, whatever. My reliable allies, just who were they again? That woman and the like, they’re all supposed to be amazing, so then why couldn’t they overcome this?

Aldebaran: “It’s the stars. —Your stars, were bad.”

But here’s the thing, I know. I’ve known all along. After all, it can’t be helped. More and more and more and more, I’m becoming unable to think straight. I’m losing all interest in the things happening before my eyes. That’s not it. It’s not that I’m losing interest, I’m just trying to distance myself from it all. I even know the reason why.

Aldebaran: “—Play ball.”

After all, I don’t want to hate everyone or anything like that. But, whenever I think about everyone else, I just end up hating them all for not doing anything for me. So, I’ll stop. I won’t think. To make sure that I don’t end up hating them, I’ll stop thinking. I just won’t think about anyone. I don’t care about those people at all. Ah, that’s wrong. Sorry sorry, that’s a big fat lie, I love them all. Yes, loooove them.

Aldebaran: “—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition.”

Well, it can’t be helped, can it? I’m still a child after all. I can’t just grow up and become an adult all of a sudden. If I just stay here forever like this, repeating the same moment again and again, will I eventually become a grown up? Well, sorry to say, but I won’t. After all, it’s just the same moment in time that’s repeating. No matter how hard I try, it’s always the same. If it’s always the same no matter how hard I try, wouldn’t it be fine to just stop trying?

???: “Let’s get him, you bastards!!”

???: “—YEAHHH!!”

Yes, that’s right, trying my best had been meaningless. It was always the same. Haah, trying my hardest was all for nothing. Let’s just stop thinking about such difficult things. Haah, trying my hardest was all for nothing. It was all completely meaningless. I’ve been doing things for no reason this whole time. Right. That’s right. Thought so.

Aldebaran: “It’s the stars. —Your stars, were bad.”

I tried my hardest from the start, so it can’t be helped, can it? Even if I try my best, it’s not like I can become king. It’s not like I’ll be cherished. It’s not even like I could get married to that person. So, it can’t be helped anymore. It simply can’t be helped.

Aldebaran: “—Play ball.”

It can’t be helped, so, let’s just end it already.

???: “—There’s nothing, that can’t be helped.”

Why?

???: “Giving up isn’t easy, is it…? But, it can be easy.”

Why? What for?

???: “When your heart folds, or even when you die, those are nothing but scratches.”

Why? What for? You’re really still saying all that?

???: “That’s why…”

Why? What for? You’re really still saying all that? What then?

???: “That’s why—”

Why? What for? You’re really still saying all that? What then? Then —?

???: “—We… can still do this. It’ll be a piece of cake.”

—.

——.

———.

————.

—————Really, he is such a bad liar.

Thought so.

14

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never give up.

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never bend the knee.

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never regret my choices.

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never cry bitter tears.

—God, Buddha, Od Lagna. For as long as I live, I hereby vow to never forget that which I have loved.

15

—Petra Leyte was a country girl born in Arlam Village, a village in the Kingdom of Lugunica.

The “original” Petra was not a girl who would have ever participated in a battle to decide the fate of the world.

As a mere village girl, she would have either lived a somewhat good life with her cuteness and shrewd nature, or been engulfed in one of the world's great billows, ruthlessly scattering her life to the waves. That was all she had been.

But, straying off the "original" route, and getting to know her current self, Petra had a thought.

Petra: "Even if I could redo my life over and over, I'd still choose to stray from the "original"."

Yes, that was right. Straying from the "original", Petra would always end up arriving here.

And so, Petra wished to say this. To you, the one who saved me, and steered me off my "original" path.

And, to you, the one who's trying your best to lead me by the hand with those lousy lies and anguished expression; I have this to say:

Petra: "—It's thanks to the stars, that I can be here today."

"Subaru": "…"

Aldebaran: "…"

With those words, Petra wiped her lips with the back of her hand, leaving both Al and "Subaru" at a complete loss for words.

Setting Al aside, she knew the reason for "Subaru's" speechlessness. He must have thought that his own lousy lie and attempts at encouragement had gotten Petra so depressed that she would have not even been able to speak.

Certainly, it had been a lousy lie. The trick to a good lie was to mix in at least a little bit of the truth, she had even just mentioned it; this lie, however, had failed to mix in any fragment of the truth whatsoever, truly a lousy lie of the highest degree.

Petra: "But, I don't want to let the person I love become a liar, after all."

And so, she got back on her feet through her own efforts. He could rely on neither comfort nor encouragement, so he had kept watching over her with such worry, trying to pat her head and support her back, though he knew he could not touch her; and seeing his admirable, desperate appearance, she finally thought to herself that there was no helping it. Falling in love was her weakness.

Petra: “The person I love, isn’t a liar.”

After all, she had stood up like this. Petra had stood, so Subaru was not a liar.

The repeating world had been an agony. Revitalizing a heart that had come so close to dying was no easy feat. In fact, it was the most difficult thing she had ever done in her entire life up to this point. But, she stood. She had gotten back up. Because right by her side, there was a person who always believed in the weak, pathetic, and clumsy Petra.

Petra: “There’s not a single thing bad about my stars.”

Amazing. The fact that I have to try my hardest no matter what, is tough. Even though I’m usually pretty clever, even though I can usually succeed at anything right away, living up to this person’s expectations, is really tough. But, even when she found herself in a hell so terrible that it would have crushed the hearts of anyone else and left them unable to stand, a hell that made her go through the same moment however many hundreds, thousands, tens of thousands of times, this person continued believing in her for no good reason whatsoever, saying “Petra won’t lose!”, so she had no choice but to push forward.

If Natsuki Subaru believed that Petra Leyte was a girl so tough that her heart would not break even after looping tens of thousands of times, then, she would make it so.

Petra: “You see, isekai girls need to at least be able to make miracles happen on their own, or else they won’t be able to get by.”

After all, if she had never strayed off the “original” rails of fate, she would have never even met the person she now adored from the bottom of her heart.

Petra: "—Al-san, no matter how many times this repeats, I think it's pointless."

Having interrupted his signature phrase about blaming the stars or whatever, Petra declared thus toward the silent Al.

This was no bluff or brave front, but rather Petra's true beliefs—even if this interval repeated far beyond the realm of tens of thousands of times, and entered the realm of billions or even trillions, it would not be able to wear Petra down.

After all, a girl's love was infinite—it was no fairy-tale solution like that either.

Petra: "This is a loop that repeats until your enemy's heart is fully expended, right, Al-san?"

Even when she triumphed against Al, even when she killed him, even when she sent him far, far away, it did not end.

Even when she was defeated by Al, even when she was caught by him, even when she ran far, far away, it did not end.

Even when she killed herself, even when she was killed, even when she tried to abandon everything in despair, it did not end.

Simply put, even though it had repeated over ten thousand times, it did not end.

Petra: "But you know, the point that it's cut off ought to be decided by you, right, Al-san?"

The way to put an end to an endless loop; she could not imagine it being anything other than Al undoing the Territory.

The loop was likely nothing so convenient that it would end on its own once the target's heart was shattered. The timing to end it would always need to be consciously executed by the Al inside the loop.

Ultimately, if she got Al to throw in the towel, then this loop could have been ended on the very first go around without even needing to reach ten thousand tries. —All that was needed was to make the cautious and cowardly Al of the initial loop decide to do so.

Petra: “So, I’d like for you to cut it off here. Other than me, everyone else has already collapsed, so your fruits of battle should be sufficient, Al-san. Even if you continue this, it’ll just be meaningless.”

Let it be said once more: this was no bluff or brave front from Petra.

Even if this loop repeated for the rest of eternity, Petra’s heart would not break.

After all, Petra had made her choice.

Petra: “You see, I’m no longer able to give up, I can’t have regrets either, nor can I cry tears of frustration, and I’ll never be able to forget all the people who I love so much. —That’s the sort of Witch I’ve become.”

—After all, Petra Leyte had chosen to become the Witch of Tristitia.

Witch of Tristitia: “Hey, Al-san. —How many more times are we going to have this conversation?”

Indeed, at the Witch of Tristitia’s question, a faint hum rumbled in Al’s throat.

It was apparent that his eyes, hidden under the veil of steel helm, had begun to smolder with emotions of dusky black upon discovering something inscrutable deep within the Witch of Tristitia’s own round eyes. By some chance, perhaps that might have been related to an unfading scar rooted in the very depths of Al’s heart.

Perhaps, in some time long past, he had peered deep into the eyes of a Witch, only to be wounded in the process.

On that trauma, she would—

Witch of Tristitia: “—Compress Agony.”

Compressing the trauma Al carried, she forced it into him.

Boiling his brain, reversing the flow of his blood, then peeling the scabs off all his unhealed wounds of joy, lamentation, happiness, and sorrow, she rubbed it in: not salt, but trauma.

A stimulus of trauma so potent that he would go on to shed tears several dozens, hundreds, and thousands of times whenever he recalled it in his life here to come, in that instant, she made him taste it with a concentration of a thousandfold.

Aldebaran: “—Ah.”

That moment, with the dread he harbored towards the Witch of Tristitia, and the Compression of his stimulated trauma, Al reacted not with his body, but with his soul, reaching out for the relief most familiar and accessible to him.

That was to say—

Witch of Tristitia: “—Game set!”

—The way to put an end to an endless loop, was to force the start of the next loop.

Arriving at that conviction, the Witch of Tristitia entwined her hand with the intangible hand of her beloved, smiling as their fingers overlapped.

Witch of Tristitia: “How uncool. —If it was Subaru, he would have put up a brave front and said that a fractured heart’s nothing but a scratch.”

“Subaru”: “You, are just way too cool, Petra.”

With a sense of powerlessness, yet brimming with pride, her beloved spoke those words to her.

As those words filled the Witch of Tristitia’s heart, she continued to face forward.

—Now then, this was it, the final showdown.

Her wounded heart, the weakness that had made her wish to end it all, and the tears she had shed in regret; because she had offered all of those as compensation—the Witch of Tristitia would not relent until victory was secured in the form she desired.

16

—Undoing the Territory, and tying it up anew, he reconstructed his Matrix.

That was an admission of certain defeat for the imposition of the Territory that ought to have guaranteed a certain victory.

But, it could not be helped. There was a precedent. The Territory could not kill a Witch put in the position of Aggressor.

Of course, the term “kill” was not being used literally here, as the target was purely restricted to the heart, but—

Aldebaran: “…”

Having boldly proclaimed that she could endure Territory, was Petra—no, he could no longer merely call her Petra. Without any exaggeration, she had undergone a complete transformation.

Aldebaran: “—The Witch of Tristitia.”

In the past, the one who had broken through Aldebaran’s Aggressor of the Territory, was the Witch of Greed.

Thinking back, regardless of whether it was the Victim or the Aggressor who took initiative over the Territory, a bad omen always lingered over Aldebaran’s Authority as a trace of his defeat in his first battle.

Regardless, even now that the Territory had been brushed off, Aldebaran still held the advantage in this battle.

Aldebaran: “—Hk.”

Aside from the Witch of Tristitia, the Aldebusters who heralded the subjugation of Aldebaran had been wiped out; unfortunately for them, the abrasions to the heart that came with using the Territory were absolute. It was not as though Aldebaran had decided to impose the Territory on them with a resolve so tepid as to allow them to escape it by acting or playing dead.

That was precisely why he would have been severing one or two of the target's limbs as verification before he decided to transfer the Territory onto the next target. Since that continuity did not exist within himself, he had no way of knowing exactly how he had ascertained that, but if his current self could think of it, then the him inside the loop would have also drawn the same idea.

Hence, he could say it with certainty. —Aside from the Witch of Tristitia, nobody would be able to stand.

Aldebaran: "But, that's something she'd also be aware of."

If she had stood up, then her other allies would also get back up; Aldebaran could not afford to underestimate the Witch of Tristitia standing before him as one who would commence action on such a naive assumption.

In that case, there had to be something. The Witch of Tristitia had a plan to still turn the tables on him.

—The girl, boasting of how the stars had allowed her to be here today even when transformed into a Witch, had a trump card.

Aldebaran: "…"

With the Territory undone, Aldebaran and the Witch of Tristitia were in a momentary state of release, and while there was a distance of five meters between them, it was tantamount to nothing given the opponent's Authority—or rather, with an Authority like Compression, there was no peace of mind to be found at any distance whatsoever.

But, it was an Authority.

She was undoubtedly bound to make a move, playing the card in her hand known as the Authority of Tristitia.

Naturally, the most likely possibility, given the effect of her Authority, was to summon others forth using Compression.

The probable candidates were—

Aldebaran: "—Lil' Miss Rem, and Lil' Miss Meili? Or maybe, her Margrave master?"

When he considered the potential personnel whom the Witch of Tristitia could assemble, and were not present here, the first ones to come to mind were those three. Rem ought to have been clashing against the highly admirable Yae, but since he had not glimpsed any discomposure in Ram, there was no taste of defeat that had been transmitted via their Synesthesia. It was difficult to imagine that Yae had been defeated, but he had now reached a stage where he had no choice but to consider it.

Meili was accompanied by numerous Witchbeasts, and Roswaal possessed monster-tier firepower that he had even let loose back in the Empire, so Aldebaran believed they were both highly possible.

But, none of them would provide anything more than being strong and formidable.

The fact that Aldebaran could not be driven into a corner with mere numbers or strength had been made very apparent up to this point. If that had been her aim, it could only be described as short-sighted —

Aldebaran: "No—"

It was not any one of them, Aldebaran could intuit as much from the Witch of Tristitia's eyes.

From the outset, this opponent had been Compressing her thought processes, giving her the ability to deduce conclusions while completely dismissing the concept of time. Any idea that Aldebaran devised and discarded, would have long been abandoned by the Witch of Tristitia during her preliminary review. —In other words, it was something different.

He would need to alter his way of thinking at its very core in order to catch up.

If the Witch of Tristitia were to call someone here, it would be an entity capable of breaking this deadlock—

Aldebaran: “—Don’t tell me!”

Gritting his teeth, his eyes widened. And in that moment, as if having waited to ascertain that spark in Aldebaran’s synapses, the Witch of Tristitia raised her hand overhead, and brought it down.
—Instantly, Compression took place.

Thereupon, the one who appeared between Aldebaran and the Witch of Tristitia, it was.

???: “—Wow. This is way more carnage than we thought∼.”

—Clasped in handcuffs, his mobility constrained, it was Roy Alphard of Gluttony.

17

The moment he saw Roy dropped there, Aldebaran was convinced of his opponent’s intentions.

He had estimated the probability of Roy not being dead to be around eighty percent.

To begin with, if they were attempting to save the victims of Gluttony, Roy’s survival was indispensable. With Rem’s Name having actually been regurgitated, the Aldebusters ought to have been all the more convinced of that fact.

Regardless of how they would get him to cooperate, they would have realized that no negotiations could take place if they took his life. —The remaining twenty percent chance of him dying stemmed from two possibilities: the prospect of a situation in which they could not devise a solution in which they could let him live; and the worry of Roy tending to instigate far too excessively, angering his opponents to the point where being killed would have been unavoidable.

Either way, Roy's survival was fortuitous—but, his opponent's aim was a problem.

Rather than counterintuitively acting to serve the interests of her enemy, the Witch of Tristitia would have naturally had a reason to go out of her way to summon Roy here. She would have had an objective. She would have had a secret agreement or something akin for Roy to work to her advantage.

And so, having made an inconceivable comeback after having read the Book of the Dead, she would have pieced together from Natsuki Subaru's knowledge the reason as to why the Witch of Envy had taken action. If she could figure that out, then there was a chain of possible actions she would have unlocked.

That was—

Aldebaran: "—Getting Reinhard!"

Supposing the Witch of Tristitia had colluded with Roy to have him use his Authority, if it was the Witch of Tristitia who had shattered her own heart to the point where even the Territory had no effect on her, it would not have been strange for her to opt for the ultimate self-sacrifice in order to recover Natsuki Subaru.

That was an idea Aldebaran himself had also come to, the world's salvation via the Authority of Gluttony—to take an individual who had read Natsuki Subaru's Book of the Dead, and strip them of those Memories.

Then, the Witch of Envy would withdraw, and the deterring force of the world, who had been stuck keeping her at bay, would come.

The Sword Saint, whom he had successfully surmounted through numerous attempts and traps, would come.

—If the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea, were to arrive here, that would be the end.

His plan would come crumbling down. Hence, Aldebaran poured the entirety of his soul into preventing that outcome.

To Roy Alphard of Gluttony, summoned to the scene via the Authority of Tristitia, he would—

Aldebaran: "—You're forbidden from devouring Memories! You'll be scorched by the curse mark!"

Once again, he tightened the conditions that had previously been slackened.

Being the one who had applied the curse mark, the repeated modifications to the conditions also caused serious damage to Aldebaran's soul, and he could feel his Od fissuring deep within his body. That was not a feeling of pain, but rather, a profound sense of loss; the sensation of one's very core being undermined, something that Natsuki Subaru was also said to have experienced.

But with this, he averted the crisis of Roy eating the Witch of Tristitia's Memories.

So long as the Witch of Envy did not withdraw, the Sword Saint would be hindered from—

Witch of Tristitia: "—Al-san."

Reaching this place; in that moment, as he subconsciously clenched his fist, before he could even finish that thought, it occurred.

The Witch of Tristitia had called to Aldebaran. Her plans derailed, he thought she surely ought to have been making a bitter face, and certainly, a painful expression adorned her countenance.

But, that was not a visage lamenting her own future. —It was one that looked at him in pity.

Aldebaran: "What are—"

As a shudder ran down his body, Aldebaran contemplated the meaning of the Witch of Tristitia's expression.

But, that had been a mistake. Thinking had been a mistake. Rather than thinking, he ought to have killed himself immediately. If he died now, then no matter what it was, he would have still managed to make it through somehow.

But once again, when it mattered most for Aldebaran, die he could not.

Just like when he had failed to keep the sun of this world from setting, once again, he could not.

Witch of Tristitia: “—Play ball.”

It transpired in that moment, as the Witch of Tristitia spoke the line that Aldebaran had intended to say, but had failed to get the chance.

—The natural enemy of Aldebaran, was now standing right behind him.

18

Petra: “—I think I might know Al-san’s weak point.”

Before the Aldebusters had officially formed, during the strategy meeting held to approach the defeat of the Al Troupe, that was a realization that Petra, who would go on to become the Witch of Tristitia, had come to.

When she learned from Rom-jii’s testimony that Al’s Authority was a looping ability similar to Natsuki Subaru’s own Return by Death, Petra had reasoned that if its activation condition was also the same as Subaru’s, then there ought to be a way to thwart it.

But then again, it was not as though she could tell for certain at that point.

As for whether or not the method would be viable, there was a need to verify it with the person in question, but aside from a one-sided acquaintance through the Book of the Dead, Petra had essentially zero points of contact with her—no, with him.

But, thinking that it might be possible, she had gotten in contact with him before the Aldebusters commenced their operation, and had promised that she would only call him to the pitching mound as the ultimate trump card when they had truly pushed Al to the absolute limit.

Thus—

Witch of Tristitia: "—Play ball."

While getting revenge with the declaration that had been spoken to her over and over again, the Witch of Tristitia looked at Al, lying beyond Roy Alphard, who she had situated between them as a decoy.

Alas, Al had acted exactly as the Witch of Tristitia had intended, in exact accordance with her wishes.

She imagined that if he saw Roy, he would presume that she was aiming to have him employ his Authority. —This was Roy, who had cut a secret deal with Felt, harboring a rebellious spirit against Al. If he had come by the opportunity to learn of that fact amidst his "Turning Back Time", then she predicted that he would foster doubt towards Roy's intentions.

Sure enough, Al had acted just as she hoped, choosing to seal off Roy's betrayal.

The fact that, at the same time as Roy, the Witch of Tristitia's trump card had appeared right behind him, would have likely completely transcended the realm of his consideration. He had likely failed to even imagine that this person might have been here.

The sixty-one Aldebusters who had fought in this battle represented the total strength that the Emilia Camp and Felt Camp had managed to assemble; there was no falsehood in those words. —Indeed, that was the total number of participants from the Emilia Camp and Felt Camp.

Hence—

???: "You're completely worn out, aren't you nyow? —Let's heal it for you, kay?"

Even if one scoured the entire world, they would never find any greater healer—that instant, the highest tier of healing magic belonging to the Blue, Ferris, wrested Death out from Al’s grasp.

V!c.1120

19

—The Blue, Felix Argyle. Better known as Ferris.

The one and only Knight of Royal Candidate Crusch Karsten, and the greatest practitioner of healing magic in the Kingdom—nay, the greatest in the world. Thus, he was the last of Aldebaran's three natural enemies.

He was the final barrier whom Aldebaran could not afford to encounter, having already set aside Natsuki Subaru and the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea, for the sake of his plan.

And so, upon Aldebaran, he applied magic that was tender and merciful, yet undoubtedly cruel.

Aldebaran: "Ah, GAHHHHHHH—!!"

The moment all of the hairs on his body stood on edge, Aldebaran resolutely spun around, and, shoving the person who stood behind him—Ferris, to the ground, he undid the package of poison within his mouth.

Instantly dissolving on the membranes of his tongue, it elicited a tremendous threat to Aldebaran's facilities of life, and would deliver him unto death in a mere few seconds—no longer. The tissue that ought to have been crumbling apart was thoroughly restored, and even the nosebleed that had begun to gush forth beneath his helmet had ceased within a single second.

Aldebaran: "FUCK—"

On account of this, he created an impromptu stone dao and, placing it against his own neck, he slashed with all his strength.

Having severed a thick artery, blood gushed out with terrific force, and with that, Aldebaran's life was—under no threat whatsoever. The wound healed instantly, and he felt no more pain than about the prick of a needle.

Aldebaran: “FUCK, FUCK, FUUUCK…!”

He had been played. As far as he knew, this was the most terrifying, most effective way to seal Aldebaran.

The method to seal Return by Death was nothing special. —It was simply to prevent them from dying. That was all it took.

The very means by which to “kill” Aldebaran and Natsuki Subaru, lay in the gentlest hands this world had ever seen.

Witch of Tristitia: “This is the end, Al-san.”

Indeed, the Witch of Tristitia calmly apprised Aldebaran as he lost his composure in such an unseemly manner.

He could not die. He could not redo. Seeing Ferris on the ground beside him, he considered dispelling the healing magic, but—

Ferris: “It’s nyot happening. Or do you really wanna try having a pointless contest of endurance with Ferri-chan?”

Ferris, whose expression did not budge even with sword thrust before him, was likewise an individual who had steeled his resolve to take on this challenge.

If Ferris was applying the same healing magic upon himself that he was currently using on Aldebaran, then no matter how he struggled, he had no chance of dispelling Ferris’s magic here.

In other words, right here and now, Aldebaran needed to decide on what to—

???: “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.”

Aldebaran: “…”

Once again, he heard the Witch’s voice. —Just then, it happened.

A ruinous shockwave was birthed from afar, and with terrific vigor, it swallowed Aldebaran, the Witch of Tristitia, and all others present at this final stage in one momentous swoop.

—That assist was by no means something the Divine Dragon had intended to bring about.

With the battlefield having shifted, a clash against the rightful owner of the dragonhusk unfolded, and upon the perforation of its dragonhalo by the hyper magic of miracles manifested by the two magicians, the Divine Dragon had made a momentous choice.

Rather than pursuing its own immediate victory in that moment, it had opted instead to prioritize the purpose, the wish, and the long-cherished desire it had set out to fulfill together with its original self.

Divine Dragon: "—HAAHRAAN!!"

The final breath unleashed by the Dragon aimed for neither the dragonkin nor the magicians, dashing straight towards a land far in the distance—true to its aim, it landed a direct hit upon the ultimate destination that ought to be reached, the colossal hole that penetrated the land, said to be the deepest and darkest in all the world, tunneling down to its very bottom; the Grand Mogolade Geyser.

The cataclysmic devastation it had wrought, alongside the astonishment it had caused throughout the world, went beyond all description. Even upon this battlefield, it came surging forth as a great wave of earth.

Towards the battlefield of Aldebaran and the Witch of Tristitia, in the precise moment of their conclusion, the tremendous undulation surged forth.

Aldebaran: "…"

Completely oblivious to those circumstances, Aldebaran was engulfed in a fierce torrent of water and plumes of dust billowing forth, widening his eyes at this arrival of a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity—in the truest sense of the phrase, it was a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity.

There was no doubting that this was an opportunity beyond anything Aldebaran could have hoped for, his ultimate chance.

This was no scheme devised by the Witch of Tristitia, but rather a rare stroke of luck that had worked in his favor, something that ought to have seldom occurred in Aldebaran's life—a resource he ought to have fully expended when he had met Priscilla.

Aldebaran: "—Hk."

His shock lasted for but a moment, yet as Aldebaran was buffeted by the wind and rain, he strained his eyes across the battlefield shrouded in fog, searching for that which he needed.

His target was neither the Witch of Tristitia, nor Ferris, nor the fallen Aldebusters.

Here on this battlefield, there existed the sole, final measure that Aldebaran could still take.

With Death obstructed, and all his allies lost, it was the final method by which Aldebaran could still fulfill the long-cherished desire he had strived towards alongside the Witch, someone who no longer existed anywhere but within himself.

That was—

Aldebaran: "—Roy!! If you're there, then come out! Come and… come and eat my Name!!"

Updating the conditions of the curse mark with reckless abandon, he once again tasted in the sensation of his Od fissuring under the enormous burden, and with the resolve to make his very soul spew forth blood, Aldebaran screamed.

To return this situation to zero, that was the one and only stratagem Aldebaran could still take with his Authority having been sealed.

By having his Name eaten, and vanishing from everyone's memories, he would turn it all back around.

For that purpose, Aldebaran searched for the revolting form of Gluttony amidst the dense veil of dust, and screamed.

Aldebaran: “Eat me! My… my Name is—”

Christened Aldebaran, the one condemned to carry the fate of the Following Star.

By ridding the world of Natsuki Subaru, he would grant the Witch her wish long-prayed. Despite bearing such a destiny, he scorched with yearning for the sun, and as a result, he had lost everything, left as naught but a worthless wretch.

That person, his Name was—

Aldebaran: “Rigel. —Natsuki Rigel!!”

The foolish star who had betrayed the Witch’s expectations, and had plunged the sun into a neverending night; that was his Name.

Chapter 57:
Final Act of Servitude

1

—The reason why Ferris assisted the Aldebusters was, of course, none other than for the sake of his master, Crusch Karsten.

Originally, Ferris and Wilhelm had visited the Royal Capital with the intention of negotiating directly at the Royal Castle, hoping to join the survey team en route to the Pleiades Watchtower that had been cleared for entry.

It was during this time that the Aldebaran Troupe attacked the Royal Capital—a raid that unleashed a battle between the Sword Demon and the Divine Dragon, and saw the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony break loose from his prison.

???: "—There is a matter I wish to share with you, and something I would like to ask for your assistance with."

It was Otto, the Internal Affairs Minister of the Emilia Camp, who gave Ferris and Wilhelm the rundown, requesting their cooperation. When the details of Al's—of Aldebaran's atrocities, as well as the fact of Reinhard's participation in the conflict, had reached Ferris's ears, he was not as willing as Wilhelm was to offer their complete cooperation.

Of course, as a member of the Royal Guard, he felt indignance towards any who dared to disturb the Kingdom's peace. However, he was powerless in combat, and even his healing arts, which ought to have been his lone strong suit, were insufficient to save his master, the one whom he held dear above all else, so what more could he do?

In fact, in the battle that immediately followed, Wilhelm was defeated by the Divine Dragon, suffering serious injuries that left him unconscious, which only served to further reinforce Ferris's sentiments.

However, a situation arose that forbade Ferris from keeping his gaze downcast any longer.

???: “It has been some time, Felix-sama.”

Face-to-face with the maid—Rem, as she bowed out of courtesy towards him, Ferris recalled the events of the conversations they had shared, the battles they fought together, and realized that she was one from whom the Authority of Gluttony had been rescinded.

In other words, she was a living testament to the prospect of breaking one of Crusch’s two curses, those being of her Memories and of the Dragon’s Blood.

Ferris: “…In that case, I’ve got nyo other choice, do I?”

There was also the fact that Wilhelm, who had been a continued source of encouragement for Ferris at times when he felt worthless at Crusch’s side during her torment, had been taken down.

Accepting that request, he lent his strength to the Aldebusters in an attempt to stop the Aldebaran Troupe, who were determined to accomplish an unknown goal, even if it meant making an enemy of the world. To that end, he resolved himself to do whatever it might take.

But then again—

Ferris: “—Of all things, I never thought I’d be used as the trump card like this.”

As he was hit by the tremendous eruption of smoke, violent wind, and pouring rain, Ferris covered his mouth with his hand to block the dust as he reflected on the unexpected role that had been levied upon him.

With Petra’s power of Compression, it was possible to move objects swiftly or complete discussions in the blink of an eye—using this, the Aldebusters repeatedly employed the unfair tactic of transporting their wounded to Ferris to be healed before being sent back to the battlefield, progressively sinking their teeth into their formidable opponents.

That alone was already quite the major duty, but to be entrusted with delivering the decisive blow to Aldebaran, someone who possessed an outrageous ability, was something he could have never imagined.

—Upon Aldebaran, he cast perpetually active healing magic. That was the duty entrusted to Ferris, the trump card to be used against Aldebaran, a role that permitted no failure.

Ultimately, even now, Ferris did not fully grasp the meaning behind his role.

Taking into account the words of Petra and Rom-jii, whenever Aldebaran “sustained a mortal wound”, time would turn back to before he received that injury—such was his interpretation. By exploiting this, Aldebaran had been able to continue tiding over many a tight spot, allowing him to sidestep even Reinhard.

Frankly, Ferris found himself perplexed over what everyone was seriously considering as a possibility. Supposing that were really true, it would be far too invincible. Nobody could defeat that sort of thing, could they?

All the more so if they were saying that Ferris’s healing magic was the only way to overcome that invincible power.

He thought it would be far, far too big a gamble.

That just maybe, it might have been a foolish act to fully restore the enemy that everyone had worked so hard to corner.

Still, what if, by some chance, Ferris actually could deal the decisive blow to this battle?

???: “Don’t lament, Ferris. Your heart is precious. Be proud of your talents… You have the kindest power in all the world.”

Ferris: “—Your Highness…”

In the past, there was someone who spoke of Ferris’s power that way, taking pride in it.

Both back then, and even now, Ferris's power still fell short of the title of Blue. Even so, he wished to believe that there had been meaning in the fact that he had continued to polish it, not viewing it a curse.

To that end—

???: "—Roy!! If you're there, then come out! Come and… come and eat my Name!!"

Unseen within the cloud of dust, mixed with the roaring wind and the screams of the land, a voice could be heard.

It seemed that Ferris's healing magic had certainly proved effective as a trump card. This was evidenced by Aldebaran's violent discomposure, and his desperate cries through the wind.

But, the opponent had not given up just yet. —As Ferris also stretched out his slender knees to stand up, he began to ponder.

Ferris: "What else can I still do for the people I hold dear?"

So he spoke.

2

Aldebaran: "Rigel. —Natsuki Rigel!!"

Raising his voice amidst the dense enshroudment of dust, Aldebaran assiduously strained his vision.

The pouring rain, gusting winds, and rumbling earth roared, rendering him unable to discern the sounds in his surroundings. Even while bearing those unreliable senses of sight and sound, he still raised his voice as if to tear his throat apart.

The abominable power of healing that had been cast made it so that instead of spewing forth blood, his shrieking throat was instantly being repaired. While being bestowed such an ironic boon, he continued to scream with all his might.

Aldebaran: "ROY! ROOOY!! FIND ME! IT'S RIGEL! NATSUKI!

RIGEL!!”

Each time he said it aloud, he felt a heartache as if sandpaper filing away at his soul unseen, yet amidst it all, Aldebaran continued to cry out that name; time after time, he cried it out.

Natsuki Rigel. —Before he wore the mantle of the Following Star, that was the true name belonging to Aldebaran.

Aldebaran: “—Hk.”

Nothing about it felt real. Only, it caused a sense of irksomeness to cling to a corner of his mind.

For Aldebaran, rather than the name given to him by his parents that none had ever called him directly, it was the name that the Witch had called him by countless times, “Aldebaran”, that was far more familiar to his ears. Even that name had been transformed into a wound when the Witch had been reduced to the Witch of Greed.

As for who he “originally” was, he no longer knew. —But, self-recognition had no bearing upon it. The only thing that mattered was how Od Lagna had recorded this pathetic life.

That was why—

Aldebaran: “—I’m… Natsuki Rigel.”

That which he deemed only an abhorrence to give as his name, Aldebaran recognized it as part of himself.

Even if one rejected, shunned, or hated them, nobody could choose their parents in life.

Aldebaran: “…”

Continuing to scream even now, Aldebaran frantically searched for Roy amidst the fog.

Swept up in the devastating windstorm from a moment ago, all present on the battlefield had been scattered. Aldebaran had also been thoroughly tossed around, and the Witch of Tristitia, Ferris, and Roy were of no exception either.

At present, there ought to have been nobody else capable of mobilizing here. But, his opponent had preserved their trump card, Ferris, until the very last minute. It would not have been strange at all if they still had some cards left concealed. —Now that Aldebaran's Territory had been sealed, such a thing could serve as the deciding factor.

Aldebaran: "FUCK…!"

He thought that he might have been able to at least force the Territory's imposition upon Ferris, but it was no use. Upon being sidestepped by the Witch of Tristitia, the sensation of freedom he had grasped over the bug had once again receded into the distance. Even if that was not the case, there was a strong randomness to the target selection. He could not bear to witness the Witch of Tristitia be chosen again. On top of that, Ferris's healing magic—that which persistently sustained Aldebaran's recovery, was sourcing the Mana necessary for its operation from Aldebaran himself.

And now, because of his connection with "Aldebaran", that was practically inexhaustible.

Aldebaran: "If I can't rely on the Territory…!"

Intending to exhaust the entirety of the very Mana that was impeding him, he would clear away the obstacles with great magic. Formulating such an idea, Aldebaran visualized many techniques within his mind.

They were all things he had learned from the Witch, knowledge that had been shelved on account of lacking the requisite resources for activation, but now with his connection to "Aldebaran", he possessed the ability to employ them.

As was the case against Reinhard, he would wield them to the utmost, and break this deadlock without use of the Territory—

Aldebaran: "Blergh… hk."

—The moment he thought that, a nauseating sensation of vomiting filled Aldebaran's mouth.

At the vehement dizziness and tinnitus in his ears, Aldebaran nearly fell to his knees with an "Ah?". Under the impression someone had attacked him, he scanned his surroundings in a panic, yet no one could be found. —Then, he made the realization.

Right now, the true culprit behind Aldebaran's disorientation, was an unfathomable sense of pressure.

The pressure of being unable to make the wrong choices, was crushing Aldebaran's heart.

Aldebaran: "…You've gotta, be kidding me."

Staring down at his trembling right hand, Aldebaran was struck speechless.

In this high-risk situation, at this critical juncture where everything he had worked towards could be rendered meaningless, in peak physical condition thanks to that horrendous healing magic, in a scenario that demanded optimal and expedited decision making, to think he would lose his ability to think straight due a lack of nerve; what a terrible joke.

But, in truth, it was not a joke or anything of the sort. Even if it seemed as though a nightmare, it was reality.

—After all, Aldebaran had never definitively decided upon anything without the use of his Authority.

Prior to the commencement of this battle, in the Vollachian Empire, in the Royal Selection, on the Gladiator Island, and even before all that during his days with the Witch, every choice of Aldebaran's had always been the optimal decision, safeguarded by his Authority.

No matter how he might have failed, he would always redo, choose a different option, and nullify his mistakes. Living his life through those accretions was Aldebaran's very nature. And right now, that would not apply.

Aldebaran: “…”

He did not know what extent of wind he needed to generate in order to wipe away the dust without resulting in anyone’s death. The heat to evaporate the rainfall, the impact to offset the rumbling earth, whether it would be best to step into these plumes of dust leading with his right leg or left; everything was an unknown variable.

The fact that he could not verify anything, was terrifying.

To walk down a path without the guarantee of the right answer, was an act tantamount to fumbling around in pure darkness.

Such a path, with no certainty of reward, was one Aldebaran could not tread. —After all, with his Authority rendered ineffective, Aldebaran was nothing more than a helpless, wooden doll.

Neither the two Witches, nor the beloved woman, had that wooden doll been able to save.

Aldebaran: “—Hk.”

Once he began to think, nothing but undesirable notions flashed through his head.

Was feeding his Name to Roy truly the most optimal stratagem? Were there no other measures he could take? Should he use the curse mark as a shield and let Roy wreak havoc to capitalize on the chaos? What about discovering an unprecedented manner of death to slip through a gap in the perfect healing magic? Would it not be better to flee through the clouds of dust? Et cetera, et cetera, with his emotions racing ahead—.

???: “—Look at that, it is…”

Aldebaran: “…”

Those impatient emotions of his came to a halt at a sensation akin to being dashed in cold water.

Hesitation and fear, all of Aldebaran’s negative emotions that boiled over upon the sealing of his Authority: as if being dragged out by those, the greatest regret he had kept submerged down at the very depths of his being became tinged with heat.

A heat so intense that it would sear with a mere touch, enough to warm one's skin just by drawing near to it; yet contrary to that, feeling a chill that seemed to penetrate down to every last drop of blood in his body, Aldebaran sighed.

???: "It is mine—"

Aldebaran: "…Stop."

???: "Mine—"

Aldebaran: "STOOOOOOOOOP—!!"

Plugging his ears, averting his eyes, and nearly forced to confront something he had buried at the very bottom of his heart to avoid facing, Aldebaran screamed.

Rejecting the voice that sounded within him, rejecting the smile that flashed across his vision, rejecting the warmth that tried to enter his being, he bared his teeth. —That instant, he forced his eyes open, and caught a glimpse of a faint silhouette beyond the fog.

In an instant, the figure was lost amidst the veil of dust, but not a shred of doubt existed within him. It was Roy. It was Gluttony.

To pull Aldebaran away from these surging regrets—no, from this worst-possible situation that he was currently wrapped up in, there existed a sole ray of hope, and he had glimpsed it. That instant, he broke into a dash.

Aldebaran: "—Roy! I'm right here! Eat me! Come eat my Name!!"

The hesitation of which leg to step forth with, the cowardice of seeking a way to die, the weakness of trying to escape to enact a different stratagem, the carelessness of questioning his own choice; all of it was shattered in an instant with the impact of his foot kicking off the ground.

That moment, Aldebaran gained the composure to seize the choice fluttering before his eyes, deciding to flee from the most terrifying outcome.

—Up until this point, Aldebaran had always relied upon the power of his Authority to avoid ever locking in the “choice” he made on the first go. Ergo, he did not know.

That, when making a “choice” regarding a single thing, a decision motivated by a single-minded desire to escape a situation, would never affirmatively change the course of one’s own fate.

As if to prove that—

???: “—Al-sama.”

As Aldebaran attempted to rush towards the figure eclipsed by the fog in an effort to escape, his body was restrained by a being that had appeared right before him—the actions of Yae Tenzen, who was supposed to be his ally, served as proof of that.

3

—Upon her defeat in the battle against Rem, Yae’s “next” battle commenced.

Blown away, she rolled down the side of the ice mountain that had been made by freezing the great river, and abandoning all the blood-stopping methods she originally could have performed, she put all her efforts into playing the role of the defeated on the verge of death.

Her objective in doing so was—

Rem: “—I do not intend to take your life. It would sadden that person, after all.”

When the Oni girl spoke those words and applied her healing magic, Yae won her initial wager.

In all honesty, considering her lack of relent during combat, it was difficult to believe that she had no intent of taking her life, but since Yae had actually made it out with her life, she could not complain. —Above all else, if she dared to complain here, her only chance would fizzle away like a bubble on water's surface.

Unfortunately for Yae, she had no chance of turning the situation around on Rem here.

So long as she could not solve the contrivance that Rem had used to nullify Yae's attack in their final skirmish, then even supposing she succeeded in launching a surprise attack, she would likely fail to take Rem down. Thus, it would be none other than an act that wasted any chance at a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity.

Ergo, Yae's aim lay elsewhere. —It lay in one final act of servitude, devoting the entirety of her soul with what little she had left to offer.

As expected, Rem was also wary of a counterattack, and so the effects of the healing magic were kept to a minimum, leaving her condition at just closing up her bleeding wounds and stopping the countdown towards death. On top of that, she chained up Yae's hands and feet without any pushback, a thoroughness refusing to grant her any role above that of a hostage or prisoner. —But, with that alone, her perception of how to deal with a shinobi could only be called naive.

So long as they did not experience an instant death, it was in a shinobi's nature to get the job done, even if it meant letting their head fly.

She could dislocate all of her joints to escape the chains, and ignore her mortal wounds by burning her lower abdomen.

By doing so, Yae believed that she would still be able to do something for Al at the very end of the end, having failed to accomplish a single one of the duties entrusted to her.

Thus—

Yae: "…"

—The once-in-a-liftetime opportunity Yae had aimed for, materialized quicker than she ever could have imagined.

A tremendous impact vehemently engulfed the Agzadd Canyon and the entire surrounding area, so while the corollary cataclysm of aftershocks, wind storms, and flooding quaked the earth as an assault on the land, Yae sprung into action.

Fleeing from Rem, who had attempted to protect Yae from the impact, she broke away from the canyon, and arrived at the clifftops—it was then that Yae painfully realized the inadequacy of Al's henchmen, herself included.

Amidst the dust storm that seemed to be covering the entirety of the vast canyon, she saw that Al, far from reaching the Grand Mogolede Geyser, had been kept occupied by the enemy immediately after climbing up.

If Yae, if "Aldebaran", if Roy Alphard, if Heinkel, if the henchmen whom Al had gathered had been able to fulfill their roles, this ordeal would have never transpired.

That was precisely why—

Yae: "…"

Her vision disrupted by dust, her hearing disrupted by rumbling, and her sense of smell disrupted by surging billows of the wind, Yae consolidated what little information she could from her five senses, and accurately pinpointed the person she needed to find there.

Likely, there was nobody who could make the best of this situation like a shinobi could. Feeling grateful for her abduction into the shinobi village for the first time in her life, Yae gallantly hastened to that person.

This time for sure, no matter what, in order to become his strength —

???: "—Roy! I'm right here! Eat me! Come eat my Name!!"

—She had no choice but to be useful to Al. That was what she had believed, and yet.

Yae: “—Al-sama.”

Piercing through the enshroudment of dust, she caught the man’s rushing body head-on. Feeling the warmth, weight, and the pulsations of life from the touch of his skin, Yae hesitated from the bottom of her heart over what she ought to do.

Aldebaran: “—Ya, eh?”

Al, pitching forward from forcibly being stopped, immediately peered into Yae’s side-profile, and muttered those words as if witnessing something utterly unbelievable.

His trembling voice was filled with equal parts wonder and turmoil; however, the same could be said for Yae. —No, considering her resolve from a moment ago, it could be said that Yae was even more troubled than Al.

Yae: “I…”

She more or less had a grasp of the situation Al was currently in.

He had been cornered by some means, and was now attempting to maneuver out of these chaotic circumstances. Gluttony possessed the means to that end, so in order to help Al accomplish his objective, hastening toward the Sin Archbishop amidst the dust would have been the best thing Yae could have done for her final act of servitude.

Despite understanding that, Yae obstructed Al’s path. Slamming her entire body into his, she held him back.

Why had she done so? Shocked at her own actions, she scrutinized herself. —Yae feared Al, and she had wished for him to die, so she was trying to help him accomplish his objective in order to let him die. But, with Al as cornered as he currently was, Yae might have been able to kill him with her own hands. Was that why? Was that why she had stopped Al? Was she attempting to repay the dread he had made her feel?

Yae: “I…”

???: “—Is love.”

At the budding doubt, the figure of Rem declaring so without hesitation flashed through her mind, and Yae’s breath caught.

It was different; there was undoubtedly a difference. They may have both been maids trying to fulfill the objectives of their masters, but Yae and Rem’s motivations differed at a fundamental level. They could not be compared.

Only, recalling the Oni who pursued her single-minded devotion driven by her absurdly immense passion, Yae suddenly became privy to certain feelings of her own.

Yae: “I—”

Yae had wished for Al to die. After all, the monster known as Al was terrifying, so there was no helping it.

However—

Yae: “—I… it seems like I just can’t bear the thought of forgetting you, Al-sama.”

—From now to eternity, I could never wish to lose you.

4

Aldebaran: “…”

As Yae restrained his movement, and voiced the reason for doing so, a momentary lapse was born in Aldebaran’s mind.

He did not understand. He did not understand. Far too many things, he did not understand. —With Aldebaran’s Territory having shattered Yae’s heart, she ought to have become an absolute collaborator on the condition of his death.

The selfish confidence he had placed in Yae, had now betrayed him in this ultimate climax.

Had she always been waiting for the perfect moment to enact her betrayal?

He did not understand. He did not understand. Only, with his steps halted, it finally caught up to Aldebaran. —He had plugged his ears to it, averted his eyes from it, and even buried it at the very bottom of his heart; the voice he had wished to run away from the most.

???: “—Look at that, it is mine victory again.”

Aldebaran: “…Priscilla.”

In this moment where he needed to exert every effort towards pulling the possibility right before his eyes even a little bit closer, the mutter that spilled from Aldebaran’s lips was neither the name of Gluttony, nor that of the woman restraining him, nor even that which belonged to himself.

In this moment where he needed to do so, in this moment where he needed to carry that out, even now that his regrets for having failed to accomplish anything were piling up like ash, once again, Aldebaran wished upon that very mountain of ash.

Aldebaran: “What…”

Do you mean it was your victory, Priscilla?

You died. You died, didn’t you? The fact that you died, means that you lost. The fact that you died, means that your desires can’t be fulfilled anymore. The only ones in this world who get to continue on after death, are me and Natsuki Subaru. That’s why, it’s not the same for you.

And yet, what the hell do you mean it was your victory? Even though you’re the least suited to being a poor loser out of any woman in this world, at the very end, why didn’t you admit defeat?

In the end, why did you smile, Priscilla?

Yae: “Your stars—”

Aldebaran: “—Ah?”

Yae: “Your stars were bad, Al-sama…!”

As Aldebaran devoted his attention to those unanswerable questions, Yae stared up at him from within his chest.

Hearing her voice so bereft of composure, the words contained within caused Aldebaran’s breath to catch. Blaming the stars; it was a phrase that Aldebaran would sometimes vocalize, and something Yae had also heard him say.

So, was this an act of revenge? Now that she had halted Aldebaran, she would say those words out of retaliation—no, Yae’s crimson eyes were telling him that such was not the case.

The sincere radiance alight within those eyes, it was of the same quality as what had once illuminated the eyes of the Witch; they spoke to him:

It isn’t your fault, Aldebaran.

Aldebaran: “—Hk, there’s no way that…”

Could be true; such violent emotions immediately welled up within him.

The situations leading up to this point, the circumstances up until now, the merits and demerits of things having turned out the way they had, the fault for absolutely all of that lay with Aldebaran, and with Natsuki Subaru; it being any other way was an impossibility.

Thereupon—

???: “—Al!!”

Unobstructed by even the maelstrom of dust, a voice of silver bells tore through his momentary ardor in the blink of an eye.

5

Jumping to her feet before scurrying to hop out of the canyon, Emilia was shocked by that sight.

Emilia: “Just when I thought I felt a reaaally big tremor…”

As dust filled her vision to the brim, the voice of the wind would not cease its roaring. Furthermore, with the tremors of the land that seemed only to be getting bigger, things had visibly gotten quite bad during the time she was unconscious.

But, that would not discourage her. She would not lose heart. Emilia did not have the time to feel disheartened.

Emilia: “I have to hurry to Al…”

The reason why their allies had entrusted Emilia and Rem with stopping Al, was because everyone believed that the two of them were the most suited to the task. And then, the reason why Rem had sent Emilia off to go chase Al as he flew away, was because Rem placed her faith in Emilia to do so.

Carrying all of that upon her back, and since she fired herself up in order to save Subaru and Beatrice, she could not allow Al to get away—

Emilia: “—Found him! Al and… eh?! That girl?!”

Emilia plunged through the dust with determination, and beyond it she found the figures of Al and Yae embracing, causing her all the more surprise.

Rem ought to have been keeping Yae at bay. The fact that Yae was now here caused her to worry about Rem—Ferris had placed powerful healing magic over her saying it was a good luck charm, but even so, Emilia was still concerned for her safety.

Emilia: “I have to—”

Catch up to them and find out right away; it happened the moment she firmly kicked off the ground. —Within Emilia’s vision, from beyond the embracing Al and Yae, a great shift sweeping aside the dust was approaching.

That was the true source of the tremors that refused to subside below her feet, the origin of the ceaseless screaming of the land.

Drawing ever closer, as it violently quaked the earth, was a flash flood of tremendous volume.

Bearing witness as it attempted to mercilessly wash away everything on the battlefield, Emilia picked up the pace of her steps without even thinking,

Emilia: "—Al!!"

As he raised his visage in surprise at her call, she crossed gazes with the eyes veiled behind his helmet; leaping over the embracing pair, Emilia faced off directly against the flash flood surging forth.

And then—

Emilia: "—Icicle Line!"

6

Aldebaran: "…"

The atmosphere raised a high-pitched shriek, and an unbelievable scope of glaciation was enacted against the flood.

They were inundated by a deluge of mythical proportion, as if a great lake had been upended like a bucket. To combat it, the beautiful girl with her silver hair fluttering behind her rapidly froze all of the water pouring in, fashioning it into a glacier.

Emilia: "YAHHHHH—!!"

However, that was an unfavourable game of cat and mouse between glaciation and flash flood.

Even if the cold air Emilia produced froze part of the flood, the next wave would just crash over the ice, forcing her to freeze that too. This cycle, repeating again and again, created an ice umbrella, a glacier that constantly expanded as water flowed over it.

Emilia: "UYAHHHHHH—!!"

With Emilia as the origin, the ice umbrella expanded radially as she emitted cold air in parallel with the flow of the flood water, arching over Aldebaran's head before it continued past him.

The larger that structure grew, the heavier it became, and as cracks began to form in the umbrella, it was only a matter of time before it came crashing down with immense weight—

Emilia: "…"

For a moment, Emilia glanced back, locking eyes with Aldebaran.

Perhaps thinking something of that, Emilia tightly pressed her lips together—

Emilia: "URYAHHHHHHH—!!"

She reinforced the umbrella of ice as it loudly creaked and fissured, and continued the construction of the great glacier that had been on the verge of collapse. To keep the umbrella from falling, pillars of ice shot out from the ground one after another as support beams; however, Aldebaran focused his attention elsewhere.

Emilia styled herself the Witch of Glaciation, and in fact, she exhibited enough power to back that title up. But, now, at this very moment, if the reason why Emilia was exhibiting power that surpassed her limits was because of the look they had exchanged a moment ago…

If it was the same as when she had protected Aldebaran in the canyon after he had deployed the massive boulder as a trap, if Emilia was manifesting her strength in order to protect Aldebaran…

With those thoughts, he now realized. —Emilia had properly been looking at Aldebaran, and had also been trying to talk to him.

Aldebaran: "I'm—"

A raspy voice escaped his throat, but no further did it continue.

Merely, he felt that there had been some vast, irreparable discrepancy. —A discrepancy from even before his Authority had been sealed, one he could no longer redo, one he could no longer reverse.

???: “—Look at that, it is mine victory again.”

What do you mean it was your victory? Ultimately, he never knew.

But, Priscilla, when you said those words, when you smiled with that triumphant look strewn upon your face, you were so truly—

???: “—That will be as far as you go.”

—That instant, the absurd iron hammer mowed down nearly everything in the vicinity, piercing the battlefield as a streak of light.

Chapter 58:
The Sound of Chains

1

???: “Rigel. —Natsuki Rigel!!”

—This howling furore of the soul, was being hearkened with certainty by Roy Alphard.

Earnest and frantic, it was an implore suffused with emotion as though smiting the chests of all listeners such that, had it been Gourmet, Ley Batenkaitos, who loved the violent, impassioned emotions of harrowing ghast of humans, and the wistful yearnings of desire oscillating in joys and sorrows, he would have lent his ears to that wish with delight and, whilst licking his lips, fulfilled that humble request without question.

Roy: “But, it wasn’t Ley who’s here, it’s us, isn’t i~t.”

Ley of Gourmet and Roy of Bizarre Eating, twins who shared in the same Witch Factor of Gluttony—to be precise, they were triplets with Louis, who had died inside their mother’s womb, but contrary to expectations, they were siblings who had not been on the same wavelength with each other.

Despite being siblings made of the same flesh and blood, what they regarded with importance as it pertained to meals, was as though entirely different between them.

However, they had never lamented the divergence in their eating habits. Rather, that they lived without having to scramble for the same prey between siblings was something to take delight in. Although Louis, unable to freely select prey of her own accord, with no choice but to pilfer food from the Stomach of Souls, seemed to find that vexing—

Roy: “Can’t be helped, can’t be helped. Little sister is dear and cute even to us, you know. But, but, you see? Eating is something that is done for oneself, so an act so adroit as satisfying the stomach of someone else simply can't be done, you know."

So, even if he took pity on his younger sister's implorations for her famishment, it was but the hunger of a close someone else.

Even upon learning that Ley, ephemerally, had fallen in the tower of sand, that too was but the failed meal of a close someone else.

Above all, he would neither think of it as something that deservingly served him right, nor would he lament and grieve that manner of finishing the meal. His thought was singular—the powerful emotion of it being wasteful.

Roy: "A~h, from Ley's viewpoint of Gourmet, someone like us, constantly starving as we were, would probably be a disqualified failure hooligan or thereabouts, but… we of Bizarre Eating, would have gladly eaten Ley, hu~h."

Strangely noticing that he had been keeping Ley and Louis outside of the targets for his meals, Roy had the amusing, unbecoming thought that his familial love was surprisingly unabandoned. To think the Bizarre Eating who haphazardly and indiscriminately guzzled anything that caught his eye in entirety, had been, of all things, choosing his platters.

Roy: "A~h, did something truly regrettable, didn't we~."

It was unfortunate, but Ley had died. In addition, the presence of Louis, ever since the time spent in that tower of sand, could not be sensed within the Stomach of Souls, and it was unknown what became of her. —It was truly, truly unfortunate. The next time he came into contact with his younger sister, he would surely chew her soul, and yet.

Roy: "After all, we are Bizarre Eating, you know."

No matter how unsightly and repulsive a thing may be, once he thought of eating it, he could not help but stretch his tongue.

Even if Gourmet did not so much as even turn to look towards it, even if it was atop a platter that Satiation had pushed aside, he shall eat it, sparing naught.

—Above all, he could not bear to even think of giving up on an article he had once avariced in desire to eat.

???: “—!!”

Outcrying from beyond the dust, was an Aldebaran whose life had been cornered to a dead end—no, the predicament he was spiraling down into seemed to somehow be the result of having been placed into a situation that was the exact opposite of that. To thereupon recall Roy’s existence, attempting to have his Name eaten so that he could turn the board around, was an act that invited considerable pique and admiration.

Galvanizing the curse mark he had engraved to turn him into a yes-man and drag him along, Aldebaran was frantically calling Roy. Inexplicable pain as though scorching the intangible soul assaulted Roy, his body quivering as it bounded upon the ground. An abuse of the soul, making the threat through agony to convey that, if he wished to elude this pain, he must obey.

Roy: “We get it, we do get it, we very much get it, we’re saying we get it, as we get it, even though we get it, there’s no choice but to get it, you know-! Because we’re saying we get it-! Gluttonous drinking-! Gluttony-!”

He got what he wanted to say. He got what he wanted to make him do. He even got, that he was cornered.

In all honesty, even on the verge of his soul being scorched this way, Roy was grateful to Aldebaran. —Thanks to being taken out from the Prison Tower, he arrived at the opportunity of a meal that may have never reoccurred. The yes-man had few occasions for meals, but since Roy’s merit was that he did not choose what he ate, that must have been convenient for Aldebaran as well.

Roy: “But you know, it’d be troublesome to have this misunderstanding, wouldn’t i~t.”

Because he was grateful, he agreed to become a yes-man for him. —

But that only went so far as the extent Roy was willing to yield; beyond that, Roy would do as he pleased.

One such example being—

Roy: "—Fou~nd you."

As per his eating habits, an opponent whom he desired to eat even in exchange for his life, was one he would eat without fail.

2

???: "Rigel. —Natsuki Rigel!!"

As if spewing out blood, that scream resounded within the ears of the Witch of Tristitia as well.

It happened right when she somehow managed to raise her body after being jostled about by a shockwave that seemed to level the ground, amidst a blast and vehement pressure that had surged forth from beyond the realm of her consciousness, inflicting severe damages upon the battlefield.

"Subaru": "—Petra! Are you alright?! Shit, what happened all of a sudden?! Is everyone safe?!"

Even if her mind was dominated by the loud ringing in her ears, the voice of the Imaginary Subaru as he worried over her was unconnected to her eardrums, so she could hear him clearly. What had reached her amidst that turmoil and anxiety of "Subaru's" as he worried for their fallen comrades, was Al's scream from the start.

Witch of Tristitia: "…"

Within the dense haze of dust, the Witch of Tristitia coughed up the particles she had inhaled, receiving two distinct shocks from Al's scream, mixed in amongst the fierce winds.

The first, was how Al was planning to use the Authority of Gluttony to break this deadlock. And the other, was the name that Al had shouted to be his true name.

Natsuki Rigel. —The sound of that name was clearly not unrelated to Natsuki Subaru.

Petra: “Given that he’s from another world like Subaru, I’d figured that Aldebaran was a pseudonym, but…”

The name that had emerged, Natsuki Rigel, was far too strange a coincidence.

Rigel was the name of a star, and the family name Natsuki was the very same as Subaru’s own. —Surely, the requirements for being summoned to another world could not simply have been to bear the Natsuki surname in addition to a star name.

“Subaru”: “That guy’s…”

Naturally, “Subaru” also knit his eyebrows with the same suspicions as the Witch of Tristitia.

Al was full of enigmas, so although the Witch of Tristitia and her allies were confronting him and his resolve to make an enemy of the world, they did not have any idea about the true nature of his feelings or intentions. This too, was just more proof of that.

However—

Witch of Tristitia: “—Sorry. I’ve already made up my mind.”

The Witch of Tristitia was not enough of a child to prioritize focus on an unsolvable mystery here.

What she needed to prioritize right here, right now, was not some new mystery that Al had raised to the surface, but a countermeasure against Al, who possessed a means to completely upend the game board even now that he had expended nearly all of the cards in his hand.

If Al were allowed to carry out his course of action, that of having his own Name eaten, there would no longer be anything she could do to stop him. —Remembering what it had been like to forget Rem, the effectiveness of that had long since been proven.

Witch of Tristitia: “That’s why, I have to do this, Subaru.”

When the Witch of Tristitia murmured those words, “Subaru” stood not by her side, but directly in front of her. Not floating, but with both of his legs planted on the ground, he stood face-to-face with her.

“Subaru”: “…”

Staring true into his black eyes, the Witch of Tristitia felt a strangely deep emotion.

The version of him present here, no matter how he strived, was nothing more than an illusion that showed her what she wanted to see, by no means the real Natsuki Subaru. From an outside perspective, it surely would have been an absurd delusion, merely a deception that was most convenient for the Witch of Tristitia.

Witch of Tristitia: “And yet, you still won’t marry me.”

“Subaru”: “Petra, I’m…”

Witch of Tristitia: “I’m kidding. It was just a Witch’s joke meant to tease you a bit.”

Poking her tongue out, the Witch of Tristitia apologized for troubling “Subaru”.

The Witch of Tristitia proudly interpreted the fact that “Subaru” would not simply do as she said as a testament to her own noble feelings.

For the person she loved to become exactly what she wished for would make her happy, yet it would leave her conflicted.

Witch of Tristitia: “After all, I fell in love with the Subaru who told me that I’m an idiot.”

“Subaru”: “…Now that’s a real honor. After all, I’m a goddamn idiot who’s outrageously happy.”

Witch of Tristitia: “—That couldn’t be more true.”

As “Subaru” responded to her confession in such a manner, the Witch of Tristitia pursed her lips. Then, the Witch of Tristitia spun around, turning her back toward “Subaru”.

And then, after a moment of perhaps either rumination or hesitation, “Subaru” embraced the Witch of Tristitia from behind.

This was a perfect score for her hopes and desires. Moreover, since the real, non-illusion Subaru would have done the same for her, it did not influence the Witch of Tristitia’s final grade.

And so, embraced by those arms—

Roy: “—Fou~nd you.”

So too did a tenacious voice resound in close proximity, the threat drawing closer from the other side of the plumes of smoke.

The Witch of Tristitia’s fingertip pointed skyward—the corona fired from it being his signal; rushing to make haste to her was the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, Roy Alphard.

Fangs bared, Roy crossed gazes with the Witch of Tristitia.

And—

Witch of Tristitia: “—It’s Petra Baumann.”

Her finger thrust up toward the heavens, the Witch of Tristitia gave her name.

The shuffle of names carried out amongst the Aldebusters as a countermeasure against Gluttony—with the cooperation of the lord, Roswaal, it was the result of the name changing ceremony that had been accepted as something with official validity. As each of them selected a name as they pleased, the Witch of Tristitia received the surname of the person she loved and respected the most.

But, revealing the newly-changed name she had kept hidden until now could have been for nothing else. —Nothing other than the ace up her sleeve.

“Subaru”: “—Petra…”

With intangible arms, yet still tightening his embrace, “Subaru” called out her name. Hearing that voice, and placing her hands over his arms, intangible though they were, the Witch of Tristitia smiled.

Smiling, the young girl who had offered up everything as compensation, and had become the Witch of Tristitia, spoke.

Witch of Tristitia: “—Subaru, I love you.”

3

Placing it atop his tongue, invoking Eclipsing, a titillating numbness that perfused on the moment of eating rushed through his entire body.

Roy: “~~-!”

This precise climax of Eclipsing was the true flavorful pleasure of Gluttony, for which no substitute came to mind, even for Roy, who had eaten multitudes of Names and Memories until now and covetingly indulged in lives.

Starvation of a hunger, hunger, hunger far too inordinate was the raison d’etre of Gluttony. —In a moment wherein he could hallucinate even a fragment of its fulfillment, he could feel raw, fresh sufficiency.

That was certainly—

Roy: “—The finest-!”

The flavor of the Witch who had kept her word intoxicated Roy with maximal love as he licked his lips at the aftertaste.

Taken captive by emotions that surpassed his anticipations, severity that surpassed apprehensions, and purity that surpassed aspirations, Roy surfeited what a true Eclipsing was as a sense of fullness in his stomach permeated throughout his body.

Certainly, certainly, certainlycertainlycertainly, he had been living for this singular flavor.

—Even should his soul be scorched as indemnity for violating the curse mark, he harbored no regrets for this Eclipsing.

Upon these Memories pouring in, Louis's reason for craving became explicitly clear. However, unfortunately, unlike Louis, what Roy's taste buds found to be the utmost sweet were the young girl's prayers.

The Witch who loved a singular platter to this breadth, splendidly transcended the anticipations he had borne prior to tasting.

Thus, the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, Roy Alphard, smiled.

Whilst being scorched by the blue flare emblematic of the curse mark's violation, he smiled.

Roy: "—Thank you for the treat-."

And, in the juncture he would be scorched by the blue flare together with his soul—

???: "—That will be as far as you go."

A deep crimson blaze suddenly emanated upon the battlefield, and mercilessly flashed through the blue flare.

4

—If one was asked to come up with something synonymous with the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea, the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint would likely be the first thing they would say.

However, if it were someone deeply aware of just how absurd Reinhard truly was, they would also know that one of the many factors behind his status as the strongest Sword Saint in history was the sheer number of Divine Protections he possessed.

In the past, when Reinhard had done battle against one of history's strongest existences, the Sin Archbishop of Greed, Regulus Corneas, the one who had been present there fighting alongside him, Natsuki

Subaru, had appraised the Divine Protection of the Phoenix to be particularly extraordinary amongst the arsenal of his many Divine Protections.

The power of the Divine Protection of the Phoenix, allowing him to resurrect even if he died, regardless of the fact that he was already nearly impossible to kill on account of his overwhelming strength, was truly an unfair ability.

But, if Natsuki Subaru were to learn just how extraordinary the Divine Protection of the Phoenix truly was, his previous astonished evaluation of it being a cheat ability would have been eclipsed further yet.

Reinhard: "—Divine Protection of the Phoenix."

Strictly speaking, since it had already been used in the battle against the Sin Archbishop of Greed, this was the next Divine Protection of the Phoenix that he had received, but since the phenomenon they induced was the same, there was no point in making a distinction.

The important thing was that through the activation of this Divine Protection, Reinhard van Astrea, as its holder, would be resurrected from his lost life, and when that occurred, all of his injuries, fatal or not, would undergo a complete recovery.

Hence, at this moment, all the wounds Reinhard had sustained during his battle against the shadow of the Witch of Envy, spanning three days and three nights as he fought to avert ruination of everything at world's edge, were undone.

That also included the wounds that Aldebaran and the Divine Dragon had inflicted upon Reinhard's arms, rendering them unusable. It even blazed his exhaustion from continuously fighting with no sleep to naught.

That alone would have been enough to prove the extraordinary power of the Divine Protection of the Phoenix, but the true value for which Reinhard had turned to this Divine Protection was still yet to come.

Through some plot devised by Aldebaran, the menace of the Witch of Envy had been revived in the modern day. The moment it had suddenly vanished as abruptly as when it had first appeared, Reinhard deemed it the end of the battle—instantly, he decided to inflict a mortal wound upon himself.

If this had simply been for the purpose of healing his wounds, Reinhard would not have gone out of his way to inflict self-harm, and likely would have waited for his injuries to naturally heal.

In other words, what he sought from the Divine Protection of the Phoenix was not the healing of his wounds, but the other effect that the Divine Protection induced, that was—

Reinhard: "…"

—That moment, clad in flames of deep crimson, Reinhard was resurrected in the midst of a battlefield.

That was the other extraordinary effect carried by the Divine Protection of the Phoenix, the flames of rebirth that allowed the deceased holder to resurrect at any location they desired.

In his battle against Regulus Corneas, the power had raised him from the ashes right before Natsuki Subaru's eyes, but in the current moment, the place where Reinhard resurrected went without saying.

It was by the side of one who ought to have been fighting against Aldebaran, cleaning up after Reinhard's failure: his master.

Reinhard: "…"

Appearing from the flames that billowed in the winds, Reinhard stepped out onto the battlefield, his instincts immediately branding it an unnatural space in the throes of cataclysm.

Even Reinhard could not help but be surprised at the sight, but—

???: "Reinhard!"

Turning around at the sudden call, Reinhard spotted his lovely friend who had an air of seriousness about them, and held in their arms was his master—Felt.

Perceiving it to be an urgent situation, Reinhard immediately hastened to his master. Held in his friend's, in Ferris's arms, Felt's head hung limp, bereft of strength. Nobody was more suited to that task than Ferris, but he would at least try to say something to—

???: "—Oi."

Reinhard: "…"

Quicker than Reinhard could address her, that frail rasp of a voice was spun.

Amidst the dust, Felt was enveloped by a faint glow cast by Ferris—receiving the light of healing focused on her head, she slowly lifted her face, and while her vision blurred in and out of focus, those red eyes of hers captured her one and only Knight.

Then, mustering all the strength left in her body, she put together a single sentence.

That was—

Felt: "—I leave the rest… to you."

Those words spoke to Reinhard, telling him that what he currently needed to do, was not to worry about his master.

Reinhard's master was strong. Far stronger than Reinhard could ever hope to be.

Therefore—

Reinhard: "—That will be as far as you go."

Entrusting his master, who had fulfilled her duty, to his friend, and spurred onward, Reinhard advanced onto the battlefield.

In that instant, he pinpointed all the presences that dotted the region, headed towards the enemy among them who needed to be dealt with, and in a solitary flash, reduced Roy Alphard of Gluttony, engulfed in blue flare, to nihil, erasing him from the world of the living.

Roy: “—Thank you for the treat-.”

That which was scorching the smiling Roy Alphard, was a blue flare set ablaze upon the firewood of his soul, never to dissipate. Thus, Reinhard assisted his suicide as to not allow him to suffer for long.

And then—

Reinhard: “—Al-dono, this time, I shall stop you for certain.”

Kicking off the ground, Reinhard soared toward Aldebaran, standing amidst the dust storm. Even without needing to borrow the power of Compression, it was a movement of such speed that it appeared to have crushed space.

Between Reinhard and Aldebaran, a girl promptly stretched out her arms. The red-haired girl had moved as fast as possible in an attempt to protect Aldebaran. Brushing her aside, Reinhard delivered a karate chop to her neck without permitting any reaction, reaping her consciousness to the beyond in the blink of an eye.

Then, toward the defenseless Aldebaran, Reinhard once again pulled his arm back—

Reinhard: “—This, is my duty.”

—Instantly, an unrelenting blow from the Sword Saint struck Aldebaran’s torso.

5

Far in the distance, an azure inferno dispersed beyond the dust, and in the very next moment after beholding that, he watched as the slender back of Yae crumbled before his eyes.

He had been about to reach his hand towards her as she abruptly fell, but which parts of his mind had been at work to cause that?

Either way, Aldebaran's hand had failed to reach her. Same as it ever was.

Then, without so much as a moment to blink, a white flash scythed across Aldebaran's torso—

Aldebaran: "—Oh."

Two. Without a doubt, as the strike of the hand flashed across his waist, Aldebaran was cleaved right in two.

But, regeneration commenced the very moment he was split apart, and Aldebaran's flesh was restored with a vigor as if a video played back in reverse, instantly mending the halves of his bisected body.

That was the transcendent potency of the healing magic cast upon Aldebaran by the Blue, and the "magic trick" of severing the human body accomplished by the Sword Saint's hand slash, far sharper than any run-of-the-mill treasured sword.

But—

Aldebaran: "Can't die…!"

An affirmation, or a refutation: just how had that appeal resonated?

A blow from Reinhard; yes, from Reinhard. He, who ought to have been neutralized by the summoning of the Witch of Envy, had appeared, and although Aldebaran had basked in his unrelenting karate chop, he did not die.

Given that he had bisected his torso, Reinhard had surely launched that attack with the goal of slaying Aldebaran. But, the healing arts of the Blue surpassed even the murderous intent of the Sword Saint, impeding the activation of his Authority.

Aldebaran: "…"

For a moment, ignoring the pain that he was not sure even existed or not, Aldebaran pondered.

Reinhard was present. Problem. Trouble. All his calculations were set back to square one. Moreover, if the reason for his presence was not simply because he had forsaken the world, it meant that the Witch of Envy must have withdrawn.

And if the Witch of Envy had withdrawn, it would have been because that which she had needed to silence had been lost. —In other words, it was proof that Roy had broken the Oath of his curse mark, and had used his Authority on the Witch of Tristitia. And, he had done so fully aware that he would pay that penalty with his life.

As an act of retribution for having been forced into submission, had the Sin Archbishop thrown away even his own life? Only one thing was certain—any chance of Aldebaran breaking through this situation with his own efforts had been severed.

Aldebaran: "—Hk."

The possibility of Gluttony had slipped through his fingers.

Recognizing that fact, Aldebaran sparked his thoughts as he grit his teeth, resolving himself to use every last one of his actions from this point forth to break through this deadlock.

Every breath, every pulse, every drop of sweat from his fingers; to none would he permit any futility.

With that firm warning to his own soul, Aldebaran embraced the falling Yae. —He, embraced Yae?

Aldebaran: "—Ah?"

This was right after Aldebaran had decided on what he must do.

Fully utilizing every fraction of every instant from that moment forth, he would overcome this accident, that was what he had resolved in his heart; and yet, why had he reached towards Yae, and embraced her?

She had lost consciousness, and the odds that she was just masterfully playing dead were zero. Even if he were to hold Yae up, he would not be able to break through the situation.

And yet, for what reason, had Aldebaran—

Reinhard: “You know it deep down, too. —This will be as far as you go.”

As Aldebaran stood dumbfounded, failing to understand the meaning of even his own actions, Reinhard’s voice, unimaginably healthy for one who had been engaged in a death ballet against the Witch of Envy, struck his ears.

Reinhard was simply telling him: to give up, this would be as far as he went.

He, was telling him.

Aldebaran: “Well, you’re also surely carrying a lot upon your back, Sword Saint, but… it’s not as if I started this with a resolve so cheap that I’d relinquish it at the drop of a hat.”

Reinhard: “…”

Aldebaran: “It’s not over, not yet. This… this is nothing! Don’t you go thinking that I’d give up so easily!”

Putting up a brave front, Aldebaran glared at Reinhard.

By surpassing his opponent in sheer intensity, he wished for at least one thing that his fingers could grasp onto. But, in response to Aldebaran’s vigor, Reinhard raised the hand he had used to slash him aloft, and responded.

The karate chop that the Sword Saint had performed to split Aldebaran in twain, that very hand was clutching something.

—Something that could not have possibly been there, a black orb woven by magic.

Reinhard: “Even with this?”

Left speechless as he stared motionlessly with eyes wide open, Aldebaran realized that the Sword Saint’s flash from earlier had not aimed for his life, but specifically for the bisection of his torso.

With that as his target, Reinhard had done it. —Believing in the power of the Blue, he quite literally split his stomach open.

And, splitting Aldebaran's stomach, he had retrieved it.

That which ought to have been discarded at the Grand Mogolade Geyser, into the hole which led beyond this world—

Aldebaran: "But even so, it can't be broken!!"

The shock had not worn off. Even so, he still possessed the initiative.

Devised by the Witch, it was a forbidden art that reliably sealed any who had been granted power by a Witch Factor. Even with Reinhard's absurd levels of power, even with the world-rending breath of a Dragon, it could not be broken.

Thus, no matter what happened, Aldebaran would not lift that seal—

Reinhard: "No, it's Subaru who's sealed in here, isn't it? —In that case, it can be drawn."

Instantly, a torrent of power surpassing all normalcy quaked the atmosphere, and a shudder certainly ran through the world.

That was simply how tremendously significant the drawing of this sword was, to the point that even the world was unable to ignore it.

That was—

Reinhard: "—Dragon Sword, Reid."

With that flash of impossible radiance, the small magic orb in the Sword Saint's hand was rent asunder.

6

???: "—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created."

Those were the words of the Witch, who had taught Aldebaran everything that he knew, and had bestowed upon him the name of the Following Star.

???: "—Look at that, it is mine victory again."

Those were the words of the Sun Princess, who had given meaning to Aldebaran's life outside of being a Following Star.

Aldebaran: "…"

The foolish, powerless Aldebaran had lost both of them, so despite being one who possessed an Authority that was supposed to rectify erred choices, ultimately, he had continued to choose the most half-hearted path.

Only, he would not allow the birth of the Witch who would end the world. —Everything had been for that purpose.

Receiving the Witch's teachings, and acting in accordance with her wishes, he had attempted to kill the Witch. —He had failed.

Meeting Priscilla, and acting to make her the Monarch, he had attempted to kill the Witch. —He had failed.

Falling back on his initial resolve, and acting to remove Natsuki Subaru, he had attempted to kill the Witch. —He had failed.

Aldebaran: "—Ah."

As a blinding light spilled forth, feeling his eyes being scorched even from behind his steel helmet, Aldebaran bore witness to the marvel of brute force taking place right before his eyes, and the result of that rule-defying power.

The phenomenon brought about by one suprarational power was severed at the hands of another suprarational power, so when that which had been sealed was released, the only thing Aldebaran could do was to tighten his arm around the slender body in his embrace, as if having a tantrum.

And then—

???: “—Hk.”

A faint respiration, one he by no means should have been able to hear, scratched at Aldebaran’s consciousness.

That was something which belonged to the silver-haired girl behind him, who had been wielding her strength to fend off the inundating flood, emitting a tremendously cold air to prevent the battlefield from being swallowed by the muddy stream.

If that had been a lament for being unable to completely dam the rush of water, he could have endured it.

If that had been a sigh of relief at Reinhard’s arrival, he could have endured it.

If that had been satisfaction for the abhorrent Aldebaran having been cornered, he could have endured it.

But, it was none of those things. —That which her amethyst eyes had trained their gaze upon, was but a single person.

After all, no matter the time, Aldebaran would never be reflected in those eyes of hers.

Aldebaran: “—NATSUKI SUBARUUUUUUU!!”

He shouted. He screamed. He roared.

With a hoarse voice that quite literally seemed to spew forth blood, Aldebaran cried out that name.

Emerging from within that light, was a black-haired boy embracing a dress-clad Great Spirit—that unmistakable individual, with the vigor of having been liberated from the black orb, dropped to one knee upon the ground.

Then, as his lips opened, the very first thing to exit his mouth was a yell.

???: “—Rem!!”

As if in response to that call, the sound of chains grated upon Aldebaran's eardrums.

7

—Rem loved Natsuki Subaru.

This was an unshakeable truth, one that Rem, even before fully regaining her Memories, would have had to admit with reluctance.

Or rather, whether she had Memories or not, it was an inevitability that Rem would be attracted to Subaru, so frankly, what exactly had she been holding back for?

Rem: "No, that isn't right. That would be taking things a little too far, or rather… First of all, that would make it sound like I'd fall for that person even if he never did anything for me, right?"

Rem believed that her own feelings were nothing so convenient.

Rather, Rem viewed herself as a fastidious, distrusting woman who would not easily open her heart. Even if she said so herself, she shuddered at how unapproachable of a girl she must have been.

She was vastly different to the honest and compassionate Ram, or the cute Katya, whose true feelings were painfully obvious despite her abrasive attitude.

Indeed, the "original" Rem had been an unapproachable girl with a poor attitude and ugly personality.

Her perspective had been narrow, her world small, too preoccupied with guarding her own self-imposed sanctuary to spare a thought for others. —And yet, Natsuki Subaru had stepped inside.

Stepping in, trampling over it, taking her by the hand, and leading her out from there, Rem had fallen head over heels for him.

Thus, those who had done so, and those who would go on to do so, would only continue to grow with time.

Rem: "Still, among all of them, the fact that Rem was the very first one will never change.”

Rem had been the first one to recognize the greatness of Natsuki Subaru.

Emilia may have been a worthy contender for that, but in terms of depth and weight, Rem would insist she was first. That too, was something unshakeable. —Something precious, tied to Natsuki Subaru.

Rem: “The mansion, the Royal Capital, and Flugel’s Great Tree.”

The path that Rem, who loved Natsuki Subaru, had walked alongside him before she had lost her Memories.

Rem: “The jungle, the Fortress City, the Imperial Capital, and the coupled dragon carriages.”

The path that Rem, who had begun to love Natsuki Subaru, had walked alongside him after she had lost her Memories.

Rem: “The past, present, and future.”

The path that Rem, who had fallen in love with Natsuki Subaru again, would walk alongside him now that she had regained her Memories.

Even without needing to be told by Yae so many times, Rem understood that it was too simplistic to lump all of that under the single word of “love”.

Nevertheless, if asked the name of that which impelled her, the driving force of the hope that declared that, no matter what happened, she would have no regrets, then she could think of naught else but “love”.

Because of love, Rem was able to believe in Natsuki Subaru.

Because of love, Rem was able to devote herself to Natsuki Subaru.

Because of love, Rem was able to yearn for the same future as Natsuki Subaru.

???: "—Rem-neesama, there is one thing I want to ask you."

That was a conversation Rem had had before they went off to battle with a girl, who, just like herself, was in love with Natsuki Subaru.

Rem understood that she, too, was one who had met Natsuki Subaru and deviated from her "original" self. She was one who had found happiness in that fact, and decided to walk alongside him on his thorny path.

She was also one who knew of those eyes which were fixed straight ahead, looking at someone other than herself, the gaze of her beloved that she could not help but wish would turn toward her.

???: "Rem-neesama, would you do anything to help Subaru?"

Afterward, Rem pondered over it.

Just how much courage had it required to ask that question?

Just how much deliberation did it take to convey the words she had prepared for that moment?

And hypothetically, if Rem were to give an answer that failed to meet her expectations, just how much resolve, how many ideals, would she have to bear, as she walked that path alone?

Rem: "Yes, of course. —I am Subaru-kun's Rem, after all."

That was why being able to respond to that without hesitation was something Rem was proud of beyond measure.

In a way, it was a contest of whose feelings for Natsuki Subaru were stronger. And it was a hidden vow that she could never entrust to Emilia, the one he fell in love with.

What would happen if that vow were to be fulfilled? The truth was, Rem had no clue.

The only thing she knew was that it would help Natsuki Subaru—no, to the contrary. That it would allow her to be the first among the many feelings Natsuki Subaru, that kind-hearted boy, would bear.

To wish for more would be extravagant. Yet, now that her Memories had returned, she had become greedy, and even knowing it was extravagant, she yearned just a smidgen for what lay beyond.

For example, once that boy was pushed forward by Rem and the others onto the path he walked, then she wished that he would feel the devotion of Rem and that girl, not just as a mere ripple on the surface of his heart, but as much more, a great wave.

That alone was Rem's—

???: "—Rem!!"

The moment his figure appeared beyond that white light, Rem's endearing sentiments shattered.

In that moment, swept away by a torrent of unceasing emotions that surged from within, Rem felt an irresistible urge to cast everything aside and rush into his arms. She endured it.

Immediately after, the earth beneath her feet exploded upwards, and the rising wall of rock threatened to engulf her entire field of view—only to be swept aside in a single flash by the Sword Saint, leaving the lingering afterglow of flames upon his form and clearing the path.

Directly ahead, straight in front of her, Rem and the eyes of the boy she loved met.

Rem: "…"

Prepared to die, yet unable to be rid of the kindness at his core, the young boy's black eyes met her gaze.

A thousand words she longed to convey, ten thousand feelings she desired to express, a hundred million prayers she wished to offer; swallowing them all, Rem said,

Rem: "Once more, please make my current self… please make Rem fall in love with you again."

That instant, she swung her arm with all her might. —The iron ball flew true, streaking straight through the sky.

8

—The sound of chains, ringing out.

In that instant, his own bloodcurdling scream, the protrusions of the ground caused by the utmost extent of magic he had unleashed in a trance, the negation of that cataclysm by the supreme flash of the Sword Saint severing even the glaciated atmosphere, the fact that it seemed like the man who had appeared while hugging the Spirit had been utilizing the Authority of Greed to keep a grasp over the situation, the fact that he was subconsciously tightening his embrace on the warmth of the woman in his arm; absolutely all of it, did not matter to Aldebaran in the slightest.

Merely, with reckless abandon, he reached out his hands. —No, he only attempted to reach them out. He had failed to do so.

His right arm was embracing the woman who had betrayed him, and his left arm had been abandoned all that time ago alongside the Witch's expectations, so Aldebaran had failed to reach out his hands.

Instead—

Man: "—Al…"

The man, having gathered the attention of all present there, trained his gaze upon him, and called out.

The emotions dwelling in those black eyes, the fact that it seemed like he wished to save even Aldebaran if he could, that color of Natsuki Subaru was, above all else, more than anything, eclipsing aught in his heart—

Aldebaran: "I ABSOLUTELY FUCKING HATE YOU, YOU SHITTY O—"

—The sound of chains, rang out.

9

—I love you.

Chapter 59:
—No.

1

—I love you.

2

—With a deep exhale, he pulled taut the bowstring of resolve deep within his heart.

???: “…”

His exchange with those girls a moment prior, especially the consideration of Petra, caused an ache in his chest. Even Meili, with her insincere devilish attitude, and Flam, with her businesslike demeanor, seemed to worry about him in their own ways, and so with Beatrice at the forefront, this was a lineup of superb young ladies.

???: “As expected of the Lolimancer, I guess. Though, it seems like a dishonor for both sides.”

Regardless of how it had been when he had first been bestowed that title, Petra and the others would not stay young forever. So long as he was accompanied by the eternally youthful Beatrice, however, the day would never come that the person in question would be stripped of that alias. Of course, it would be a different story if he ever parted ways with Beatrice, but—

???: “If only he could do such a thing, eh?”

In all likelihood, it would have made this plan considerably easier to execute.

In fact, with the exception of Beatrice, he had never encountered a Great Spirit of the Yin Attribute that was amicable to humans. He considered that to also be part of her design, but he could not speak for certain on the intentions of the Witch's links, separate from the Witch whom he had known.

At any rate, as a specialist of the Yin Attribute, and considering her origins, there was a fear that Beatrice would be able to decipher an essential factor to the plan. And so, the timing was critical.

Beatrice was soul-bound to the target through a Contract, so he would have no choice but ensnare her in the forbidden art as well.

???: "…"

As the sound of tension creaked, he could tell that the bowstring was being stretched tight.

Thus, he entered the Library of Taygeta, the vast floor packed full with bookshelves housing a tremendous quantity of books, a sight that would always overwhelm him no matter how many times he saw it—and there did he witness.

???: "Murak."

Receiving the full support of the Great Spirit, that man obtained the maximum effect of that brief incancation, and hopping on top of the tall bookshelf, he stealthily concealed a single volume.

???: "…"

Even if he could tell it was a book from a distance, he could not discern just whose name was written upon its spine.

The Books of the Dead in that Library, aside from the titles, were all of the same appearance, with nary a distinction in their thickness. Upon consideration, it was a bit of a strange matter; there was no way that a child who succumbed to illness at the tender age of five, and someone who died peacefully at the age of one hundred after having lived a life full of ups and downs, would have books of the same thickness.

There was no doubt that this Library was a place that took advantage of Od Lagna's properties, but it ought to have been the Witch who had made them manifest in the form of books.

In that case, why had the Witch gone out of her way to create a Library that was so difficult to comprehend?

???: “When you finally find that which you seek, you would not desire any excess noise, now would you?”

Vocalizing an utterance that the Witch herself seemed like she might have said, it sounded like it might have really been the right answer, filling him with unpleasant feelings.

To begin with, he wished to avoid recalling the Witch as much as he could. —Ever since she died, he found himself recalling the Witch as if recoil from everything that occurred up to that point.

Witch: “—There is nobody who can defeat you, you whom I created.”

For a moment, he pondered. If this was a Library containing books that chronicled the lives of the deceased, then naturally, it stood to reason that the Witch’s book would also be somewhere around here.

Thus—

???: “—Look at that, it is mine victory again.”

The voice to which he had plugged his ears, averted his eyes, and kept at a distance in rejection from his soul; the Book of the Dead of the voice’s owner, would also be located here.

???: “…What do you mean it was your victory, Priscilla?”

In those unforgettable last moments, in those final minutes he had shared with her, she had worn that triumphant smile. The declaration of victory that had accompanied that smile, even now, he did not understand its meaning.

Even if he understood, it would not change a thing. After all, she was no longer among them. After one passed away, it would no longer be possible to exchange words or feelings with them.

But, even if it was purely a one-sided affair, this Great Library Pleiades made understanding possible.

???: “…Am I an idiot? No, I’m definitely an idiot. Even though that sorta thing’s nothing more than a pretext.”

Everything was for the sake of the plan, a cover story to get that man and the others to console his heartbroken self, laying the groundwork for him to carry out what he had set out to do alongside the Witch, the plan he had once abandoned.

To think his heart would actually be swayed by that, it would be a tale far worse than going out for wool and coming home shorn.

Above all else—

???: “Please, don’t save me.”

If he were to read her book, if he were to once again be scorched by the radiance of the sun he had failed to keep from setting, then just like the day he gave up on being a Following Star, he might waver once more.

The foolish star who did not deserve to be saved, would waver once more.

That was why—

???: “—Your stars, were bad.”

Resigning himself to those words, he resumed his halted steps, and proceeded through the Library.

The singular book that had been stealthily hidden atop the bookshelf, although he had not seen the title of that book, he knew what name had been inscribed on its spine without even needing to see it.

If it was a Book of the Dead that man had hidden due to finding it inconvenient, there was only one title that it could have borne. — And, finding one of those same books had been an essential puzzle piece for the enactment of this plan.

The two volumes he had wished to track down, those being the Books of the Dead belonging to himself, and to that man, had been found.

So, all that remained was the time for action—

Man: “Good grief. It’s like I’m a mischievous kid who’s getting up to no good in the library…”

He slowly walked up behind the man who spoke these words as he scratched his head. The other party seemed unaware of his approach, and parting from the bookshelf where he had just hidden the book,

Man: “It’d be a problem if Ezzo-san, the very embodiment of a curious mind, were to find it… I mean, there’s also the possibility that a bunch of people come marching in here, so maybe I gotta dispose of them all? How many volumes in total would there—”

???: “—Dispose of what, bro?”

Man: “—Hk.”

As soon as he called out to the grumbling back, the other party’s shoulders jumped up in an exaggerated motion. Slowly, the man turned to face him, a faint stiffness strewn upon his countenance, making it obvious that he was feeling guilty about what he had done.

At the reaction of the other party, doing a clumsy job of hiding things, he deliberately made a grand motion of shrugging his shoulders,

???: “Oioi, you’re getting way too startled. I was just trying to make small talk.”

Man: “…Yeah, sorry, sorry. Someone hearing you when you’re talking to yourself is actually pretty embarrassing, you know?”

???: “I get where you’re coming from with that, but I find it troubling that you’re making me out to be the bad guy ‘cause of that, yeah?”

Man: “The bad guy…”

Drawing back his chin as the other party inclined their head, he directed his attention to behind himself. Then, waddling over from that direction with lovely footsteps, approached Beatrice.

She wedged her small body in between him and the other party, and while puffing up her cheeks,

Beatrice: “Hey, you, don’t startle Subaru all of a sudden like that, in fact. Whenever Betty isn’t watching, Subaru has what’s known as a flea’s heart, I suppose.”

???: “A flea’s heart… really, bro does? I didn’t take him for that sorta guy, though.”

Man: “If that evaluation’s based on my boldness and audacity, I’ll gladly take it in stride, but what the hell did you see in me to make you think that way?”

???: “—Let’s see. Well, bro, I might actually know a lot more about you than you think, you know?”

Responding to the words of the man, who patted the head of Beatrice as she came to his defense, he took a moment to think before keeping it to a relatively harmless answer.

If he mentioned any further information than what he had brought up just now—that was, the fact that he even knew about his inferiority complex and complicated crossroads with his parents before coming to this world, just what would he think?

Of course, he would never do anything so foolish. He had been urged by those impulsive feelings many times, but on those occasions, he would endure it by fiddling with the metal fixtures on his helmet.

A routine for when he went into deep thought, the metallic clank that warned him against forgetting about the plan.

Beatrice: “That is rather interesting, in fact. It is quite shameless to claim such knowledge about Subaru before Betty, I suppose. You are making light of the sweet relationship between Spirit and Contractor, in fact.”

???: “It’s precisely because it’s sweet. Good grief, sorry for getting in the way of your passionate honeymoon.”

As he clicked and clacked the joints of his helmet, Beatrice stood with her arms crossed, thoroughly offended. Shrugging his shoulders in an effort to not upset her, the other party awkwardly scratched his cheek,

Man: “Nah, don’t worry about it. Beako and I get all lovey-dovey whenever time allows it, and right now, well, see? We’ve gotta prioritize the Library, don’t we?”

???: “Thank you for accommodating me on everything, yeah? No, seriously, no joke, lemme thank you again. Even if it’s just three days, it must have been troublesome to set aside this time for me. Beako-chan, I’m sorry for bringing bro along with me. Thanks for coming with us.”

Beatrice: “Betty and Subaru are one, so it is a matter of course that we are together, I suppose. —Also, Betty is not so benevolent as to repeat the same warning many times, I suppose. Correct it by yourself, in fact.”

???: “Gotcha, gotcha. —She’s very kind, your kid.”

Man: “Ngh, yeah.”

The man gave a wry smile, struggling to get his words out, and Beatrice gently clasped his hand.

For some reason, the conversation was not quite bouncing along. Though it brought him no joy, he and the other party had good, responsive chemistry, and the tempo of their back-and-forth ball game of a conversation ought to have flowed smoothly. For it to have become this stilted, was perhaps because he had thought something inconvenient had been spotted. —Perhaps, it was because he had concealed a book different from the one he had expected.

For instance, could it have been one of the two volumes he had envisioned just earlier?

Man: “Al… um, how are you feeling?”

???: “—. What kind of question is that, it’s like you’re the parent of an adolescent who’s struggling to get a grasp on a sense of distance… As you can see, no results just yet. I thought that it might be possible in three days, but man, I’m really at a loss with this number of books. It’s really on the level of finding a single needle dropped in a desert, isn’t it?”

Man: “—Hk, but, don’t give up man. Let’s search properly! I’ll also do my best to help!”

???: “Oioi, bro?”

Just when he thought that, the other party suddenly adopted a proactive position, taking him aback.

Time and time again, the other party had vowed unwavering sincerity towards him, proclaiming that he would be of help. Neither did he think that was a lie, nor did he find that aggravating in itself. —After all, he had no expectations.

That which he had hoped for the most, that which he had wished the man to do, he had not done.

That was why—

???: “Knock it off with the sentiments that muddy up exactly which one of us had wanted to come here in the first place. It wouldn’t make any sense if I’m not getting as enthusiastic as you, bro.”

Man: “Then do it. Let’s do it, as if it were a matter of life and death. For three days, we’ll give it everything we’ve got. Then…”

A tremble ran through that voice. —Not his own, he heard the voice of the other party trembling.

He had far too much empathy, or perhaps, a wave that already ought to have passed had come crashing back in, stirring those emotions anew. The feelings of regret and lamentation, were things that man felt far more than the ordinary person. He knew that well.

Between himself and this man, they were the only two people throughout the entire world to possess it: the curse of their Authorities.

Merely, there was the man who could use it to save those whom he loved, and then there was his own self, unable to do the same.

Thus, so long as the man’s love was allowed to persist, it would eventually be born. —The being that would bring about the world’s end.

In order to prevent that, at the very least, he would need to fulfill the duty of the Following Star—

Beatrice: “—Subaru.”

Holding hands with the man who had cast his head down, his voice trembling, Beatrice quietly called his name.

The emotions filling that call were tranquil, and contrary to her cute appearance, there was a mystical solemnity that seemed to prove that she, too, was a Great Spirit who had lived for quite a long time.

Man: “…”

At the address of the Great Spirit, the person in question held his breath, giving no response.

Witnessing that reaction, he fiddled again with the fixtures on his helmet, and decided. —After another comment or two, finishing the verbal rally, he would begin.

As the other party had stated, they would be searching the Library in this Tower for a period of three days. The more of that time limit he depleted, the more his head would start to wander elsewhere. Ergo, he would take action before that could happen.

Man: “—Three days, is that not good enough?”

The man’s words, spoken as if wringing them out, sounded a bit desperate; was that perhaps a reflection that he was also getting a bit nervous? —It made him think for a bit.

If he did find the Book of the Dead across a three-day search, and could fully glean the emotions that woman who was no longer among them had left behind in her final moments, what might happen?

He could say it with certainty. —It would not change a thing.

These wounds would never be healed, and this pain would never fade. To begin with, he desired no such thing.

And so, in response to the question the other party had hurled his way, despite knowing that it would be a complete divergence from what he had actually been asked, he deliberately answered with the following:

???: "—Your stars, were bad."

Even for himself, it was unclear whether he viewed those stars through a positive or negative gaze.

Present in this place were two stars, the Pleiades and Aldebaran—nay, Subaru and Rigel, and as they faced off, it was unclear who was being condemned as at fault, and who was being consoled as having done nothing wrong, even for himself.

Aldebaran: "…"

He had gotten far too emotional. He had also done a poor job in keeping the conversational rally going this time.

If he kept going like that, he would quite likely get drawn in and find himself uttering something that could be perceived as suspicious. He had already decided. He would do it on the next one, he had decided.

The other party who had fallen silent, the man who had been named for the stars, and bestowed the names of the stars, after he finished his next remark, it would commence. —Passing Mana through his Gate, formulating the technique, he opened up the entryway for the forbidden art.

Then—

Subaru: “—Al…”

Then, his eyes met with Natsuki Subaru’s, a face on the verge of tears.

Subaru: “—Ol Shamak.”

An incantation, one not of his own. —He understood.

Once again, in the battle he had needed to win no matter what, Aldebaran had been defeated.

???: “—Look at that, it is mine victory again.”

Alongside the triumphant smile of the lovely woman he could never get back, he heard her voice. —The next instant, the world of Aldebaran cut to black.

3

???: “—Natsuki-dono, while it may not serve as any comfort, your fears were not misplaced. He had been kneading Mana, formulating a technique. A single slip up, and you likely would have found yourselves in completely opposite positions. I fully support your judgement as having been the best course of action.”

Having stood witness over the entire affair, the words of the dwarf—of Ezzo Cadner, served as no consolation to Subaru’s heart whatsoever, just as he had said.

Was there really no other way to settle things without anyone getting hurt?

???: “Captain, my amazin’ self doesn’t really get it. ‘S just, ‘s just…! Even tho’ I don’t understand anythin’, my amazin’ self can just say this…! I’m so happy you’re safe, Captain!”

Just like Ezzo, tasked with monitoring the situation, the one who was like a younger brother to him expressed his feelings of frustration as he embraced Subaru’s shoulders with his burly arms and straightforward words.

And, he was not the only one nestling close to Subaru,

Beatrice: “Subaru, you made a decision, I suppose… Even though Betty could have taken it all on for you, you still got yourself hurt like a fool, in fact.”

Subaru: “Beatrice…”

Beatrice: “But, Betty and Subaru performed that forbidden art together, I suppose. Subaru prepared the technique, Betty formulated the spell, Subaru performed the incantation, and Betty passed the Mana through. Hence, Betty will take on half, in fact. It would be unfair for you to carry too much on your back, I suppose.”

Subaru: “—Hk.”

With his teeth clenched firmly, what Subaru tightly clutched in his right hand, so tight that his fingers did not seem like they would ever open up, was a black orb that his own inadequacy had left him with no choice but to enact.

—With no other means to stop him, it was the magic orb in which he had imprisoned Al.

Subaru: "—Sorry. There's somewhere… I need to go."

Deep within his chest, feeling a sensation as if all the organs in his body were trembling, Subaru got up from his knees, and slowly exited the Library of Taygeta.

Holding hands with Beatrice, and accompanied by the worried Garfiel and Ezzo, Subaru reprimanded his legs that were on the verge of collapsing, proceeding down the corridor until he reached the room he had set out for.

Then—

???: "O~h? Onii-san, what's the ma~tter? How's the search in the library~?"

Seeing Subaru as he appeared in the entrance, both Meili, resting on a barrel in a corner of the room, and the small crimson scorpion, seated on her hair, inclined their heads in unison.

The sight of her safe and sound, acting in her usual cheeky manner, was something that struck his heart, but more than that—

???: "—Subaru, what's the matter? Did you forget something?"

Hearing Meili's voice, the girl who had been facing the other way turned to his direction. Using a cooking utensil with a magic stone to stir the pot, she blinked her round eyes as they reflected Subaru.

Subaru: "—Ah."

Laying his eyes upon that girl, Subaru's body and soul reflexively tensed up.

After seeming a bit puzzled for a moment, she immediately stretched out her folded legs and asked “Subaru?”. Then, facing Subaru directly as he walked forward with unsteady, tottering steps,

Girl: “Beatrice-chan, did something happen? For some reason, Subaru is…”

Beatrice: “Something did happen, I suppose. But, Betty shall not say what, in fact… Merely, it seems like he had an overwhelming urge to see Petra right now, I suppose.”

Girl: “Me?”

Confused, the girl—Petra, wore a look of surprise at Beatrice’s answer. Seeing those abundant changes in facial expression up close, the tension in Subaru’s cheeks slowly dissipated.

As Meili sighed a meaningful “Hm∼mm?” behind him, Subaru gazed at Petra head-on, and after a moment of hesitation,

Subaru: “Petra, this is gonna sound strange, but… can I hug you?”

Petra: “—. Well, you can hug me without even needing to ask. Ah, actually, you shouldn’t do that. Just thinking about it makes my heart pound and seem like it’s going to bur—st .”

As Petra smiled mischievously, before she could finish giving her gentle reply, Subaru reached his arms out and pulled her body close, embracing her within his chest.

Petra: “Um, uhh…”

At the sudden embrace, Petra could not hide her confusion. For a girl who, before he had even realized, was rapidly gaining nerves of steel, becoming better and better at not being shaken by anything, this was a clear discomposure to the point of being unusual.

But, there was not a single person here who would make fun of that fact.

After all—

Petra: “Hey, Subaru, are you okay?”

A hand reached out from within his chest, softly caressing Subaru’s cheek.

At the question of the girl right before his eyes, so close that they could feel each other’s breaths, a distance where even the beating of their hearts collided, Subaru swallowed his breath, and forced a smile.

Subaru: “Of course—”

I’m okay. After all, he had to have been. After all, Petra was here, doing so well like this.

And it was not just Petra. Beatrice, Garfiel, Meili, Ezzo, and Flam; they were all unharmed. Everyone in the Tower, everyone who did not come to the Tower; they were all safe.

Everything bad that had transpired, all of it had been made to have never happened.

Of course, it was not as though he knew everything that had occurred, and he also knew that not all of it had been bad.

There had been confrontation and reconciliation, there had been betrayal and fellowship, there had been curses and vows, there had been hatred and love—there had been Aldebaran and Natsuki Subaru.

Subaru: “—Maybe, I’m not okay.”

While embracing Petra, he caught a glimpse of the magic orb still clenched in his hand, spilling that murmur.

Then, the feeble sound that had escaped his lips as a murmur, did not end as merely a stilted voice. Little by little, his feelings morphed into tears, flowing out from the corners of his eyes.

Subaru: “—No.”

By puffing out his chest and declaring that he was okay, he had wished to repay Petra and the others, who had deemed it acceptable to force Subaru's Return by Death, undoing many irreversible things in exchange for a world left behind.

He could not bring himself to do it. In sorrow and lament, with his own pathetic inadequacy, he could not puff out his chest.

Subaru: "I'm not, okay… hk."

To Petra, who had offered up so much as compensation; to Rem, who ought to have regained everything; to Emilia, who never gave up on trying to converse with Al up to the bitter end; to Beatrice, who had deciphered the mechanisms of the forbidden art while sealed together with him, giving Subaru a trump card when he Returned by Death; to all the people who had participated in that battle, both those who Subaru knew and those who he did not; to absolutely everyone.

And finally, to Al, whom he had failed to get the chance to properly talk to—

Subaru: "I'm sor—"

Petra: "—Subaru!!"

Suddenly, a sharp, loud voice cut off the apology he had been on the cusp of vocalizing.

It was the voice of Petra, looking up at Subaru from within his chest after having held her tongue. When he noticed that her round eyes were flickering with a storm of emotion, tears began to stream down Subaru's face, and as she caressed it with her hands,

Petra: "You finally said it. You finally said that you aren't okay."

Subaru: "—Ah."

Petra: "There's no need to be so afraid. You don't have to carry everything on your own. Right, Beatrice-chan?"

Beatrice: "…A matter of course, in fact. Betty is Subaru's partner, I suppose."

Encouraged by Petra, Beatrice tightly hugged Subaru's body. As Subaru was bewildered by the warmth of the two girls, Petra continued to smile,

Petra: "Meili-chan."

Meili: "Ehh? I'd rather no~t. Petra-chan and Beatrice-chan should be enough…"

Petra: "Meili-chan."

Meili: "…Fi~ne."

Hopping down from the barrel, Meili walked up next to Subaru with a sulky face while emitting an air of half-heartedness, lightly tugging on the hem of his clothes. As if in place of its master, the small crimson scorpion leapt off of her hair and onto Subaru's shoulder, nestling its body close to his cheek.

Petra: "Garf-san."

Garfiel: "Yeah! Captain!"

Subaru: "Gwohh?!"

A huge amount of force crashed into his back as if it had been waiting, causing him to reflexively raise a cry of pain. Desperately holding his ground to avoid tipping over and crushing Petra, he endured it. He had endured it, but—

Petra: "Ezzo-san, Flam-chan, will you join us as well?"

Ezzo: "I am an outsider, so I shall refrain. Still, I stand by Natsuki-dono."

Flam: "I only just arrived here, and have yet to fully process the situation, but… understood."

The presence that only arrived later, without hesitation, nestled close near his right hip.

Now, in every direction, he was being completely embraced without any escape—swarmed by such warmth, Subaru unwittingly exhaled a “Hah”.

Subaru: “What’s up with this?”

From an outside perspective—in reality, Ezzo was looking on as a bystander, so from his perspective, just how foolish must Subaru and the others have looked in their current state?

With everyone all clumped together like this, it must have looked stupid.

Petra: “It’s fine. After all, the one who told me that I’m an idiot was none other than Subaru.”

Subaru: “Did I really say such a thing?”

Petra: “You did.”

Subaru: “…Among all the people I know, there’s probably not a single person smarter than you, Petra.”

He truly believed that. Surely, that was the case. And so, it was obvious to her, clever as she was. Amazing. This was what it truly meant to be wise. There was a big difference from someone like Abel, who was just a clever idiot.

Subaru: “I’ve decided.”

His face was still covered in tears, he was still stuck in place being embraced by everyone’s kindness from all directions, and he had just admitted that he was not okay in the slightest, but he had made up his mind.

Subaru: “Al, it seems like you hated me so much that you could never forgive me, but…”

He did not know the true reason behind that. Only, he would not let things end without finding out.

So much had been on the verge of ending, but thanks to the determination of many people, unwilling to allow that ending, it had been averted; hence, although he was not okay whatsoever, Natsuki Subaru had decided.

That was—

Subaru: "—I, no matter what, will definitely save you too."

Even if he had committed abhorrent deeds that would have made him the enemy of the world, everything, both the good and the bad, had been made to have never happened by means of Return by Death; thus, that was Natsuki Subaru's vow.

And, hearing that vow of Natsuki Subaru's, Petra Leyte gave a satisfied nod,

Petra: "That's my Subaru."

—Indeed, the girl, who had not become the Witch of Tristitia, smiled.

Interlude: Cheer

—Right from the very beginning, there was only ever one ending that the Witch of Tristitia, Petra Leyte, had needed to aim for, strive towards, and ultimately arrive at.

That was from before she had ever become the Witch of Tristitia, from back when Petra Leyte, a mere village girl, had ended up reading the outrageous artifact that was Natsuki Subaru's Book of the Dead.

From back when she had first learned that Natsuki Subaru, in exchange for his own Death, had been fighting in a constant struggle in order to alter the fates of countless people.

From back when she had fallen in love with Natsuki Subaru through their ordinary, quiet days together, discovering what brought him joy, what made him grieve, and what caused him to feel happiness and sorrow.

—Taking all those varied reasons, gathering them together, bundling them up, and collecting them all into one, she had made her decision.

Petra: "Because no matter what, Subaru still wants to do something about Al-san, right?"

Honestly, from Petra's point of view, it was an unthinkable idea.

If one were to count up all the things Al had done on their fingers, not even all the digits on their hands and feet would be enough to list everything, so they would need to go as far as using the Unseen Hand to enumerate the rest of what the hands and feet had been unable to.

To that extent, Al had done enough irreversible things to fill a mountain. —But even so, she did not believe that at heart, Al was a heinous villain who had done all of that while scorning everything.

Petra: “I wonder, is this the influence of being corrupted by Subaru’s book…?”

It might not be her place to say it, but Petra was a realist, and the extent of what she could handle was limited. Rather than just limited, it was more accurate to say she deliberately kept it limited.

After all, if she were to use her abilities to their fullest extent, her vessel would have been capable of carrying an extraordinary amount of things, a fact which Petra took great pride in. She would not feel ashamed of that.

However, using her vessel to its limits, she did not believe that she would be able to treasure everything that she could cram into it.

And yet—

Petra: “Subaru’s greediness…”

But, that’s what I like about him. —That’s wrong. It’s part of what I like about him.

And so, because that Natsuki Subaru could not be changed, Petra Leyte would do it.

It was a painful decision, one that seemed to cut deep into her, as if mercilessly ripping her heart to shreds.

—By making Natsuki Subaru Return By Death, she would reset everything that had happened.

From the moment she made the decision to leave the Pleiades Watchtower and journey alongside the Imaginary Subaru, Petra Leyte had been forging ahead towards that ending.

She had firmly insisted on becoming the holder of the Witch Factor of Tristitia, taking it upon herself to pay most of the compensation, save a small few exceptions, that came with wielding the Authority. She had not spared any card she could play in the negotiations, and provided all of the information she could share, thereby plotting the course for the Aldebusters.

Petra: “If me reading the book is what caused the Witch of Envy to go on a rampage—then, I’ll be able to use that too, right?”

Ever since the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, Roy Alphard, was released from the prison tower, and the effects of his Authority became clear to her, a certain suspicion had sprouted within Petra. —Having read the Book of the Dead, if Petra were to be dispossessed of her Memories, just what verdict might the Witch of Envy pass?

Then, she also wondered if this was perhaps the very strategy Al had aimed to use in order to make the Witch of Envy withdraw, since he had claimed to have no intention of destroying the world.

Hence, when Roy Alphard was defeated by the combined might of the Aldebusters, while he was tied up and barely clinging onto life, she had made a promise with him.

Petra: “If you want to eat me, I’ll give you a chance.”

Of course, this was a promise she intended to break without remorse if he had not been willing to keep it.

Corrupted by Natsuki Subaru, Petra had become an outlaw who bore no reservations whatsoever about breaking the promises she had made with people she disliked.

Moreover, in preparation for when that unlikely event came to pass, she had secured a reliable ally.

Petra: “Rem-neesama, is truly amazing.”

With sincerity, even when setting aside the tremendous bias from Natsuki Subaru’s influence, she believed this.

Rem had uncovered Subaru’s Return by Death—back then it was “Turning Back Time”, but even if the impetus for that was Rom-jii explaining the true nature of Al’s Authority, she had pieced it together on her own.

On her own, Rem had come to the realization that Natsuki Subaru was a person who had always continued to fight by sacrificing his own life. —Though the thought of that had made her happy, she also felt devastated.

Petra: “But, that’s why I can entrust it to Rem-neesama… No, I can’t entrust it to anybody but Rem-neesama.”

No matter how many wonderful things happened along the way, no matter how many unrelinquishable feelings she gained, Petra Leyte had resolved herself to overturn everything, and make it so that none of it had ever happened.

And true to that, even Rem, who had at long last regained her Name and Memories, and had thus truly returned home to them all, would be erased and disappear.

Knowing that full well and still determined to go through with it, Petra had an obligation to get Rem involved.

They were kindred souls that knew they were going to be erased, who in spite of that, were fellow women who, from the bottom of their hearts, wished for the person they loved most to not lose even a single thing.

She could have only ever entrusted this to someone who truly believed that there was no other way, one who was willing to give up everything for love.

Such a terrible thing could have never been entrusted to someone who, if they believed a better solution might exist somewhere, would relentlessly search for it until the very last moment.

That was why Petra and Rem were the ones who would carry this through.

Petra: “Subaru, Emilia-neesama, I know you must be so tired. I’m sorry. But I’m going to wind up being a burden too. I’m sorry. All the thanks I’d wanted to say could never be enough…”

Thank you, thank you in the truest sense of the word: that is what she had wished to convey.

Knowing everything that she did from having read the Book of the Dead, Petra Leyte had wished to assist both Emilia, who was walking down a thorny path, and Natsuki Subaru, who had chosen to work himself to the bone in order to support her.

That would not come true. No matter how hard she tried, Petra Leyte would always be a mere village girl who knew absolutely nothing at all.

That would be frustrating, it would be miserable, and no matter how many thank you's and sorry's she said, it would never be enough.

Even so—

Petra: "…I wonder, did I really do everything I could?"

Given the constraints in her situation, had she not done the absolute extent of what she was capable of?

Al had prepared an all-star lineup to ensure he would not lose, and yet she had only been granted a single chance of trial and error in order to overcome him; there were limits to how unfair it could be.

But she had done it. She had pulled it off. Though she had been a little taken aback when Otto, stripped of his memories, had joined the fray midway, but everything, every single bit, had been thanks to everyone joining together.

Petra: "Hehe, I'm pretty amazing, aren't I? Think you're going to fall for me now?"

???: "—. Yeah. Seems like I might."

Slightly inclining her head, she greeted him with the cutest face she could put on.

At Petra's adorable gesture and question, the Imaginary Subaru blushed in a shy manner. Was this just a deception that Petra had wanted him to say? Or, was it genuine enough that even the real him would actually say it?

Petra: "Well, since I'm about to disappear, I might as well interpret it in the way that's most convenient for me."

She gently reached out, placing her hand over his intangible one, entwining their fingers. A phantasmal perk to this degree, could surely be allowed. She had worked so hard, after all.

"Subaru": "By the way, can I ask you something? I mean, it's kind of weird for me to be asking, considering my position."

Petra: "Hmm~? What is it?"

"Subaru": "Even before Clind-san passed the Witch Factor down to you, just one time, Petra, you paid some compensation for the traversal… but you never told me what it was, did you? I've just been wondering what it could have been."

Petra: "Since I didn't tell you, why not just leave it at that?"

"Subaru": "Don't be so cruel!"

Even his pathetic expression looked cute, so Petra let out a small chuckle.

But as expected, imaginary or not, Subaru was still Subaru. Even if he was a resident of her mind, he would not take liberties with what Petra had kept hidden from him, those things which she did not wish for him to see or know.

Relieved by that, Petra stuck out her tongue in a playful manner and,

Petra: "It's~a~secret!"

That made the Imaginary Subaru put on a sullen look, but Petra wanted to keep it a secret.

It should be fine to have at least one maiden's secret that she would not show even to the Imaginary Subaru. And besides, this particular maiden's secret had just a touch of girlish cunning.

Back then, to Clind, Petra had offered a certain possibility of hers as compensation.

That was—

Petra: "—The possibility of me becoming Subaru's bride."

The surprise on Clind's face when he learned of Petra's resolve had been truly remarkable.

Bearing a weighty history as a dragonkin, the eyes with which Clind had looked upon Petra as she sacrificed that potentiality of hers, contained a reaction overcome with such deep emotion that she would never be able to forget it.

That was precisely why she had felt so apologetic. —After all, it was that compensation that had convinced Petra.

Petra: "If I could offer that as compensation, then the possibility of that future truly does exist for me."

Considering the abilities of the Witch Factor of Tristitia, it would be more accurate to say that Petra had offered up part of her ability to exert influence over the world, specifically, "the various efforts she would have needed to make in order to secure a future in which she married Subaru". But, such details meant nothing to Petra at that moment.

What mattered was to believe in a future in which Petra Leyte would become Natsuki Subaru's bride.

And that had been proven by none other than a Witch Factor, something that made contact with the very core of the world.

Because she had that evidence, she had resolved herself to see it through, and had thus been able to make it all the way to the end.

That was why—

Petra: "Do your best, me. —Whether or not I seize this chance, depends entirely on how hard I try!"

From the village girl who had become the Witch of Tristitia, utilizing even a Witch Factor for the sake of her own happiness, that was an earnest cheer directed toward her future self, one who would never become the Witch of Tristitia.

—It was the heavy-hearted cheer of love from a tough and determined girl from another world.

Curtains Close: Reweave

1

While looking at the servants of the Barielle Residence work from afar, Frederica felt a sense of restlessness beyond her control.

Frederica: “I am used to being treated as a guest when traveling with the Master, but… it is a bit unusual with how things are in this mansion, especially with the current state of things.”

Reflected within the gaze of Frederica’s emerald eyes as she said this, was the hectic atmosphere of the mansion.

Swift and well-led, it was clear to see that the staff were a team of extremely capable people, managed by efficient leadership. Even when they became aware of the terrible news brought by Frederica and the others, they did not fall into dysfunction. —That alone was worthy of admiration.

Frederica: “Priscilla-sama, it seems she was truly adored by everyone here.”

The tragic news the servants were informed of—the notice that the head of this mansion, their mistress, Priscilla Barielle, had lost her life in the Vollachian Empire.

Frederica: “…”

Letting out a heavy sigh, Frederica cast her hazy eyes downwards, as she observed the garden from the balcony.

Frederica, due to her position, knew how it must have felt to have those she served, such as Roswaal and Emilia, to leave her behind at the mansion and to have no other option to pray for their safe return. If she found out at that time that her prayers had not been delivered, just how devastating a blow to her heart would that be?

In truth, many of the servants were grief-stricken, and many of them were shedding tears. When they became aware of her death, not a single person had left the duty in the mansion, which could only be seen as a testament of their relationship with Priscilla.

But, it was not just due to Priscilla being loved by everyone—

Frederica: "—I believe that Schult-sama's resolute demeanor touched everyone's heart, too."

Frederica was deeply moved by the young servant, who had accompanied Priscilla to the Empire, and with her death, had to bear the responsibility of conveying her dying will, a task that he had accomplished splendidly.

Schult looked as undependable and skinny as a small animal, however, he did not entrust the unenviable duty to Frederica and Roswaal, and instead used his own mouth and words to accomplish this great task.

Though the servants had not left the mansion and chose to stay in their current jobs due to their adoration for Priscilla, there was no doubt that their faith in Schult had been another large contributor. Whilst being an outsider, Frederica wholeheartedly agreed and could not bear the heat that prickled at the corner of her eyes.

Then—

???: "—Oya, here you are, Frederica. I've been searchiiing~ for you."

Frederica: "Master…"

Raising his hand slightly, the tall figure stepped onto the balcony—Roswaal greeted her, as Frederica bent her knees and gave a small curtsy.

Frederica: "For making you search for me, I humbly apologize. What business do you need me to attend to?"

Roswaal: "Business, I wouldn't go so far as to call it something like that buuut~. The preparations are nearly completed, so I just wanted to speak with you for a moment.”

Frederica: “Preparations…”

Roswaal: “Yes, the preparaaations~”

Roswaal smiled faintly, leaving one eye closed —his yellow eye, a mismatch to his right eye, was left open, as he stood beside Frederica on the balcony and leaned against the railing.

Roswaal: “There’s quite a lot of land that’s worth the effort. I don’t have many acquaintances in the South. Priscilla-sama’s late husband Lord Leip Barielle was nooot~ a man that left behind a good reputation.”

Frederica: “For the Master to say that, he certainly must have been quite an unpleasant person.”

Roswaal: “Oya, how harsh. Has Petra-kun also poisoned you and made you lose your obedience to meee~? Or maybe—”

Roswaal tilted his head, and as he looked into the eyes of Frederica beside him,

Roswaal: “—You don’t like my plan to use Schult-kun, do you?”

Frederica: “…I do not think that what you are doing is wrong, Master. Also that it is for the Royal Selection… and by extension, ultimately for the sake of Emilia-sama and her Camp.”

Roswaal: “Though easy in theory, it’s not easy to convince the heart is iiit~?”

Understanding this yet still saying it, Roswaal’s crooked personality was unassailable. If Emilia were here to speak, she would probably say that it was just a sign of his mischievous side and that he deserved a proper scolding for it.

Frederica: “With my relationship with the Master, it is very difficult, Emilia-sama…”

If Emilia or Petra were here they would attack using a straightforward approach, if Ram were here she would use unorthodox methods to make Roswaal reflect, but perhaps because he had anticipated this, Frederica was here by her lonesome.

Frederica, even omitting the debt of gratitude she bore which could not be repaid, knew that when it came to Roswaal's actions, despite his evil ways, he worked for the sake of the camp.

—The goal that unified the Emilia Camp was ultimately that of the Royal Selection.

In the Royal Selection, the time they spent in the Vollachian Empire had made them fall behind. Even without this Emilia had been lagging behind since the start. If they wanted to catch up, if they wanted to gain some momentum, then they could not rely solely on conventional means.

Towards that end goal, to gain the support of the Barielle Domain which had lost its absolute pillar that was Priscilla Barielle, Roswaal moved forward with devoted and dispassionate maneuvers behind the scenes.

Roswaal: "Since Priscilla-sama has died, and the next fief's lord has yet to be elected, an acting provisional governor will be appointed. Fortunately, I can produce a candidate from my associates. I would just have to appoint one of the Ryuzu-dono's —someone from the Meyers as a liaison."

Frederica: "Grandma's, is it not premature to get them involved?"

Roswaal: "Spare the rod and spoil the child, isn't that what they say? If you continue to gallantly keep them locked away in a birdcage, they will never have the chance to learn to spread their wings. I also agree with youuu~ though."

As Roswaal steadily and dispassionately filled in the holes in his plan, Frederica doubted if Emilia's criticisms of Roswaal were true, if his evil actions were just a pretense or if he truly was as much of a villain as he appeared to be.

Perhaps, since he could flawlessly devote himself to being the villain, he was not able to properly open up his heart to his fellow Camp members. He was too diligent.

Frederica: “Master, at least show a bit more consideration—”

And, just as she was about to point this out, and not let this misunderstanding sow great doubts in not just the Camp, but also the Barielle Domain, and in Schult’s heart, a voice interrupted her.

???: “—Th-Th-Th-Thi-Thi-Thi-This is very much terrible! Margrave-sama, where might you very much be?!”

Frederica: “What is it, Schult-sama?”

Abruptly, Schult’s panicked voice could clearly be heard from below, causing Frederica and Roswaal to exchange glances with each other. Roswaal raised his eyebrows as he also seemed to have no idea what was happening, so the Master pushed away from the railing and looked down, raising his voice to yell out “Schult-kun” as Schult ran into the garden down below.

Then, once Schult had been called, he opened his eyes wide and raised his voice,

Schult: “Margrave-sama! You very much must come down immediately! Someone claims they very much need to see you, that they have to report something to you!”

2

???: “—That which you are now viewing, is the will left behind by the late Madam.”

Saying this, the contents of the sealed letter were revealed by a girl of crimson hair—a maid who introduced herself as Yae Tenzen, whose words caused Roswaal to widen his eyes in shock, motionless.

Roswaal: “…”

Up until this point it had been unusual to see her master display his discomposure so openly, but that reaction was only natural. Having ascertained the same contents, Frederica, and all other parties present were struck with astonishment.

Above everyone else, as the central figure addressed by the written contents of that letter, Schult experienced the greatest shock.

The contents of the letter were—

Yae: "—The head of House Barielle, Priscilla Barielle, hereby declares that when it comes time for her official successor to be determined, the following personage, Schult, is to have his name altered to Schult Barielle, and he is to be ushered in as the legitimate son, and rightful heir to House Barielle."

Schult: "Priscilla-sama, me…?"

Schult blinked at the unforeseen event, his face seemingly unsure if this was a dream or reality.

However, placing her hands on Schult's shoulders from behind, Yae, who had revealed the location of the letter, smiled and said "You're getting way too surprised." as she rubbed her cheeks against his.

Yae: "Considering how much the Madam doted on Schult-chan, doesn't this totally make sense? —Though in truth, I think she had intended to keep it hidden during the Royal Selection."

Schult: "Yae-sama… Yae-sama, how long have you known about this? You left the mansion so many months ago, and I am very much glad you are finally home, but…"

Yae: "—. I found out just before Schult-chan and the Madam left for the Empire. After all, it was around that time when she had prepared the letter."

At Yae's quiet answer, large tears began to well up in Schult's eyes.

If one were to ask, they would discover that Yae was a maid who had previously worked at the mansion and had been on leave for quite a while, but upon receiving news of Priscilla's passing, she had come rushing here.

As one could see, Yae seemed to be quite close with Schult, and it also appeared that Priscilla had held great confidence in her, entrusting her to guard the important letter she had left behind.

The revelations that came forth as a result of all that were a great disruption to Roswaal's plans—

Frederica: "—However, thinking of Schult-sama, it might be for the best."

Roswaal: "…Frederica?"

Frederica: "It might be a bit different from what you had in mind, Master, but… For Schult-sama, and the spirits of everyone in the mansion, it will surely be a salvation. —Truly, she was an incredible individual."

Despite having been Royal Candidate and an adversary of Emilia, Frederica had had little contact with Priscilla, however she could only describe her as an incredible person.

After all—

Frederica: "To derail your schemes to such an extent, Master, without a doubt, she must have been a worthy adversary to Emilia-sama, correct?"

3

Yae: "…"

Embracing Schult from behind as his small body trembled, looking over the letter that had been left behind once again, Yae breathed a sigh in response to her own decision to return to the Barielle Mansion.

—All of her judgments had been for the sake of helping Al accomplish the objective he was aiming for.

Yae: "The fact that he didn't give the signal, means that his plan at the Tower must've failed~."

Originally, Yae was supposed to converge with Al at the nearest town as he set course for the Pleiades Watchtower, and by helping him accomplish some duty that he had no choice but to fulfill, the promise had been that she would then ascertain his last moments as his life came to naught.

However, without any signal given at the established time, Yae judged that Al's plan had failed, and withdrew from the nearby town—straight from there, she made her return to the Barielle Mansion.

Yae: "For me to be openly returning to the mansion like this, is it the first time since Al-sama prevented me from assassinating the Madam?"

But then again, in the cases when it was not out in the open, she had visited the mansion rather frequently in order to maintain communications with Al. —The letter she had used as a pretext to return to the mansion, too, was information she had obtained on one of those non-overt occasions, while she had concealed herself in the roof.

Though, to Schult, and to the nasty aristocrat—Roswaal L. Mathers, who had attempted to prey on him alongside his maid, she had pretended it was a letter entrusted to her by Priscilla.

Yae: "In reality, I just caught a glimpse as the Madam prepared and stored it away in a secret safe."

Thanks to the fact that the letter had been stored within a secret safe, its whereabouts had been revealed to her without anybody else learning of its existence, lending credence to the notion that Yae had simply been entrusted with the secret. For that reason, she felt a little guilty capitalizing on Priscilla's death, but—

Yae: "—But, Madam, were you truly not aware that I had been watching?"

In all honesty, even Yae could not find a clear answer to that mystery.

Priscilla had prepared the letter to officially adopt Schult just before venturing to the Empire, storing it in the safe at around the same time, but regardless of having been Yae's master for a period of time, her perception was not to be made light of. That fierce woman of character, possessing eyes that seemed to peer into the hearts of others, had she truly believed that Yae had not been present?

???: "—Utilize this letter skillfully, and have it serve your own interests. Take the opportunity to save Schult as well."

Perhaps it was with such an arrangement in mind that Priscilla had hidden that letter in a secret safe, one that nobody, save for Yae, having concealed herself in the roof, would have been capable of finding without turning the mansion inside out.

Either way—

Yae: "I shall do so, Madam. —I must wait for Al-sama, after all."

Choosing to take advantage of Priscilla's kindness, Yae had returned to the mansion for that purpose.

As mentioned previously, Al had not given the signal to go ahead with the plan; likely, he had failed at the Watchtower, and the plan had fallen into a state where it would be difficult to carry out. But, Al would not die. He was alive.

Yae: "After all, Al-sama is a monster."

Al would not die, he could not be killed. Because he was such a monster, Yae obeyed him.

It was all in order to ascertain that he fulfilled his objective, and died in satisfaction; to ascertain the disappearance of the being who had taught her dread. —For that purpose, she would keep Schult at a distance from the Emilia Camp.

If something had happened to Al, the Emilia Camp, who had accompanied him to the Watchtower, would have been involved. She had no choice but to prepare for when he broke free, remaining in a location where mobilization was possible at any time.

Hence—

Yae: “Schult-chan, let’s carry on the Madam’s wishes together. It’s alright. After all, from now on, I’ll also return to the mansion, and help you however I can, Schult-chan.”

Schult: “Yae-sama… yes. Yes, of course…! I will very much try to live up to Priscilla-sama’s expectations! I very much wish for Yae-sama to help me with that!”

At the determination of the upfront and adorable Schult—no, of the boy who had become Schult Barielle, Yae showed an exaggerated look of delight in her eyes, and the other servants were deeply moved to the point of tears. The maid accompanying Roswaal also wiped a tear from the corner of her eye, touched by his courageousness.

The Margrave was making an indistinct expression, as if his expectations had been off the mark, but taking that as proof that Priscilla had still managed to exceed someone’s expectations post-mortem, it was quite satisfying.

Indeed, Priscilla had been a worthwhile master to serve. —That alone, was the truth.

Schult: “I’ll very much do my best! After all, when Al-sama and Heinkel-sama finally return, I very much wish to present them with an admirable appearance!”

But, as Schult got red in the face with such enthusiasm, Yae hesitated on how to respond.

Al’s return was something that Yae was also awaiting.

But, when it came to Heinkel—

Yae: “…For Heinkel-sama to return, it might be a little bit difficult~.”

4

Heinkel: “—Gwoaahhh-!!”

Crashing to the ground following a feeling of suspension, Heinkel raised a deep shout.

After groaning for a bit, he slowly moved his limbs around, undoing his restraints. Gaining freedom from the fine threads that had bound his wrists and ankles, he grasped a sense of liberty for the first time in a while—

Heinkel: “Piece of shit…!”

In a manner most loathsome, he spat out words as if to curse the misfortune that had befallen him.

—The one who had tied Heinkel up, leaving him in a small hut in a forest that nobody would visit, was a girl named Yae who had declared herself to be one of Aldebaran’s accomplices.

There was some incomprehensible history about her being a former maid who served Priscilla while simultaneously being an assassin sent to kill her, and she had tempted Heinkel, saying that if he helped Aldebaran, he would get the chance to obtain that which he desired most—the Dragon’s Blood. She had tempted him, and yet.

Heinkel: “Gotta be fucking kidding me, saying the plan failed the moment there was no contact from that Aldebaran guy…”

In the end, as Heinkel sought explanations and the continuance of the plan, she mercilessly kicked in his knees and elbowed him, tying him up as he bled from the nose, before promptly disappearing on her own.

From Heinkel’s perspective, he had done nothing to deserve being left hanging like this.

Heinkel: “Each, and every, one of them… hk.”

Upon the death of Priscilla, whom he had been counting on, he turned to Emilia as his next recourse, only to be rejected, and when he reached out to grasp the hand Aldebaran had offered him, the hand shook him off, casting him down into Hell.

As a result, Heinkel’s prospects had circled back to the dead end they had been at before the start of the Royal Selection.

Heinkel: “But, even so…”

He could not give up. He could not bring himself to give up. Not once had he ever been able to give up.

Heinkel: “—SHIT!!”

Shakily standing back up, he wiped his dried nosebleed on his sleeve, and began to walk. He knew not where those legs would take him, but even without a destination, he could not bear to halt his tracks.

—After all, Heinkel Astrea was a husband, and a father.

Heinkel: “Just you wait, Louanna, Reinhard. I’m… I’ll…”

Falteringly dragging his feet along, with his hand placed on the hilt of the sword hanging by his waist, Heinkel pressed forth.

He had no destination. —All he had were his prayers, worn out and rusted over after many long years of endurance.

5

Subaru: “—In the end, I’m sorry about all this commotion, Ezzo-san.”

Ezzo: “No, it was unavoidable. I also understand that your circumstances have changed. For now, I shall remain here until other personnel arrive as a replacement, but if necessary, I can always provide a testimony.”

Subaru: “That’d be a huge help… Truly.”

Speaking these words softly, Subaru bowed his head to Ezzo’s gentlemanly reception.

The location was the fifth floor of the Pleiades Watchtower, the expansive area just before the grand gate. There, Subaru—no, Subaru’s group had completed their preparations to disembark once again, seeking to depart from the Tower as soon as possible.

After a meager half-day sojourn, it was an early morning departure awaiting the dawn outside the Tower.

Meili: “It seems a little like you guys are always in such a ru~sh, Onii-san. I wonder, couldn’t we return from the Tower a bit more qui~etly?”

Beatrice: “You can say that again, I suppose. Last time, he was sent to the Empire, and this time, it’s such an abrupt roundtrip, in fact.”

Petra: “That isn’t Subaru’s fault. The one who’s to blame for everything is Al-san… geez, what are we even going to say to Schult-kun… Stupid Al-san.”

Quietly exchanging those final comments, were the girls of the returning group.

Naturally, each of them had their own reservations about things having turned out like this. About this mere half-day sojourn, about the situation of them needing to hastily depart, and about the one who had caused those circumstances.

Only, for Subaru, it was painful that the person who had caused it kept receiving blame.

Garfiel: “Captain, I’ve gone ‘n loaded all the luggage into th’ dragon carriage. We can get goin’ whenever.”

Thereupon, slightly opening the grand gate, Garfiel returned from outside and called out. Having gone a step ahead by loading up the dragon carriage with all of their belongings, he knitted his brow at Subaru, who had raised his hand.

Garfiel: “Yer mug is lookin’ real stingy, Captain. Tho’, I get that you’re frettin’, same like “Rauraji’s Deep-Cut Nail”.”

Subaru: “Mm, I know that you’re trying to encourage me, but I don’t really get it. Deep-cut nail? Rauraji?”

Garfiel: “It don’t really matter! Ya can’t change somethin’ once it’s happened. ‘N so, it’s a matter of what ya can do from here on out, yeah? My amazin’ self’ll help ya in any way I can.”

Flashing his fangs, Garfiel vigorously clapped Subaru on the shoulder.

Under that force, Subaru thought his frail shoulders might shatter, but those sentiments filled him with joy a hundred times greater. Besides, it was as Garfiel had said—what mattered was what he had decided to do from this point forward.

Subaru: “—I’m going to find out. Just what exactly it is that I’ve decided to carry.”

With those words, Subaru placed his hand over his chest—touching the magic orb hanging around his neck, he declared his resolve.

—When Subaru and Beatrice had been sealed in a magic sphere similar to this one, it was not as though he had clear knowledge of all the details concerning the massive, colossal battle that Al had incited.

Subaru: “…”

The interior of the magic orb had been dark, difficult to maneuver inside, and kept him in a dream-like state of mind that made it unclear whether he was conscious or not, as if he had returned to being a fetus submerged in the amniotic fluid of his mother’s womb.

Inside, Subaru’s sense of what was reality or dream was hazy, leaving him unable to say anything for certain. As expected of the adorable Beatrice, she had admirably devoted herself to reverse-engineering the technique behind the forbidden art that had sealed them, but the only thing Subaru could do when he found himself in a state of being consciously aware, was to invoke the Authority of Greed—Cor Leonis, to gather the presences of his nearby allies, and perceive the intense changes in their emotions.

Even so, thanks to the reiteration of longing, desperation, and violent fluctuations in the powerful emotions of his allies, he had been able to perceive the shifts in the extraordinary circumstances through his soul.

Particularly distinctive were the intense hues of resolve and determination within Petra, and the monolithic swell of emotions that Rem harbored towards Subaru. —Due to having received those, Subaru expressed his intent to depart the Tower in the early hours of the morning with utmost conviction.

Originally, their purpose for visiting the Pleiades Watchtower had been for the sake of Al, so upon finding out that it had just been a pretext from him, any reason to remain there was lost; but, not only that—

Petra: "—There's a way for the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony to properly throw up the things he's eaten, right?"

Subaru: "Yeah. And present within, are the people who've been devoured until now… including Rem's Name and Memories."

In response to the words of Petra, who had likely gotten the best use out of the Authority of Gluttony in her strategy during the loop before he had Returned by Death, Subaru gave a deep nod.

In that moment, without even the chance for words to be exchanged, Rem, with eyes which seemed to comprehend it all, had driven her Morningstar into Subaru. —Splendidly wielding the spiked iron ball that Subaru had kept polished every day, she had certainly regained her sense of self. Beyond any shadow of a doubt, that was the result of Gluttony's involvement.

That was the conviction he held, and furthermore, Gluttony had already been apprehended. There existed no reason to not thoroughly pressure him, and force him to vomit up everything that had been eaten.

And so, for the sake of those direct negotiations as well—

Subaru: "—Let's get going, off to the nostalgic Royal Capital! We'll confront Gluttony, and make him hurl everything up! And besides, it seems like I can't keep remaining indifferent to the history of the Kingdom, and to the history of this world, for any longer."

Clutching the magic orb in his fingers, and thinking of Al sealed within, Subaru admonished himself.

In response to Subaru's declaration of resolve, Beatrice held his hand as she stood by his side, Garfiel stroked his fang with his finger, and Meili shrugged her shoulders with the small crimson scorpion sitting atop them.

Then, as Petra donned a dignified and resolute smile, Subaru received her gaze.

For the sake of Aldebaran, the one who called himself the "Following Star of the Pleiades", an opposing force who wielded the same power as Subaru, yet still one whom he had resolved to definitely save no matter what, Natsuki Subaru pressed forth to the Royal Capital.

He would find out. After all, he knew that remaining in ignorance would be insincere, and he would never be able to forgive himself for doing so.

Hence—

Subaru: "—Bring it on, oh inevitable fate!"

Carrying those feelings upon his back, Natsuki Subaru declared his intent to surmount any accursed shackles that might stand in his way.

6

—It coincided with Natsuki Subaru's declaration of resolve.

At the current moment, in a far distant land, the very destination Natsuki Subaru had announced his departure for—in the Royal Capital of the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica, a certain incident was unfolding.

???: "…"

In this early hour of morn, the majority of the Royal Capital's citizens were still asleep, letting the break of dawn go by from within their dreams, the Royal Castle Lugunica, which ordinarily ought to have been enveloped by an extraordinary tranquility, was enshrouded in a peculiar atmosphere.

The source of that atmosphere, was the very heart of the Royal Castle—the throne room.

The impetus for the Royal Selection, had been the extinction of the Royal Family at the hands of a disease. And so, in the absence of a sovereign, the throne room of the Royal Castle was firmly closed off, with the exception of holding monumental ceremonies.

However, on this day, on this morning, the doors to the throne room were flung wide open, and there, the leaders of the Kingdom—the Council of Wise Men, the faithful vassals who had won the trust of the deceased King, as well as even the royal soldiers, emanating a solemn air of tension, were all gathered.

???: "…"

In this Kingdom bereft of a Monarch, each and every one of them bore a heavy responsibility in their individual positions.

Despite being an early morning summons, nobody had arrived tardy, and there was not a single person present who displayed drowsiness in their eyes, nor any miscreants who dared to exhibit an attitude lacking in concentration.

Ergo, no matter the time, the weight of the attention poured into this place was no less than that of the Kingdom itself.

—Taking all of that in by her lonesome, a woman maintained an air of silence.

Woman: "…"

Kneeling down on one leg atop the blazing red carpet laid out across the marble floor, was an individual clad in robes of indigo blue, bowing her head with her hands clasped before her chest. That posture of prayer was so polished, it caused the military officers to recall their martial training, and the civil officers to recall their etiquette training, spurring them all to reflexively heave sighs.

That was the extent to which the woman, with a mere gesture of offering a prayer, had completely overwhelmed her surroundings.

???: "—Hrrrmm. Could you please raise your visage?"

Only one man amongst the crowd did not find himself captivated by the woman's prayer, letting his voice reverberate through the chamber.

Calm and intellectual, it was the kind of voice that would naturally lend that impression to any who heard it, and its owner was one of the people involved with the castle as it received the kneeling girl—no, his position could even be described as their representative.

Miklotov McMahon. —In the Kingdom of Lugunica, bereft of a Monarch, he was the central personage of the Council of Wise Men who steered the nation's politics, and even in this situation that had been prepared in great haste, he was the utmost important individual whose voice held the greatest influence and sway.

A sagacious individual known for his outstanding ingenuity, and his extraordinary faith and devotion towards the Kingdom, he possessed so great a presence that none other than the King himself had joked, "The nation shall not waver even if the Lugunican King dies, but if he were to die, the Kingdom would fall into ruin".

His gentle appearance and mild manner of speech may have been deceiving, but in reality, the King of Lugunica was a remarkable man, the most reliable to make an ally of, and the most fearsome to make an enemy of. —Miklotov was an individual who, over many long years, had exploited that reputation to the fullest.

Woman: "—Yes."

Receiving Miklotov's words, the woman slowly lifted her downcast visage. Then, when she opened the eyelids that she had kept shut, Miklotov's breath caught slightly upon meeting her gaze.

That reaction Miklotov gave had not been solely limited to him. Present in this chamber as another member of the Council of Wise

Men, Bordeaux Zergev; standing here as the representative of the military officers, the Commander of the Royal Guard, Marcos Gildark; the central figure of the civil officers, Rickert Hoffman; and all others standing in attendance in the throne room at this very moment, all reacted.

This was a woman whose mere presence had harbored enough allure to naturally draw the attention of everyone present. But, in this moment, everyone's shared reaction was not merely caused by the way she conducted herself. —It was her appearance.

Long, elegant golden hair, and crimson eyes blazing with dignified intent; possessing a meaning far more significant than simply being beautiful, they were striking to all those present here—nay, to all who lived in the Kingdom of Lugunica.

Thus—

Woman: "—To begin with, allow me to express my thanks for your graceful reception of my sudden visit. Considering our positions, this was likely far from ideal."

As if she was accustomed to all those gazes, the woman, still down on one knee, gazed over all the wise and important individuals that had congregated here, and uttered those words.

Receiving her words, which had neither excessively abased herself, nor had failed to bear her position in mind, those present there suppressed their momentary surprise and turmoil, entrusting their response to their representative, Miklotov.

Taking in their intent, Miklotov, sitting in his chair as he caressed his long, long beard, he interposed a "Hrrrmm" as a sigh,

Miklotov: "My my, you seem to be one willing to say things where most others would hold their tongues. Be that as it may, I suppose there is no meaning in pretending otherwise. After all, you have spoken nothing but the truth."

Woman: "When you phrase that in such a frank manner, it does place a burden upon my shoulders, too. As you can see, I am quite young and lacking in experience, so I had been fearful that I may not be able to muster words in front of you all like this."

Miklotov: "Hrrrmm, though you might say that, you seem rather dignified. It is as if you are well accustomed to all eyes falling upon yourself. As for why that is so… I can come up with quite a few ideas."

Woman: "Indeed. I shall not deny it."

The pair had a difference in age enough to be grandfather and grandchild, but there existed nary a falter in the exchange between Miklotov and the woman, nor did it seem like things would devolve into a one-sided probing on account of one actor falling short of the other.

As both of them grasped that neither would be the case, they simultaneously smiled as if letting out a breath,

Woman: "In this early morning, I could not possibly waste everyone's precious time, given how busy you all must be. Without further ado… may I begin the main subject?"

Miklotov: "Hrrrmm, very well, you may do so. At this age, getting up early is of no issue to me, but when it comes to important matters, I find it painful to defer them no matter how old I get. — That is especially so when it is a subject broached by the Divine Dragon Church, which has placed itself at such a distance from the Royal Castle."

Everyone: "…"

He had generously prompted her to continue, but Miklotov's words caused the atmosphere in the room to instantly grow tense. That response was immediately slackened, recognizing it as a discourtesy to the woman who had visited the Royal Castle all by her lonesome, but the reason behind it was something that nobody present could have done anything about.

—The name Miklotov had raised, the Divine Dragon Church, was, as the name implied, a religious group that worshipped the Divine

Dragon Volcanica, founding their faith in the grace of its power and the protection of the Covenant.

As the Kingdom of Lugunica christened itself the Dragon Kingdom, the exceptional depth of its ties to the Dragon was well known, and to a greater or lesser extent, the citizens of the Kingdom considered themselves to be receiving the favor of the Divine Dragon.

Due to that self-awareness, even if they were not officially part of the Church, the majority of Lugunica's populace harbored feelings of reverence concerning the Divine Dragon. Within that sort of environment, the potency of faith that those who officially adhered to the Church harbored towards the Divine Dragon went without saying.

In order to avoid shaking the nation with that immense influence, the Divine Dragon Church refrained from drawing near the Royal Castle, which bore responsibility for the nation's politics, and they each contributed to the well-being of the citizens within their own domains. —That was the unspoken agreement.

That was how unprecedented an event it was for a nun of the Divine Dragon Church to visit the Royal Castle, attempting to speak on a matter before a group that included the Council of Wise Men.

Only—

Woman: "—There is value in doing so."

Precisely because there was an understanding of how unprecedented it was, there existed a reason substantial enough to break that unwritten rule.

The woman's declaration, proclaiming that, indeed, this was meaningful enough to gather Miklotov and the others in the throne room, and have them hear what she had to say, succeeded in its purpose of filling them with expectations.

Hence, following the silent encouragement from the wise men, the woman spoke. —Of the reason, for her visit.

Woman: "All adherents of the Divine Dragon Church mourn the recent perils of the Kingdom from the bottom of our hearts. As per the unspoken agreement, we have remained at a distance from national affairs concerning the battle for the throne… the Royal Selection, but ever since news of the catastrophe at the Watergate City reached our ears, we could no longer remain still.”

Miklotov: “The Watergate City… Pristella, and the incident with the Witch Cult. We too are pained regarding the damages to that city, but surely the Divine Dragon Church does not intend to admonish the Royal Candidates involved with the incident?”

Woman: “Under that assumption, the significance of hastening to break the unspoken agreement, and the fact that I said prior there would be value in hearing what I had to say’d be contradicted… It would be contradicted.”

Revealing her true colors with the sudden counterpoint, the woman’s youthfulness showed itself as she corrected her speech. As if to cover up the awkwardness of it, the woman cleared her throat with a small cough,

Woman: “At any rate, I have no complaints to present regarding the Royal Candidates. It is not as though I harbor no reservations towards any of them, but that would be a matter of my own opinion, and not the consensus of the Divine Dragon Church.”

Miklotov: “If it is not the opinion of the Church, that would be your modest view as a citizen of the Kingdom. In fact, I believe we ought to proactively lend our ears to it, but… hrrrmm, that would likely veer this discussion off course.”

Woman: “Indeed. I shall bear in mind that you are a talkative personage, Miklotov-sama, but, let us proceed to the main topic. —That which we wish to discuss, is not the attribution of responsibility, but on the matter of the damages.”

Miklotov: “—. Let us hear it.”

Woman: “In the Watergate City of Pristella, those who fell upon harm at the hands of the Witch Cult… it seems like several cases have been identified, but the Divine Dragon Church can offer a means to provide aid."

—That instant, at the meaning contained in those words, the atmosphere in the throne room underwent a great tremor.

However, as the source of that tremor, the woman's dignified posture remained undisturbed, continuing to stand up straight while basking in the gazes of the wise men. She had not exhibited any wavering in her gaze or demeanor, and there was an assurance in herself that would not permit her to speak without thorough conviction.

Miklotov: "—Hrrrmm."

With that single interjection, Miklotov cut through the stirring atmosphere.

Nevertheless, even Miklotov, a man of preeminent wisdom within the Kingdom, could not help but be surprised by the woman's proposal. And so, as the wise man caressed his beard with a slight amount of restlessness,

Miklotov: "Supposing that is indeed true, we could not hope to ask for anything more. Bringing the matter up with the Royal Castle was…"

Woman: "If we had gone ahead and proceeded to act without permission, it would not have been received all too well, correct? Moreover…"

Miklotov: "The ones who would not receive it well would not just be limited to us at the castle, but the Witch Cult, too, after all."

To the fact that went without saying, the woman drew back her slender chin in agreement with Miklotov.

Naturally, if they were able to neutralize the harm that the Witch Cult had dealt, it would certainly be an undesirable event for the Witch Cult. Ergo, the Divine Dragon Church wished for something.

Miklotov: "—The Kingdom's certain protection. Due to the distance between we who govern national politics, and the Divine Dragon Church that governs religion, something of this nature has never truly taken shape over the many years.”

Woman: “Yes, indeed. On this occasion, we wish to actualize that. That is the collective will of the Divine Dragon Church. —In order to push in favor of that decision, I have a proposal.”

Miklotov: “Hrrrmm, a proposal, is it? And that would be?”

Woman: “First of all, allow me to present to you. A demonstration of the relief we are capable of providing.”

Placing a hand over her chest, the woman declared so, causing Miklotov to raise his eyebrows.

That was a welcome request. As she said, it was a proposal to provide a basis for their decision, so they could not object to it. Merely, to bring a victim from the Watergate City all the way to the Royal Capital would be—

Woman: “There ought to be someone you have in mind. Let us make that person the first.”

Miklotov: “—. Very well. First, I grant you the permission to propose this matter. —Commander Marcos.”

Marcos: “Yes sir!”

His name called out by Miklotov, that titan of a man clad in armor from head-to-toe, the Commander of the Royal Guard, Marcos, responded with a booming voice and stepped forth, bowing before the seats of the Council of Wise Men.

Miklotov: “Could you please escort her? This shall be regarded as a matter of great importance to the Kingdom. Be prudent.”

Marcos: “Understood. —I shall be accompanying you.”

Woman: “Yes, your face is… no, your whole body is rather large. I look forward to working with you.”

With a small bow of her head, a degree of gentleness dwelled in the woman’s expression. Perhaps that was because the discussion proceeded in accordance with her wishes, and the purpose of the Divine Dragon Church’s visit seemed like it would be fulfilled.

Understanding that it would thus catch her a bit off guard, Miklotov decided to ask her a certain question.

Calling herself a messenger from the Divine Dragon Church, the woman had gathered Miklotov and the other leaders of the Kingdom at the castle in the early morning; and so, he asked about the aspect of her that had attracted even more attention than simply her involvement with the Divine Dragon Church.

That was—

Miklotov: “Excuse my terrible impoliteness, but may I ask to hear your name, Miss Nun?”

7

Woman: “—I am a nun sent by the Divine Dragon Church.”

Brought there directly by Marcos, the woman paid a visit to the Royal Residence—faced with the person who called herself a nun, Ferris could not hide his puzzlement.

The reason why Ferris and Wilhelm were staying in the Royal Capital, was to make a direct request to the Royal Castle—to enlist in the survey team en route to the Pleiades Watchtower now that it was cleared for entry, and by using the wisdom of the Sage, extolled as being all-knowing, to learn of a means to save Crusch, who was still suffering even now.

Of course, from the letter sent by Emilia and the others, who had already returned from the Pleiades Watchtower, it was made clear that the Sage’s existence and wisdom were nothing so convenient. But, even so, it was a greater possibility than the stagnated developments in healing magic.

Ferris: “Really, how stupid. No matter how much I improve on any preexisting healing magic, all it does is make it so I can’t die, while doing absolutely nothing to relieve Crusch-sama’s suffering.”

Amidst his feelings of desperation, the research of the Blue had elevated the field of healing magic existing in the Kingdom of Lugunica by not one, but three whole levels in this short period, but at this time, that did not make Ferris feel anything other than worthless.

At present, he was unable to save the person he wanted to save the most. That fact pressed Ferris into a corner, plunging him into darkness.

And so, even though he had wished to try relying on the Sage's wisdom at the Pleiades Watchtower—

Ferris: "…Save, Crusch-sama? The Divine Dragon Church can? R-Really?"

Woman: "My faith forbids me from speaking falsehoods, and I am not interested in further tormenting those who are already astray. Even if you do not believe me, it seems like your Commander does."

Responding to Ferris's trembling voice, the nun gestured to Marcos, who had accompanied her. As Ferris raised his voice, exclaiming "Commander!" to Marcos, he nodded with his boulder-like expression,

Marcos: "I've heard that the Divine Dragon Church possesses magic and techniques that haven't been unveiled to the public. Starting with Miklotov-sama, the rest of the Council of Wise Men also believes that there is value in lending her credence."

Ferris: "…B-But, if anything else were to happen to Crusch-sama…"

Woman: "…"None can lift the Quain Stone alone"."

Ferris: "—Hk."

Silently, as the nun spoke those words, Ferris's breath caught reflexively.

As Ferris's eyes welled with tears from turbulent emotions gushing forth within him, the nun gently reached her hand out towards his, and with her slender fingers, she softly undid the firm clench of Ferris’s own.

With her doing so as she pleased with him, Ferris suddenly took notice of her beautiful golden hair, as well as the earnest illumination filling her crimson eyes, and widened his own eyes in surprise.

That realization spurred on by confusion, he failed to understand its significance—

Woman: “I beg of you. Please, allow me to aid the one you hold ever so dear. The Divine Dragon Church prays night and day for the well-being of the Kingdom’s citizens. No matter the doctrine they embrace, there are no exceptions to that.”

Ferris: “Wh-Who… who, are you?”

Woman: “…”

She held her breath at Ferris’s question; however, keeping that brief hesitation contained to the blink of an eye, she gently held his hands in her own, and replied.

That was—

Woman: “—Filóre. That is my name.”

—Fifteen years ago, the daughter of the King’s younger brother had been abducted, her whereabouts unknown ever since. With the same name as that vanished princess, and bearing the golden hair and crimson eyes emblematic of the Royal Family, the nun introduced herself.

vic.ll20

Bonus Short Stories

The Land of Nascent Wolves:
Undead Busters V
(LQ MTL Translation)

1

—Old legends tell a tale.

It is the story of a solitary King and a young girl. A story of how a King who was once alone met a girl and was alone no longer. As a long time passed, those involved lost their lives one after another; through that time, the truth was obscured and embellished, yet it remains a story that leaves a profound emotional impact on the heart. Though there are many theories on how the story is told, every version speaks of the existence of a foolish wolf who harbored wicked ambitions and tore apart the feelings of the King and the girl. The black-furred werewolf set his claws and fangs upon the girl, touching the imperial wrath of the King who loved her. His body and even his soul were scorched by the "Sun Sword," and finally, as an abominable and cursed existence—

—he was carved into the Iron-Blooded Laws, an edict to exterminate his kind so that even his fellow wolves would be wiped out. Therefore, the old legends say:

—Even the girl who loved all people was destined to never be able to love this wolf.

"…or something like that is what's being said, so I was wondering how things would turn out."

"You were wondering… what?"

"Well, it was a much more radical reunion greeting than I expected, so even for me, it's like, 'I pulled it off!' or 'Are they both just idiots?'—I'm torn on which reaction to give! However, it goes without saying that flashy is better than plain for dramatic effect, and in its own way, this isn't a bad epilogue for an old tale. What do you think, Arakiya?"

“I don’t care…”

“Oh my, really? Really? This is like an unreleased episode of ‘Iris and the King of Thorns,’ which the sister princess cherished so much, you know? If that doesn’t interest you, saying you ‘don’t care’ makes you quite the cold-hearted one, Arakiya…”

“Cecilus, die.”

“—Whoa-ho!!”

Cecilus chattered incessantly, while Arakiya grew furious, provoked by him. Between the two of them, the heat was rising—though it was only Arakiya truly heating up. Listening from the side, it was entirely Cecilus’s fault, so one could say the heat between them was rising.

In any case, Spica stepped between the two and scolded them loudly. This petty bickering was a regular occurrence, but it would be troublesome if they started a “Great Empire Decisive Battle” here without regard for their surroundings.

Because, right now, one such battle was already unfolding.

And—

“Oua, ouau.”

Both participants were people Spica knew: Yorna Mishigure, one of the Empire’s First Generals, and Volcas, the werewolf brought to the Imperial Capital under complicated circumstances.

2

“—!!”

Struck by a tremendous explosive pressure, Volcas pulsed all the muscles in his body, letting the impact escape through the tips of his limbs while violently spitting out surging bloody phlegm.

Bloody phlegm—what a ridiculous notion. This body was a mere imitation made of earth, a temporary vessel where a lingering soul barely managed to hang on. It was strange that being punched and kicked would result in torn flesh, broken bones, or especially spitting blood.

"I don't think it's strange at all. A vessel of flesh is, after all, influenced by the heat and radiance of the soul housed within. A vessel where that radiance smolders and emits cold heat is inferior to a lump of earth, even if blood and flesh flow through it. For you, who have blood flowing despite being a lump of earth, the Heavens have decreed… or rather, I should say, it makes for a delicious role for a named actor!"

The one who said this to the bleeding and bone-broken Volcas was Cecilus Segmunt—less of an instruction and more of a delusion—after he had easily defeated Volcas in their initial encounter.

To summarize, if the soul is lively, blood will flow. If that were the case, it was even more unwelcome. There shouldn't be any vitality in Volcas's soul.

Yet, there were regrets. Effeminate, despicable wishes. Because of them, Volcas had followed Cecilus and the others who had spared his life, bowing his head and allowing himself to be taken to the Imperial Capital.

All of it was so that he could have his soul scorched by the "Sun Sword" by the Emperor who ruled this city—no, the Empire.

However—

"Is that all there is to it?"

Looking down at Volcas, who had his limbs pressed against the earth, was a tall Fox-woman dressed in a loosely worn, lightly dyed kimono. Her movements were extraordinary; she was a warrior of more than average caliber.

As soon as she laid eyes on Volcas, who had been brought to the Crystal Palace by Cecilus and the others, this Fox-woman had dragged him to the wasteland behind the palace—and struck him mercilessly.

To be honest, it was a blow he had expected. After all, from the moment this Fox-woman saw Volcas, her scent carried a complex color that was neither pure anger nor pure grief. So, he had a premonition she would attack. What was strange was Volcas himself, who failed to dodge it.

He didn't feel like dodging the Fox-woman's kick and took it head-on. After that, he endured a rain of her punches and kicks, ending up crawling on the ground.

The Fox-woman's blows were heavy, unthinkable for a woman's slender arms. But in the land of the Empire, it wasn't rare for someone's combat prowess to defy their appearance. Arakiya was the same.

Therefore, the reason Volcas couldn't compete with this woman was something else—

"For someone who was once the 'Wolf General of Hell,' are you really being beaten senseless by a single woman like me?"

"…"

Volcas didn't even show signs of standing up, let alone fighting back. The woman questioned him.

He had no words to answer her. No—the words were there. If he opened his mouth, words seemed ready to spill out, swirling in the depths of his throat where his fangs were retracted. He questioned himself for not wanting to fight back despite being beaten and kicked, and a suspicion arose.

But that was a delusion born from a foolishness even greater than the disgrace of visiting the Imperial Capital out of effeminate, lingering regret.

"So you say you have no claws, fangs, or even words to exchange with me. If that is the case, I am no ogre. —This is the end."

Suddenly, the Fox-woman lowered her hands, dropped the ember from her pipe onto the ground, and slowly turned her back to Volcas. As she walked away, one step, then two, an impulse surged through Volcas, and strength returned to his limbs.

A heat that hadn’t stirred when he was being beaten and made to spit blood now boiled up at the sight of the woman’s retreating back. Before he knew it, Volcas reached out both hands toward her.

And, covering the Fox-woman from behind with both arms—

“—Iris… is that you?”

It was impossible. With impossible regret and sentimentality, Volcas uttered that question.

Iris. The girl who was noticed by the “King of Thorns,” caught in a war that shook the Empire, and the tragic woman whose heart was pierced by Volcas’s fangs.

Her appearance, her voice, her very way of being—everything was different.

And yet—

“—The scent of Iris is drifting off of you.”

Cecilus had said it. The radiance and heat of a soul are never lost, whether the vessel is flesh or earth. It was annoying, but it was the truth.

Because—

“How is it, Volcas? —I’ve become quite strong, haven’t I?”

Though her way of speaking and her expressions were different, her way of laughing remained exactly as it was that day. Yorna Mishigure—the Iris loved by the “King of Thorns” and the others—laughed mischievously.

3

“—I thought it was noisy, and I hear the cause lies with those I had so conveniently sent away. To bring back such trouble in less than a month… he is a man who truly knows how to complicate things. I can only imagine the hardships Arakiya and Spica face."

"Ah—er, maybe so! But Arakiya-chan looked more energetic than when she was shut up in the castle, and Spica-chan too! Cessie was… his usual self, I guess?"

"Hmph, his usual self, then."

"Ye-yeah, usual, usual… haha."

Vincent Vollachia, resting his clasped hands on his desk, narrowed his dark eyes at Medium's somewhat weak smile.

Lately, Medium had been acting strangely.

Originally, he hadn't chosen her as his Empress because of her scholarship or competence beyond her station. The primary reason for welcoming her as his bride was to represent an innovation in the way the Empire had been governed, showing both internally and externally that status was no longer determined solely by lineage or bloodline.

Therefore, as far as Vincent was concerned, he intended to require nothing more from her as Empress than to give birth to a robust and healthy heir. Of course, that role couldn't be filled by just anyone; they had to lack the ambition or rebellious intent that would plunge the nation into chaos, and they had to be someone Vincent could trust—though "trust" was a relative term. Those conditions were essential.

Naturally, Medium satisfied many of the conditions Vincent sought. And if she was fit for that role, he felt no need for any other consorts for the time being.

For those logical reasons, Vincent was quite satisfied with Medium's presence as Empress, but—

"…If something is weighing on your mind, speak. I cannot bear to see such a frown on your brow."

"Weight on my mind… oh, you mean worries? Eh?! Worries?! Abel-chin, how did you know I was worried?!"

“…My time is limited. Tell me the source of your worry.”

“Ehh~, but it’s hard to talk to Abel-chin about something concerning Abel-chin. Can I talk about the other one instead?”

“…Speak quickly.”

Apparently, there were two worries, and one of them was related to Vincent himself. Medium, who had been wearing an uncharacteristic expression, began to speak, saying, “Well, you see…”

The content of it was—

“—In short, opinions are divided on how to handle that undead werewolf, Volcas.”

“That’s right~. See, Abel-chin gave the order to kill all the undead, right? And Vol-chi thinks he should be executed by Abel-chin because of the bad things he did in the past, but Yorna-chan is super against it, and at this rate…”

“Say it. What will happen?”

“Yorna-chan might start another rebellion for Vol-chi’s sake!”

“Even with the ‘Great Disaster’ settled, she still hasn’t learned her lesson about opposing me, that ‘Topographical Artist’…”

Vincent grew bitter at Medium’s plea, which was accompanied by exaggerated gestures.

Ever since her time as the ruler of Chaosflame, Yorna had frequently rebelled against Vincent over the treatment of demi-humans, leading large-scale insurrections. He had expected their relationship to improve somewhat after they had opened up to each other during the “Great Disaster,” but it seemed that was a premature assumption.

“Perhaps I should simply order Cecilus to replace the seat of the ‘Seventh’ once and for all.”

"Ah—Abel-chin's bad habit again. You don't actually mean to do it, so stop saying mean things with that mean face! No more mean glares either!"

"My expression is natural. Do not talk nonsense. Hmph."

Medium pulled up the corners of her soft eyes with her fingers, and Vincent, snorting at her remark, leaned back in his creaking chair and thought for a moment.

It was galling to admit Medium was right, but in reality, the Empire's military strength had taken a massive hit during the "Great Disaster," and strategically, he couldn't afford to lose Yorna now. However, if the undead Volcas was indeed that "Wolf General of Hell," it was a complicated matter for the Emperor.

"To have two of the direct actors of 'Iris and the King of Thorns' in this era… if you include the late Emperor Eugard from the other day, that makes three. Priscilla would have been thrilled."

"—Um, hey, Abel-chin. Can I… make a proposal?"

"You? A proposal?"

Thinking of his dead sister and her hobby during her life, Vincent felt a slight pang in his chest, but he blinked in surprise as Medium timidly raised her hand.

This was the first time Medium had offered an opinion on a situation requiring political maneuvering. He had valued her as an Empress specifically because she did not overstep in such ways.

"—Fine. However, if the Empress remains too indifferent to politics, the nation's future is bleak. Very well. Let me hear it. What do you have to say?"

"Well, like Yorna-chan said, I want you to spare Vol-chi's life. And then, maybe you could put Vol-chi into one of the vacant 'Nine Divine Generals' seats?"

"—What?"

“Ah! Vol-chi is definitely strong! I’m no match for him, and Jamal-chin got beaten soundly! Even Cessie said his skills are top-notch!”

Vincent closed one eye at Medium’s frantic explanation.

Unexpectedly, it was an opinion worth considering. If she just wanted to save Volcas, it would be a foolish sentiment born of her sweetness, but there was a foresight and wisdom in the proposal.

If Volcas joined the “Nine Divine Generals,” the vacancy among the generals would be filled. Furthermore, if his true identity was the “Wolf General of Hell,” then—

“In ‘Iris and the King of Thorns,’ Eugard-kun gave the order never to forgive the werewolves and the mole-people, right? And you tried to put a stop to that order, Abel-chin. So, to make everyone understand your sincerity…”

“Forgiving Volcas, the direct cause, and bringing him under my banner is the best course of action. If I show that I will employ even Volcas—who is both a werewolf and an undead—provided there is reason to do so, it will be the greatest proof to the people that this Empire has been reborn since the ‘Great Disaster.’“

“That! That’s what Big Bro said! …I mean, that’s what I said!”

“You didn’t say it. I see, so it was Flop’s… no, their suggestion.”

Medium, who had let it slip, clutched her head dramatically, crying “Ahh~!” Her attempt at unaccustomed political maneuvering or playing the strategist had collapsed halfway through.

Nevertheless, the proposal itself was worth considering, and it didn’t seem like something the Empress would need to use her clumsy words to convince the Emperor of.

“Why did you use such a roundabout method? Did you think I was such a fool that I would reject a worthy suggestion based on who said it?”

“Well, I wanted to look good for Abel-chin…”

"…What?"

"I—said—! I wanted to look good for Abel-chin! You know, talk about smart-sounding things and have Abel-chin think better of me. …It's true that I'm worried about Yorna-chan and Vol-chi, though! Everyone gave me lots of good ideas."

Medium poked her fingers together in front of her chest, looking dejected. Vincent was at a loss for words at her blatant honesty and the shallowness of her scheme.

To think the goal of her plot was merely to win his favor. Even if she harbored ambitions, in her current position as Medium, there was no higher status than the Emperor's throne itself.

"Do you intend to plot against me and stand at the pinnacle of the Empire?"

"—? The place I want to be 'Number One' is inside Abel-chin. Abel-chin is already the 'Number One' of the Empire, right?"

"Ha."

At her single-mindedness, which made serious consideration seem foolish, Vincent let out a long sigh.

Then he slowly stood up and straightened the collar of his coat.

And then—

"Lead the way. To consider that proposal, I must first meet this Volcas directly."

"—! Yes, yes! This way, this way! Everyone will be so happy~. As expected of Abel-chan! You're so kind!"

"You are likely the only one who would describe me as such."

Medium's face brightened instantly, and she held out her hand with a cheerful voice as she led the way. Vincent looked down at her hand and sighed.

He had never heard of an Emperor and Empress walking through the palace holding hands. —And so, Vincent took her outstretched hand, drew it to his arm for her to hold, and began to walk.

The Emperor and Empress of the Vollachia Empire walked through the Crystal Palace arm-in-arm, in perfect harmony.

END

Kararagi Reaper Incident V
(LQ MTL Translation)

Anastasia regained consciousness in the darkness and let out a small sigh.

"—Haa."

A blunder. This was undeniably a blunder.

Drawing the surroundings' attention with a major event while making a move to pluck the real prize in the meantime—that was a basic of basics even in commercial strategy, and a tactic she often used herself in the trading company.

"And yet, I went and fell right into the trap… for someone like me, I've got a lot of reflecting to do."

Placing a hand to her forehead, Anastasia reflected on her actions while feeling the sensation of sand grains against her fingertips.

—A wind disaster in the form of a giant tornado had attacked Kararagi's second city, Banan. To protect the city from the damage, Anastasia and the others had used their wisdom and strength to repel it.

With Julius on horseback, the "Iron Fang," her old acquaintance Halibel, and the cooperation of the Great Spirit Tia, Anastasia had been proud of the magnificent results, but—

"…I wonder how many times I've been kidnapped now."

Moments after striking down the tornado, Anastasia was hit by a sudden surprise attack and lost consciousness. It seemed she had been abducted; when she woke up, she was in this pitch-black darkness.

Thinking about it made her start to dislike herself, but being kidnapped was not a first for Anastasia. Her first kidnapping was when she was a child who had just met Ricardo, and the scene of that kidnapping incident was the catalyst for her interaction with Mimi and the others. —And that wasn't all.

"—Echidna, you too—"

As she said this, Anastasia stroked her neck, which felt cooler than usual, confirming that the fox muffler—Echidna, who disguised herself as one—was not there as she usually was.

It was Anastasia's habit to check for abnormalities in her surroundings the moment she woke up. This was not just out of caution, but related to Anastasia's physical defects.

Born with a malfunctioning "Gate" that regulates mana, Anastasia's body was prone to many glitches, made worse by her contract with the special spirit Echidna. She was poor at regulating her body temperature, tired easily, and had several other points to worry about.

Because of this, the habit of checking her physical condition and surroundings particularly upon waking had become instinctive.

"I've been kidnapped, but it doesn't look like I've been treated poorly."

She wouldn't say she had been transported with care, but it seemed the opponent had no intention of needlessly harming her. The fact that her hands and feet were not bound was proof that she was being looked down upon as someone who couldn't do anything even if she could move. —In fact, Anastasia without Echidna had no combat power, so it was frustrating that the assessment wasn't wrong.

Remaining a captive was the same as idly watching a business opportunity pass before her eyes. If she were to accept that, she wouldn't be fit to be a merchant of Kararagi.

While thinking of such things that wouldn't earn her a single coin, Anastasia placed her hand on the cold wall and, relying on it, began to walk one step, then another, through the darkness.

"If something were to happen to me following the Princess, Miss Emilia—who says she wants to be friends—would be terribly sad, wouldn't she?"

Thinking this way wasn't like her at all.

"I'm alive. As long as I'm alive, I can reflect and apply it to the next time. I'd be constantly worrying Julius and the others, and besides…"

Pausing there for a moment, Anastasia shrugged her shoulders with a sigh.

Even so—

Emilia, who wielded swords of water, and Priscilla, who fought as if dancing with a flaming sword. Compared to those two royal candidates who acted with particular decisiveness even among those Anastasia knew, Anastasia's physical ability was not just the difference between an adult and a child, but perhaps that of a dragon and a puppy.

As she stood up while brushing off her knees, she pictured them in her mind.

"I wish I could move vigorously like Miss Emilia or the Princess, too."

Normally, moving around while in the position of a kidnap victim would be considered an act that might provoke the opponent, and she would surely be advised never to do it.

However, Anastasia believed that this time was an exception for two reasons.

First, the kidnapped Anastasia had neither been killed nor restrained. —Naturally, kidnapping has a purpose and a reason for keeping the target alive. The opponent went to the trouble of causing a tornado to gather attention just to carry out the kidnapping. It was unlikely they would harm Anastasia until that purpose was fulfilled.

The other reason was the existence of the unseen Echidna. The spirit who had spent over ten years with Anastasia would not leave her side unless something significant happened. Furthermore, her mimicry of a muffler was master-class, a special skill that was almost impossible to see through. Despite this, the reason Echidna had left Anastasia's side and her whereabouts were unknown was clear.

"Your target isn't me, but Echidna, right?"

The view opened up into a large cave of rock where moonlight poured in, and in that place where the wind whistled with a sound like it was tearing skin, she appeared and stared intently at Anastasia.

With white hair, long and narrow golden eyes, and a violent beauty like a sharp blade, her appearance was far too similar to an acquaintance Anastasia had recently met.

More than just similar, they were identical. Even triplets like Mimi and her siblings didn't look this much alike. She couldn't speak of it. In that case, the theory that they were the same person was more natural, but—

"I take it you aren't Miss Tia, right?"

"—Die."

"…That's quite direct."

At the extreme sharpness of the response to her question, Anastasia felt a chilling sensation for the first time in a while.

Her body only felt heat and cold moderately, but the heart's reaction to such fear or hostility remained as it was; she hated the lack of flexibility in not being able to take only the good parts.

However, although the reply was aggressive, she did not move to carry it out. Nonetheless, remaining vigilant, Anastasia observed the opponent's state closely.

The woman there looked almost identical to Tia. The prickly beauty and the voice she heard were the same, but the only slight difference was the design of the clothing she wore. Based on the amount of white and black in the kimono pattern, Anastasia mentally dubbed the friendly one “White Tia” and the kidnapper before her “Black Tia.”

It seemed Anastasia had been brought by this Black Tia to a limestone cave of considerable scale, a natural fortress where nothing with artificial warmth could be seen. Anastasia had apparently been left in one of the side holes, so it was hard to think she was being treated as a person of great importance.

And now, this place where she confronted Black Tia was a great hollow at the deepest part of the cave, where the ceiling and floor were punctured and connected to the outside—

“—This is ‘Zarestia’s Bed,’ isn’t it?”

Saying this as the realization hit her, Anastasia felt a different kind of chill.

“Zarestia’s Bed” was a forbidden land at the western edge of the Kararagi city-states. It was the home of the Great Spirit Zarestia, known as the “Most Beautiful Death God,” who was said to hate the lives of all living things and was known to slash anyone who approached her bed without any mercy.

In the world at large, the “Witch of Envy” was often spoken of with more dread, but for Anastasia, who was from Kararagi, the local and more familiar Zarestia held a stronger sense of fear. In fact, Ricardo often threatened her as a child, saying, “If you don’t behave, Zarestia will come for you!” Conversely, after becoming an adult, Anastasia used it as a convenient way to discipline Mimi and the others: “If you aren’t a good child, Zarestia will end up coming!”

In any case—

“To be brought to a place like this, isn’t it a double blunder?”

The reason “Zarestia’s Bed” was treated as forbidden land was not just because of rumors or legends, but was based on Kararagi’s national regulations. Even if Julius and the others could grasp Anastasia's whereabouts, they would need to go through various procedures to send an official rescue team.

Between being kidnapped and the location she was taken to, it was a flaw for Anastasia in two senses.

"Well then, I've got to make a comeback from here."

Slapping her own cheeks with both hands, she rolled up the sleeves of her kimono. Seeing Anastasia's determined face, Black Tia, standing at the edge of the large hole, turned a suspicious eye toward her.

From the opponent's perspective, this distance was as good as nothing, and Anastasia's movements were like those of a baby to her. That was why there was an opening for words.

"Since you didn't answer, I'm just confirming, but your target isn't me, but Echidna… the cute muffler I had wrapped around my neck, right?"

"—! Die."

"I'll take that 'die' as an affirmation. To add to that, Echidna got away, and you're currently in the middle of searching for her… is that also correct?"

"—Tch, die!"

Seeing the opponent's reaction as her face stiffened while still wishing for death, Anastasia was relieved that her guess was correct and Echidna seemed to have escaped safely. However, given the character of that dutiful spirit, it was hard to imagine she was running away and leaving Anastasia completely behind.

Most likely, she was still in this great hollow. And not very far away.

"Until I got here, I thought about a lot of things while walking through the pitch black. Like why I was kidnapped, or if Echidna was the target, what the purpose was, and come to think of it, there was that thing about the light orb Miss Tia mentioned. I thought it would feel good if all of that connected."

"For someone who keeps saying 'die, die,' you're a bit soft in your methods, aren't you?"

Placing a hand to her cheek, Anastasia said this, and Black Tia's eyes widened.

However, the more she thought about it, the more poorly organized Black Tia's inferred purpose and process seemed. Given the outcome of the two attacks on Banan, if the goal was to secure Echidna and get some information from her, she should have used Anastasia more.

"Miss Tia's light orb… the source of her power. Is that form of yours the result of obtaining it? Miss Tia also had a rough way of speaking, but is the 'die, die' thing also an influence of that? Even though you might stop being yourself soon, you still won't let go of that power?"

"Die…"

"I see, you won't let go of the power. On top of that, because you have a reason other than just rampaging, you haven't killed me and you're looking for Echidna. Right?"

"Die…!"

"If you went to the trouble of keeping me alive, you could have just nicked a finger or an ear and made me let out a scream. If you did that, Echidna might have come flying out in a panic. Is the reason you don't do that because you don't want to cut off all negotiations? Or did the option just not occur to you?"

"D-die…"

"Even with such great power, you're just a child throwing a tantrum. That's why—"

"—Dieeee!"

Unable to find words to return to each of Anastasia's points, Black Tia had only been trembling—that reached its limit, and she shouted at Anastasia in open rage.

Immediately after, she became the wind itself, reaching her hand straight out toward Anastasia—

"—That's why, I'll help you."

—Suddenly, Black Tia's finger stopped just inches from Anastasia's throat.

"…"

Anastasia, whose neck had almost been hewn in a split second, did not let her inner sigh show on her face. Instead, she looked Black Tia—who was staring with wide eyes—directly in the face and nodded deeply.

"There's something you want to do, right? But you can't think of a way to satisfactorily accomplish it. In that case, I can just help you. There's no need to fight pointlessly."

"…Die."

"I'm a merchant of Kararagi. I understand very well the feeling of wanting to doubt a merchant. But the best result of a trade is when everyone involved profits. That's what I aim for."

"…"

"At worst, if things stay as they are, a lot of people will come chasing after you soon to rescue me. Among them will be Ricardo, Julius, and Halibel. You definitely won't be able to get away. Of course, you—"

"—seem strong, so you might be able to take down a few of them… but that's as far as it goes."

"Die…"

"You'll die, I'll die, and many of my comrades will die, and nobody will profit. Even someone who isn't a merchant would know that's a big loss. —What will you do?"

Tilting her head, Anastasia left the judgment to Black Tia, who held the right to decide.

The predicted future she had spoken of in a flurry of words was mostly her honest opinion, though with some embellishment. After that, it was just a matter of whether Black Tia could digest it and properly balance the scales.

It depended on how that hand, which was barely touching her neck, moved—

"—Die."

Eventually, Black Tia, who had said that, slowly lowered her hand and exhaled.

At that verbal abuse, which made it hard to tell if her persuasion had succeeded or failed, Anastasia let out the sigh she had been holding back.

Then, a white shadow slid up from Anastasia's feet and onto her shoulder—

"Oh, aren't you the heartless one who left me and ran away."

"—That's a harsh way to put it. In my own way, I was desperately running around to make sure no harm came to Ana."

The fox-shaped spirit, Echidna, wrapped herself around her neck as she said this, and a smile involuntarily escaped Anastasia at her excuse.

In fact, that was likely true. Once Echidna realized she was Black Tia's target, she immediately left Anastasia's side and continued to draw the opponent's attention for her safety. For her, who cared deeply for Anastasia——the previous exchange must have been very nerve-wracking.

Even so—

"As expected of Ana, to cut through it so boldly. However, from next time, I'd like to ask you to handle things in a way that's better for my heart."

"You say that even though you don't have a heart. And besides… you were great for being patient, too."

She stroked Echidna's head with her finger as she tickled her neck, and then Anastasia turned her attention to Black Tia, who had endured the urge to move at the appearance of the vanished Echidna.

What had made her hold back was likely Anastasia's earlier proposal. While it could be taken as a mere plea for life or a way to buy time, it had firmly suppressed Black Tia's impulse.

"The light orb, was it?"

If that, which seemed to be the source of White Tia's power, was making Black Tia's appearance identical to White Tia's, then perhaps her true form was much younger.

Thinking about it that way made several of her momentum-driven actions, and the way she listened to Anastasia's appeal and innocently believed it, seem more understandable.

"My sensitivity tells me there are various things about this troublesome child that pique my interest."

"Ana, don't let your guard down too much. She attacked Banan with wind twice. That crime is not cheap."

Even if there was some room to talk, she—

"I know. But you can't say much, can you, Echidna?"

Echidna, who had warned her in a low voice, fell silent at Anastasia's counterattack.

It was no mystery why this spirit became unable to speak. None other than Echidna herself was one of those who was here now because of Anastasia's meddling.

Of course, she didn't think this would end with her taking Black Tia under her wing like she had with Echidna, Ricardo, Mimi, and the many members of the "Iron Fang," but—

"In any case, I'm a person who intends to have my own country and pack as much as possible into it. If that's the case, I have to be able to manage at least one rowdy person."

"—Good grief, Julius and the others have a difficult road ahead."

"Don't say it like it's someone else's business. Now then—"

Pressing Echidna's nose with her finger and pulling herself together, Anastasia turned back to Black Tia.

Black Tia, standing there awkwardly, had a modest cuteness like a demure White Tia.

Her lips softening at the sight, Anastasia first looked up at the ceiling of the cave.

They had to get out of this dangerous place called "Zarestia's Bed," where moonlight shone into the great hollow, and rejoin Julius and the others.

"—After that, I'll have you let me hear your story too. Don't rush; one thing at a time is fine."

A contract made is to be strictly fulfilled. —That, too, was the pride of a Kararagi merchant.

END

No Stella No Life V
(LQ MTL Translation)

“Sensei, do you actually have friends?”

“…That is a rather rude question, following up on our last conversation.”

Inside the dream castle created by the Witch—an unnatural space that could never exist in reality—the Witch who spent all her time there furrowed her brow at Aldebaran’s inquiry. It was a reaction typical of a human being asked something unpleasant or inconvenient. The Witch frequently claimed she was different from humans or that she had no heart. However, to Aldebaran, scowling at a disadvantageous point seemed very human; it felt less like she lacked a heart and more like she only said so because having one would be inconvenient. In short—

“Hit the mark, did I? Alright, my bad. I shouldn’t have been so cruel as to ask Sensei about friends. Sorry, sorry, let’s end the talk here!”

“Wait. If you make a face like you understand everything, it makes it seem as though the dishonorable rumor of me having no friends is actually a fact. Besides, what about you, saying such things to me? Do you have friends?”

“Do you think I do? Stuck here forever with no chance to go outside, suffering under Sensei’s relentless abuse?”

“…That was an inappropriate counterargument. I apologize sincerely. I am sorry.”

Aldebaran shrugged his shoulders at the ‘Witch,’ who apologized meekly with a downcast face. In truth, he wasn’t hurt or irritated by her remark. He simply knew that reacting this way would make her reflect on her behavior. And if the Witch felt indebted to him, it was a success. The ‘Witch,’ who usually lacked any mercy or hidden agenda, might loosen the trials, allowing for a brief moment of mental rest. However—

“Though I apologize for my excessive words, the talk regarding the dishonorable suspicion cast upon me is not over. After all, you know all of my friends… the other five ‘Witches,’ don’t you? It’s what you call Q.E.D.”

“Hmm, I mean, that’s true, but were those people really real? Isn’t there a possibility they were just ‘Imaginary Witches’—not imaginary friends—that you cooked up to prove you aren’t a loner…”

“Now you are insulting more than just me!”

Hearing the Witch raise her voice, Aldebaran reflected that he might have gone a bit too far with his verbal abuse. The five ‘Witches of Sin’ he had been made to face in this dream castle were all eccentric and abnormal, but they certainly possessed a presence that felt real.

“If those were products of Sensei’s delusions, you’d need counseling… no, I’d feel bad for the counselor or therapist. Truly pity them.”

“It seems the defamation against me is continuing, but what about that clarification from before?”

“Eh? Oh, my bad, my bad. I definitely doubted the ‘Imaginary Witch’ theory too much. My bad-dy.”

“Your apology is too light! What kind of attitude is that toward a Witch!”

“Wasn’t the point of the trials to not lose performance by flinching or being scared of a Witch every single time? Exactly as intended; you should praise your prize pupil.”

“Hmm, somehow I am not convinced…”

Setting aside the twisted Witch who couldn’t honestly rejoice in her student’s growth, Aldebaran, who just wanted to slack off on the trials, became a bit curious about this topic. It was true that the ‘Witches of Sin’ could be called her friends.

"But that's largely because you were all in the same situation, right? Since all 'Witches' are social misfits, don't you have any friends who actually fit into society? If not, then we'll just settle this argument with the conclusion that birds of a feather flock together."

"I am amazed by both the audacity to label a Witch a social misfit and the courage to say it to my face. …However, friends other than 'Witches,' you say?"

"Are there any? Even if there aren't, you don't have to make any up."

"There is no need to fabricate anything. I have friends other than them. Or rather, 'had' would be more accurate. They are people I have already parted ways with and am now estranged from."

"…"

As the Witch lowered her long eyelashes and spoke in a dropped tone, Aldebaran caught his breath. The conversation had become heavier than he expected. He had an inkling of the reason for that estrangement, and since it wasn't unrelated to Aldebaran himself, it was all the more awkward. However, contrary to Aldebaran's uneasy feelings, the Witch let her lips curl slightly, as if reminiscing about the past.

"Though, I rarely recognized them as friends. They were people who caused me nothing but trouble, and I have no decent, normal memories with them. However…"

"However?"

"A friend who was with me said that the six of us were a group of close friends."

"A group of friends… well, that's certainly a lighthearted way of putting it."

"I suppose it is. Now that I think about it, it was a rather carefree expression to use, considering they were a group of people who could have easily split the world apart if they'd had the mind to."

The Witch spoke in a slow, calm tone, her voice thick with kindness and affection. Aldebaran felt a flicker of irritation alongside a strong sense of curiosity at this change—one she was likely unaware of herself. He prompted her to continue.

“What kind of crowd were they? You mean the members you’ve been dropping hints about, the ones you supposedly traveled with?”

“Dropping hints? I don’t think I was being quite that’s unpleasant about it.”

“Hey, are you seriously not aware? Whenever you talk about that, you pull this move like you’re some blatantly mysterious woman with a dark past. I’ve only held back from asking until now out of consideration for you.”

“Mysterious and dark… I see. Having it put that way is a little—actually, it’s quite embarrassing.”

The Witch, who apparently hadn’t been trying to create an atmosphere on purpose, placed a hand against her slightly flushed cheek and began to deeply reflect on her own behavior.

At any rate, now that things had been revealed this far, Aldebaran was intent on hearing whatever could be told. Within the scope of what he could remember, if he had to pick a name he heard often…

“…Reid. Yes, that was the name. Among the members you occasionally mention, I thought that was a name I heard fairly often. Who was that person?”

“—. Heh.”

At that declaration, Aldebaran felt a flicker of annoyance, catching a glimpse of the Witch’s trust in the absolute, unshakable strength of the man named Reid—a man whose personality was impossible to love. —Even if he hadn’t reached it yet, one day he surely would.

“Well, whatever, forget about that piece of human trash. What about the others?”

“The others… well, for example, Alec is friendly and has the virtue of getting along with anyone immediately, but he is the greatest liar of the age. I know no other being who uses words so skillfully to lead the hearts of men astray. How he manages to achieve such results against Authorities with such a difficult Divine Protection is a mystery. He is a monster beyond my understanding."

"Trash and monsters coming out one after another! Are they Witches?! Oh, they were Witches!"

"No, there are things to praise. Alec is an old acquaintance of Reid's; he's like a beast tamer who is the only one who can properly handle Reid, who listens to no one. If Alec hadn't mediated while Reid was rampaging, the number of towns reduced to empty lots would have been on a different scale."

"I feel bad for the towns that became empty lots because the owner couldn't train his pet. Also, I suspect Alec only looks better relatively because Reid is so bottom-tier."

"Fufu, he showed a scheming side occasionally, but fundamentally he was a gentleman to both me and her, and there's no doubt he was a likable person. Unlike Reid, the fact that there was no worry of him looking at us with those eyes also bolsters his evaluation."

The Witch used many words to defend the man named Alec, the beast tamer. This also somehow set off Aldebaran's annoyance sensor. Aldebaran's feelings for the Witch were complex; it couldn't be called love, but he had a sense that he wanted to be seen as a significant existence. He wondered if the Witch would use so many words for his sake when talking about him to someone else.

"The other person, Farsale, was truly frank, always bright, and had a personality that was never intimidated by any opponent. Yes, to put it bluntly…"

"You look like you're having a hard time saying it, but to put it bluntly?"

"To put it bluntly… yes, he was an idiot."

The 'Witch,' unable to find the right words, declared it clearly.

Since the Witch—who hadn't even called Reid 'trash' explicitly despite clearly thinking it—had raised the white flag, it must have been quite something.

"The surprising thing about Farsale is that his actions were not without thought. No matter how foolish an act appeared to onlookers, there was a calculated logic behind it. It was just that the process of reaching that answer was hard for others to see, leaving them only to gape at the outputted result."

"Ah, like the kind of person who lives the 'thin line between genius and idiot'…"

"Yes, exactly that. Rashness and recklessness at the end of genius-level deliberation. If necessary, he would create the spark for Reid's violence or laughingly help with Alec's scams. And he wouldn't hesitate to side with the 'Dragon' and make an enemy of a great nation just to protect a 'Witch.' Such an idiot. Despite being the prince of a nation, I'm impressed he could behave that way."

The Witch slowly shook her head, but she couldn't hide the smile on her lips. It was certainly clear they weren't a normal traveling party. However, considering they were beings who could influence the fate of the world, such strong characters were actually appreciated. Aldebaran wasn't the type of person who could maintain motivation through steady effort by aiming for goals that were thin and lacked substance. If they were going to be legendary existences, he wanted them to have strength and personality to match.

"In that case, a lineup of the strongest trash, a scammer, an idiot, and a nasty witch isn't a bad lineup at all."

"Somehow, that sounds like a list of terrible insults. At any rate, those are the members you wanted to hear about. Depending on where we stopped, there were some who joined only then or those who left as others arrived… yes, this was our party."

"…"

At the Witch's nodding words, Aldebaran scratched his head and swallowed his words. A close group of six—she started the story with that, but only three people besides the Witch were talked about, with zero mention of the remaining two. However, there was no need to speak of them. He knew those two well, and not saying it was an implicit understanding with the ‘Witch.’

Aldebaran, as someone closer to the Witch than anyone else, believed he understood that this wasn’t about neglecting the unmentioned person. In any case—

“So you did have them, Sensei—friends.”

“…I find it hard to understand why you look so disappointed. It’s as if you think a heartless Witch like me shouldn’t be able to make friends.”

“It’s not ‘as if,’ that’s exactly what I think. Don’t you think it’s weird yourself? Would anyone want to be friends with a heartless Witch? If not, there are only two possibilities.”

“I see, two. I’ll take both.”

She answered like she was being offered a drink, but for the curiosity-driven ‘Witch,’ unknown information was equal to fine wine. So, he presented it.

“First, the premise that you’re a heartless Witch is wrong. The pattern where you have friends because you have a heart and aren’t even a ‘Witch.’ But I, having been killed by Sensei a million times, can declare: Sensei really is heartless, and even though you’re a dropout rejected by ‘Witch-hood,’ you are a ‘Witch,’ so the premise is correct.”

“For your information, the matter of the Witch Factor is a wound that remains large in my life, so I’d prefer you didn’t handle it so lightly.”

“It’s fine, let’s just get along as fellow dropouts. Anyway, the other possibility is—”

Ignoring the somewhat dissatisfied complaint of the ‘Witch,’ Aldebaran held up another finger.

Pointing that finger directly at her, Aldebaran prefaced it with "Exactly," and said:

"—The pattern where those guys are just such good people that they'd even become friends with a heartless Witch."

"…"

"…Uh, Sensei? Hello, Sensei."

At the response of the 'Witch,' who had fallen silent, Aldebaran waved his hand. Did he say something strange and make her angry? If so, the hard-won break from the trials might actually backfire—or so he thought.

"Fu,"

The Witch laughed, as if letting out a breath. Once a smile broke through, the impulse couldn't be contained, and the Witch continued to laugh. Covering her mouth, she laughed with an "Ahaha." Aldebaran was stunned by this unexpected reaction. He had fully expected more disparaging remarks about her companions, but—

"Certainly, there is some truth in what you say. They were problematic and hardly to be praised as human beings in every regard… but my friends were indeed virtuous."

"—Except for Reid, though?"

"Indeed."

Aldebaran, trying to act as though he understood her, asked for confirmation, and the Witch nodded.

It was irritating, but he wanted to thank Reid for being human trash. Thanks to his existence, Aldebaran could end up being more than just jealous of the Witch's old companions—her friends. He realized after saying it that among those he labeled "good people," there was someone Aldebaran himself found hard to evaluate. He had never clearly heard how the Witch evaluated that person.

"—But even if I have to part ways with such friends, there is something I must do."

Beside the pensive Aldebaran, the Witch spoke quietly. The smile vanished from her expression, and her eyes were filled with a quiet resolve; there stood the black and white Witch who would cast everything aside to achieve her goal. Witnessing that, Aldebaran pressed his hand over his heart from above his chest. It was a trivial, pathetic jealousy. In this moment, there was no one else before the Witch but him, and he was the only one the Witch truly relied on. Unable to wish for more, Aldebaran was the Witch's trump card.

"—No one can defeat the 'you' that I created."

As if reading Aldebaran's mind, the Witch said so and smiled. Looking at that fleeting yet dear smile, Aldebaran clenched his fist. —To fulfill the Witch's wish and to no longer be a 'Following Star.' Aiming for such a future.

END

Arc 10:
The Land of the Lion Kings

Volume 44

Chapters 1-12

Prologue:
The Fateful Night

—’Twas a night that derailed the fates of many.

???: “—aAHGhgGHHAAAGHA!”

Despite his efforts to stifle it, he could not fully hold back the scream, a low roar of desperation echoing through the twilight as if to curse every last thing in this world.

His body contorting, froth spilling from the corners of his mouth, rivers of blood streaming from his eyes, his muscle fibers snapped apart, his bones cracked and shattered, and the heat scorching his blood vessels mercilessly ripped into his soul without a shred of compassion.

A sin, he had committed. An unforgivable sin. To that he would admit. To that, he repented from the bottom of his heart.

Then, at the very least, let my sin and this punishment be compensated with an equal reward

???: “AHGhghAAGHHHHAAAGHA!”

Empty. His hands were empty.

That which should have been grasped within his hands, had spilled through the gaps in his fingers, towards a place that could never be reached for the rest of eternity. Though it would have been better had it just vanished, the reality of it was even more helpless, and difficult to accept.

That now, it was here. Within the vessel of the most foolish life to ever walk this world, it certainly resided, and yet.

???: “…”

As he suffered, cried out, grit his teeth, and continued to struggle through it all, a small ‘something’ was watching his body. —No, that was impossible. It was nothing more than paranoia induced by his own guilty conscience over his sin.

After all, he had already tucked him in. Promising that it would be the end of a long nightmare, and telling him that the next morning to come would surely be a dazzling one brimming with hope, he had caressed the red hair on his head until he was sound asleep.

Hence, there could not have been anyone watching him. —He had failed to put an end to this nightmarish night. The promise that a hope-filled dawn would arrive the next day, he had failed to fulfill.

—Something like wanting to die sooner, was not a desire he could allow himself to have.

The nightmare had yet to conclude. His hopes had yet to be satisfied. His promise had yet to be fulfilled.

In order to deliver his beloved family into the future, giving up was the one thing he could not afford to do.

???: “—aAHGhgghhAAagha!”

Gritting his teeth to the point of fissuring, he endured the suffering. He endured the pain.

Receiving torment which had no end in sight, he had no other option but to endure, endure, endure, and make it through.

???: “…”

—The small ‘something’ watching over him was nothing more than illusion made manifest by his feelings of guilt.

Firmly treading upon the damp floor with his large, barefoot soles, he checked back over his shoulder countless times.

Nobody was pursuing him. There was no possibility of any pursuers being sent after him, either. After all, it was none other than one who passed such orders to those beneath him, who had been pulling all the strings behind the curtains of this night.

Nevertheless, nothing could make him call that a complete sense of security.

???: “Damnit, this sorta ridiculous affair…!”

As his voice quaked with irritation, he glared through the dim lighting with a bitter expression dashed upon the face of his giant body.

It was a dark space, underground. —Since its very existence was only known to a few people, nobody was even patrolling it; it was the type of passageway that would get an outsider killed just for knowing about it.

For him to be passing through it, as a person who was undoubtedly an outsider, just who even was he anymore?

???: “—Shit.”

Grinding his teeth in a violent swell of emotion, he used all his strength to withstand his urge to slam his massive fists into the walls around him. That was not because he wished to make any noise. It was because there was something unnecessary being carried within his arms.

The weight of that unnecessary something only served to enrage him more and more, irritating him, exacerbating—

???: “—Aa.”

Suddenly, his eyes met with those of the thing in his arms, causing a ‘Ngh’ to spill from his throat.

Those were the extremely repulsive, aggravating, crimson eyes that he despised more than anything in this world. —Even amidst this darkness, they had managed to catch hold of his face, and it was apparent that their pupils were constricting.

If only he could raise his voice to a piercing note, and have this hidden passage completely destroyed alongside his own self, who had so obediently acquiesced to taking it.

Such a ruinous, intropunitive, self-destructive wish was —

???: “—Uu.”

Tiny outstretched hands pattered upon his face, followed by the sight of a smile, causing that wish of his to fizzle out.

It made him think that all those self-destructive, intropunitive, and ruinous desires were completely worthless.

???: “Ta the bitter end, ya humans are utterly revoltin’.”

Regardless of whether they understood his feelings or not, those crimson eyes did not err in their judgment till the very end.

Even though he had countless chances to cast them aside, to abandon them, to give up, and to put an end to all this, they had avoided them entirely, guiding these legs all the way to the end of this passageway.

Finally making it out of the passage, what awaited thereforth was a boundless night. —This was the final chance he would ever receive to renounce the Covenant he had formed, and relinquish the future lying ahead with no end in sight.

???: “If you’re gonna regret somethin’, then ya oughta regret it in the grandest way possible.”

However, staking his aged beliefs and whatever little dignity he had left, he rejected that final chance.

???: “Don’t be so conceited as ta think ya can tie me down with a Covenant. Have a look at me now. I’ll eradicate humankind, and throw all their corpses together into the Great Waterfall.”

Harboring his long held hatred, ripened to the point of boiling, the giant figured proceeded forth. —All the while, admonishing himself to not allow the deterrent power of those innocent eyes to become a reason for him to halt his legs in the slightest.

—And, those were the events of the night that went on to derail the fates of many.

Chapter 1:
Friends

1

???: “—Well ain’t that just like that princess? She stuck to doing things her own way until the very end.”

Emilia’s eyes softened toward Felt, who uttered so as she sipped her cup of black tea.

On a sofa used for receiving guests, with one knee tucked under her arm, Felt sat across from Emilia, listening to her story in its entirety without interruption, before paying her respects for Priscilla in her own way.

Emilia did not think it heartless that great grief or loss had not flashed across Felt’s eyes, being only a slightly different shade of red from Priscilla’s. However, she did think it was strong of her.

This included the fact that she had visited this place of her own volition, in order to glean the details of Priscilla’s death.

Right now, Emilia and Felt were facing each other in a room of the Royal Residence in the Royal Capital of Lugunica. In a reception room of the residence where those of great importance were assigned to stay, Emilia greeted Felt.

It was not something that they had pre-arranged. Felt, who had happened to be staying in the Royal Capital, had heard that Emilia had brought news to the Royal Castle, and thus had come to see her.

In all honesty, she was awfully delighted that Felt had paid her a visit like this.

To begin with, the Emilia Camp owed Felt a great deal—she had taken great care of Meili while they had been absent from the Kingdom; so Emilia heard from Annerose.

Annerose, a relative of Roswaal and a supporter of Emilia, had been tasked with handling the discussions regarding the various matters surrounding the Pleiades Watchtower and Meili. Apparently, Felt and those aligned with her had greatly assisted in reaching an arrangement in those talks.

For that reason, Emilia had planned to make time to convey her gratitude to Felt herself, so she was really grateful for the chance to see her like this.

However, if anything, she wished she could have brought back a more pleasant tale, and yet—

Felt: "—That's what the look on your face seems to be saying, Emilia-neechan."

Emilia: "Eh, w-was I making such an obvious face?"

Felt: "Pretty much. If you keep frowning and looking down like that, anyone could pick up on it, y'know?"

Imitating Felt's motion of tapping her brow with her finger, Emilia also rubbed between her eyebrows.

People often said she tended to show what she was thinking upon her face, but she amazed herself at how much had been unintentionally shown. And it also worried her. —She had completely regained her footing already, and thus was unflappable now. No one needed to worry about her; she was fine: these were the feelings she had tried to portray.

Emilia: "Despite all of that, I'm still no good. Subaru and the others would be angry with me."

Felt: "It'd make that guy upset with you, Emilia-neechan? I can't imagine that happening though."

Emilia: "Of course it would. Even Subaru would be annoyed if I couldn't be strong. That's why he diligently tells me where I'm lacking."

Felt: "Heh, that so?"

With a smile, Felt rested her chin on her raised knee as her fang peeked out.

Pouting at Felt's vaguely mischievous and teasing smile, Emilia continued with a "However," Emilia: "Seems like you could see right through my thoughts, but… Felt-chan, you don't agree?"

Felt: "It's a bit complicated, but if I'm getting you right, you're thinking something like how it's been a while since we've met like this, and you're sorry that the topic's the princess's death, or something along those lines?"

Emilia: "Umm, yeah… that's right. Yep, that's it."

Felt: "Regarding that, I'm actually glad I heard it from you, Emilia-neechan."

Emilia: "From me?"

Having said something unexpected, Felt nodded back to Emilia's question with a "Yeah." While scratching her head in front of the surprised Emilia, she continued,

Felt: "Honestly, when I heard that the princess had died, I thought it must've been a joke. She was the embodiment of a woman who would never die even if you killed her. If things had continued as-is, I would've been filled with nothing but pointless doubts, and the truth of the matter would've been buried."

Emilia: "…"

Felt: "So when I heard the story from you, Emilia-neechan, I was able to make up my mind since you were actually there… No, I was able to prepare to make up my mind? Tch, my wording's also become complicated. My bad."

Emilia: "—. No, I feel like I understand what you're saying, Felt-chan."

Being unable to explain it well, Felt made a bitter face, but those feelings were able to be conveyed to Emilia.

If the situation were reversed, and Emilia were to hear that someone she knew had lost their life somewhere far away without her knowledge, she would probably overthink the circumstances surrounding that death.

With those various imaginings, regardless of their validity, her head would become filled with things that could not be verified, and she would become unable to grasp the truth.

That's why, even if it was incredibly painful, having that room for doubt erased, could be salvation.

Emilia: "If it's someone you trust confirming it, that's even better, I think."

Felt: "…I guess that means I trust you, Emilia-neechan?"

Emilia: "Yeah, I also believe in you, Felt-chan, and… aren't you the same? Isn't that why you came to see me like this?"

Felt: "Technically, we're both rival candidates, so it'd be weird if I said yes!"

Having lowered her foot from the seat, Felt had a dumbfounded look upon her face as she rested it on her knee. Still, since Felt did not disagree, Emilia smiled with a sense of relief.

Thinking of Priscilla still made Emilia's heart weep in pain. However, she was glad that she had not left Felt's murky answers buried.

???: "…"

Then, a faint exhalation interrupted the exchange between them. As soon as Felt's sharp ears picked up on it, she let out an "Oi," with a sullen voice, and then,

Felt: "Hey you, what the hell are you laughing about?"

???: "—Nothing, my apologies. Just now, it was simply quite unusual to see Emilia-sama so thoroughly get the better of you, Felt-sama.”

Felt: “Better of me, my ass. What kind of Knight smirks and watches as his master is defeated?”

???: “I beg your forgiveness. I hesitated to interject into the conversation between the two of you.”

Saying this, while placing his hand on his chest and bowing, was Felt’s Knight, with his distinctive red hair and blue eyes: Reinhard.

Naturally, Felt would not have come to visit Emilia alone, so he had been listening to their conversation up until that point alongside them. At the chummy exchange between Reinhard and Felt, Emilia prefaced her proceeding comment with a “Geez,” Emilia: “You don’t need to be so considerate. Even our Otto-kun has been chatting with us since earlier… huh? He hasn’t?”

Otto: “That is right. Thank you for noticing. Even I have common sense enough to not cut into a conversation between two of such exalted status, as a matter of fact.”

Next to Emilia, who had raised her eyebrows in surprise, was Otto, wearing a wry smile typical of him.

Since Otto was the only one who had accompanied Emilia to the Royal Capital, inevitably, he was the one attending her wherever she went, be it by giving her report at the Royal Castle or meeting at the Royal Residence. Since Otto was someone who made her feel at ease just by being there, she had been unintentionally put at ease with nary a word from him.

Emilia: “I’m sorry, I didn’t realize. You love to chat, Otto-kun, so it must have been reaaally hard to keep quiet.”

Otto: “Let me just say, I only chat about what is necessary, when it is necessary; it really is not the case that I love chatting, okay?!”

Felt: “Yeah yeah, that ain’t very convincing. I don’t think you can say that a guy who can chat with bugs, water dragons, and so on in addition to humans isn't a talkative guy."

Otto: "I would appreciate it if you did not confuse the subject of Divine Protections with human nature."

Pressing down on the green hat upon his head, Otto gave a casual response to Felt.

Given that Otto was able to speak with all sorts of creatures with the power of his Divine Protection of the Soul of Language, Emilia thought that Felt's point just now was spot-on. She suddenly realized: everywhere they went, whether it was with animals or bugs, Otto was talking to every living thing around and expanding his circle of friends.

Emilia: "Otto-kun, you reaaally do have so many friends. I don't have too many friends, so I admire that you can get along with anyone."

Otto: "I would not exactly call them friends, truth be told. From time to time, what I offer to others is something like a negotiation or transaction, which requires a bit of a different know-how than making friends. Now that I think about it, I suppose I cannot say I am someone who has a lot of friends either."

Felt: "The definition of a pal isn't something you should just keep pondering over. If anything, why don't you become friends with our Reinhard? He's also the kinda guy who doesn't have many friends."

Emilia: "Eh, is that so? That's reaaally unexpected."

As Felt shut one eye and pointed towards Reinhard, who was standing behind the sofa, her words made Emilia instinctively look up at the red-haired Knight.

Reinhard had a good personality, was very famous, would surely be known by anyone in the Kingdom if asked, and was someone who could be relied upon. For Emilia too, since the first time they had met, he had been so consistently considerate of her that she thought that he was more or less friends with everyone in the Kingdom.

Seeing the astonishment in Emilia's eyes, Reinhard said, "It is unfortunate,” before continuing to speak,

Reinhard: “Putting aside my own views, it seems I often intimidate others. For that reason, outside of the Knights and my companions from our camp… excluding Subaru and Ferris, perhaps I have quite few friends.”

Emilia: “Is that so? Even you have those sorts of worries too, huh Reinhard…? Hey, Otto-kun, if you’d like, would you become friends with Reinhard?”

Otto: “I am being asked to do something incredibly outrageous here, but would it not be a disgrace as far as Reinhard-san is concerned?!”

Reinhard: “Of course not. In fact, I would greatly welcome it. Would you be my friend?”

Otto: “Is this some kind of pincer attack or ambush?”

Caught between Emilia’s gaze and Reinhard’s smile, Otto grumbled in frustration.

Only Felt looked on with a smirk, but after agonizing over it for a long moment, Otto took a long, deep breath, and said,

Otto: “As Felt-sama brought up earlier, right now, we are affiliated with opposing camps. Until the Royal Selection is over, we should avoid becoming excessively close to one another.”

Reinhard: “I see. A shame, but if that is your intention, I shall respect it. Not that we are friends, though.”

Otto: “Yes, please do. Since we are not friends.”

With such sad words, Otto’s shoulders slumped, and towards that, Reinhard gave a smile that oddly enough seemed neither hurt nor disappointed. Unfortunately, the two of them did not become friends, but in Emilia’s eyes, they somehow gave off the air of proper friends.

In addition—

Otto: “Good grief, the tea has grown completely cold. I will go brew a new pot. Emilia-sama, you and the rest keep having a pleasant chat. I will—”

Reinhard: “—. In that case, I shall accompany you. We may not have become friends, but how about I show you the power of the Divine Protection of Tea Ceremonies?”

Otto: “It might surprise you to know that I am someone who holds grudges, but having the Sword Saint hold a grudge against me is truly unsettling.”

While carrying on such a conversation, the two of them left the room.

Emilia watched as their backs were obstructed by the closed door, and then turned back toward Felt.

Emilia: “For some reason, it feels like they are reaaally good friends, you know?”

Felt: “Heh heh, yeah, I thought so too. I’m always so pissed off at the attitude of that damn Reinhard, but when it’s someone else on the receiving end, it’s super funny.”

Emilia: “Ah, that’s a naughty face. But to make Otto hold off on being Reinhard’s friend until after our Royal Selection, that’s…”

Felt: “Hmm, that dude just used what I said as a convenient excuse, right? Can’t say I know why he did, but… don’t take what he said about not being able to get along ‘cause of the Royal Selection so seriously.”

Emilia: “I don’t need to, take it so seriously…?”

It seemed like Felt was quite satisfied, and she was in such a good mood to the point she was almost humming. After thinking for a moment, Emilia let out an “Okay,” and stood up.

Thinking of the Royal Selection, Otto had given up on becoming friends with Reinhard. She felt guilty over that decision and consideration on Otto’s part, but Emilia had made up her mind.

After what had happened with Priscilla, she did not want to have any more regrets.

Emilia: “Hey, Felt-chan, can I say something?”

Felt: “Oh? What’s up?”

Briskly walking up to Felt, who had looked up at her, Emilia sat herself next to her. At a distance where their shoulders brushed against each other, Emilia turned to face her directly. Felt’s red eyes blinked as Emilia readily approached her with such momentum.

Looking back on it, Emilia had first met Felt when she had stolen the insignia that qualified Emilia to join the Royal Selection. At the time, she had panicked and had wanted to take her anger out on Puck, who had not been flustered in the least by such a situation. In any case, her encounter with Felt had definitely not been off to a great start.

Even so, right now, regarding Felt, who was likewise a candidate for the Royal Selection, Emilia felt thus.

Emilia: “I want to be friends with you, Felt-chan. And not just ordinary friends, like reaaally good friends.”

Felt: “…Huh?”

Emilia: “Actually, I promised Anastasia-san that when the Royal Selection ends, we will be friends. We talked a lot as we traveled together… well, it wasn’t entirely Anastasia-san the whole time, but we talked a bunch and then we made that promise.”

Emilia promptly pressed Felt, whose wide eyes were flashing with confusion.

The promise she had exchanged with Anastasia was one she would surely keep, as part of her strong identity as a merchant. It was not like with Subaru, so she could be assured that the promise would be kept.

Emilia: “I worry when it comes to Subaru, since he breaks his promises so easily, but when it comes to Anastasia-san, I feel assured. But even besides promises, I feel like I couldn't be Subaru's friend, and I don't feel like I would want to be friends with Subaru… huh? What was I saying again?"

Felt: "That you and Subaru-niichan can't be friends, Emilia-neechan?"

Emilia: "Yeah, that's right… No it's not, I was talking about you and myself, Felt-chan!"

Emilia felt a tinge of anxiety over having nearly lost sight of her main point. In front of Emilia, who had narrowly avoided that perilous situation, Felt suddenly looked up. Following that movement, Emilia also looked toward the ceiling. She did not see anything in particular.

Emilia: "Felt-chan?"

Felt: "I ain't looking at the ceiling. I was just wondering what the hell I should do."

Emilia: "Umm, yeah. Subaru and Petra-chan often tell me that they feel reaaally invigorated when they see my face. How about that?"

Felt: "Would you happen to be trying to show off your good points?"

Emilia: "That's right, because I want to be friends with you, Felt-chan."

Over the past year or so, Emilia had been getting used to seeing herself in mirrors.

Subaru, Petra, and sometimes even Ram would compliment Emilia's face, so if there was perhaps a chance it would also have an effect on Felt, she figured there was no harm in suggesting it.

Felt kept looking upwards in response to that desperate approach of Emilia's, and then,

Felt: "Why do you wanna be friends with me so badly? It's fine the way it is now…"

Emilia: “You see, I had wanted to become friends with Priscilla.”

Felt: “…”

Emilia: “But, I put off telling her that. I’m… no good. I should have known I might have to suddenly say goodbye to someone important to me who was fine just the day before, and yet…”

Emilia murmured as she placed her hand on her aching chest and touched the Magic Crystal hanging from her neck.

The same had happened with Puck, who continued to slumber, as well as Emilia’s cherished family who had been frozen in ice in the Great Forest of Elior. Farewells could be sudden, and could come for even the most precious people in one’s life.

Her farewell with Priscilla had reminded the forgetful Emilia of such a sorrowful truth.

Emilia: “I don’t want to forget that anymore. So, I decided I won’t hold back. Tell those you like that you like them, and tell those you want to be friends with that too.”

Felt: “—Shit, that princess, she really went all the way ‘til the very end, didn’t she?”

Emilia: “—?”

Emilia had put her feelings into words as honestly as she could. While still looking up and listening, Felt slowly lowered her gaze.

The expression on Felt’s face was a smile that was neither frustrated nor bitter.

Felt: “Gotcha, no problem. I’ll be friends with you, Emilia-neechan.”

Emilia: “Really?! You mean, after the Royal Selection is over…”

Felt: “It doesn’t have to be. If I’m gonna do it either way, Emilia-neechan, I’ll become friends with you before Anastasia-neechan and make her regret it.”

Emilia: “Oh, don’t say that. Anastasia-san is going to be my friend too.”

Felt: “Aren’t I, someone who is already your friend, more important to you, Emilia-neechan, than someone who isn’t your friend yet like Anastasia-neechan?”

Emilia: “Geez, don’t put me on the spot!”

Felt laughed gleefully, her fang on display, with Emilia also instinctively breaking out into a smile.

Felt had given a delightful response to her offer. At the experience of becoming friends with Felt, Emilia’s heart slowly filled with warmth.

Then, whilst smiling together with Felt, Emilia thought to herself. —She thought about Al, still unable to fully accept Priscilla’s death, and of Subaru and the others, who were all accompanying him.

Emilia: “With Al too—”

One day. It did not need to be right away, but one day.

From the very bottom of her heart, she wanted to pray for the coming day upon which she would be able to discuss Priscilla, someone with whom she had wished to become friends, without tears flooding her eyes.

Indeed, while nestling shoulders together with her friend, Emilia thought so.

2

Reinhard: “—Well then, you went so far as signaling me with a glance. You have something to tell me, do you not?”

Having left Emilia and Felt behind in the reception room, upon walking down the hall for a bit, Reinhard deliberately broke the ice.

Carrying the silver tray with the tea set in his hands, Otto, without looking back, nodded an “Indeed”.

Otto: “Your understanding is much appreciated. It appears that Felt-sama’s visit has allowed Emilia-sama to finally smile naturally again, so I did not wish to tear down that atmosphere.”

Reinhard: “As expected, the matter of Priscilla-sama seems to have affected her quite a bit.”

Otto: “In all honesty, there was likely nobody participating in that battle who remained unaffected. Even I, who lacked much of any contact with her, felt a sense of helplessness.”

Of course, the impact it had borne on Otto was nothing compared to that of Emilia, who had harbored affection for Priscilla, nor to that of Subaru and Al, who had watched her fade away before their very eyes.

Even so, as Otto had been working to ensure that as many of the allies fighting alongside him against the Great Disaster would make it out alive, the death of an individual involved with the Kingdom—of a Royal Candidate, was something that deeply affected him. On the other hand, there was also a part of himself calmly analyzing the dropout of a rival candidate who possessed an irrational charisma.

Reinhard: “…How surprising.”

As if having listened in on Otto’s inner thoughts, Reinhard muttered those words. And glancing back at him, Reinhard’s eyebrows were, in line with his words, raised in surprise.

Having garnered such a reaction, Otto slightly loosened the corners of his mouth with a hint of self-deprecation,

Otto: “That reaction, were you surprised that I was pained by the death of Priscilla-sama? Certainly, I would be lying if I said I did not welcome the dropping out of a rival candidate…”

Reinhard: “No, I found it surprising that you admitted to your weakness so openly. You do not need to go out of your way to feign such callousness, no?”

Otto: “…”

Reinhard: “Or maybe expressing your true feelings was a sign that you had let your guard down… perhaps even a sign that we could become friends?”

Otto: “It seems as though I have chosen my words poorly.”

Being teased in such a manner, Otto squared his shoulders, putting his feelings in check as he resumed his steps.

It appeared as though he was in a worse mental state than he had realized. And having picked up on that, Reinhard had allowed that blunder to slide as a moment of levity.

Otto: “Get a hold of yourself, Otto Suwen.”

This will not do; he reigned himself back in.

Regardless of how little Felt regarded Emilia with enmity, they were unmistakably rival candidates. The best course of action was always to abstain from displaying weakness to one’s opponents. A situation in which one had lost the balance of their mental state was among the highest tier of appearances that must never be shown.

Reaffirming that in his mind, Otto would fulfill the purpose for which he had brought Reinhard out.

That was—

Otto: “—I shall now divulge information pertaining to Heinkel Astrea.”

Reinhard: “…”

At the raising of the topic, it was apparent that the atmosphere in the corridor had distinctly shifted.

Drier or damper, the humidity had changed. Higher or lower, the temperature had changed. The only thing that could be said for certain, was that the one who had brought about those changes was the very Sword Saint walking right by his side.

Otto: “Heinkel-san participated in the battle in the Empire as a member of Priscilla-sama’s Camp, and he did survive. However, in the wake of Priscilla-sama’s death, after being sighted in a state of extreme discomposure, his whereabouts became unknown.”

Reinhard: “…Was he taken captive in the Empire?”

Otto: “No, likely not. While it is a country that can be exceedingly ruthless in order to benefit itself, in its current state of exhaustion following that battle, they are not individuals who fail to grasp the situation to such an extent that they would make an enemy of the Kingdom—of the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea.”

Reinhard: “So then, he disappeared of his own volition, did he?”

With his eyes slightly downcast, Reinhard feebly muttered those words for Otto to hear.

He had not intended on getting revenge, but the result ended up being a situation much like Otto’s earlier blunder, in which the other party had lost the balance of his mental state. Be that as it may, he was not currently in the mood to take advantage of the situation and probe into the other party’s weakness.

In all honesty, he thought himself ill-suited to it, but—

Otto: “Heinkel-san… your father, are you worried about him?”

That was a question voiced out of genuine concern for the other party.

In reality, it would have likely been a difficult question for Reinhard to answer. Otto was not deeply familiar with the relationship between Reinhard and Heinkel, but it was already common knowledge that this was a parent-child relationship that had fractured and broken down.

Not to mention, in Pristella, Otto had happened upon a scene of Heinkel raising his sword against Felt in an attempt to prevent Reinhard’s movements.

On that note, the very fact that the three generations of this family were all backing different Royal Candidates spoke volumes about the dysfunctionality of House Astrea.

In any case—

Otto: “Regardless of whether it serves any consolation, according to Garfiel, your father seems to have managed to withstand even a Dragon’s blow. Hence, I surmise that there is little fear of his life being in danger even if assailed.”

While relaying that information, Otto intentionally concealed the possibility of Heinkel committing suicide.

From what he had heard, Heinkel had lost his composure after Priscilla’s death, to the point that he had tried to shift his allegiance over to Emilia, begging her to take him on as a subordinate. With Emilia turning him down, it could not be definitively stated that there was no possibility of him, whereabouts unknown, finding himself at a loss for what to—

Reinhard: “—That will not happen, Otto. My father would never do anything akin to ending his own life.”

Otto: “…Did I show it on my face like Emilia-sama?”

With his inner thoughts completely seen through, Otto massaged his brow with one of his hands. Upon doing so, Reinhard forced a smile and said “No”,

Reinhard: “You purposely refrained from mentioning the worst possibility, so I presumed it was out of consideration. Only, it is a needless worry. My father has a goal he wishes to fulfill no matter what. Something like him choosing death whilst leaving it unfulfilled, is an impossibility.”

Otto: “On the one hand, that is a relief, but on the other, it does bolster my apprehensions. With his back up against the wall, just what might that person do… would he not then attempt to make contact with Felt-sama next?”

To begin with, from Heinkel’s perspective, it would be a choice with much more merit than pleading to Emilia.

Of course, that choice would eliminate the sole and absolute advantage in Heinkel's possession—his ability to exert some sort of coercion upon Reinhard, the Sword Saint. But, setting that aside, it was a highly probable option for him to be recruited there.

Now that he had lost Priscilla and had been rejected by Emilia, it seemed entirely possible to Otto that Heinkel would choose Felt as the next target for his parasitism.

However—

Reinhard: "—Likely not."

With an even greater conviction than before, Reinhard shut down Otto's follow up.

Otto: "…"

Those eyes that captured the essence of a perfectly clear blue sky were entwined with a hue resembling nightfall. Reinhard, the glimpse of a smile that had been previously strewn upon his lips having faded, walked alongside Otto as the latter fell silent.

Two steps, three steps; with not a word said, the pair gradually closed the distance to the kitchen. And just like that, Otto assumed that the conversation had met its end amidst the silence; however,

Reinhard: "My father wishes to have me resign from being the Sword Saint. Hence, within the Royal Selection which he must win no matter the cost, it is unthinkable that he would assist Felt-sama, who holds my endorsement."

Otto: "…He wants to win the Royal Selection. However, he does not wish to let you win, Reinhard-san?"

Reinhard: "That would be so. On that point, my father and I are incompatible. Regardless of my father's wishes, I am the Sword Saint. —I have to be… the Sword Saint."

Everyone had their own unique circumstances.

Because he fully understood that, Otto would not attempt to interject this and that about another household's situation. Without a doubt, while it seemed like a distorted relationship between father and son, that final comment sounded as if he was reinforcing it to himself.

Ergo, the only thing Otto could do was to make his own stance clear.

Otto: "—. Good grief, this has been quite the outrageous scene. I never thought that my life would include a moment of engaging the Sword Saint in small talk like this."

Shrugging his shoulders, Otto displayed an unwillingness to pry into Reinhard's circumstances.

It was some of his worldly wisdom as a peddler who had encountered people in a wide variety of positions across many different regions. No matter what circumstances might reach his ears, he would show his harmlessness by exaggerating about how he would not exploit them.

In the majority of cases, he would be able to leave the post town without incident.

Otto: "Though, sometimes the flow of alcohol would cause me to blurt out information that I absolutely should not, and there were some outrageous people who would then hear that and try to silence me…"

Hence, even at the most optimal taverns for gathering information while traveling, it was necessary for him to have measures in place to avoid accidentally acquiring any more serious information than necessary. The fact that his peddler's knowledge was proving to be so useful now that he was involved with the Royal Selection was a testament to how one never knew just what life had in store for them.

In any case—

Reinhard: "Thank you for sharing this information about my father. I will keep it in mind."

Once again, Reinhard nodded upon receiving Otto's intent. And ascertaining that, Otto shrugged his shoulders and continued with a "Pardon me".

Otto: "Perhaps I have needlessly added to your troubles? With a position like the Sword Saint, you must always have many things troubling you."

Reinhard: "It was of my own will that I acquired this position and Divine Protection. I suppose it ought to be called my responsibility."

Divine Protections were endowed articles.

It seemed a bit strange to phrase it as if something acquired through one's volition, but Otto immediately recalled that the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint alone was something inherited by a worthy successor a posteriori.

As such, following the death of the previous Sword Saint, Reinhard was in the position to inherit it.

Reinhard: "For people with Divine Protections, there are unending troubles that come with dealing with them. From what I can see, Otto, you have quite the mastery over your own, is that not so?"

Otto: "It is outrageous to say that I have mastered it. Ever since I was born, this Divine Protection has always been far too much for me to handle. If I could give it away to someone else, I would gladly do so."

Reinhard: "Haha, you mustn't say such thoughtless things. There is no shortage of people who envy those bearing Divine Protections. Of course, I think that goes without saying for you."

Otto: "In reality, I do not think it is anything worth being envied for."

As Reinhard had said, the troubles that came alongside Divine Protections were unending.

Not only could they not be shared with people who lacked any Divine Protection, they could not even be shared with people who possessed differing Divine Protections; it was something akin to continuing to answer a difficult problem with no example solution.

Unmistakably, Otto's response to Reinhard's flattery was his true feelings. —Not once had he ever been so conceited to think that he had achieved mastery over the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language. Likely, he never would.

Otto: "Unlike your Divine Protection of the Sword Saint, Reinhard-san, mine is not something that would leave its name down in history."

Reinhard: "Sword Saint this, Sword Saint that; I wish you would not put so much emphasis on that title. After all, I still find myself inexperienced for this position, under the weight of such a title. I do not intend to act any more important because of it."

Otto: "It is said that the position makes the person. It could just be that you are not aware of it, Reinhard-san, and your Sword Saint-ness actually overpowers those in your surroundings."

Reinhard: "Overpowering with my Sword Saint-ness… maybe you could tell me more about it? Perhaps it is the cause of why Felt-sama, Rachins, and the others are always telling me all sorts of things."

Otto: "Though, it is troubling how eagerly you are responding to what was just a joke!"

Unexpectedly finding his remark latched onto, Otto cried out at Reinhard's assertive questions.

As their exchange shifted to a lighter tone, Otto slightly cut back on his wariness towards Reinhard, granting his own heart some leeway.

At the very least, Otto currently did not have any reason to damage his reputation by hastening into political strife against Felt and Reinhard. He was by no means in the best condition, either.

Above all, Subaru was right in the middle of exerting every effort for the sake of Al in far-distant lands.

Otto: “Even I would feel guilty about scheming behind the scenes while Natsuki-san and the others are off trying to save someone’s heart. —The same cannot be said for the Margrave Mathers.”

Unlike Subaru and the rest, who had set off for the Pleiades Watchtower alongside Al, Roswaal had taken Schult, formerly a servant of Priscilla, back to her territory of the Barielle Domain. Beneath that concern and consideration, there was no doubt that his objective lay in taking the opportunity to meddle with the Barielle Domain.

As one involved with the Royal Selection, such conduct was correct, diligent, and worthy of contempt. —At the same time, even if it meant he was naive for not stooping to such cold-heartedness, Otto felt like it was better this way.

Reinhard: “Well then, shall we brew some tea? Allow me to show you what I am capable of.”

Otto: “By all means, let me see what you can do.”

Upon arriving at the kitchen, Reinhard took the tray with the tea set, and began making preparations. Watching over him, Otto took a small breather as he considered the developments yet to come.

Only, he had a premonition. Soon, there would be some sort of movement in the situation: that sort of premonition.

Otto: “…Going so far as postponing Emilia-sama and Felt-sama’s audience, some discussion is being given priority at the castle. What in the world might it be about?”

Beside Otto as he muttered, a tiny silhouette lurked in the shadows of a pillar. —It was the Zodda bug he had made a deal with, to make a report if there were any developments in the castle.

—In two ways, Otto’s premonition had been right on the mark.

The first was the report from the Zodda bug, informing him that the discussion in the castle which had gone out of its way to keep the Royal Candidates away had come to some sort of conclusion, and the second was the report from a girl of the Felt Camp during their visit to the Royal Residence—Grassis.

That was a complicated, turbulent report, news of some trouble having occurred with Subaru’s side over at the Pleiades Watchtower, and the tidings that upon having taken Al captive, Subaru and the others would be heading for the Royal Capital.

Chapter 2:
Sacrament of the Church

1

—There once was a wonderful young man by the name of Fourier Lugunica.

When they had first met, he was still just a boy, and with the personable impression he gave off since those days remaining largely unchanged, he was a childish person.

He was cheerful, innocent, and naive, with a side to him such that one would never know what he might do or say even just one second later, always keeping those around him in suspense.

But, no matter how much he troubled them with his antics, he had such a charm that they would never particularly mind.

Theirs was a relationship spanning a decade.

Ten years of accumulated seconds, with each making it impossible to know what might happen in the next; there were so many things that happened.

Certainly, there were countless times where they could not simply laugh things off.

And yet, when reminiscing, even those events were ones that they looked back on with a smile.

And right in the heart of those memories recited with that smile, was always that smile of his, bright as the sun.

Allow this confession without any pretenses. —I loved Fourier Lugunica.

From the day they met, up until this very day, not once had those feelings ever wavered.

No matter what words Fourier spoke to them, no matter what thoughts he vented, no matter what tribulations they shared together, no matter what time they spent together, no matter what future he dreamed of, no matter what bitterly painful betrayals they faced, no matter what tragedy tore their heart to shreds, not once had their affection for him wavered in the slightest. —Not once.

Certainly, if it were him, he could brave any situation without that smile of his fading. He would never lose hope.

In fact, until his very last moment, he never ceased to remain noble, pure of heart, and earnest.

They esteemed that from the bottom of their heart. They dearly respected it. They found it lovely.

That was why—

???: “—Your Highness, I beg of you, please forgive me.”

This decision, this resignation, is by no means the result of my love for you fading.

2

—The Church of the Divine Dragon was, as its name suggested, a religious organization that held faith in the Divine Dragon Volcanica, who had established a Covenant with the Kingdom, and dedicated themselves to its power and grace.

Its establishment unmistakably dated back four hundred years, to the era of the Covenant that earned the Kingdom of Lugunica the moniker of Dragon Kingdom; thus, there could be no objection to calling it a group with an ancient and distinguished history.

In fact, the Church of the Divine Dragon had remonstrated itself against the expansion of its own influence, and had maintained a certain distance from that which lay at the heart of the Kingdom, such as the Royal Family and the Royal Castle. That is to say, this was proof that the Church of the Divine Dragon had not sought out more power than was necessary, merely choosing instead to define itself as a foundation of faith.

Consequently, even when the Royal Family of Lugunica was eradicated by an epidemic, and the Royal Selection to decide the next to sit upon the throne had begun, the Church of the Divine Dragon did not actively intervene in the Kingdom's affairs.

???: "But, we're no longer in a position where we can be saying things like that so calmly. Ever since I heard of the Witch Cult's violence in the Watergate City, my patience has been approaching its limit by the day."

???: "…"

???: "Of course, this anger should be directed toward the Witch Cult who have treated the common people so cruelly. But it'd be a nearly impossible task to uncover and punish them thoroughly… or rather, even if we punished them, it would not save those who have already suffered. All things have an order of priority."

???: "…"

???: "Punishment must not take precedence over salvation. This too, is in the scriptures. "Punishment absent salvation is idle lightning; the Dragon first spreads its wings and embraces even the smallest of lives with affection." This is precisely what I believe; the optimal solution for humanity…!"

Emphatically arguing so, the woman forcefully shut the thick scriptures she held to her chest.

The amount of force put into that action was such that the man listening worried the pages of the bound tome might fall out. Fortunately, the book that was slammed shut with such force did not fall apart, and a catastrophe that could have caused the persuasiveness of that forceful speech from just before to fall to the ground was also averted.

Woman: "Ahem, ahem. I'm sorry. It seems I got a tad too impassioned. It's a habit of mine. Whether it is a good or bad habit, that shall depend on my deeds from this point on."

And as her listener was worrying about such trifling things as the book, the woman who had made that speech cleared her throat with a tinge of embarrassment before saying so.

Despite reflecting on her own conduct, that way of thinking was striking in how it came across as strangely forward-thinking.

The man was impressed by the strength to declare that whether it was good or bad would depend upon one's own attitude going forward; it was a way of thinking that he held a favorable impression towards. —Though favorable, it was still an extremely complicated impression.

???: "…"

He examined her with a glance: a beautiful woman clad in a nun's habit.

The woman, who had introduced herself as a nun of the Church of the Divine Dragon, had visited the Karsten Family's mansion in the Royal Capital after having held a discussion with the Council of Wise Men earlier in the Royal Castle.

The purpose of her visit was astonishing, and even now he had yet to fully recover from that shock. But the impact she had brought with her did not stop at merely the purpose of her visit.

A nun with long golden hair and crimson eyes that housed the light of her determination. Those physical characteristics of hers, and above all else, her name—Filóre, that was how she had introduced herself, but it brought with it a shock within his old bones that rivaled the purpose of her visit.

Filóre: "…I feel awkward and self-conscious saying something like this, but when you stare at me like that, I'm bewildered… I am bewildered. Quite a bit."

???: "—. I beg your forgiveness. It appears I have been rather impolite."

Filóre: "No, it's not like I'm blaming you. It's just that as a young person, the overwhelming look in your eyes, from the one called the Sword Demon… felt scary… life-threatening? Well, anyways, I just can't help but feel that there is some other expression that sounds better."

Indeed, toward Filóre, who was willing to overlook the boorishness of his gaze, the one who had been referred to by his epithet—Wilhelm, quietly bowed in apology.

The intention behind his apology was twofold: both for the intimidating gaze, and for how long she had been made to wait. After all, over an hour had already passed since Filóre had arrived at the mansion.

In the meantime, Wilhelm had been unable to think of a subject to pass the time, and Filóre, who abhorred the silence, had been searching for topics to discuss since the start. She kept asking for refills of her tea to avoid the awkwardness, and she was already breaking ground on her sixth cup.

Nevertheless, the truth was that the lack of discussion was not solely due to Wilhelm's clumsiness when it came to speaking. The greatest reason was the dual impact caused by her visit that had shaken Wilhelm to his very core, ripping away any composure he had previously possessed.

In truth, he wondered how he should treat Filóre. Wilhelm looked to the individual standing along the wall behind her, as if seeking an answer there.

He was a tall, strong man who had accompanied Filóre to the mansion—

Wilhelm: "—Commander of the Royal Guard, Marcos Gildark."

Marcos: "Sir."

When Wilhelm called that name, the large man clad in silver armor who had remained silent, Marcos, straightened his already straight back even further, and responded.

His reply had been naught but a single word, but one could feel a sense of upheaval like a giant boulder being stirred, as well as a definite reverence within that solemn voice.

Wilhelm, slowly shaking his head at the consideration imbued into that tone of the man's voice,

Wilhelm: "There is no need for you to be so formal. It has been over a decade since I was the Commander of the Royal Guard. I am just an old fool, who cannot be compared to the likes of you, the current leader of the Royal Guard."

Marcos: "An old fool? Surely you jest."

Commenting on Wilhelm's remark, a faint smile rose to the surface of Marcos's stony countenance.

He may have thought it mere modesty, but by Wilhelm's own admission, it was no lie. He had been endeavoring to regain his former skill with the sword, but the results he had hoped for were not readily being realized with his aging body.

This explained the reason why the old veteran could never relinquish the sword, and yet, he was still so far from reaching it.

Wilhelm: "At the very least, I have recovered to the point where I can make the active Commander of the Royal Guard pass it off as a joke. I suppose I can say it is fortuitous in that respect."

Naturally, someone appointed as Commander of the Royal Guard would be among the preeminent powerhouses of the Kingdom.

Wilhelm believed that Marcos, like himself, possessed the talent worthy of that position, though he did not intend that as self-praise—and beyond that, he was one of the most distinguished fighters throughout history. He had been overshadowed by Wilhelm, whose deeds had always been wide-spread, and Reinhard, the strongest Sword Saint in history; but, the current strength of the Knights owed itself to the merit of the man leading them.

It was also for this reason that Wilhelm appraised Marcos as the most qualified individual out of all the prior Commanders of the Knights. But then, any evaluation of Wilhelm, who had put personal grudges ahead of loyalty and left behind his duties, may have been worthless drivel from his own point of view.

In any case, the subject Wilhelm wanted to broach here and now was not talk of the troubles of fellow Commanders of the Royal Guard separated by a generation. It was a much more serious and dire topic.

And that was—

Wilhelm: "—Am I to conclude that the Council of Wise Men grasp the current state of affairs?"

Marcos: "Of course. They are taking this to be an extraordinary turn of events."

Wilhelm: "That is… inevitable, I suppose."

Omitting the subject, Wilhelm confirmed this, and Marcos did not feign ignorance nor ask what he was talking about.

It was unclear whether the answer was based more on his personality or position, but as for Wilhelm, he could confirm that the Council of Wise Men must have experienced the same shock as he had, and he let out a sigh.

Wilhelm: "To think that she has the same name as Filóre Lugunica-sama, daughter of Prince Ford Lugunica-sama."

It had overflowed from his sigh, and as he listened to his own murmur, pregnant with an emotion that was neither relief nor grief, Wilhelm could not sort out his own feelings. And as previously mentioned, that sentiment was not solely confined to Wilhelm, but it also applied to the Council of Wise Men and everyone else who participated in the discussion at the Royal Castle.

Filóre Lugunica had disappeared fifteen years ago—and a girl with the same physical characteristics of the Royal Family of Lugunica, even bearing the same name as her, had suddenly appeared.

Wilhelm: "…"

Glancing at Filore, who was now drinking from her seventh cup of tea in order to avoid boredom, Wilhelm searched for a glimpse of the Royal Family of his memories in her profile.

If he were to say that there was, then there was, and if he were to say that there was not, he would accept that too; there was only that kind of vague sensation.

To begin with, the princess had disappeared when she was but an infant, so it was impossible to escape the realm of conjecture regarding how she may have grown up had she survived. — However, supposing her lineage was as Wilhelm and the others suspected, it was a serious problem that would shake the foundations of the Kingdom.

This could put the continuation of the Royal Selection itself into a precarious state, and depending on the intentions of the Church of the Divine Dragon, one could even call it the seed of a disaster that could well lead to the division of the Kingdom.

What would sprout from that seed, and what kind of flowers might bloom, were things none could possibly imagine.

Be that as it may, there were things he could declare with certainty at this point in time.

There were two Royal Selection camps who would suffer the greatest impact from Filóre's existence and her proposal as a representative of the Church of the Divine Dragon. —Needless to say, one would be the Crusch Camp, to which Wilhelm also belonged.

Wilhelm: "—Crusch-sama."

Closing his eyes, Wilhelm thought of his master, who had extended a helping hand to him.

One of the Royal Selection Candidates, a preeminent woman of talent in the Kingdom, and heir to Duke Karsten: for Wilhelm, who had continued to pursue the White Whale to avenge his wife, she was his irreplaceable benefactor. But the reason he still firmly believed that she herself was worthy of the throne, even now, was not simply out of gratitude.

Crusch's attitude, character, and way of being—that heroic sense of values and bearing like a polished sword were the reasons why Wilhelm desired her to ascend to the throne with all his heart.

Even after falling into the clutches of Gluttony and losing her Memories, that was unable to take away the earnest nobility and sincerity that permeated the core of her being.

In other words, he believed that it was the innate brilliance of her soul itself.

Consequently, for that master to suffer further disasters brought Wilhelm great sorrow, and he was assailed by his own helplessness that threatened to tear him apart; such was this bitter experience of his.

However, it could be said that it was preferable to at least be able to regret and lament one's own errors, inadequacy, and mistakes in judgment.

Wilhelm: "—Ferris."

The name that he subsequently voiced was that of her admirable one and only Knight, who, as far as Wilhelm knew, was likely the individual most harrowed by his deepest regrets and sense of powerlessness in the days since the Royal Selection had begun.

Wilhelm: "…"

The reason Wilhelm was currently making their visitors, Filóre and Marcos, wait, was due to none other than Ferris. As Wilhelm and the others passed the time away in stagnation at the parlor, Ferris was spending time with Crusch in her bedroom, just the two of them.

Wilhelm gritted his teeth; just how heartbreaking, how agonizing must that time be?

It was the kind of suffering that made him want to pray that if he could take Ferris's place and grant some relief, he would.

However, Wilhelm could not serve as a substitute. —No, it was not only Wilhelm; no one else could replace Ferris in his current role.

It was a decision that none but Ferris could make, a choice that none but Ferris could be permitted to make; that was what lay before him.

Wilhelm, Filóre, Marcos; all of them could only continue to patiently wait for that decision and choice to be made, and nothing else.

There was no need to be impatient. Everyone had a hunch that it would not take long.

And in fact, it did not.

???: "—I'm sorry I've kept you waiting."

Saying so in a miserable voice, Ferris stepped into the parlor.

He was sure he had done his best. However, there were traces of tears on Ferris's pale cheeks, and his wavering amber eyes were even now still colored by a fragment of the conflict within that could not be erased.

Wilhelm hesitated to say anything, Ferris's thin shoulders drooping, and his cat ears and tail, which made his demi-human ancestry apparent, were worn out and exhausted.

He could not ask such a transparent question as "What happened?". "It is not your fault," perhaps? How in the world could he dare to say such a thing? Not to mention, if he were to say "Nothing could be done", he would want to cut off his own head.

There were no words to be said. Any conceivable words would just be a blade cutting through Ferris at the moment. Amongst everything he could choose, it was silence that would be the shortest and least horrible blade to stab him with.

Filóre: "How long it took is no problem for me. I'm aware of the weight of responsibility you shoulder… That's probably nothing more than mere consolation though."

Ferris: "…Yeah. But, mere consolation helps. Because, I'm completely overwhelmed right now."

Rather than to Wilhelm, who remained silent, Ferris instead responded to Filóre, who had spoken up.

His usual mischievous childishness mixed with frivolity had faded away, and his feeble smile seemed like it would crumble at a single touch; brittle, like it was made of candy.

Likely aware of that to a keen extent, Filóre continued her words.

Ferris seemed to be on the verge of falling apart, and as if to postpone that moment from arriving,

Filóre: "Please, let me hear the answer. —Your answer."

Gently extending her hand, Filóre fixed her crimson eyes upon Ferris and asked thus. Meeting that gaze head-on, Ferris's thin lips trembled.

The hesitation that arose, however, had no power to restrain the devotion of the Blue—

Ferris: "—Please. I'm… not enough. Please, save Crusch-sama."

To the outstretched hand of Filóre from the Church of the Divine Dragon, that was the answer of the one and only Knight of Crusch Karsten, the Blue, Felix Argyle—of Ferris.

3

???: "—Is that true?"

Right in the middle of a moment of peace, having just exchanged a promise of friendship with Felt who had come to visit the Royal Residence, was when it was heard that at the Karsten Villa in the Royal Capital, where Crusch had been transported, treatment would be administered to counter the accursed poison tormenting her body.

Otto: "My knowledge in the matter is lacking, but it seems that a discussion involving the Church of the Divine Dragon has taken place at the Royal Castle. Apparently, the Church has a countermeasure to combat the suffering that the Sin Archbishop of Lust has inflicted upon Duchess Karsten's body."

Emilia: "A countermeasure… as in, you mean they can heal Crusch-san's body? Is it a different way than what made Subaru's hand turn black?"

Otto: "Unfortunately, for more details…"

Felt: "Well, there ain't any point in dawdling about. —Reinhard, head over to the Castle for a bit and figure out what they were talking about."

Reinhard: "Understood."

Amidst Emilia's confusion over the report from Otto, who had just returned from brewing tea, Reinhard immediately soared to the Castle upon receiving an order following Felt's swift judgment.

Watching the ever-diminishing figure of Reinhard as he jumped out of the window, Emilia muttered to herself, "The Church of the Divine Dragon…",

Emilia: "Those are the people that reaaally believe in Volcanica. But, didn't they say that, so they wouldn't get involved with the Kingdom's politics, they weren't going to approach the Castle?"

Felt: "Regardless, those bastards broke the mutual agreement and showed their faces in the Castle… It'd be great if those guys can do something about Crusch-neechan's body, but if that's the case, they should've said some damn thing sooner."

Otto: "I am unable to discern the Church of the Divine Dragon's motives. At the moment, all of the information we have is unconfirmed. It is just—"

During this conversation which grew ever more markedly perplexing, Otto closed his mouth, seemingly deep in thought. Seeing this, Emilia tilted her head and asked "Otto-kun?", and with a shake of his head,

Otto: "No, while the situation remains uncertain, I should refrain from saying anything. For now, let us wait for Reinhard-san's return.”

Emilia: “…Okay? I understand. When you want to talk about it, let me know properly.”

Felt: “Regardless of whether or not green-niichan wants to talk about it, that bastard Reinhard isn’t gonna make us wait all that long. Jeez, he’s so irritating.”

With her arms folded, Felt tapped her toe and grumbled in impatience.

As Felt gazed out of the window, gently drawing her head close, Emilia faced not towards the Castle for which Reinhard had departed, but rather searched for the Crusch Residence within the Noble District.

Since they had parted ways in Pristella, they had not been able to ascertain Crusch’s condition. Her heart panged with guilt at not being able to return with an immediately useful report from the Pleiades Watchtower. If, as Otto had overheard, the Church of the Divine Dragon was able to save Crusch, then—

Emilia: “Even if it’s not because of us, that’s totally fine. So…”

Felt: “—He’s back!”

As Emilia was about to mutter a prayer, Felt painted it over with her assertive voice.

Just as when he had departed for the Castle, Reinhard returned to the Royal Residence in a single bound. He rushed towards the window before Emilia and the others, landing softly so as to not disturb the garden lawn.

And then—

Reinhard: “Felt-sama, the situation is urgent. Would you please accompany me to the Castle?”

Felt: “Ahh? Why the Castle? More importantly, about our conversation from a moment ago…”

Reinhard: “—Felt-sama.”

Interrupting Felt, Reinhard called her name tersely. Felt narrowed her crimson eyes at his sharp demeanor, and with a “Tch” as she clicked her tongue,

Felt: “Got it. Me, to the Castle. What about Emilia-neechan and her companion?”

Reinhard: “The information from Otto’s report has been corroborated. Indeed, it seems that the Church of the Divine Dragon is heading towards Crusch-sama’s residence. There—”

Emilia: “We’ll go. I can’t sit still any longer!”

Hearing that Otto’s report was correct, Emilia gave her chest a powerful thump.

She must have been very worried about Crusch, but if Felt had no choice but to go to the Castle, then Emilia intended to bear part of her anxieties and make the visit.

Of course, there was a high possibility that they would be turned away amidst the confusion, but,

Otto: “A visit should be fine, at least. Leave it to us… It looks like we, too, might have to head to the Castle afterwards.”

Reinhard: “Agreed. It would be better for you to think that way. Felt-sama.”

Felt: “I know, no need for you to call me over and over again.”

Snorting at Reinhard as he extended his hand, Felt hopped lightly onto the window sill, and turning around to say “Emilia-neechan” as she jumped into his arms,

Felt: “The night before the devastation in Pristella, I promised Crusch-neechan that we would talk more. So…”

Emilia: “—! Yes, leave it to me! That Felt-chan is reaaally worried, I’ll be sure to let Crusch-san know!”

Felt: “Hah. I still don’t think it’s a good idea to be surrounded by friends in the Royal Selection.”

Shrugging her shoulders in response to Emilia’s strong resolve, Felt jumped into Reinhard’s arms. As he caught her with reverence, adjusting her position within his arms, Reinhard briefly glanced at Emilia and Otto—immediately after, with another single leap, he flew back towards the Castle.

Otto: “Oh dear, he really is abnormal. Us humans will have to hurry on our own feet.”

Emilia: “If I try my best, I might be able to hold Otto-kun in my arms and hop over with a “pyon”…”

Otto: “That has some pros and cons, but please do that for Natsuki-san, not me. —Let us hurry.”

Emilia: “Got it!”

Nodding at Otto’s urging, Emilia too quickly hurried off, rushing into the streets of the Royal Capital.

Their destination was the Karsten residence—previously, when Crusch and company had been injured in an attack following the Subjugation of the White Whale, they had hastened down this same route out of concern; their impatience now carried them much faster than before.

And then—

4

???: “—Ferris!”

Gasping for breath from her dash there, when Emilia witnessed the figure of Ferris kneeling as if in prayer, she called out to him with a voice bordering on a shriek.

Her voice making his flaxen cat ears tremble, Ferris timidly turned his head.

Ferris: “…Emilia… sama?”

Emilia: “Yes, that’s right. I haven’t heard all of it, but I know the gist. Sorry it took so long to get here.”

Ferris’s feeble voice was acutely agonizing for Emilia, and it ached deep within her heart.

He had always given off an air of adorableness and liveliness, and yet when they met again like this after such a long time, Ferris felt so pitiful and ephemeral, it seemed like he would just fade away.

As if to prevent that from happening, Emilia embraced that slender figure without any hesitation.

Ferris: “—Y-You’ll get tears and snot on you.”

Emilia: “That’s nothing to worry about. It doesn’t bother me. Leaving you like this would be way, way more painful, Ferris.”

Ferris: “—Hk.”

Taking care not to squeeze too tightly with her arms, Emilia hoped that the heat of her own body, as well as her concern for Ferris, who was right before her eyes, as well as for Crusch, would be conveyed.

Behind Emilia and Ferris, treading across the carpet was Wilhelm, who had received them. Emilia and Otto had arrived at the estate in a panic, and rather than turning them away, Wilhelm had let them in.

Having arrived late after Emilia, Otto stole a quick glance at Wilhelm,

Otto: “I know we are the ones paying you a visit, but is it okay? In this situation…”

Wilhelm: “It is my own judgement, but it was precisely because of the current situation that I did so. Even if it is but a single person, it is reassuring to know that someone is sincerely praying for Crusch-sama’s well-being right now.”

Otto: “…It is certainly true that in that regard, Emilia-sama’s power is indeed great.”

Otto and Wilhelm were having some sort of exchange behind her, but Emilia could not hear their words. Right then, she wanted to devote her heart and soul to Ferris, who was in her arms. Holding his feebly, pitifully trembling body, Emilia tenderly stroked his back.

Emilia: “Ferris, is Crusch-san…?”

Ferris: “—She’s… inside. Inside that room, right now, they’re treating…”

Emilia: “…”

Firmly within her embrace, Ferris indicated the door he had been kneeling and praying before with his gaze—within Emilia’s memories, she recalled it was a bedroom.

Without a doubt, it was the room where Crusch had been brought to rest and where the treatment was taking place.

And yet, that Ferris was outside the room like this—

???: “It is a Sacrament of the Church of the Divine Dragon, esoteric and not to be shown to outsiders.”

Emilia was taken aback when the large figure standing as still as a statue in the hallway replied with that answer. Now that she got a good look at him, she recognized him as the Commander of the Royal Guard, whom she had seen several times at the Royal Castle.

She wondered if the Commander of the Royal Guard had also been worried about Crusch and rushed over. Or perhaps he was good friends with Ferris, and that was the reason why he was present.

In any case—

Emilia: “A Sacrament… so can it be used to save Crusch-san?”

Ferris: “I d-don’t know… b-but, there’s no other way… I-I, I-I’m u-useless… hk.”

Emilia: “That’s not… hk!”

…True, is what she had wanted to say aloud. In fact, had this been the Emilia from not too long ago, she certainly would have said so without thinking anything of it.

However, she now realized that simply saying that on impulse, without any thought, would not encourage or console Ferris in any true sense.

Ferris was amazing. He possessed a truly, immensely special and incredibly kind power.

However, Ferris was unable to use this power that Emilia respected from the bottom of her heart for the sake of Crusch, the most important person in the world to him. He was crying and trembling like this, facing such a truly arduous and excruciating reality that he could do nothing about; there was no way she could say that without any thought.

Emilia: “It’s okay, it’s okay.”

Therefore, Emilia swallowed back down the words she had begun to say, and tenderly embraced Ferris. She continued to embrace him. Continued to embrace him, and continued to hold him close.

When Emilia had felt frozen by her own powerlessness, that was what had made her happiest; so, she did the same for him.

Emilia: “—Hang in there, Crusch-san.”

Supporting the weeping and trembling Ferris, Emilia prayed.

Emilia knew that Otto and Wilhelm, along with the Commander of the Royal Guard, were also praying for her, right behind where she and Ferris held each other close in prayer for Crusch’s well-being.

Behind that door, someone whose face she did not know, from the Church of the Divine Dragon, was struggling.

Struggling to save Crusch, who sustained a horrific injury fighting for the people.

Wishing for that tenacity to bear fruit, she prayed, and prayed, and prayed, and then eventually—

???: "—You can enter now."

Suddenly, a voice was heard from the other side of the door, and Emilia snapped her head up.

It was a completely exhausted female voice, its message causing Ferris to flinch within Emilia's arms as he stared at her face in disbelief.

His wholehearted prayers brought to an abrupt halt, Ferris's mind was unable to catch up with reality.

Emilia: "Can you stand?"

Ferris: "Y-Yes, I can s-stand…"

Standing up before Ferris, Emilia lent him her arm to help him up. His slender knees shook unreliably, but Ferris turned his round eyes toward the door and exhaled, walking one step at a time.

Supporting Ferris's shoulder as he did so, Emilia also headed for the door as well. Then, she turned the door handle for him, as his whole body continued to shake.

The door made a sound as it opened, and on the other side was the bedroom. There was a bed placed in the center of the room, and a woman had been laid upon it. That figure was—

Ferris: "—Ah."

Letting out a hoarse sigh, Ferris stepped forward as if he were in a trance. His legs of no particular reliability seemed like they would immediately become tangled and pull him down.

However, that did not happen. Ferris unconsciously shook off Emilia's supporting hand and headed for the bed where Crusch lay with enough momentum that it seemed like he would collapse onto it.

Ferris: “Crusch-sama… Crusch… sama… Crusch-samaaa… hk.”

Hearing that choked, tearful voice repeatedly calling out for his beloved, Emilia stepped forward towards the middle of the room as well, gazing upon Crusch, whom Ferris was fixed on.

Having spent so long bedridden, Crusch’s beauty had become emaciated, and her skin pale like that of an invalid, even despite the daily care she had received. —However, the evil poison that had taken root, stretching across her face, neck, and body, was nowhere to be found upon her visible skin.

???: “Prayers… can be answered.”

Emilia: “—You are?”

Emilia, who stood beside Ferris as he clung to the bed, looked around, noticing the form of a blonde woman across the bed, stretching out her legs as she sat on the floor.

She was a member of the Church of the Divine Dragon who had been testing a method to save Crusch. Her breathing was markedly fatigued, and despite the amount of sweat covering her forehead, the woman broke out in a smile,

Blonde Woman: “This too, is in the scriptures. “The salvation of but one, is according to the prayers of the many. For it is only in communion that the grace of the Dragon shall reign supreme.”“

Emilia: “—Hk, thank you.”

Blonde Woman: “This much is a piece of cake… I mean, of course.”

The expression of the woman with a brave smile upon her face stiffened, and she immediately corrected her speech. While feeling sincere gratitude for her efforts, Emilia crouched and put her arms around Ferris’s shoulders.

As she supported Ferris in the midst of his shaking and weeping, she rejoiced with all her heart in knowing that their prayers had been answered.

Emilia: “Crusch-san, when you wake up, there reaaally is so much that I want to talk with you about. I have a message from Felt-chan, and a lot more I want to say.”

With all traces of that gruesome and vile poison wiped from her face, Crusch slept, her eyes still closed. Wishing dearly for the time that sleeping face would wake, Emilia spoke to her.

When she woke, there would be much that Emilia wanted to talk about. Among them were her own selfish desires, spurred on by Anastasia and Felt.

Therefore—

Emilia: “Reaaally, reaaally, thank you so much for hanging in there.”

Indeed, Emilia’s eyes softened as she expressed her gratitude for each and every person there.

5

Otto: “…”

Laying his eyes upon the results displayed by the Sacrament of the Church of the Divine Dragon, Otto gazed at Ferris, who was clinging to his bed-ridden master, and Emilia, who was supporting him.

Wilhelm: “Crusch-sama, how truly… how truly…”

Likewise, bearing witness to the same sight, Wilhelm was overcome with emotion, his voice trembling.

It was proof that even he, famous for his legendary swordsmanship under the name of the Sword Demon, had continued to have his heart worn down by his inability to be of use to his master during her time of anguish.

Though incomparable to the devotion of her one and only Knight, Ferris, who had devoted himself to her for many long years, it was still clear that Wilhelm's chest had been filled with relief and gratitude.

And in no small amount, Otto felt the same.

Just before this, as he had recollected alongside Reinhard, Otto too had been shaken by the death of Priscilla. Hence, the fact that Crusch had been saved after sustaining a tremendous wound during the battle at the Watergate City caused him to feel a definite relief.

That made him glad. Truly, he was glad.

But at the same time, he became convinced of the possibility of which he had refrained from informing Emilia.

That was—

Otto: "—The Royal Selection of Duchess Crusch Karsten, ends here."

At the very least, it was a conviction that did not need to be shared with anyone present here at the current moment, in this place shedding tears of joy at Crusch's safe recovery, whispered soundlessly in the confines of his mouth.

Chapter 3:
An Omen of Light

1

—Whenever Felt set foot into the Royal Castle, she would always endure a sensation akin to breaching a resistance, one as thin as a single layer of skin.

To Felt, who had been raised in the Slums of the Royal Capital before the commencement of the Royal Selection, the Royal Castle of Lugunica was but a symbol of absolute disconnect, one that lingered at the corner of her vision, but bore no relation whatsoever to her own life.

A place that whilst there, she would have no involvement whatsoever. Hazy and irreal, like a mirage whose existence held no perceptible worth; it left such an impression.

And that was why, even now, whenever she had the opportunity to visit the Castle as a Royal Candidate, she felt as if she were stepping into a dream or an illusion.

And as such—

???: "—Felt-sama?"

Having had her name called, Felt stopped in her tracks and raised her head.

Her crimson gaze returned the stare of the blue eyes of her Knight as he turned back to her, his hands upon the door; with a brief snort, she replied shortly, "It's nothing".

Yes, it was nothing. No one could stop their stride now.

Felt: "Let's go."

Standing atop the resolution this declaration gave them, Felt tore through that skin-thin resistance, and proceeded forth.

When the Knight—Reinhard gave a nod and opened the door, on the other side was a place that, as always, was bustling with the presence of many people, a place filled with a bizarre tension.

It was a space where individual agendas intermingled chaotically, exchanged in the form of gazes and words. However, the moment Felt set foot inside, those scattered intentions were unexpectedly unified.

That was to say, unified into a single unreserved will to appraise Felt for the sake of the Kingdom's future.

Felt: "Well, it ain't like I care. When facing up with someone, I've got plenty of those same feelings myself."

Setting aside the Royal Selection, this worldly wisdom was Felt's method of survival in the Slums, or perhaps something akin to life experience. Whether the other party was useful to oneself or not, what they might be thinking deep down, she had made a habit of ascertaining such things.

In truth, even since becoming a Royal Candidate, this ingrained habit had come to her aid.

After all, she was meeting with far more people now than she ever did in the Slums, and she was swamped with opportunities where she had to discern their true motives. If she had been forced to rebuild that sense of judgment from scratch, there was no telling how much she would have struggled.

That being said—

Felt: "Though, there are folks like Emilia-neechan who have nothing to do with that sort of thing."

Emilia who, despite being a fellow Candidate for the Royal Selection, maintained a defenselessness that bordered on the miraculous.

Felt suspected that behind Emilia's ability to retain that demeanor lay the extraordinary efforts of her Knight, Natsuki Subaru, and others like Otto who accompanied her all this time.

However, on the other hand, Felt's assessment was that neither the Royal Selection nor the environment which surrounded it was simple enough for someone to survive solely by unconditional protection. For all that, Emilia possessed a solid eye for people and the intuition to sense their ulterior motives.

Since she acted that way despite having those instincts, it made things rather difficult for Felt to deal with.

Felt: "In the end, she went and made me her friend, too."

Reflecting on the decision she herself had just made, Felt heaved a deep sigh.

She had no regrets accepting Emilia's offer, but she felt that the path ahead had become unclear yet again. She had no intention of resorting to dirty tricks or schemes, but there was no doubt it would have been easier to make decisions without holding back if they were just rival camps clashing fiercely against each other.

If it was just the other side that held a one-sided affection for her, then the opponent would be the only one at a disadvantage.

Felt assumed that this must have been Anastasia's true aim in inviting the other camps to Pristella, her basic strategy. —Unfortunately, that scheme was seemingly crushed by a flow of events which led to her becoming friends with Emilia after the Royal Selection.

Be that as it may—

Felt: "Fine by me, I don't hate it. It's been a while since I've had those appraising gazes directed at me instead."

This was no bravado, but full acceptance of the scrutiny directed towards herself, as Felt twisted the corners of her mouth into a smile.

Within the throne room into which she stepped—the very place where the start of the Royal Selection had been declared, numerous officials of the Royal Castle of Lugunica were gathered; among them was the Council of Wise Men, who bore the weight of the nation's administration.

The other day, Felt had reported on the incident at the Augria Sand Dunes and the Pleiades Watchtower—of the achievements of Meili Portroute, who had sold herself as being capable of guiding the group to the Sage's Tower; the atmosphere at present was distinctly different from when she had exchanged those words with them.

It was a gaze which was usually directed at Felt, almost as if looking upon a heretic or a foreigner—in the beginning, at the point where she had joined the Royal Selection, Felt had picked a fight with every single person there.

It was close to the tone of bewilderment and confusion they had directed at that stray child from the Slums back then.

And so—

Felt: "You guys with the "Who, me?" faces might be the reason for this."

Stomping heavily across the red carpet, Felt walked directly to the center of the throne room. Closing one eye, she glared at the man and woman who were already standing there.

???: "…"

The pair that turned to face Felt were both young, barely twenty years of age.

A gentle-looking man with bright-green colored hair, and a beautiful woman with short purple hair, reminiscent of flowers blooming in the rainy season. Despite the circumstances, the two of them stood dignified, not at all overwhelmed by their surroundings.

In fact, even at Felt's opening, deliberately made as an attempt to seize the initiative, the two of them remained unshaken. The gentle-looking man gave a wry smile, while the woman waved her hand softly and fluttered, with an "Oh my, oh myyy",

Purple-haired Woman: "Hehehe, aren't you awfully sudden? Even though this is the first time we've met in this way, Felt-chan really is just as prickly as the rumors saaay.”

VIC.II20

Felt: “Rumors, huh. What kind of rumors are those exactly?”

Purple-haired Woman: “Small and adorable, yet majestic and dignified; strong-willed and unyielding to anyone, putting even men to shame… the reputation is that the gap in charm is enough to make one diiizzy.”

Felt: “Now those are a bunch of unwanted rumors out there…”

As Felt expressed her dejection with that answer, the woman giggled with a glossy allure.

Clothes coated in deep crimson like a ripened fruit, a hat of similar hue tilted upon her head, the woman boasted an appearance and atmosphere that resembled that of a scribe, or perhaps a maid serving someone of high status. However, the way she unreservedly closed the distance with others, and her sleepy, drowsy red eyes, made it difficult to pin her down.

If said bluntly, she gave the impression of being someone not easily dealt with. However—

Green-haired Man: “—Sakura, the person before you is a Candidate in the Royal Selection. Please stop speaking so smoothly in your usual tone. We wouldn’t have enough lives to spare.”

And, standing next to the woman, the gentle-looking man chided his companion’s attitude. That said, his rebuke was thick with the tone of a jest, offering no guarantee of his own seriousness or sincerity.

In fact, at the man pointing this out, the woman by the name of Sakura simply smiled, going “Huuuh?”,

Sakura: “Are you trying to make me the bad guy too, Tiga-chan? I’m already in bad standing thanks to that child’s selfishness, so to be told that by my only ally is such a letdooown.”

Tiga: “Then all the more reason not to increase our enemies. First impressions tend to linger, you know. Especially since right now, we are in a position where we aren't exactly welcome… right?"

Sakura: "Yeees, yeees, Tiga-chan's reasoning is sound, I suppooose."

Tiga: "I am glad you understand."

As Sakura stuck out her tongue in a sulky gesture, the man named Tiga nodded theatrically.

Then, turning himself towards Felt and Reinhard, he removed the wide-brimmed hat that had been pulled low over his head, and placing it against the chest of his dark purple cloak,

Tiga: "And so, my companion has been terribly rude, Felt-sama. I am Tiga Rauleon, and this is Sakura Element. We look forward to making your acquaintance."

As he spoke, the gentle-looking man—Tiga bowed with a distinct style, and, closing one of those yellow eyes he had turned toward Felt, he was a handsome man whose affected gestures truly suited.

Taking in the sight of Tiga and Sakura, Felt was convinced. Without a doubt, these two, who appeared to carry an atmosphere so distinct from the rest of the Royal Castle, were the reason Reinhard had taken her from the Royal Residence in a hurry—

Felt: "Reinhard, these two…"

Reinhard: "Yes. —They are the two envoys from the Church of the Divine Dragon."

Standing beside Felt where she had halted her step, Reinhard faced the two in question.

Inadvertently, Felt and Reinhard, along with the duo from the Church of the Divine Dragon, faced off with each other in the middle of the throne room, drawing the attention of those present therein the Royal Castle.

Paying no heed to such attention, Felt crossed her arms, and glaring at Tiga, Felt: “As far as I know, the Church of the Divine Dragon wasn’t supposed to involve itself in the country’s politics. So, why are you in a place like this?”

Tiga: “I am unsure of whether you will believe me, but in reality, this contact has been involuntary on our part as well. As you said, the Church has been trying to distance itself from national politics. Although of course, I won’t say that is because we lack a sense of belonging towards the Kingdom.”

Felt: “Involuntary contact, huh? You say that, while knowing that you might be able to do something for the body of Crusch Karsten, who’s a Royal Candidate herself?”

Tiga: “—. That is…”

In response to Felt’s words, Tiga faltered slightly. Next to him, Sakura covered her mouth with her hand and giggled once more.

Hearing that laugh, Felt growled with a “Huuh?” in her throat, and as Sakura tilted her head to the side,

Sakura: “No, no, Felt-chan really does have very sharp eaaars. Even though that topic you mentioned just now was supposed to be a secret kept only within this Caaastle.”

Felt: “Heh, you shouldn’t underestimate the hellish ears of this guy standing next to me. He’ll even listen to my footsteps when I get out of bed at night to go use the toilet.”

Reinhard: “While I will not deny it, that is a misleading way of phrasing that might invite misunderstanding, Felt-sama.”

Felt: “Shut up, quit forcing a smile like that and just look brazen! That’ll scare them way more, right?”

The origin of the information, that the discussion being held with the Church of the Divine Dragon at the Castle involved Crusch, had actually been Otto, so Felt concealed that fact out of obligation. At this point, adding on a few more rumors about Reinhard having hellish ears, or a habit of eavesdropping, would not hurt him much anyway. It was a fact that he could likely distinguish the sound of a needle being dropped a kilometer away, too.

Be that as it may—

Felt: "—The problem's in the "Church of the Divine Dragon" bit."

Sakura: "Oh my, does Felt-chan hate the Church as weeell? I do think our activities in, say, the Slums, have had a positive impact thooough."

Felt: "Sorry, but I hate taking charity. I've never lined up for the bread the Church hands out. And, it's not like I'm saying that those activities are useless, or that I hate them. What I'm talking about right now is the part where your bunch can save Duchess Karsten."

Sakura: "Does that mean that you want to leave a rival camp alone to suuuffer?"

Felt: "You tryna make me say "no" specifically? Sorry, but I ain't got that much free time."

Felt stuck out her tongue at Sakura, who, despite her sweet manner of speaking, laced her attacks with poison.

Indeed, Crusch belonged to a rival camp, but the reason she had fallen into her current state could not be helped. Everyone who had been present at that event bore a guilt regarding it, and if she was heading towards recovery, it was only human to try and take whatever helping hands were available. —However, those of the Church of the Divine Dragon alone, were for Crusch a terrible mismatch.

After all—

???: "—Duchess Crusch Karsten declared at the start of the Royal Selection: that she would annul the Covenant exchanged with the Dragon, and break away from the peace protected by it."

Everyone: "…"

Speaking thus, interrupting the conversation of Felt and the others, was an old man with a long beard who sat in a chair in the row of the Council of Wise Men—Miklotov McMahon. Felt, sighing slightly at the words of one of the Sages who had finally decided to talk,

Felt: "…The very person who made the declaration that the whole country relying on the Dragon was pathetic, she's now borrowing the power of the Church of the Divine Dragon that worships said Dragon? It must look kinda lame…"

???: "Be careful of what you say, Felt-sama. This is not a matter of appearances…"

Miklotov: "No, it is as Felt-sama says. Appearances… in summary, it is a matter of optics. In that regard, Crusch-sama will receive an irreparable blow. Though, that is only if she chooses to take the hand offered to her."

One of the civil officials present tried to interject in the exchange between Felt and Miklotov, but he was chided by none other than Miklotov himself.

The Sage's interjection implied that the final right to make the decision regarding the proposal from the Church of the Divine Dragon lay with Crusch and her Camp.

However—

Reinhard: "—Ferris."

Holder of the title of the Blue, he who was the one and only Knight of Crusch, who now lingered in the utmost torment, was also the friend Reinhard thought of as he lowered his eyes slightly and uttered that name from his lips.

Felt had witnessed with her own eyes when she had visited how his beauty, usually mistakable for that of a lovely woman, had withered away from exhaustion, and how much he agonized and gasped beside Crusch. She had not heard of Crusch's condition improving since then. If that was the case, his state of mind would be the same.

His precious master, continuing to burn in the flames of a deadly poison in a living hell. If a means to save her was offered, no one could blame her one and only Knight, no matter what decision he made.

Miklotov: “Of course, even for us, there was a debate regarding this proposal from the Church of the Divine Dragon. First, we had to ascertain whether the content of the proposal was factual or not. Depending on the result…”

Felt: “Maybe the guys who got affected in Pristella could be saved too. If ya think about that, the things we’re hung up on are pretty small potatoes, I guess.”

Miklotov: “Hmm. Are you convinced, then…”

Felt: “You really think I can be?”

She understood the logic, and she understood the reasoning. However, emotional acceptance was a different matter altogether.

Having joined the Royal Selection, Felt intended to keep moving in order to win. But, with Priscilla having died in the recent events in the Empire, if Crusch were to drop out because of this, it would be a completely different outcome from the way Felt wanted to settle things.

If it were to end in that manner, would it be all that different from Reinhard just going on a rampage and rendering all the other Royal Candidates into invalids?

Miklotov: “It is not as if anyone is to blame. If one must point fingers, every bit of fault lies with the Witch Cult.”

Felt: “I know it’s too late now, but I really should’ve roughed up that Wrath bastard a bit more before throwing her in prison. If I’d done that, maybe my gut would’ve settled down a little.”

Of course, she knew perfectly well that doing so would not solve anything, and it probably would not have made her feel any better, either. In the first place, most of the damage in Pristella had been caused by Gluttony and Lust; the aftereffects left by Wrath were extremely minor.

Reinhard understood this as well, so no one took that hateful grumbling of Felt's seriously.

In any case—

Felt: "I get what's going on. The Church brought a treatment method, and the Duchess… ah, whatever. Whether Crusch-neechan will be saved or not depends on whether her Knight accepts that treatment… We don't have the right to butt in there."

Even if she had her own thoughts on the matter, only the people involved could choose what to do.

Having admitted that, Felt asked "So?", directing her question to Reinhard beside her, and then to everyone present in the room.

Felt: "I understand the flow of things up to this point, but why was it necessary to drag me here in such a rush? I appreciate the explanation, sure, but you know Emilia-neechan is in the Royal Capital right now, too, it's not just me. If it's just this explanation, it shouldn't have made a difference if you told us all together."

This matter had the ability to significantly affect the Royal Selection. That was all the more reason why this information should have been shared urgently not just with Felt, but with Emilia as well. In a situation such as this, it was unlikely that Reinhard would try to outwit Emilia by bringing along only Felt. It was doubtful Reinhard even possessed the concept of outwitting others.

Despite that, there had to have been a reason why Felt, and only Felt, was brought to this place.

Felt: "If there is a reason, is it you guys from the Church? But, as of right now, I don't have anything I wanna discuss with the Church… Though, I guess we could talk about the Divine Dragon."

Her words became somewhat muddy and her tone dropped in the second half—Felt's perception of the Divine Dragon Volcanica, whom the Church of the Divine Dragon worshipped so grandly, had just recently changed.

Felt: "After all, when I went along with Meili to the Pleiades

Watchtower, I ended up having to watch Reinhard fight that empty-headed Dragon up close and personal…”

The battle between the Sword Saint and the Divine Dragon had not taken place in an environment where either could exert their full power, but it had still been a fierce, apocalyptic clash. Through that battle, Felt had learned that the Divine Dragon was in a state far removed from the majesty spoken of in legends, but if she had been asked to explain the details, she would have been at a loss for words.

However, Tiga, in response to Felt’s concerns, shrugging his shoulders,

Tiga: “No, summoning you, Felt-sama, wasn’t our intention. Or rather, regarding the discussion just now, the Church is actually in a delicate position.”

Felt: “Just now, you mean the stuff involving Crusch-neechan? And what do you mean, delicate?”

Tiga: “Well, simply put… the Church hasn’t actually given a clear answer yet on whether we would act to save Duchess Crusch Karsten.”

Felt: “Haaah…?”

Felt involuntarily groaned in a low voice at the reply given by Tiga, who frowned with a troubled expression.

It was a statement that made no sense. She had understood the situation to be that the Church of the Divine Dragon possessed a means to heal those afflicted by the Witch Cult, had declared they would save Crusch with it, and had contacted the Royal Castle. But, what Tiga just said completely undermined that premise.

Felt: “But, that treatment is supposed to be administered to Crusch-neechan right now. If the Church hasn’t given an answer, then why is that…”

Sakura: “That is becaaause… one of our impatient girls went running ahead on her ooown.”

Felt: “…Running ahead?”

Sakura: “Yeees. That is whyyy we also rushed to the Castle in a great paaanic to hear the situation from everyone. It really is quite the biiind.”

It was hard to tell just how much of it to believe, given Sakura’s lack of seriousness. However, Tiga, who seemed far more capable of normal conversation compared to Sakura, did not stop nor deny her statement, but instead placed a hand on his forehead as if embarrassed by his own kin.

If it was true, then the Church of the Divine Dragon had some reckless personnel of its own.

But, even so—

Felt: “That still doesn’t explain why I was called here.”

Miklotov: “Hrm. Regarding that point, we too find it exceedingly troubling. Since Knight Reinhard happened to be present, we asked that you attend as well, Felt-sama. After all, in the dilemma we now face, Felt-sama is a concerned party.”

Felt: “…”

Having been told that it was a problem related to her, Felt narrowed her crimson eyes and licked her lips.

Even if it had taken quite the detour, it seemed as though they were finally arriving at the main topic.

The movement of the Church of the Divine Dragon regarding Crusch’s fate, the fact that this was unexpected even for the part of the Church, and the reason why Felt was called to this place where their envoys were present.

That was—

Miklotov: “The person I mentioned earlier, who contacted us on their own from the Church of the Divine Dragon… is a woman with beautiful golden hair, and crimson red eyes. Furthermore…”

Felt did not interject as Miklotov spoke these words.

The characteristics of this person were being told to her as if they were significant; Felt was not dull enough to miss what that implied.

While watching Felt's reaction, Miklotov voiced the continuation of his explanation.

Miklotov: "That person gave her name as Filóre—claiming to be the same name as the daughter of Ford Lugunica-sama, the younger brother of the King, the very girl who went missing fifteen years ago."

2

—Filóre Lugunica, daughter of Prince Ford Lugunica.

While the significance carried by that name and existence was massively important for the Kingdom, it was of even greater significance to Felt above all else.

After all, Felt's participation in the Royal Selection had not been solely decided due to her causing the Dragon Gem embedded in the insignia to shine, the act that qualified one for the Royal Selection; there was an even greater reason: the suspicion that Felt might have in fact been the missing Filóre.

As fate would have it, it had been fifteen years since Filóre had vanished as a baby.

That lined up with Felt in terms of age, and her hair and eye color were also consistent with the characteristic traits of the Royal Family of Lugunica. Of course, Felt had never thought of herself as a member of the Royal Family, and she had never attempted to take advantage of it. —However, she was not so self-centered that she could completely disregard the possibility those around her might have been expecting.

There were many in the Kingdom of Lugunica who saw in Felt the possibility that she was of the lost Royal Family.

No matter how Felt saw herself, she could not change the expectations and envy of others; such was human nature. And even without speaking of the greater picture encompassing the subjects of the Kingdom, to those who happened to be present there during the commencement of the Royal Selection—and to even Reinhard as well, it was a glimpse of hope that they cherished.

Without a doubt, it was true that the possibility of the Royal Family's survival had bestowed Felt, who originated from the Slums, with an initial blade to wield in the fight upon the stage of the Royal Selection.

And then—

Felt: "—The real Filóre who disappeared, huh?"

Felt muttered this under her breath, the situation suddenly sinking into her chest.

Indeed, no wonder such a great uproar had spread through the Royal Castle. Perhaps the possibility that Crusch had been saved by the Church of the Divine Dragon, raising real concerns about her possible withdrawal from the Royal Selection, was itself being treated as a trifling matter in the wake of that fact.

That was just how astounding the existence of the nun from the Church of the Divine Dragon who called herself Filóre was.

???: "—Felt-sama."

Suddenly, she was addressed by Reinhard, standing next to her, causing Felt's breath to catch slightly.

That appeal certainly had not caught her off-guard, but nevertheless, Felt had failed to pick up on what emotions had been contained within that voice. —No, she must admit it.

The clear turmoil stirring within Felt prevented her from picking up on Reinhard's emotions.

Felt: "…"

In the beginning, when she had been brought to the commencement of the Royal Selection by Reinhard, she held naught but strong feelings of rebellion and hostility, partly due to her life of forced confinement in the mansion after being taken there from the loot house. Ultimately, she had decided to participate in the Royal Selection due to the course of events that transpired there, including Rom-jii's intrusion. However, the reason Reinhard had brought her there in the first place, endorsing her as a candidate, must have been due to his suspicions of the survival of the Royal Family, the foundations of which had now been shaken to their very core.

They had been repudiated. —No, it was not a repudiation, they stubbornly remained as uncertainties. In addition, Felt had so far scoffed at that possibility and walked all over it.

And yet, when it was repudiated once and for all before her own eyes, a clear turmoil churned within her soul. It was not due to some desire to attain royalty.

Those who had hoped Felt was a member of the Royal Family found their expectations betrayed, a disappointment caused by circumstances beyond her control.

Felt: "…How pathetic."

Discerning the true nature of that budding turmoil, Felt was disgusted with herself.

She hated herself for always being so bold and brazen, pretending to be unshakable no matter what might happen; yet as soon as she realized that something unforeseen might have been lost, something she thought she could be free of without it bothering her at all, she panicked so disgracefully.

Gritting her teeth at how pathetic she was being, Felt forced her heavy, stiff neck to turn, somehow managing to look in the direction of Reinhard, who stood beside her.

No matter what kind of face Reinhard was making there—

Felt: “…”

Having braced herself, Felt looked up, and within her vision was a pair of eyes looking straight back at her, the azure skies captured within them, not a single bit of worry or turmoil lay there whatsoever. Even disappointment, to say nothing of dejection, was absent.

There was truly only one thing present there: the utmost trust in Felt, that was all.

Felt: “…What the hell sort of eyes are you making, huh?”

Reinhard: “In my own way, I believe they contain my unwavering loyalty to you, Felt-sama.”

Felt: “—. Hah, shut it.”

Whether he intended it in jest or in complete seriousness, Felt replied to Reinhard’s response by poking her elbow into his side as he gave a slight smile. She had no choice but to do so. What was particularly aggravating was that Reinhard’s bearing just then had made the emotions weighing on her suddenly feel so much lighter.

Felt: “No matter what, I’m me. Can’t do anything ‘cept fight back like that.”

She had needed an impetus to openly fight back against that which was obvious. By chance, that was provided by Reinhard, and despite wanting to object to that, Felt refrained from any complaint.

She had objections, but they were not bad objections. Although, she would never admit that to Reinhard.

And just like that, a definite and clear decision had immediately been made within Felt.

???: “—Knight Marcos Gildark has returned.”

Indeed, as a guard brought the news to the throne room, the expressions of all those there abruptly became tense. As Felt became alarmed by such a reaction, Reinhard leaned in to whisper in her ear, saying,

Reinhard: “It appears Commander Marcos brought the woman in question to Crusch-sama. Regardless of the right or wrong of such a remedy…”

Felt: “We’re coming face-to-face then. What a relief that it’s after I made up my mind.”

Responding to Reinhard’s whisper, Felt took a long, deep breath. Then, having Reinhard remain where he was standing next to her, she waited for a moment.

Then—

???: “—So many people have been waiting for me. The circumstances are what they are, so perhaps it’s only natural.”

Felt heard such notions from an individual as they stepped through the door of the throne room and peered inside.

Felt: “So that’s…”

Was she the one calling herself Filóre, the nun from the Church of the Divine Dragon who had marched into the Royal Castle?

Just as she had heard prior, the woman was a nun with long golden hair and crimson eyes filled with determination. Though she was boldly standing tall, she seemed uncomfortable receiving the attention of the entire room all at once. However, due to the presence of the large armored figure just behind her, she could hardly step back.

In the end, she shook her head as if in resignation, and stepping straight into the room—

???: “—Filóre-chan?”

Filóre: “Gehgeh.”

Upon taking her first step, she recognized the figure of Sakura turning and waving, and her carefully prepared expression stiffened dramatically, the color immediately draining from her face.

As it was, she had shifted her weight onto her front leg and then halted her movement, but after a brief pause, she attempted to turn around.

???: “Filóre, everyone already knows, so please behave yourself and come over here.”

Filóre: “Guh, not just Sakura, but even you, Tiga…”

Tiga: “Of course we were going to show up. Seriously, you’re just being selfish.”

Though the half-turned Filóre appeared distressed at Tiga’s appeal as he shrugged in exasperation, she also appeared resigned.

Abandoning the option of turning tail and fleeing, the girl plodded over dejectedly, her shoulders hunched, and before Tiga and Sakura, who were naturally acquaintances of hers, she took a deep breath, and—

Filóre: “Devoting ourselves in prayer for the people of the Kingdom is the true purpose of the Church of the Divine Dragon, and I merely followed that doctrine. How about that?”

Tiga: “No matter how you put it…”

Sakura: “I don’t think you’re escaping a scolding and a lectuuure.”

Filóre: “But I’m not in the wrong!”

Immediately after puffing out her chest and making a grand declaration, her bluff was shattered. Toward the nun at her wits end who raised her voice to nearly that of a shriek—toward Filóre, Felt instinctively raised an eyebrow.

The girl had a considerably different air about her compared to the first impression she gave off at a glance.

Moreover—

Felt: “You’re quite a bit taller than me. Does the difference come from the luxury you lived in as a kid?”

Filóre: “Hold up, luxury? By luxury, are you referring to me? If that’s the case, that’s a big mistake. The Church of the Divine Dragon’s motto is the spirit of charity! Most of the Church’s spirit of compassion and charity is directed outward, not inward. In other words…”

Felt: “In other words?”

Filóre: “We’re famished almost all the time!”

With her hand on her stomach, Filóre loudly complained about the Church’s righteous poverty. Felt scratched her cheek in response to the vigor and volume of her voice, and upon finishing her declaration, Filóre was smacked on the back of the head. As she turned around with an “Ouch,” standing there behind her was Tiga, who had struck her head.

Directing his eyes in Filóre’s direction, looking at her like a troublesome little sister,

Tiga: “Don’t go around flaunting our shame. It’s a secret we’d taken great pains to keep from the heart of the nation until now. You’re not planning to expose anything and everything like that, are you?”

Filóre: “Th-There’s no way I would. If I were that loose-lipped, you two…”

Sakura: “In that caaase, what about the Sacrameeent?”

Filóre: “…”

The sound of Filóre gulping in response to the questioning echoed with remarkable forte throughout the throne room.

As Tiga and Sakura both examined her face from either side, Filóre opened and closed her mouth for a moment, and then,

Filóre: “…I m-made everyone leave.”

Tiga & Sakura: “Haaah…”

Filóre: “What grand sighs! Is this… is this the thanks I get for helping others? This too, is in the scriptures! ‘Even evils perpetrated under the cover of dusk are as a bonfire at midday in the eyes of the Dragon. The conceit of being able to keep it concealed is the very darkness of delusion thou dost construct for thyself!’”

Hoisting up the thick scriptures she had hastily produced with both hands, Filóre gave her excuse.

Felt was not very familiar with it, but she took the substance of what she had said just now to be something along the lines of, “Secrets always come out in the end, so do not become overconfident in them.”

That aside, there would most likely be some complaints about the scriptures of the Church of the Divine Dragon being used as a dictionary of excuses.

???: “Knight Marcos, did all go well?”

Ignoring the representatives of the Church of the Divine Dragon arguing amongst themselves, Miklotov fished for information from the Commander of the Royal Guard who had entered the throne room alongside Filóre.

His name called and a question asked of him, Marcos responded “Sir,” with a stern look still on his face.

Marcos: “I personally accompanied her and bore witness to the power of Miss Filóre’s Sacrament.”

Felt: “Bore witness, meaning…”

Marcos: “—The wicked flames that dwelt within Duchess Crusch Karsten have entirely lost their vitality, and their influence has vanished.”

Marcos’s report caused Felt’s cheeks to stiffen with emotions she had no answer to.

Crusch had been saved; that was indeed joyous news. Yet Felt could not fully call the fact that she had been saved by the Church of the Divine Dragon joyous news.

However, just as she had prepared herself a moment ago, only those involved could have made that choice.

Miklotov: "—Hmmm, is that so?"

With the wisdom of his years, Miklotov accepted something akin to the complicated emotions Felt had experienced, then assessed Filóre's state of affairs with a single glance. Filóre raised her head to meet his gaze, and as Miklotov stroked his long beard, he continued with a "Well then,"

Miklotov: "There is much for us to discuss. Of course, there is also the matter of the Sacrament Miss Filóre has provided us proof of, but above all else…"

Filóre: "—? Was there something else?"

Puzzled, Filóre frowned as if she were completely clueless as to what Miklotov had left unspoken.

Aside from that reaction of Filóre's, Miklotov's hesitation to put it into words earlier was most likely out of consideration for Felt, who happened to be in attendance.

However—

Felt: "I don't need that sort of consideration. —Reinhard."

Reinhard: "Of course."

At Felt's command, Reinhard gently placed something in her outstretched palm as if he had known to do so.

For a moment, Felt examined the feeling of the object in her hand, and then flicked it with her finger in front of her—toward Filóre.

Filóre: "Wah, wh-wh-what? What's this?"

Quickly putting out both her hands, Filóre caught the object flying right at her. She blinked at that sudden action, to which Felt softly snorted.

Then, turning to face everyone there who had gone wide-eyed at that action of Felt's, making a show of shrugging her shoulders—

Felt: "This is what everyone here all wanted to see, right?"

Felt pointed with her thumb, and just beyond it stood the figure of Filóre, both hands enveloping that which she had received—within her hands, the insignia she received shone.

It was undoubtedly proof that she had been chosen as a Dragon Priestess by the Dragon Gem. —It was the sixth brilliant omen of light that blessed the existence of a Dragon Priestess recognized by the Dragon Gem.

VIC.1120

Chapter 4:
You’re Welcome

1

???: “The invention of a Magic Stone engine, as opposed to a steam engine, couldn’t come sooner.”

Said Subaru, his eyes focused ahead as he sat at the coachman’s seat, reins gripped. Snugly seated atop Subaru’s knees, Beatrice knitted her eyebrows at his words.

Beatrice: “…There’s another curiously odd thing you blurted out, in fact. What is a Magic Stone “engin“, I suppose?”

Subaru: “A technology that isn’t in this world yet. See, if we could use the energy from Magic Stones to create a system close to a steam engine, then maybe we’d be able to make a locomotive.”

Beatrice: ““Lowkomowtiv“?”

Subaru: “It’s kind of like an iron dragon carriage that doesn’t need a ground dragon, that can keep on running till its supply of Magic Stones run out. It can only travel across places where there’s railway tracks, so it has less liberty, but on the other hand it would make it possible to come and go from places at a substantially good pace wherever there’s rail connectivity. What do you think?”

Beatrice: “No matter what one may think, it seems to be convenient, in fact. That is, if you can close your eyes to the absurdly nonsensical parts, I suppose.”

Subaru tapered his lips in apparent displeasure at Beatrice, her reply failing to conceal her dismay.

He did think it was a fairly considerable idea, but it truly would be quite difficult to transmit the image in his head to those who had not seen the real thing. Above all, in terms of knowledge pertaining to working locomotives, Subaru was nearly just as lacking as Beatrice. If only he had been more informed about the construction of steam engines, he could have said something with more of a sense of reality.

???: "—Dodogyuuun."

Subaru: "Uh-oh, my bad my bad, Patrasche. I didn't mean any offense, especially not after you came all the way to the Empire to receive me. It was only a right-person-at-the-right-place kinda talk…"

Patrasche: "—Dodogyuuun!"

Beatrice: "Unfortunately, it seems that won't suffice to swindle her, in fact. The more you upset Patrasche, the less likely she will be to return, I suppose."

Subaru: "Now that's a situation I'd like to avoid no matter what… please don't be maaad."

Having failed to share the exact image of a locomotive, he must have transmitted that the role it would perform would intrude upon hers. Scratching his head at the objections of his beloved dragon Patrasche, Subaru adjusted his clutch on the reins once again and narrowed his eyes at the unchanging, unrelenting scenery of sand.

—After shutting down Al's attempt at the Pleiades Watchtower, Subaru set his course straight for the Royal Capital along with his group, determined to uncover the things he needed to learn no matter what, while carrying the truths that had been brought to light during the loop that had been undone.

The shock of Al's betrayal was weighty, and in order to digest that as well, the group departed from the Tower with enthusiasm crossing into the realm of bravado—however, the road to the ever-important Royal Capital was long.

After all, the journey spanned from the eastern edge to the western edge of the Kingdom of Lugunica, a distance crossing across almost the entire Kingdom.

Even borrowing the power of the energetic and exceptional

Patrasche, it appeared to take a substantial number of days, so even though on one hand a part of him braced himself, his vexation amplified on the other.

In this agonizing state of mind, even if Subaru could escape into his mind to explore ideas for new means of travel, he would probably concede them as unsalvageable halfway through.

Subaru: "If a locomotive or train did become a practical reality, I wonder how much travel time would be shortened… it should undoubtedly be able to move faster than a ground dragon without rest."

He did not have the leisure for it now, but once things calmed down, he would consider discussing it with Roswaal or Otto in a more serious caliber.

As a concept, it was similar to the coupled dragon carriages invented in the Empire, but those were based on ground dragons and relied upon the running capacity of each creature, so a Magic Stone-powered device should have a higher level of convenience.

Subaru: "If we could make it happen, I bet it would knock Abel's socks off. Just imagining him frustratedly asking me to teach him how we did it makes it start to feel more and more worthwhile."

Beatrice: "If it involves Magic Stones, then Betty may also be able to offer advice, but won't cooperate if it's for some worthless objective like getting the better of that Abel, in fact."

Subaru: "Right. Seeing Abel's sniveling mug was a worthless motive. Forget it, forget it."

Erasing away the image of the grimacing mug of Abel that surfaced in his mind with his hand, Subaru set his chin on Beatrice's temple and let out a short sigh. Beatrice registered the sigh above her head, and the solid sensation at the back of her head—the black orb hanging from Subaru's neck.

Beatrice: "Subaru, that forbidden technique—"

Subaru: "It's something that you brought to light… I'm sorry, but that's all the explanation I can give."

Beatrice: "You won't be reproached or anything, I suppose. What Betty is concerned about is the composition of that magic, and the anomalous precision of its method of target selection… it felt like a glimpse of Mother, in fact."

Subaru: "Mother… Echidna, huh."

Beatrice: "I suppose."

Beatrice nodded as Subaru recalled the Witch of Greed he had encountered in the Sanctuary.

Speaking of her detestable face, in the midst of the Great Disaster of the Vollachian Empire, he had even seen her face-to-face when Sphinx took on her appearance. In light of the depth and expanse of the scars that Witch of Greed had bequeathed, the credence of their exchanges in the Tomb was lost on Subaru by this point.

Moreover, the existence of the Witch of Greed, in contrast to the scars she had left behind all throughout the world, had been far too inordinately meticulously suppressed.

Not fading away due to the passage of time, it would have been more natural to deem it a purposeful erasure from history. —That raised a question: who was responsible?

Subaru: "It is true that Echidna ended up dying, so it's not like she did it herself. But, considering she continued perpetrating evil deeds even after death by entering and exiting people's dreams, that too becomes dubious."

Beatrice: "At least that should expectably be impossible, in fact. To freely visit people's dreams even after death should be unfeasible for even Dream Arts Users who are masters of the Dream Method, I suppose."

Subaru: "D-Dream Arts Users? Dream Method?"

Beatrice: "Magic that uses dreams as intermediary to meddle with the opponent's mind, in fact. On top of that, it is a kind of forbidden art, and its users were almost entirely eradicated, I suppose."

Subaru: "That kinda thing's definitely still out there somewhere! Interfering with the mind? Maybe the users just planted some convenient memory in people's minds that they had been eradicated and let themselves slip away."

Beatrice: "Th-That's way too pessimistic, in fact…! Ahem, anyhow, I suppose. The approach of Mother, whom you and Emilia encountered in the Tomb, may seem to apply the principles of the Dream Method, but strictly speaking, it is something entirely different, so invading the consciousnesses of living beings, like invading dreams should be undoable, in fact."

Subaru assented to Beatrice's adorable explanation, her upraised finger waving.

He was unaware of the detailed principles, but the Castle of Dreams that Echidna inhabited exclusively used the special ground known as the Tomb as its nucleus, so it did not stretch to the outside—or so it seemed.

If that were the case, then the fear of Echidna having done everything by her own power would disappear.

Subaru: "But in that scenario, it'd mean that there would be someone who acceded to Echidna's will and carried out the concealment, with the most likely candidate being Roswaal…"

Beatrice: "If it is the crime of someone close, there's no choice but to choke back tears and push him out, I suppose."

Subaru: "Like I said, we can't push him out till the Royal Selection ends, and even after the Royal Selection ends I'd like not to, if possible. Also, the one who plays the part of a pretty girl in front of me, Beatrice, actually making some secret moves in the shadows as Echidna's apostle is a development that's convention for entertainment, you know?"

Beatrice: "Betty being the final boss is a plotline that's been discarded long before, in fact. It doesn't have a fragment of convincingness or cohesiveness, a trashy idea that's just fishing for shock value, I suppose."

Subaru: "I think so too, but you're really tellin' em…"

She had no intent to entertain even the idea of her becoming Subaru's enemy even in jest. That too was evidence of the extent to which she cherished Subaru, nothing more.

All that said, assuming it was neither Roswaal nor Beatrice who went around erasing any traces of Echidna, then—

Subaru: "—The Witch Cult."

Beatrice: "…"

Beatrice faintly twitched and halted her breath. This nervous reaction by Beatrice was proof of her internal agreement with Subaru's muttering.

The Witch of Greed—no, not confined to information about only Echidna, but all of the Witches affixed with the deadly sins other than the Witch of Envy, were on the verge of having their entire existence erased down to the last traces.

And when the Sin Archbishops had all simultaneously appeared in the Watergate City of Pristella, they had shoved their respective egotistical demands onto the city for things that they wanted in exchange for the lives of the city's inhabitants. Back then, there were those like Regulus who were simply seeking to fulfill their own desires, but there were also objects of demand in the mix that would have been difficult to imagine as what the individuals personally desired.

Subaru: "On top of that, I've also heard from Otto before. No matter what part of the world, if there's something that's happened to be found with a connection to the Witch, then the Witch Cult would come to rob it… that sorta thing."

In reality, the Fortified City of Garkla, which Subaru and the others had visited in Vollachia, was said to have collapsed into annihilation in the wake of that same Regulus's sizeable rampage.

Forced to reminisce about an enemy he did not wish to recall, he felt a deep sense of revulsion.

Anyhow—

Subaru: “I feel that the destructive rampage at Pristella does support the rumors Otto had spoken about. If that’s the case, then the group’s rampages aren’t just simple terrorism by a cult group, there’s an entirely separate strategy—and that’s exactly what’s attempting to erase the Witches from this world, isn’t it?”

The Witch Cult espoused the Witch of Envy, and assented to the offer of worship to that being.

Because this cursory information had been spread as common sense, the fact that they sought to erase all traces of Witches other than the Witch of Envy might have been getting concealed.

Subaru: “Not “If you want to hide a tree, put it in a forest”, but if you want to hide a Witch then put it in the Witch of Envy episode, huh…? But, if that’s the case, then the one who created the Witch Cult would be…”

Beatrice: “—It cannot have been… Mother, in fact.”

Following the same train of thought as Subaru’s, Beatrice anticipated this conclusion and negated it.

Lips sealed shut, Beatrice’s visage as she looked onward was out of Subaru’s sight. However, imbued in her words was something far too brittle to be labelled conviction, a feeble orison.

She must have known that rationally, Subaru’s idea did conform to reason.

But what evermore forbade Beatrice from acknowledging it was the truth of the person in question being Beatrice’s creator, and family whom she had spent an invaluable spell of time with.

Subaru understood that to an aching extent, and simultaneously, it became a source of ire toward Echidna.

Subaru: “To make my adorable Beako go through something so gruelling…”

The Witch who had left Beatrice behind for four hundred years in the Forbidden Library, after commanding her to wait for That Person.

That Echidna’s true intent behind her instruction was the desire to know whom Beatrice would choose as That Person, the reason being a fearsomely wicked curiosity, was something Subaru knew. Naturally, he could not possibly reveal that to Beatrice. Nor did he intend to convey it.

To repudiate the emotions with which Beatrice cherished Echidna and then overwrite them with himself was a vulgar, pathetic thought. Beatrice could continue to cherish Echidna; all Subaru had to do was become something greater than that for her.

Subaru: “Beako, I love you.”

Beatrice: “—?! The flow of conversation changed, I suppose?!”

Love and purpose brimming over, Subaru hugged Beatrice tightly from behind. Upon his embrace, Beatrice’s solemn face turned red. This was it, exactly this.

Not to dismiss this discussion with vague undecidedness—

Subaru: “We won’t find an answer at this time or place. We need to go to the Royal Capital and… wait, this is where the conversation ends up again? Goddammit, can’t wait for the invention of the Magic Stone engine…!”

Clutching the black orb hanging by his breast, Subaru vented in annoyance.

The itinerary was yet long, the set destination of the Royal Capital yet far away—

And Subaru’s impatience would be dissolved through rather unanticipated means.

That being—

???: "—Good grief, got tired of waitin'. You're finally back."

Awaiting Subaru and the others in the post town of Mirula that they reached after crossing the sand sea was a bald giant with crossed arms as thick as logs—Rom-jii's reception, and the surprise they received from it, was where it began.

2

Beatrice: "—It is surprising that there is still a surviving member of the giants, I suppose. I had thought that just about all of them would have already died out in a similar vein to the Oni Clan, in fact."

Rom: "Unfortunately, never've I happened ta meet another giant 'side from myself. It's possible that I'm the last of the giants still kickin' in this world."

Subaru: "Seriously? Isn't that way more severe than simply being on a countdown to extinction?"

As Beatrice stared up at his huge body, the giant in question, Rom-jii, replied to her. And hearing that, Subaru furrowed his brow at the hopeless situation of the giants.

After all, if the only survivor still remaining was the ultra-elderly Rom-jii, there was no longer any hope for posterity, with extinction an inevitability. If the final survivor of the race had been younger, they might have been able to leave more threads of possibility, but,

Rom: "What, it stands ta reason that a race done servin' it's purpose would die out. The giants 'n the Oni Clan, there's no further reason ta keep 'em alive in the world here ta come. It's up ta the individuals ta live 'n perish as they please… that's just how it goes."

Subaru: "You know, I really don't like that sorta fatalistic outlook. Though, even if I say all that now, I guess it's too late to do anything about it."

Rom: "Those are some laudable things you're sayin'. Seems like you've also gone 'n learned a bit of prudence."

As Subaru poked his tongue against the interior of his cheek in frustration, Rom-jii's own cheeks bent into a smile and he clapped the former on the shoulder with his large palm.

In fact, this was the first time Subaru was getting to properly talk to Rom-jii since the day upon which the start of the Royal Selection was declared, when both of them had taken measures to sneak into the Castle.

He had heard that Rom-jii served as the brain of Felt's operation, but only upon exchanging a few words with him here after a long while did it finally begin to sink in.

Subaru: "Looking back on it, before even Beako, Rom-jii and Felt were some of the first people I met in this world, so it's somewhat deeply emotional… Though going deeper on that line of thought, I met that unc at the fruit stand before ever meeting Emilia-tan, which is a bit…"

To begin with, if he was going to start talking about the pace of his encounters, he would also have to include Tonchinkan, causing his head to act up.

Either way, sharing a reunion with an old acquaintance was something of great joy to Subaru. All the more when it came to somebody whom he had gotten to know on the very first day of his summoning to another world.

Hence—

Subaru: "—You're one of those people too, Reinhard."

???: "Thank goodness. Your conversation with Rom-jii was so lively, I thought that I had been completely forgotten about."

Subaru: "Being forgotten? You of all people? You ever experienced that sorta thing?"

Reinhard had such a sense of presence that even if his Name were to be devoured by the Authority of Gluttony, it seemed like it would be impossible to forget him. And in all likelihood, he would never find himself in the situation of having his Name eaten to begin with.

As Subaru pointed that out, Reinhard gave a wry smile as he shrugged his shoulders,

Reinhard: “Fortunately, I have not had the opportunity as of yet. And so, it is not as though I feel no burden. After all, my own actions can never be undone.”

As he spoke, Reinhard’s eyes glanced behind Subaru—towards Garfiel, standing there with an imposing air about him.

Off to the side from their reunion, Garfiel was silently casting his sharp, emerald-green eyes towards Reinhard. Basking in his gaze, Reinhard softly narrowed his own blue eyes, and,

Reinhard: “You have gotten quite a bit stronger since the last time we met. In such a short time at that, it is an incredible feat.”

Garfiel: “Tch, you’re sayin’ that so lightly. Even tho’ for me, it was a matter of levelin’ up after bein’ thrust to the brink of dyin’ countless times, the depth of yer strength keeps gettin’ more ‘n more unfathomable.”

Reinhard: “I wonder, are you not going to challenge me like you did in Pristella anymore?”

Garfiel: “Even if I tried now, there’d be no winnin’. Besides, if my amazin’ self went ‘n lost against ya on my own, that classification’d just end up causin’ trouble for Emilia-sama.”

Turning away as he clicked his tongue, Garfiel firmly held back his own combative spirit.

He was not overthinking it. In reality, since her Knight’s strength was of no match, the one who would be compared to Reinhard was the military officer of the Emilia Camp, Garfiel. If it became known that Garfiel was defeated in a head-on fight against Reinhard, even if that classification was already fully understood by society, it was entirely possible that the Camp would gain an impression of lacking strength.

Thus, Garfiel had considered all of that by himself, and held back.

Subaru: “Garfiel… you’ve grown up so much…!”

Garfiel: “Ahh?! Th’ fuck, Captain, don’t pat my head! I just said some pathetic shit ‘bout how I can’t win right now! There ain’t no reason to be praisin’ me!”

Subaru: “There is, there is, there is, there is, one thousand percent yes there is. Oi, everyone, let’s all praise Garfiel!”

Garfiel: “R-Roar!”

As Garfiel’s face shyly flushed red in embarrassment, he was surrounded by Subaru, Beatrice, Petra, and Meili as they commended him “Good, good”.

It was a reverse pattern to when they had comforted Subaru in the Pleiades Watchtower just a short while ago.

And after they finished thoroughly doting on Garfiel in such a manner—

Petra: “—So then, what business might two members belonging to Felt-sama’s Camp have with us?”

Indeed, the one to properly broach the matter at hand, was the most reliable member of their group, Petra.

With her hands on her hips, Petra’s small form was eager to play the negotiator of the Camp, giving Subaru an unanticipated sense of reliability, and filling his heart with ardent emotion.

Unexpectedly, he felt as if he sensed a glimpse of the loop that had been lost, in which she had endeavored to an unknowable extent in order to take back Subaru in the battle against Al.

Beatrice: “Wh-What’s with that heartrending expression, in fact, Subaru?”

Subaru: “It’s nothing, I’m just easily moved to tears lately. Beako, could you give me a hug?”

Beatrice: “Th-There’s no helping it, I suppose, you require much attention, in fact.”

With a reluctant face, Beatrice switched from holding Subaru’s hand to a stance of clinging to his waist. With that, Subaru refocused on the conversation playing out before his eyes.

The reason why Reinhard and Rom had come all the way out here to wait for Subaru and the others—

Reinhard: “Of course, we came to pick you up. —There are urgent circumstances transpiring in the Royal Capital. Emilia-sama was feeling rather uneasy, so Felt-sama ordered that I come here.”

Petra: “Emilia-neesama? But then why would Felt-sama…”

Reinhard: “The two of them became friends. And so, she said she would lend a hand to help her friend out.”

Meili: “O~h my, Felt-chan was played by Emilia-oneesan, wa~sn’t she now. I know the fee~ling. I might also be able to get along with Felt-cha~n.”

Hearing Reinhard’s reply to Petra’s suspicion, Meili smiled mischievously. But, from the way she spoke, it was an admission that she too had been moved by Emilia’s kindness, but it was unclear if Meili herself was aware of that. Subaru kept his mouth shut.

Moreover, Subaru was also surprised. Of course, he did not have any impression that Emilia and Felt had a poor relationship, but to think that Felt would take action for the sake of Emilia.

Subaru: “It would’ve been unimaginable back when she had first stolen her insignia…”

Rom: “I’ll tell ya this now, young’un, but spillin’ that story ta the public’d be a real trouble. If y’all were ta go spreadin’ that poor reputation, we’d also be forced ta make some plays.”

Subaru: "It'd be one thing if I had no memory of it, but that would just be suffering the consequences of my actions… though, you guys wouldn't be the only ones in trouble if the details of that incident were to come to light…"

As Rom-jii gave that warning just as a precaution, Subaru shrugged his shoulders.

The disruption of the insignia robbery in the Royal Capital was actually linked to the schemes of Roswaal who commissioned Elsa behind the scenes. Furthermore, Elsa was also entangled with Meili, so all those things falling under greater scrutiny would be more of a pain for the Emilia Camp.

To begin with, it was unthinkable that Emilia would bring up the fact that Felt had stolen her insignia at this stage. All the more if they had become friends.

Subaru: "If anything, there's also a chance that Emilia-tan has forgotten the fact that Felt previously stole her insignia… though I doubt she would've, right?"

Reinhard: "From my perspective, Emilia-sama has overcome that past to seek friendship with Felt-sama. That is what I believe."

Subaru: "Right. I also prefer Emilia-tan that way. But…"

The problem was the fact that Emilia had been driven into a situation of feeling uneasy.

As he thought about just what might have happened in the Royal Capital, Subaru suddenly realized that the cause of Emilia's current feelings might lie within himself.

That maybe, it was the effect of the "report" he had entrusted to Flam before departing the Pleiades Watchtower—

Reinhard: "No, I have also heard about Priscilla-sama, and the matter concerning Al-dono. It had caused Emilia-sama great heartache, but it was rather you all that she was worried about, Subaru. Hence, that was not the immediate cause."

Subaru: “Is that, so? That’s a reli… well it isn’t a relief, but I understand. But, if it’s not that, then what else happened?”

Rom: “—Circumstances that’re shakin’ the very bedrock of the Royal Selection, one could say.”

Everyone: “—!”

Hearing Rom-jii’s grave tone, Subaru and the others all shifted their expressions.

Circumstances that shook the foundation of the Royal Selection: to hear of such a thing was a great emergency, and the fact that Reinhard did not deny it, was proof that there was no mistake in that perception.

It was unclear whether that was because of the dropping out of a Royal Candidate as the result of Priscilla’s death, or whether there was some other factor at play, but—

Reinhard: “Concerning this issue, it is necessary for all Camps to come together to discuss. Hence, I went to pick up Rom-dono who was residing in our domain, and from there came here to pick up all of you, Subaru.”

Subaru: “Then, you must be wanting to go reconvene with Felt back in the Royal Capital as soon as possible…”

Reinhard: “Rachins and the others are also in the Royal Capital. In this situation, it was more pertinent for me to follow Felt-sama’s orders. In truth, I had wished to go pick you up at the Tower, but I wished to avoid heading into the Augria Sand Dunes without Meili’s abilities, and risk passing you by.”

Rom: “‘N so, we decided ta wait for y’all’s arrival in this town.”

And hearing Rom-jii bring it to a finish, the questions that had arisen within Subaru’s mind were settled.

Under such circumstances, Reinhard and Rom-jii were waiting for the arrival of Subaru and the others in Mirula. While he was grateful for that, he also grew frightened of what sort of issue had driven them to go to such lengths.

However—

Subaru: “I can’t afford not to ask, but time is of the essence. Let’s talk as we move.”

Reinhard: “Indeed, let us do so. There are also many things I wish to ask you, Subaru. After we parted in Pristella, the events that transpired in the Empire, to the extent of what you can say.”

Subaru: “There isn’t really anything I can’t tell you about. I’ll spill it all. I’ve also got plenty of things I wanna ask the guy with as huge a reputation as the Sword Saint.”

Reinhard: “—. So long as they are things I can answer, then by all means.”

Nodding to each other, a consensus was reached between Subaru and Reinhard.

For Subaru, who had yearned for a non-existent locomotive due to how tantalizing transportation felt, being able to borrow Reinhard’s power here was no mere lifeboat; it was nothing short of the Millenium Falcon itself.

And then, before they reembarked for the Royal Capital—

Subaru: “Oh yeah, Reinhard.”

Reinhard: “Hm? What is it?”

Subaru: “I think you probably won’t understand what I mean, but hear me out. —Thank you.”

At Subaru’s words of gratitude, as had been prefaced, Reinhard seemingly did not understand what he meant, and raised his eyebrows in surprise. And while Subaru’s lips curved into a smile at the fact that he had taken the Sword Saint by surprise,

Subaru: “I don’t really know all the details either, but I’m at least convinced that you had to go through extreme toil. So, thank you.”

Reinhard: “Nothing really comes to mind, so I wonder how I should respond.”

Subaru: “In that case, you can just say you’re welcome.”

Reinhard: “Understood. —You’re welcome.”

Subaru: “That pronunciation’s way too good.”

As Reinhard responded so to such unexpected gratitude, Subaru thanked him again and pat Beatrice on the head as she clung to his waist before commencing the preparations for their trip.

Since Reinhard would be hastening them in one go across a distance that would normally take several days, it would likely be some absolutely outrageous transport method. He had to brace his heart.

Reinhard: “…”

As he proceeded with preparations to depart with his allies, Subaru did not notice that watching over his back, as if to evaluate him, were Reinhard’s two eyes, hand placed over the hilt of the sword at his waist.

Chapter 5:
The Details of a Detour

1

—During the time Reinhard served as their method of transport, Subaru's mental preparedness had been doubly ineffective.

Reinhard: "It may feel a bit uncomfortable, but you should get used to it soon."

And, with this preface from Reinhard, he suddenly hoisted up the dragon carriage that Subaru's group was riding along with Patrasche, swiftly running into the sky—no, launching himself into it.

Subaru: "Ababababababa…!"

The scenery outside the windows rapidly passing by, and the inside of the dragon carriage which, like a visual bug, felt almost completely still in spite of that, made Subaru and Beatrice embrace each other as they shook.

Theoretically, this was not hard to understand. In short, it was the same as when a ground dragon applied its Divine Protection of Wind Evasion. The problem was that the one responsible for this display was Reinhard, a human who ran at a speed so ridiculous that it defied common sense.

???: "I've already been through this o~nce. Hopefully you guys all savor it too~."

???: "S-Still, is it really possible to get used to this?"

Quietly, Meili sat with her chin resting on her knees. With Petra fearfully clinging onto the cloak of the girl already experienced in this, Meili chuckled with a "fufu~,"

Meili: "I didn't know Petra-chan could even get sca~red, how surprisi~ng.”

Petra: “Rather than being scared, I’d say it’s more about being shocked by the occurrence of something unimaginable. The Sword Saint-sama is a lot crazier than I’d heard.”

???: “…True, haven’t heard of the previous Sword Saints bein’ this outlandish. Guess ya could say Reinhard’s special.”

Near the end of the conversation with Meili, seeing that Petra cued him to weigh in, Rom-jii replied while rubbing his head.

Even Rom-jii, whose body was crammed into the narrow seats of the dragon carriage, seemed unfamiliar with this running style of Reinhard’s, as he placed a hand on the wall for peace of mind.

Seemingly, this method of transport was not usually employed by the Felt Camp. However, this was also something that could have been considered a staggering advantage.

Rom: “If we got around this way outside of emergencies, we’d lose popularity for usin’ the power of the Sword Saint in vain. To an extent, a wanin’ of the Sword Saint’s influence is a problem for the Kingdom… if we’re careless, then forget leavin’ the country, this way of travellin’ might get banned too.”

Subaru: “Right, that joke of a Reinhard Law…”

To Rom-jii’s curled lips, Subaru spoke on the absurdity of a parallel world’s international laws.

As implied by its name, the Reinhard Law concerned only the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea, the purpose of which was to decisively forbid him from leaving the Kingdom of Lugunica. When spoken about, it seemed like a joke, but in reality, when one realized just how out of the ordinary he was, it was hard to frame as overdoing it.

Although—

Subaru: “I mean, Reinhard’s power is absurd, almost stupidly so, but I just wish the other nations would see that he doesn’t have the personality to cause needless harm.”

Rom: “Hoh, even though you’re from another camp, ya seem to value Reinhard pretty highly, no?”

Subaru: “We’re friends after all, and when everyone’s on a trip outside the country, it’s sad being the only one left at home. Something like a trip to Vollachia… nah, there’s nothing fun in Vollachia. Flop-san and Medium-san should use their influence to build at least one amusement park.”

Hopefully, by either sneaking around Abel’s gaze, or winning him over, they could somehow squander some of the Empire’s money on entertainment; he hoped that they could make a big amusement park.

Beatrice: “Garfiel, what are you looking at, I suppose?”

Garfiel: “Nuthin’, was just thinkin’ that if my amazin’ self could do somethin’ like this, I could make stuff way easier for the Captain ‘n the rest of ya. Like how “Gibnevra’s suited for different jobs,” it feels like my amazin’ self wouldn’t be able to do it no matter what.”

While Subaru was imagining his construction plans for Vollachia Land, Beatrice struck up a conversation with Garfiel, who expressed his vexation by the gnashing of his fangs.

Certainly, he could do something similar to Reinhard with pure brute strength, but without a functioning Divine Protection of Wind Evasion, the comfort level of the trip would have been hellish. In the first place, treating his sworn little brother like a work horse, even in an emergency, would have made Subaru feel bad.

Subaru: “Ah, so that’s why we haven’t put Reinhard’s running style to use. This gives a bad feeling for sure.”

Reinhard: “I am happy you understand. I would also feel awkward about this if it were not an emergency.”

Subaru: “You’ve joined the conversation like it’s perfectly natural…”

As if it were natural, Reinhard's voice rang out; it was the effect of his Divine Protection of Telepathy, which Subaru had once experienced in Pristella.

Apparently, people aside from Subaru were hearing his voice this time, so Petra and the others were unable to conceal their surprise at Reinhard's voice suddenly resounding in their brains. Though, Meili seemed to have gained a tolerance for the Divine Protection of Telepathy, and so continued to look smug.

At any rate—

Subaru: "For now, my surprise at Reinhard's running style has dissipated, but I still have to process the other shocking revelation. Is it true? —About the entry of this Filóre girl?"

Reinhard: "Yes, there is no falsehood in that fact."

Though he could not see it with his eyes, Subaru could practically feel Reinhard's nod of affirmation, was shocked by the truth that had been revealed, and once again took a deep breath, then swallowed.

While Subaru and the others had been in the Pleiades Watchtower, there had been an astonishing development in the Royal Capital—the Church of the Divine Dragon had made contact, and a woman who could make the insignia glow, known as Filóre, had made her entrance on the stage.

The organization that, up until now, had been keeping a low profile had come forward with a fact that could not be ignored in the Royal Selection. Naturally, as the Knight of the Royal Selection Candidate Emilia, Subaru was greatly troubled.

However—

Subaru: "—That Crusch-san was saved is great news."

The great tremor that ran through the Royal Selection was an incident that he could not escape hearing about, but among the topics that had been brought to his ears, the one that mattered most to Subaru was the recovery of Crusch.

In Pristella, within the Sin Archbishop of Lust's malignant clutches, Crusch's body had been burdened with a curse that brought incurable pain. For a long time, he had deeply lamented that he had not been able to protect Crusch while fighting on the same battlefield as her; a persistent thorn in his side.

Subaru: "Seriously, if I could've taken all that stuff off Crusch's shoulders, then I would've been happy to do so even if my entire body turned completely black."

Lust's blood had been poured into her, and Crusch had been saddled with a blight too terrible to even cast a glance at. Having been baptized in that same woman's blood, however, Subaru suffered a very different amount of damage than Crusch.

Of course, the effects were felt over the entire body, but unlike Crusch, who continued to suffer in pain, the worst he experienced was his arm and leg being covered in what could only have been considered a creepy, deformed tattoo. That, and the fact it was completely gone after that time his arm was blown off, in addition to the feeling of surprise he felt whenever he remembered the effect on his leg when he was on the toilet or in the bath.

Somehow, Subaru was able to alleviate Crusch's suffering in exchange for his own suffering. So, saving Crusch that way had been one possibility—

Subaru: "Crusch-san… didn't agree to that."

After the battle in Pristella, ever since she refused his proposal to take on her curse, stating that she could not burden Subaru further as he would soon be travelling to the Pleiades Watchtower, her physical condition had always been at the back of his mind.

That she was healed was undoubtedly good news as far as Subaru was concerned.

However—

Rom: "What's hard to stomach is that the very people it matters to the most can't just celebrate her recovery."

As Rom-jii's grave words indicated, Crusch's recovery—that it was carried out at the hands of the Church of the Divine Dragon, would have been a great regret for her and her companions.

Subaru understood that much. And because he understood, he could not say anything recklessly. It would have been frivolous to say something like "Even if it came at the cost of a major disadvantage in the Royal Selection, what matters most is that she is still alive."

Subaru: "But now this Filóre person has appeared, and she was able to prove her qualification as a Priestess by making the insignia glow. That can't be good, right?"

Meili: "That's ri~ght. Even though the number of Royal Selection Candidates finally dropped by one and a spot opened up, the fact that it was immediately filled will set us right back to the beginni~ng."

Petra: "…Meili-chan, if you don't pick your words properly, then I'll also get angry. It's for that reason we went to the Tower in the first place."

Meili: "Well, the helmet guy messed all that up… Ahh, don't get angry. Yeah yea~h, I'm so~rry."

Remembering her role as a little devil, Meili voiced her insensitive jokes, giving an insincere apology to the scathing gaze of Petra. After a small sigh at Meili's behavior, Petra continued with an "Anyways,"

Petra: "Meili-chan's cheeky tongue aside… what's concerning isn't the issue of the open spot. It's just, this Filóre lady has golden hair and crimson eyes, right?"

Subaru: "That's… what they're saying. It's…"

Petra: "—Those are the characteristics of the Lugunican Royal Family, aren't they? Also, I'm sure that was the name of the princess who was kidnapped fifteen years ago."

Rom: "—Filóre."

With a finger on her lips, Petra stated what knowledge she had. After Petra finished speaking, in the pause for the crucial word that was born, a different person took over. —Rom-jii.

Rom-jii attracted the gazes of everyone in the carriage; however, he dropped his gaze to his knees,

Rom: "Fifteen years ago, the Crown Prince's daughter who disappeared was called Filóre. That's the same name as the nun from the Church of the Divine Dragon currently in the Castle."

Beatrice: "And, they are saying that this nun made the insignia glow in front of everyone in the Castle, in fact. If that's true, then it makes sense that the trouble it creates could shake the Royal Selection, I suppose."

It was a truth which sent deep tremors throughout the Lugunican Royal Castle; after sharing the context for such an event, the dragon carriage was enveloped in a quiet air.

However, Subaru remained firm in continuing to not read the room and asserted himself with a "Listen."

Subaru: "I'm not really convinced by all that."

Reinhard: "—What do you mean by "convinced"?"

Subaru: "I'm finally starting to get used to talking with your voice in my head, but anyways, this is what everyone is concerned about, right? This person named Filóre from the Church of the Divine Dragon, she could possibly be the lost Lugunican royal. The fact that the insignia shone seemed like proof of that royalty."

Petra: "Yeah, that's right. You aren't convinced by that?"

Subaru: "Nah, after all, wasn't it the same for Felt?"

Unfortunately, even though it followed his mortifying memories of the day the Royal Selection commenced, Subaru had not heard Felt's declaration of her beliefs. Before that, he had been expelled from the throne room for his great blunder.

However, even though he had not been present, everything that happened there and what Felt had said were all shared with him later.

Originally, the existence of a fifteen-year-old royal being revealed in that place should have caused questions to surface.

Subaru: “So, the same was the case with Felt. Well, in my opinion, the existence of a princess who was secretly taken away and grew up among the common people in the streets is a more exciting twist, so I’d like it if it ends up as Felt being the royal.”

Rom: “Hm, I see. —But, if it’s as ya imagine ‘n Felt is the Kingdom of Lugunica’s princess, then the Royal Selection will be settled with her win. Are ya okay with that?”

Subaru: “Eh?”

Toward Rom-jii’s single closed eye, Subaru’s gaze widened.

He thought it might have been a bad joke, but it was not taken back. Further, other than Subaru, everyone seemed to agree with Rom-jii’s thoughts.

Unexpectedly, he was in the minority—no, having become entirely isolated, Subaru became upset.

Subaru: “No no no, why?”

Garfiel: “‘Course it’s like that, what do ya mean “Why?”. In the first place, the reason we’re doin’ this Royal Selection is ’cause of the Royal Family dyin’ out, right? But, if that ends up not bein’ true, then shouldn’t the only survivin’ royal become King?”

Subaru: “I-It’s a hereditary thing?”

Reinhard: “I wish you would choose your words more tactfully, but that is what is being said.”

The two martial artists of the group, Garfiel and Reinhard, rebuked him, and Subaru realized the difference in perception between him and the people of this world as he let out a sigh.

For Natsuki Subaru, who was born and raised in Japan, the representative of a country was decided not by lineage, but was naturally elected based on other criteria. The circumstances of the Royal Selection were another factor that influenced him, as it was similar to the system of elections that Subaru was familiar with.

Instead, for the people of this other world, the prince would have naturally been next in line after the present King, and the child of that prince-made-King would come after him.

So, if Felt was confirmed to be a royal, then the natural progression was that Felt would have been next in line to the throne and the Royal Selection would lose its very purpose—.

Subaru: “So that means it would’ve been really bad if Felt was confirmed as royalty!”

Rom: “Since it stopped at the point of bein’ just a suspicion, the Royal Selection was given the go-ahead. With that said, can ya still diligently serve as the young lady’s Knight while holdin’ your head high?”

Subaru: “Stop! I was just a little unfamiliar with common sense here! We have Beako, Petra, and Garfiel who are all growing up to be smart kids!”

Beatrice: “Allow yourself to be corrected, the pretty and charming Betty is the most grown up one here, in fact.”

Embraced on Subaru’s lap, Beatrice puffed out her chest. As he watched Subaru pat her head, Rom-jii patted his own head with a staggered look on his face.

He understood, it had certainly just been a discrepancy in perception, and he had shown some shameful behavior. However, in spite of that, Subaru’s doubts were still not cleared.

Subaru: “I stumbled a little, but my doubts are still unresolved. In the case that their royalty is confirmed, I understand that the Royal Selection would become meaningless, but ultimately, there will be the same doubts as to whether Filóre-chan-san is the real deal, just as there was for Felt. And if that's the case…"

Reinhard: "—Whichever one is true royalty must be verified."

Subaru: "…"

Perhaps those words were intended to have been as devoid of emotion as possible. Because of that, what Reinhard left unspoken cut as sharp as a blade.

Subaru exhaled, letting the meaning of those words seep into his brain. —Felt and Filóre; it needed to be verified which one was real.

Rom: "There're only suspicions with no conclusive evidence, but the Royal Selection's still continued up 'till now. But, since two Candidates have appeared who may be part of the Royal Family, then naturally, they can't be left as-is. As for those who are holdin' malicious intent, I'm also afraid of the possibility that they might've infiltrated the Royal Selection."

Subaru: "Malicious intent… whichever one ends up being true royalty doesn't automatically mean that the other one is evil. Maybe they just coincidentally had golden hair and crimson eyes…"

Beatrice: "It can't have been a coincidence, those are traits unique to the Royal Family, I suppose."

Subaru: "But! Didn't the insignia shine for both of them?!"

As both Rom-jii and Beatrice gave logical explanations, Subaru grew fervid. He was only able to argue from an emotional point of view.

In the first place, Subaru could not explain why he became so passionate.

Simply, if meeting Reinhard and Rom-jii when he was first summoned factored into his fondness for them, then the same was true for Felt. As for Felt's current position and efforts, he did not want them to be for nothing just because she was not of the Royal Family.

Furthermore, this Filóre that he had not even met yet was being made out as a bad person, and he did not want to accuse her of being a schemer and blindly curse her.

Above all—

Subaru: “If they really wanted a member of the Royal Family to take over so badly, then when Felt appeared, regardless of the circumstances behind the Royal Selection or the Royal Family, why didn’t they do a DNA test or something to check? By starting the Royal Selection without doing that, Emilia, and so many others…”

Beatrice: “Subaru…”

As Subaru bit his lip and suppressed his voice, Beatrice, who sat on his lap, grew anxious. At the feeling of a hand gently holding onto his, Subaru tightly closed his eyes, taking a deep breath. Nevertheless, the violent emotions in his beating heart refused to calm down.

Emilia, Felt, Crusch, Anastasia, and Priscilla; they had all put their beliefs, and even lives on the line in order to compete in the Royal Selection.

That an unexpected interruption would butt in was an unacceptable twisting of the premises.

Subaru: “If that happens…”

Beatrice: “If that happens, what will you do, in fact?”

Subaru: “With Reinhard’s help, maybe we could make an appeal for the Royal Selection to go on, or something…”

Reinhard: “I see.”

Rom: “No, ya don’t see! Don’t go ‘round sayin’ such terrible things! You as well, impulsively rilin’ up the Sword Saint, what would ya do if he actually followed through with that?!”

Garfiel: “If that happens, then my amazin’ self will also jump on board!”

Petra: “Garf-san, things are getting complicated now, so could you calm down? Please?”

Subaru’s bitter words as he was at a loss on what to do were met with vehement opposition by Rom-jii and Petra. A battle of protest between being active and remaining passive burst forth, as Petra glared at Garfiel, who withered away with a “Gawr…”.

But, by no means was it all entirely a joke. —No, Subaru was actually quite serious. If he had that level of resolve, then he would show his spirit as a Knight to the Royal Selection Candidate he was dedicated to.

Subaru: “There’s so much to do when we get to the Royal Capital…! Geez, I feel like I’ve just been restlessly moving around for the past six months now…”

Beatrice: “That is nothing, I suppose. Betty feels like she’s been moving nonstop for eleven and a half years now, in fact.”

Subaru: “Don’t say weird stuff like that, it’s messing with my head…”

Subaru’s banter was met by even more outrageous banter from Beatrice. Horrified by her words, Subaru lamented the scale and number of problems waiting for them at the Royal Capital.

He was worried about Emilia, who had personally encountered the cause for their concerns firsthand, and he wanted to visit Crusch, whose body had recovered. He had to pay his respects to this Filóre and personally interrogate the traumatized higher-ups about the status of the Royal Selection. Then there was the matter of the Al-orb that hung around his neck; he needed to investigate the various reasons that led to his sudden outburst.

But, for the time being, what needed to be dealt with—

Reinhard: “Subaru, we’re arriving.”

Subaru: “Seriously, that was crazy. Sorry for making you take the scenic route.”

As he was shifting his focus, Reinhard's report came in with great timing.

As one would have imagined from the scenery passing by at high speeds, he had been moving extraordinarily fast. Cecilus moved faster if one were purely speaking in terms of speed, but unfortunately, he most likely did not possess the strength to carry a dragon carriage, so it seemed that the Cecilus running style would not bear any fruit.

If it was just one person, then maybe he could imitate it by carrying them on his back—while he was thinking such, he was taken aback as the reality of the scenery outside the window had truly set in.

With the high-speed run coming to a halt, the dragon carriage slowly lowered to the ground. That was to say, they had arrived at their destination. And as if to prove it—

???: "—What… in the world is this?!"

Subaru: "…"

Suddenly, the moment he heard that voice, Subaru quickly rose to his feet and jumped out of the dragon carriage whilst carrying a surprised Beatrice, who let out a "Nkyaa!"

Before him was Reinhard, who had run whilst carrying the dragon carriage without breaking a sweat, and Patrasche who appeared full of tension after being carried by said Reinhard.

With the ridiculous appearance of the dragon carriage in her eyes, standing in front of the door of the nostalgic Roswaal manor was a blue-haired—

Subaru: "Uh!"

Beatrice: "Subaru?! Wh-wh-wh-what's wrong, I suppose?!"

Without thinking, Subaru knelt down and clutched his chest, bringing down a shocked Beatrice with him. In a panicked flurry, Beatrice whacked his head and shoulders while she was at his mercy, but Subaru's heart cried out at the wonderful sight before him.

Because, standing in front of the Roswaal manor, greeting Subaru and the others was—

Subaru: “That oh-so-familiar look of yours, I just realized how precious it truly was…”

???: “…That’s just how you are, no matter when or where we meet, huh?”

Saying this, with an elegant face, simultaneously disgusted and relieved, and in a maid uniform—indeed, Rem, in a maid uniform, sighed.

2

Capitalizing upon Reinhard’s travel method, Subaru had requested to drop by the Roswaal manor in the midst of their journey to the Royal Capital.

The purpose went without saying: to have Rem present when reacquiring the Memories from the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, Roy Alphard, which was one of the reasons why they were en route for the Royal Capital.

Subaru: “I don’t expect the discussion with Gluttony to go so harmoniously, but that Al must’ve drawn it out one way or another. Then there’s no reason to think that we can’t do it. On top of that, I’ve already missed the scene of Ram and Rem’s reunion. If I let the return of Rem’s Memories slide this time, then I’ll be beyond recovery…!”

To this powerful beseechment of Subaru’s akin to shedding tears of blood, Reinhard awarded his approval with not a second of displeasure hinting on his face, despite surely wanting to return to Felt as quickly as possible.

There was nothing to say but that he was truly a good friend. Subaru would also like to take up any request coming from Reinhard, but it was certainly dubious whether he would readily nod in assent to a request of taking a roundabout detour of hundreds of kilometers with a dragon carriage on his shoulders.

However, Reinhard had in reality just pulled that off.

Furthermore, that was not all that Reinhard had taken upon himself—

Subaru: "—Sorry for making you come along for all this."

Reinhard: "No, I don't mind. Moreover, even though it escapes my realization, I have also sustained the devastation begotten by the Authority of the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony. I was made to forget one friend, at the very least."

Subaru: "Ah… Which reminds me, he apparently said that he'd turn being forgotten around into a good opportunity to challenge you, Reinhard. He can win now that you don't know the skills up his sleeve, kinda thing."

Reinhard: "That is… something to look forward to, in all honesty."

His brows slightly upraised, Reinhard then smiled in true delight as Subaru watched with a sideward gaze, internally apologizing to Julius for having started a fire by saying things that were unnecessary.

Perhaps, he may have just crushed the possibility of winning that might have existed. But, he could also envisage the possibility of Julius finding it unfair that he would be the only one who had knowledge of skills up the opponent's sleeve, and rather progressively reveal his hand. So, any apology besides internally was deferred.

—To make such piddling thoughts rush, was how heavy the atmosphere of this place was.

Subaru: "…As you'd expect, the Prison Tower lives up to its name."

A strangely chilly sweat began to trickle down Subaru's forehead as he murmured.

He was not panicking, nor had he come running. Yet, the perspiring and dripping icy sweat was Subaru's body responding with rejection to this space.

In the uppermost strata of the Royal Capital of Lugunica, this stone spire constructed in the vicinity of the Royal Castle functioned as a prison where the premier criminals of the Kingdom were incarcerated. Naturally, in order to ensure none of the captives could easily meet with anyone, all isolation cells were sealed shut with an iron door.

It was not in the style of jails one would see in manga where prisoners would be behind steel bars; as Subaru stepped inside, he tasted a 7:3 ratio of relief and evasion.

Subaru: "The folks over at the Gladiator Island were criminals just like criminals would be, but they were more clear-cut scoundrels…"

It would not be an apt portrayal of the characteristics of the nation, but the crimes committed by Hiain, Weitz, Idra, or the others who had been his comrades on the Gladiator Island Ginunhive were based upon violence without malice. There were occasionally those in the mix who had been thrown into slavery without pardon or mercy like Hiain, but even those who were deemed to be so-called serious offenders were only differentiated by the extent of their violence, minor or major.

On the other hand, the aura of the Prison Tower that incarcerated the criminals of Lugunica had a malodor of blood that Subaru could trace on his skin, entirely unlike the Gladiator Island with which he was familiar.

Subaru: "Does this place have a high proportion of captured Witch Cultists, after all?"

Reinhard: "That's right. Based on the fact that a principally large number of their activities happen in Lugunica, that summation is correct. In fact, Wrath is also imprisoned in the underground of this place."

Subaru: "The underground… I hope Gluttony is kept at a good distance apart."

Reinhard: “You can be doubly as sure. There’s also the difference in the circumstances of their capture, but none can heedlessly come close to Wrath. Including the other prisoners as well, you see.”

The Authority of the Sin Archbishop of Wrath, Sirius Romanée-Conti, was something like mind contamination through engulfment in her words or moods, crescively infecting the atmosphere. Considering its influence, it would be impossible to say her hazardousness had been ridden of, even after forbidding her movement.

In fact, it seemed as though part of the repugnant presence wafting inside this Prison Tower was conceivably coming from the Sin Archbishop of Wrath.

Subaru: “I’ve got a physiological revulsion inside me, but before long, I may need to speak with her as well.”

Reinhard: “When that happens, do reach out to me. I will accompany you the same way as this time.”

Subaru: “That’s reassuring. Counting on you, for real.”

Oh, such reassurance from Reinhard as he knocked his chest and bore it upon himself. However, Sirius’s Authority was also something that might invert the results of Reinhard’s strength. Careful handling was requisite.

Anyhow, she was not the reason for Subaru and company’s call onto the Prison Tower. Unfortunately, Sirius shall feast on the chilling air of the underground for now.

In lieu—

???: “—This way.”

So said the Prison Tower guard who was leading their way, as he pointed to one of the doors. A man with potent nervousness and professionalism reflected upon his face in equal part, to whom Subaru nodded before locking his eyes onto the door.

A door depressing to even look at, transmitting a sensation of brumal gloom. —Beyond this door lay the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, imprisoned.

Subaru: “Even so, he’s in a state identical to the Al-orb, so it’s dubious whether he himself is conscious of the situation or not.”

Shedding light on his own experience of when he had been sealed within the black orb, all he felt was an indescribable sensation akin to being submersed in lukewarm water, unable to move.

In an environs where even maintaining a clear consciousness was insoluble, Beatrice’s diligent constitution and industrious gallantry in elucidating the forbidden technique’s construct for Subaru was something for which he wished to confer onto her the Annual Subaru Award, but it seemed as though the list of nominees alone would fill his hands, so he would rather keep deliberating his deliberations.

Beatrice: “Subaru? Why are you squeezing Betty’s cheeks, I suppose?”

Subaru: “Well, I can’t give you the Annual Subaru Award right away, so I thought I’d give you an expression of affection instead…”

Beatrice: “After this business is finished, you can do as you like, so focus on what is in front of your eyes right now, in fact.”

His forlorn skinship pierced through, Subaru tapered his lips at Beatrice’s sober reprimand, and with a “That’s right”, swallowed his breath.

Beatrice at the front gate, Reinhard at the rear gate—that was the best formation Subaru had come up with for paying Gluttony a visit at the Prison Tower. Truthfully, he would have liked to have the affiliated Rem also stationed in presence here, but he did not consider it feasible in any fashion until the first attempt at discussion had gone over well.

His assumption was that persuading, or coercing, Gluttony would require a tenacious attempt.

Subaru: “After all, he’s been fastened with Yin Magic, so Beako is especially indispensable.”

Beatrice: “You can entrust it to Betty, I suppose. And, if upon being unfastened the opponent immediately gets frenzied, Sword Saint, you will have to clobber him down, in fact.”

Reinhard: “Yes, I accept. I will not let him lay a finger on you or Subaru. Please rest assured.”

Subaru: “That does assure me a lot, for real. And with that…”

Setting his hopes on the strength of his far-too-dependable reinforcements, Subaru nodded to the guard and bid him open the door’s lock. As the guard steadily opened the door, Subaru matched its progression with tightened fists.

—Inside the Tower, imbued in scant light, in the reaches of an isolation cell that felt particularly dusky, imprisoned was Roy Alphard, fastened with Yin Magic in a form akin to a monolith. They shall awaken Roy, and force him to vomit forth Rem’s Memories, along with the Names and Memories of all the countless victims.

To exchange words with Sin Archbishops would surely be a battle that would scrape off one’s own sanity, but if a definite reward lay ahead of it, then Subaru shall steadfastly—.

Subaru: “—ah?”

After holding his breath in resolution, a gasp now unwittingly escaped from Subaru.

His eyes adjusting to the caliginous, dim light, the spectacle within the isolation cell was not what Subaru had prevised. What was supposed to await them was Roy Alphard, embedded in a monolith shaped like a dark slate, his condition akin to a preserved specimen.

However, ahead was an entirely unforeseen spectacle.

Everybody: “…”

Subaru and the others froze, oblivious to its import, but it was Reinhard who gently shifted him aside by his shoulders and stepped into the cell. Beatrice was right beside him, her entire body reclined onto Subaru as they huddled close—no, she was the one propping Subaru up.

For all strength absconded Subaru's legs, verging upon collapse even now.

With Subaru nearing collapse, and Beatrice supporting him as his backdrop, Reinhard entered the interior of the cell and observed that which had been scattered about the chilly prison floor, shaking his head side to side.

He turned around, to say.

Reinhard: "—It is unfortunate, but he is dead."

By Reinhard's feet as he imparted this, was the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony—Bizarre Eating, Roy Alphard, his heinously cruel corpse, limbs torn off, his body cleaved apart and severed into fragments, turned over; unraveled there was this terrible spectacle.

Chapter 6:
Instantaneous Water Heater

1

Pandemonium arose within the Prison Tower for a moment, people with altered expressions restlessly circling about from left to right.

Watching this scene from afar, Subaru rested his spine onto a rampart slightly distant from it all, hugging his knees.

Subaru: "…"

Setting his forehead onto his curled knees, Subaru released a deep sigh.

Far too many shocking things had happened. That naturally applied to sighting a gruesome corpse without any prior preparedness of his heart, but to think that this cadaver could possibly have been—

???: "—Are you alright?"

Subaru's face was buried in his knees when that voice addressed him, making him slowly uplift his head. There, he saw Rem, her expression bedimmed by anxiety.

The girl crouched right beside him, peering at Subaru's face, and used the handkerchief in her grasp to wipe his dispirited visage. The faintly moist handkerchief felt cool, and a sigh escaped Subaru with a "My bad", chaperoned by a sense of salvation.

Rem: "There's no need to apologize… It would seem, you saw something quite terrible inside."

Subaru: "That's… right. I also didn't want you to see him, so there's that, but I'm glad we kept you waiting outside just in case, Rem. You didn't need to see something like that, Rem."

Rem: "Please don't be so overly protective. I witnessed many casualties in the Vollachian Empire. A few more at this point wouldn't…"

Subaru: "I get it. But if you don't absolutely have to come into contact with it then I'd like you to not. If you're trying to save someone and end up letting them die because of your insufficient strength or something, those kinds of situations can't be helped… but this kinda stuff, it's the type of death that absolutely nothing good can come out of coming into contact with."

Even Subaru would not repudiate the existence of deaths that were meaningful and significant, or deaths as consequence of persisting in one's convictions.

Would he repudiate even that, then he would not have silently seen off Priscilla.

However, the death in the watchtower that he had witnessed just before—the gruesome, appalling death plight of Gluttony Roy Alphard, was far removed from any such ilk of nobility; an unsightly and repulsive thing.

There was no decent meaning in plundering the life of another, and furthermore desecrating a corpse to such a degree.

It could have been part of a malevolent scheme, or perhaps a vehement rage that eluded satisfaction unless it tormented even the cadaver bereft of a soul—he was a Sin Archbishop who would have purchased hatred as a matter of course, but nobody deserved this cruel a manner of death.

Subaru: "Shit… hk."

Nausea scourging the pit of his stomach, Subaru clicked his tongue in frustration.

It was rage directed toward the one who had ripped Roy's limbs and torn him apart, and at the same time, chagrin at once again losing the key to the resolution of the Authority of Gluttony, whose solution had finally seemed to be within his grasp.

Quite honestly, he did not wish to ponder it. —That perhaps if Subaru and Reinhard had not taken a detour after meeting up, and had instead hastened directly to the Royal Capital, they may have found Roy still alive.

And ultimately, Subaru had the power to verify that for certain. In fact, if it had been the Subaru from the Empire, with his mentality from when his body had been shrunken, he surely would have enacted that without any hesitation.

But—

Subaru: "—Al…"

Clutching the Al-orb which dangled from his neck, Subaru bit down on the inside of his cheek.

Hypothetically, even if Subaru were to lose his life now and Return by Death, his most recent restart point was in the Pleiades Watchtower, just before sealing Al away with Ol Shamak. There was also the possibility that his restart point had shifted forward, but based on his current experience, that was the latest update.

—And, to return once more to that time frame, and to repeat the moment in which it was necessary to preemptively shut down Al before he could set his plan into motion, was not something Natsuki Subaru was capable of.

Subaru: "…"

It was not that it was not a viable option. Nor was it a restriction on the part of Ol Shamak.

Simply, Natsuki Subaru lacked the courage to return to that scene and face Al once more. If he were to fail in stopping Al, all the while hoping that it might be possible to change his mind through conversation, it might be Subaru who ended up getting sealed all over again.

Were that to happen, Subaru's failed resolution would end up being entrusted to his allies once more. In order to prevent that, Subaru refrained from manifesting a short-tempered Return by Death.

However, that would mean that Rem, that the victims of Gluttony would—it happened just when he began to think that.

Rem: "…Once again, you're trying to shoulder all the responsibility on yourself."

Suddenly, upon Subaru's hand which clutched the Al-orb, Rem placed her own.

Fixing her gaze straight ahead at Subaru's face as his breath caught in surprise, Rem narrowed her pale-blue eyes, and,

Rem: "I'll tell you this now. —Please, don't make it your own responsibility to recover my Memories. The matter of my Memories is my own problem… it's troubling that you take every last thing without exception, and carry it upon your back as if it's your own problem."

Subaru: "—Hk, no, that's not it. You've got it all wrong. I have to get your Memories back, no matter what…"

Rem: "Like I said, that's all wrong. Why is it that for a problem that's mine, you're the one who's going through the most headache? That's something for me to worry about. It doesn't belong solely to you."

Subaru: "That's…"

Eyes darting about, Subaru lost the ability to say anything before Rem's gaze.

What flashed through his mind were the chills of that moment in which he had thought his life was over, back when Rem had spoken the words "You are not a hero" to him in the Fortress City. Just like that time, he thought he might end up being deprived of his privilege to struggle for the sake of Rem—

Rem: "…Please, don't give me that wet puppy dog look."

Subaru: "Huh?"

Rem: "No, that was too much of an overstatement. A drenched puppy dog would still be cute, so you look more like a wet… a wet flying dragon, or something."

Subaru: "…Though, I'm way more open to being treated as cool rather than something cute."

Rem: "It was not a compliment. Also, please do not misunderstand."

With Subaru confused as to what said misunderstanding was, Rem began to collect her words after the passing of a moment. Then, she prefaced with "Alright?",

Rem: "I have a general grasp on the situation. The person who was being held in this Tower… somebody who had some sort of connection to Spica-chan, would have been the first step to regaining my Memories. But, that person died, causing you to be immensely frustrated… All the while, you are leaving me, the person most affected, off to the side."

Subaru: "—. When you put it like that, it makes me sound like an incredibly selfish guy."

Rem: "It seems like you have finally gained awareness of your current position."

Rem plainly and gently guided Subaru along towards comprehension. As he heeded her words, some leeway returned to Subaru's respiration, after he had felt backed up against the wall all on his own.

And perhaps having perceived that change in his expression, Rem's eyes smiled in relief,

Rem: "Even I am in low spirits. Right on the brink of my Memories possibly returning… but, witnessing you there in a state of frustration greater than even my own, I did not have any time to be feeling down."

Subaru: "Umm, I'm glad that you didn't have to feel down, Rem."

Rem: "Hah? Even though you were feeling down instead, and making the rest of us worry?"

Subaru: “I’m terribly sorry~!”

Basking in Rem’s stern gaze, Subaru clutched his head and apologized.

He never would have thought that he would be treated as a thief who stole her right to feel saddened. But, that was also what Subaru truly wished at heart. Subaru believed it would be best if Rem, Emilia, and everyone else never had the time to be in low spirits for the rest of their lives.

Rem: “The fact that it seems like you’re thinking that it would be fine if you were the only one who ever felt down, is unpleasant.”

Subaru: “Rem…”

Rem: “I think you have a bad habit of believing that everything is always only your fault whenever something goes awry. So, you’re also trying to find solutions all by yourself… would you stop it already?”

Subaru: “…So what you’re saying is, that I shouldn’t worry about things all by myself?”

Rem: “That is what I have been saying from the start.”

Subaru: “Have you?! Well, I guess you might have. Yeah, you have. You have been saying it. What an idiot I am for not noticing the things you’ve been saying! Stupid, stupid!”

Before Rem, who abruptly averted her gaze, Subaru smacked his own head repeatedly. As he hit himself, he felt a separate sense of guilt welling up in his mind.

After all, Rem had called out to Subaru like this out of pure concern for him. And yet, because Subaru did not face her properly, and failed to receive Rem’s thoughtfulness head-on, he had ended up making her say things that did not need to be said.

Subaru: “I’m sorry. Even though I brought you out here with such enthusiasm, I ended up causing you premature joy.”

Rem: “I don’t find that to be your responsibility. Only…”

Subaru: “Only?”

Rem: “Spica-chan will be forced to carry an unnecessary burden.”

The Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, ones who named themselves so, Ley Batenkaitos and Roy Alphard—Gourmet and Bizarre Eating, with the demise of this duo, there was only one individual yet subsisting who was endowed with the right over their Authority, that being Spica.

That was to say, the expectation to safely regain the Names and Memories eaten by Gluttony that shall not return all the more at this juncture, was set onto Spica’s shoulders.

Rem seemed uneasy about exerting that kind of pressure onto Spica, but—

Subaru: “I don’t think Spica will find it to be an unnecessary burden… But, let’s contact Abel and ensure that there’s proper security around Spica. Tell Ceci to be vigilant as well. Putting aside whether Ceci will be able to.”

Rem: “—Yes.”

It was a tragedy that had befallen the body of Gluttony. There was no certainty whether or not the same threat would advance toward Spica; Subaru shared the worry and anxiety that Rem harbored and decided to direct this exhort towards Vollachia. He did not wish for any intrusion to impede upon Spica, who remained in Vollachia, having determined what she ought to do.

He must use any means possible to that end, no matter how overly protective he was called.

???: “—Sorry to keep you waiting.”

As Subaru and Rem’s conversation arrived at a brief terminus, approaching them with one hand lightly upraised was Reinhard, exiting the Prison Tower's interior. Receiving the duo of Reinhard with Beatrice at his side, Subaru hastily stood up as he dusted off his behind.

Subaru: "Reinhard, how's the inside? That Sirius…"

Reinhard: "Fortunately, if that is the correct thing to say. I was nearly fully certain, but she who is imprisoned in the underground is unharmed. The isolation cells of the Prison Tower are all respectively independent, so it seems she was unaware that Gluttony had even been apprehended in the same tower. And it is not just her. No other prisoners were harmed."

Subaru: "Sirius is unharmed, and so are the other prisoners… it's definitely dubious to call it good news, but one thing is clear."

Upon Reinhard's report of having completed his check of the interior of the Tower, Subaru nodded with a loathsome facial expression.

This was to say, the aim of the perpetrator of this crime within the Prison Tower was solely—

Subaru & Reinhard: "—The Sin Archbishop of Gluttony."

Their answers overlapping, Subaru and Reinhard intersected gazes and nodded.

Based on the situation at the crime scene, that was the only conclusion this circumstance accorded. However, that was not to say this conviction was not shadowed by questions.

Rem: "…Based on what Beatrice-chan told me, even that is not something so simple, is it?"

Beatrice: "The inspection is done, I suppose. That perception is unmistaken, in fact."

Drawing in her jaw toward Rem as she peered at her, Beatrice lined herself up beside Subaru. As she proceeded to gently hold Subaru's hand, Beatrice enquired about his state, Beatrice: “Are you feeling a tad fine now, I suppose?”

Subaru: “Not quite fine, but better. Sorry for shoving the whole crime scene inspection onto you.”

Beatrice: “Betty said so herself, in fact. Besides, there is not much that even Betty can do for a corpse, I suppose. What Betty can do is only provide insight from the perspective of a Great Spirit, in fact.”

Reinhard: “Please tell us your view. You see, I am unfamiliar with that regard.”

The gazes of the trio assembled upon Beatrice, as she closed her eyes at Reinhard’s urging. She cleared her throat with a tiny “Ahem” and surveyed the three as though about to give a lecture,

Beatrice: “To begin with, that Gluttony’s body was secured with Yin Magic, I suppose. Betty and Julius had worked together to do it, so it was rigid and solid security, impervious to any meager, measly attempts on it, in fact… That Betty couldn’t develop that advanced form by herself is mortifying, I suppose.”

Reinhard: “I have received confirmation on that end from those in charge of the Prison Tower. That the apprehended Gluttony was completely… suspended, like he had become a slate.”

Beatrice: “A thing impossible to meddle with, of course for the captive person, but also from those on the outside, in fact. Unfastening it would require suitable mastery of Yin Magic, I suppose.”

Subaru: “That’s not all. Even after getting him out of the monolith, you’d then have to go at it against the Roy who’d rush out. Go at it and—”

Rem: “—Take his life. In other words, it would be necessary to overcome these two stages.”

Upon Rem’s concluding remarks, Subaru and the rest were submerged in silence, their expressions troubled.

Understood insofar, in order to kill the monolith-status Roy, it necessitated skill in Yin Magic sufficient to rescind that monolith, and thereafter, the strength capable of killing Roy. Neither of these two things would be achievable in a brief period, nor capable for a person simply idling about without association.

Reinhard: “And that is to say nothing of their success in slipping through the network of vigilance to trespass into the Prison Tower. Yin Magic, mighty strength, covertness; to fulfill these three conditions is not something so simple.”

Subaru: “Taking into account all of my various grudges, I’d want to cling to the conclusion that Olbart-san is the perpetrator…”

Regrettably, even the Vicious Old Man would fail to meet the condition of being a Yin Magic user.

Although he would almost not be surprised to learn that among the shinobi techniques, there was something that exhibited similar strength, and that Olbart had been stealthily wielding it.

Reinhard: “It is without doubt that Vollachia is a belligerent nation, but they would not go so far as to choose impetuously risking diplomatic relations, given the country’s present situation. To begin with, I have heard that the arrival of Emilia-sama and the others at the Royal Capital is not unrelated to the matter of Vollachia.”

Subaru: “…You’re right. I’d like to trust the flow that the wolves of that country have become a bit more sorted, rather than suspect Vollachia’s desire for suicide. But, I’m sorry for the whole mess, Reinhard.”

Reinhard: “Sorry? What ever happened for you to apologize?”

Subaru: “I had you take a detour just to have Rem tag along, and on top of that, you must’ve brokered our entry into the Prison Tower. And yet, in the end, this is how it turns out… ah.”

Rem: “—Stare.”

As Subaru was about to apologize for the pointless errand, he noticed Rem’s frigid gaze fixed onto him.

So, this was another link in Subaru's vice of thinking everything was his fault.

However, that this thought had come to him was a fact, and withdrawing it would not sit right with him.

Beatrice: "It is unfortunate that the result was unfavorable, in fact. But, thank you for exhausting your efforts, I suppose."

Subaru: "That's it! As expected of my Beako! R-Right, Rem-san?"

Rem: "Sigh…"

Subaru: "A sigh!"

Rem's glacial gaze was replaced by her sigh, to which Subaru covered his face with his hands. Observing these affairs, Reinhard's lips cleft into a tiny smile.

Subsequently, with his smile brimming, he declared.

Reinhard: "Come now, it was nothing. —You're welcome."

He said.

2

???: "…I see, Gluttony was… It's kind of frustrating when things didn't quite go right."

Within a room of the Royal Residence, having received the report on the happenings at the Prison Tower, Emilia slanted her well-shaped eyebrows, muttering so with a conspicuously pallid complexion upon her face.

Her current state, bleared by fatigue, was a seldom sight for the ever-cheerful Emilia. Regardless, bearing the self-consciousness that one fragment of her fatigue came from his own weight, Subaru knew this was a disappointing show from him.

—Having parted ways with Reinhard, who had returned for Felt, Subaru was accompanied by Rem and Beatrice as they headed toward Emilia's sojourn, the Royal Residence. There, he rendezvoused with everyone who had arrived before him.

Apart from Roswaal and Frederica, who were making for the Barielle Domain with Schult in tow, roughly everyone from the Emilia Camp was present at the Royal Residence.

In other words—

???: "In spite of whipping these tired bodies to come running to the Royal Capital, it was a pointless errand, it would seem. How dare you spur such premature joy, Barusu."

Subaru: "Just so you know, everyone aside from nee-sama is also disappointed, and even within that, my dismay is of the top class. I might just start crying tears of blood."

Ram: "Hah! Tears of blood? That would just be the bursted blood vessels around your eyeballs. Ram can assist you in crying right this instant, in fact."

Subaru: "Scary! Just because it was a shock, your márociousness is showing a bit too much!"

Even Ram, albeit more aggressive than usual, was thus present as well.

Naturally, when Subaru had explained why he was bringing Rem to the Royal Capital, Ram had insisted in no uncertain terms that she would be coming too. Subaru understood her sisterly conviction that there was no way she could fail to be present when Rem's Memories returned, and since he himself had wanted Ram there, he had agreed.

Still, the burden of the past several months, from their challenge of the Pleiades Watchtower to their forcible incursion into the Empire, must have been tremendous. Ram had managed to hold herself together through sheer force of will, but now that this whole affair had ended in a complete miss, the strings which held her taut had finally snapped. Even as she kept flinging barbed remarks, she had basically gone groggy.

In the end, just after delivering that final jab to Subaru, she was escorted off by Rem and Petra straight to a bedroom, and it looked like she would be nursed there for a while.

Otto: “Though, to be fair, Ram-san is not the only one barely hanging on. All of us are. There was the trouble involving Natsuki-san and the others, then the murder in the Prison Tower, and now the appearance of the Church of the Divine Dragon, plus the upheaval in the Royal Selection caused by the individual at the center of it all.”

As they watched Ram leave the room, Otto muttered that with his brows drooping.

He had accompanied the party that had gone ahead to the Royal Capital with Emilia, and he was supposed to deliver a full report at the Royal Castle on the Great Disaster in the Vollachian Empire, including the news of Priscilla’s death. Amongst the matters on the agenda was also the question of the future accord between the Empire and the Kingdom that Abel had entrusted them with, an important duty both for their camp and for the Kingdom itself, or so he had surely believed.

And then, out of nowhere, they got blindsided from a completely unexpected angle, thrown into a situation no amount of preparation could have readied them for. Even Subaru could not bring himself to tease Otto over it.

In the middle of all that, just as Subaru was agonizing over where they should even begin—

Emilia: “—Will you talk to us about Al?”

As if she had seen straight through Subaru’s hesitation, Emilia chose that topic as the first item on the agenda.

Flam, Felt’s attendant, possessed a Divine Protection that allowed information to be transmitted between the twin sisters regardless of distance. Borrowing that power, they had already sent Emilia’s group a rough outline of what had happened to Subaru and the others at the Pleiades Watchtower. But, that had only been a simple summary. The details were another matter.

Having understood how anxious Emilia and the others must have been, Subaru explained everything as thoroughly as he could.

How they had gone to the Pleiades Watchtower in search of a Book of the Dead. How, that night, Al had betrayed them and attempted to do them harm, only for them to get the drop on him and contain him first. How he had not been granted any leeway to talk through the root of the reason that had driven Al to such violence.

And finally, that Subaru had no intention of letting his relationship with Al end there, without knowing any of those reasons.

Emilia: "—Yes, I feel the same way Subaru does… I think that's the best thing to do."

After hearing him out and spending some time thinking it over, Emilia gave her approval to Subaru's conclusion, delighting him. Her amethyst eyes swayed with complicated emotions, but even so, she quietly gazed at the Al-orb hanging from Subaru's neck and nodded.

He had already told Beatrice and Petra his thoughts while they were on the way back. So among those present, the ones forming a new opinion based on Subaru's explanation were Emilia, who had just answered him that way; Otto, who looked like he had just bitten into an unripe persimmon; as well as—

Rem: "—Al-san loved Priscilla-san. I cannot speak more on the matter."

It was Rem, who had laid Ram down in the bedroom, and had now returned to the sitting room with Petra.

And so, for the time being, the Emilia Camp's stance toward Al's actions was decided. Perhaps because he did not want to spoil the atmosphere, Otto kept his thoughts to himself, for now. Subaru figured he could make him vent those thoughts later, together with Garfiel. With that in mind, Subaru slapped both cheeks with his hands.

Whether it was about Al, or about the Prison Tower, there was nothing they could do for either of those matters right now. Which meant that if there was anything they could discuss at present, the remaining topic was—

Subaru: "—Let's talk about this Filóre, from the Church of the Divine Dragon."

About Filóre, whose existence could shake the very foundations of the Royal Selection.

Everyone: "…"

The moment that subject came up, the air in the sitting room changed completely. But rather than becoming taut with tension or strain, it was filled with a much broader sense of bewilderment and confusion.

In truth, Subaru included, every last one of them was at a considerable loss over the situation.

Subaru: "To begin with, what kind of discussion is even happening at the Castle right now? The whole premise was that the Church of the Divine Dragon wouldn't involve itself in the political core of things, right? And then suddenly, there's talk of a sixth person who can make the insignia shine, and on top of that, she's using the same name as the princess who vanished fifteen years ago? All of that came totally out of nowhere for everyone, didn't it?"

Emilia: "Well, it sounds like they're in the middle of discussing all of that right now. But, the Church broke its own rules this time because they wanted to save the people who were hurt in Pristella, right? Nobody can really say that's wrong, and actually…"

Subaru: "—They healed Crusch-san's body. Emilia-tan, you and Otto saw it too, right?"

Emilia: "Yes, we did see it. Right, Otto-kun?"

Otto: "I could not exactly stare a lady down so blatantly, but at the very least, the convulsive-looking black marks that had been visible have disappeared."

Beside the nodding Emilia, Otto answered in such a way, his gaze flicking for a moment toward Subaru's leg.

Was he implying that if the same conditions were met, Subaru's leg could be healed too? To be honest, it did not inconvenience him that much, but every time they all bathed together, Otto and Garfiel might have felt awkward about it, so if it could be healed, he would not mind getting that taken care of.

Subaru: "But, it's kind of terrifying, becoming indebted to the Church of the Divine Dragon for that… ah!"

Meili: "Ee~w, Onii-san, what are you getting all scaredy like that fo~r?"

Subaru: "No, I was just thinking that this might be another one of those "you put yourself last" situations I'll get scolded for…"

Rem: "If you are aware of that, then please carry yourself with a little more dignity."

Meili poked at him, and Rem sounded exasperated too. Still, if he had spoken out loud that this was a case with no actual harm involved, and that he did not want to make a disadvantageous position for the camp over it, he would probably get chewed out, so Subaru could only try to fumble past the issue with a fake little "ahem-ahem".

Not that he was trying to bail Subaru out, but the one who spoke up then with a coarse "Hey" was Garfiel, seated on the window frame of the room.

Scratching his head roughly, he hesitated for a moment before saying,

Garfiel: "There's prolly all sortsa complicated crap tied up to this. So, what my amazin' self's 'bout ta say, that's just how my amazin' self feels, got it?"

Emilia: "Garfiel… hm, tell us. What is it?"

Garfiel: "—. If they can heal the folks in Pristella, then my amazin' self wants 'em to be healed right away, 'n to get those guys to do the healin'. Between the black dragon 'n the flies 'n all the rest, ain't there already been nothin' but drainin' crap?"

Curled up with one knee hugged close, half of his body exposed to the sunlight, Garfiel's plea was earnest.

There was a family in Pristella Garfiel had grown close to. During that battle, the father of that family had fallen into the clutches of Lust, and was turned into a black dragon, having even been used once as a decoy. Even now, that transformed black dragon body remained unchanged, and by Emilia's hand, he was being kept frozen, like the other victims, slumbering in a corner of the city.

If people in such a position could be cured, Garfiel was saying, then whom one had to rely on should be secondary.

Subaru: "And, I agree with him. There are people suffering, people in pain, and if there's a way to save them, then it doesn't matter who does it. That's what I think."

Petra: "Hmm, so Subaru gets to say that sort of thing? Even though you were the one insisting that it had to be you to wake up Rem-neesama, throwing yourself into danger over it?"

Subaru: "Now that you mention it, maybe I did say something like that, but man, you really remembered that well, Petra!"

Petra: "That's not something I can forget. It kind of shocked me, after all. Part of me thought Rem-neesama was unfair, and part of me thought, wow, even after hearing that, I'm still the kind of girl who won't give up."

At Petra, who puckered her lips mischievously, Subaru could only scratch his head in total surrender.

In truth, before Rem woke up, while he had said that it would be fine no matter who awakened her, so long as she woke, he had absolutely also declared that he wanted to be the one to do it. In truth, he was a little too scared to look over and see what kind of face Rem was making upon hearing that.

Be that as it may—

Subaru: "Putting aside what I've said in the past, let's look to the future… No matter how the discussion at the Castle gets wrapped up, now that it's been proven that the Church of the Divine Dragon has a way to heal them, the people of Pristella are going to be treated… right?"

Otto: "Yes. No matter which way the heated debate turns, I do not think there will be any hesitation on that point. The real issue will be whether it is treated as merely a debt owed to the Church of the Divine Dragon, or as something more than that."

Subaru: "The sixth qualified candidate for Dragon Priestess, huh…"

Ultimately, how that individual's standing would be handled was not something Subaru and the others had any control over.

Depending on how the people at the Royal Castle, or more precisely, the Council of Wise Men, chose to define those matters, this camp centered around Emilia would decide its own stance as well.

But when Subaru thought about it that way, the one still weighing on his mind was Filóre herself.

Subaru: "Emilia-tan, you actually met her in person, right? What kind of person was she?"

Emilia: "Let's see… I thought she was a reaaally earnest girl. A good girl."

Subaru: "I see. And what do you think of Meili?"

Emilia: "Huh? Meili? I think Meili is a reaaally hard-working girl who cares about her friends. A good girl."

Meili: "I get what Subaru-oniisan is trying to sa~y, but don't use me as your prop, oka~y?"

It was not that Subaru doubted Emilia's eye for people, but when filtered through Emilia, there was always the danger that anyone at all might be judged as a serious, sincere, hard-working, good person. That said, Subaru's own assessment of Meili was not all that different, so it would be wrong to question Emilia's discernment based on that alone.

At this rate, it might have actually been more useful to ask Abel what he thought.

Subaru: "What about you, Otto? Even if you only caught a glimpse of her for a moment, what did you think?"

Otto: "I did not exchange many words with her, but my impression was that she was a devout believer of the Church of the Divine Dragon. Someone sincere, who believed that serving others was the highest good, and…"

Subaru: "And?"

Otto: "She seems to have a somewhat reckless streak. From what I have heard, this whole affair was Filóre-san acting on her own, disregarding the Church's intentions."

Subaru: "On her own? You mean healing Crusch-san, and making the insignia shine?"

Otto: "The former, yes. The latter was apparently the result of how events unfolded. But given the circumstances, I can not help thinking the Church of the Divine Dragon wanted to keep her existence hidden."

Subaru: "Well, that's…"

As for Subaru's question of why, no one there had an answer.

Was Filóre truly the princess who had disappeared fifteen years ago, or not? What was with her appearance, bearing the traits said to belong to Lugunica's Royal Family; and what was the truth behind that name? Why had the Church of the Divine Dragon kept her hidden, allowing the Royal Selection to begin and continue in ignorance of her existence?

The mysteries were simply too many. And because they were—

Subaru: “Hey, Emilia-tan—”

Emilia: “Look, Subaru—”

Subaru, lifting his face to voice an idea, and Emilia, overlapping with him, spoke. Startled, the two looked at each other with rounded eyes. Then, feeling as though they could read the same thought in each other’s gaze, they laughed together.

Apparently, Emilia had arrived at the very same conclusion.

That was to say—

Subaru: “—Don’t you think we should try meeting this Filóre person and talking to her directly?”

3

—If he were to think back on it, Subaru did not possess a particularly strong grasp on the overall picture of the Royal Capital of Lugunica.

Near the fountain in the Commoner District where he had been so grandly summoned to another world, the Commercial District with its fruit stand, whose shop owner he had met several times, the headquarters of each Candidate from whom he had received a series of blows following his terrible fight and parting with Emilia, and finally the loot house in the Slums: although he held emotional attachments regarding each of those places, they were merely a small portion of the Royal Capital’s vastness.

Consequently, to Subaru, the place of worship for the Church of the Divine Dragon, which was inconspicuously nestled in a corner of the Royal Capital’s Commoner District, seemed to be a case of it being the darkest at the foot of the lighthouse, as if it had been built right on the edge of his awareness.[17]

Subaru: “I had no clue there was such an obvious church…”

Emilia: “It’s reaaally surprising. But, if we’re talking about a church… didn’t you know, you even saw one in Pristella, where the wedding between Regulus and me was about to happen.”

Subaru: “You mean where I busted down that door! Now that you mention it, was that also one of the Church of the Divine Dragon’s?”

Due to that ironclad association of churches and weddings, his sense of duty to rescue Emilia no matter what had taken over, allowing him no leeway to even consider the setting. But, in retrospect, it had indeed been a church, and if it was a church within the Kingdom, which possessed no custom of belief in gods, it was inevitable that it would be connected to the Church of the Divine Dragon.

Subaru: “In that case, while wedding Emilia-tan was a sight for sore eyes, that incident itself is a detestable memory for me, so my impression of the Church of the Divine Dragon is off to a negative start.”

???: “Betty wasn’t there, but as expected, a Sin Archbishop would hardly do something respectable, I suppose. But, tarnishing your impression of the Church of the Divine Dragon over that would be a false accusation, in fact.”

???: “Well, this wouldn’t be the first time this guy said something so frivolously.”

Subaru: “Beako and Rem are both booing at me… do girls really still yearn for wedding dresses? So, does my bad-mouthing of the Church give me a bad image?”

In response to Subaru’s timid question, Beatrice and Rem looked at each other, then shrugged their shoulders in unison. Subaru’s own shoulders fell in dejection at their response, and putting her hand over her mouth with a giggle, Emilia smiled, putting him at ease.

While casting a glance upon that smile, Subaru took that rare opportunity to regain his composure.

Subaru: “At any rate, although there’s a lot of circumstances that led up to our outing, having Emilia-tan and me, plus Beako and Rem… going in this combination is like, a dream party in a sense, isn’t it?”

Beatrice: “Whether it’s dreamy is uncertain, but it’s certainly quite unusual, I suppose.”

Emilia: “Yeah, now that you mention it. Until Subaru brought you out of the Forbidden Library, you wouldn’t really join us on outings, Beatrice. I’m sure it was the same for Rem, before she fell asleep.”

Rem: “I have no recollection of such things, but I’m sure you’re right. I’m also having fun walking around with Emilia-san and Beatrice-chan.”

Subaru: “Heeey, you left me out on purpose just now. I’m so looonely, I’m so miiiserable.”

Even saying that, this was an unusual yet delightful combination, so Subaru remained unbothered.

For the time being, these members comprised the team that was going to visit Filóre of the Church of the Divine Dragon, the lineup tasked with the mission of scouting out the enemy.

Presently, they were at last approaching the place of worship where the involved party from the aforementioned Church of the Divine Dragon was, but under what pretext could they summon Filóre—then, it happened at that moment.

???: “—Ehhh, you can’t keep on branding others as liars! Alright, allow me to show you. This is the proof that I went up to the Castle!”

And then, an energetic voice could be heard from the premises of a large building enclosed by stone walls—judging from its roof and the ambiance of its structure, it was most likely a church, the steeple of which was in view.

As soon as they blinked their eyes in confusion, Subaru and the others saw it. —On the other side of the stone wall, a red light faintly swelled, asserting its existence.

Subaru: “That… could it be…”

???: “Wah! Amazing, amazing!”

???: “It really glowed! What did you do? What did you do?”

???: “You finally stole something! You thief!”

???: “First you call me a liar, and now you say I’m a thief?! You, just who do you think I am?! I am a nun! One who bears the Sacraments! On the verge of becoming a Saintess!”

It was the boisterously merry voices of children, and the voice of a girl who seemed to be playing with them. Subaru and the others looked at each other in response to what they had heard, before hurriedly navigating around the stone wall.

And then, upon reaching a break in the stone wall, the front entrance to the church grounds—

???: “Now, behold. This is the brilliance of our Divine Dragon, who reduces those with wicked hearts to ashes! This too, is in the scriptures. “Man is born of the earth, and the Dragon descendeth from the heavens. He that forgets to revere the heavens and foolishly trusts that he hath wings upon his own back shall not realize his sin before his fall”!”

???: “Kyaaa!”

???: “Waaah!”

???: “Ugyaaah!”

They bore witness to the figure of a nun brazenly declaring such things, with red light glistening from within her hand held aloft—the Dragon Gem on the insignia radiating, she chased after the squealing children who ran around erratically.

She had not noticed her visitors, and pursuing the fleeing children with an “Ooh hoh hoh hoh!” while the insignia glowed behind them,

Nun: “Now, who will repent amidst the blinding light of the high and exalted Dragon… huh?”

Subaru & Company: “…”

Stopping dead in her tracks, the nun swiveled around as if making a creaking noise. There, she discovered Subaru and the rest observing the scene, and her mouth fell agape.

Upon seeing the reaction of the golden-haired, crimson-eyed nun, Subaru was at a loss for words. However, at Subaru's side, Emilia rustled around in her pocket,

Emilia: "Look, look, I can do the same thing!"

And, as the produced insignia glowed red, just like the nun's—just like Filóre's had, with angelic innocence, lacking any ill intent, Emilia followed up by saying she was also the same.

Immediately afterwards, Subaru saw with his own eyes as Filóre's pale skin, from her neck to her face to her ears, all turned red with shame in a single instant, and Subaru faintly thought that she seemed like an instantaneous water heater.[18]

Chapter 7:
My Friend

1

???: “Are you okay? Do you think you can handle it?”

???: “Onee-chan, watch what you’re doing! Uh-oh, uh-oh!”

???: “Is that the silver-haired half-elf everyone’s been talking about? Splash it on her head!”

???: “Don’t just say such nonsense off to the side! Also, don’t incite such blatant malice! This too, is in the scriptures. “Thou shalt not touch the scales of the Dragon with an impure mind. The defiled shall not be permitted to pass through the Golden Gates ere they have been struck by silver rain and the filth of their hearts hath been ground away.”“

???: “…Which means?”

???: “…Which means?”

???: “…Which means?”

???: “It means if you even think about doing naughty things, I’ll be just as mad as if you actually did them! Now look, I have guests to attend to! Run along and play outside!”

A resonant voice gently shooed the innocent children outside. At that scolding, the children squealed as they noisily fled outside the building.

There were two boys and one girl, with the girl being the one with the nastiest comments. As all of them were clad in habits dyed indigo, nearly as dark as black itself, they were most likely members of the Church.

In any case, Subaru took it in stride, thinking it was good for them to be so energetic.

???: “I apologize for our children being so noisy. I admonish them daily, and yet it doesn’t quite seem to be sinking in, or rather, perhaps they just look down on me… hoh.”

Watching the backs of those children, the golden-haired, crimson-eyed nun leisurely shrugged her shoulders—it was Filóre. In the midst of preparing to entertain her guests, she lamented that the children had continued to bother her, and in truth, it seemed that their behavior was an equal mix of fondness and ridicule.

In any case, rather than offering any consolation on that matter, the attention of Subaru and the others was seized by the tea set being carried upon a silver tray along with the girl’s unsteady gait as she approached them.

Rattling and clattering, everything upon the tray was indicating imminent disaster.

Watching the state of the tea set’s precarious journey to the table in the common room they had been shown to, Subaru and the others gulped.

???: “…Um, do you need a hand?”

Filóre: “Please wait, don’t touch me! Right now, I’m maintaining a perfect balance on the tray, and even a single wrong step would spell the end. Slowly, slowly…”

???: “R-Reaaally do your best…!”

Weaving between Rem, who offered to help, and Emilia, who earnestly cheered her on, somehow Filóre gingerly managed an emergency landing with the tray onto the table without spilling a drop.

As they reflexively applauded her with an “Ooooh”, whilst wiping her forehead, she said,

Filóre: “Ahem, sorry to keep you waiting. My apologies for making you anxious and on edge all of a sudden. Normally, I would leave it up to someone else to welcome guests in this way, but there is no one else here aside from me at present.”

Emilia: “No, it’s fine. Thanks for welcoming us. If anything, we’re the ones who dropped by while you’re so short on hands.”

Filóre: “No, it’s no trouble. The doors of the Church should always be open. This too, is in the scriptures. “Fearing and revering the power of the Dragon is itself a sign of love. Love without reverence is conceit, reverence without love is servility, and righteous love is to be found in the nobility of standing tall in the presence of the Dragon.”“

Emilia: “Umm, and that means?”

Filóre: “In other words, it means you should always be at your finest so that you never have to worry about when someone important might be watching you.”

Raising her index finger, Filóre answered Emilia’s question in that way.

That quotation was likely a verse from the scriptures of the Church of the Divine Dragon, but she had an excellent sense at how to simplify and convey the ideas to make them easier to understand. Moreover, the way her explanation made the ceremonious language easy to comprehend was welcomed by Subaru, whose understanding of religious beliefs was superficial.

Subaru: “That said, the way you were shouting at those kids with spit flying everywhere was you at your finest?”

Filóre: “Guh-”

Beatrice: “And after that, the way her face turned bright red after noticing Betty and everyone else was quite the spectacle, I suppose.”

Filóre: “Urgh-”

As Subaru and Beatrice pointed this out, Filóre clutched her chest and groaned after each point. While feeling quite pleased with that reaction, suddenly Rem, next to Subaru, and Emilia, next to Beatrice, each pinched their ears.

Rem: “That was an unnecessary comment just now.”

Emilia: “Geez, don’t bully her.”

Subaru & Beatrice: “Ouch, ouch, ouch!”

And so, Subaru and Beatrice were each made to pay the price for their mischief, leaving them with some damage. In the end, simply bringing out the tea had resulted in a tally of three casualties.

But, that was enough of such nonsense—

Filóre: “Once again, I thank you for visiting me. I am Filóre… a nun of the Church of the Divine Dragon who just caused quite the commotion at the Royal Castle.”

Everyone: “…”

Subaru and the others stared in total silence as Filóre introduced herself with her hand upon her chest. Then, her expression quickly clouding over,

Filóre: “Hey, please say something. Otherwise, I’ll get anxious…”

Subaru: “Nah, it’s just that I was thinking, “Oh, so she is aware that she caused a commotion, huh.”“

Filóre: “Well of course I am… I mean, I am indeed. If everyone in the Castle was looking at you with such indescribable eyes, anyone would think “Huh? Did I do something wrong?”.”

Subaru: “Well, we weren’t there for that, but I do in fact understand that unbearable sensation of feeling out of place like that preeetty well.”

Filóre: “Really?! That hellish sensation?!”

Emilia: “Oh, Subaru, could you be talking about the time when you went off and declared yourself my Knight in front of everybody, and then I was embarrassed so I said you weren’t?”

Subaru: “Guh, that’s pretty much it!”

With Filóre jumping up, and Emilia clasping her hands together in front of her chest, Subaru was bombarded by innocent exclamations from both sides, and this time it was his old wounds that began to sting anew.

Or rather, from Emilia's perspective, her rejection of him on that occasion was simply due to her embarrassment. Of course, he had not conducted a survey on her feelings about that time, but contrary to her cute reason, the damage Subaru had suffered was horrific.

Rem: "…I can't even bear to hear what was said just now, but is it true?"

Beatrice: "Unfortunately, Betty had yet to form a Contract with Subaru at the time, so she doesn't know the details, in fact. However, it wouldn't have been strange for Subaru to make such a mistake back then, I suppose."

Subaru: "It's super depressing hearing Rem and Beako saying all sorts of things about that day after so long! Just so you know, before you lost your Memories, you understood the situation Rem, and you were rather sympathetic toward me."

Rem: "Are you sure about that? Perhaps my previous self was so dumbfounded that I simply refrained from commenting?"

Subaru: "Stop it, now I'm kinda starting to feel like you could be right!"

Truthfully, regardless of Subaru's feelings at that time, his way of doing things, his methods, the way he spoke to others, the way he presented himself; he had no doubt that he had persisted in making poor choices in all aspects. Still, he had already reflected on that, so he hoped he would be let off the hook already, even though he had been the one to initially bring it up.

However, as Subaru found himself being crushed by his own actions in the past—

Filóre: "—I understand those feelings."

Both of her hands unflinchingly reached over the table to firmly grasp Subaru's right hand. As he looked, he saw Filóre leaning forward directly in front of him, nodding toward Subaru.

Meeting the wide-eyed Subaru, those crimson eyes of hers blazing,

Filóre: "The icy stares of everyone around you, glaring at you, who appeared out of nowhere, and clearly don't belong."

Subaru: "—!"

Filóre: "Your tongue, which had started speaking with such enthusiasm, is unable to turn back now."

Subaru: "Yeah, yeah. That's exactly right!"

Filóre: "After you've more or less finished speaking, there's a long silence that feels like an eternity before someone says something!"

Subaru: "Those few seconds are endlessly long…!"

Filóre: "I realized that I really overdid it… That I might have made a mistake, or something."

Subaru: "Filóre…!"

The shudder of fear she had experienced coursing through her, he felt every bit of it as if it were his own—no, in truth, it was his own. Realizing this, Subaru also grasped Filóre's hands in return.

Hands clasped together atop the table, Subaru and Filóre nodded to each other.

Indeed, Subaru and Filóre were comrades who had both gotten carried away and made a mess of things at the Castle—

Rem: "However, aren't your positions quite different between the likes of Filóre-san, who immediately produced results, and you, who postponed the opportunity to make amends?"

Subaru: "St-Stooop… we were totally having a moment just nooow."

Filóre: “Indeed, indeed. This too, is in the scriptures. “Sharpen not thy claws that tear at thy neighbor whilst sheltered beneath the shade of the same wing. Brothers who quarrel under the same sky are those who err in abandoning the benevolence of the Dragon by their own hand”.”

Emilia: “Umm, and that means?”

Filóre: “We are all comrades who have suffered the same taste of shame, so get along instead of arguing.”

Subaru: “I totally get it! Maybe I’ll join the Church of the Divine Dragon!”

Beatrice: “That would be a delicate matter, so don’t treat it so carelessly, in fact!”

Taken in by the overly kind treatment, and on the verge of joining a new religion, Subaru was stopped by Beatrice’s loving open palm. If love for the object of one’s faith was a major driving force, then Subaru was surely already an adherent of Beatrice-ism, as well as Emilia-ism and Rem-ism.

Subaru: “No, by that logic, that’s a whole lot of religions I’m joining. Up to now, I’ve been pretending to be non-religious as typical of a Japanese person, but perhaps in the eyes of God, I’m actually an unfaithful person…?”

Rem: “—. Well, isn’t that right?”

Subaru: “Those are simply unbelievably cold eyes!”

As soon as he muttered something nervously, he was stabbed to death by Rem’s pale-blue eyes. With Emilia and Beatrice also offering wry smiles beside Rem, Subaru stopped investigating the topic further.

Having made his tactical retreat, Subaru and the others turned their gaze to Filóre once again. Frankly, she already was very easy to get along with at this point, but there was something he needed to tell her.

And that was—

Subaru: “I heard you helped Crusch-san. This might sound odd for me to say, but… thank you. Seriously, thank you.”

Filóre: “…”

Saying this, Subaru bowed so deeply that he nearly cracked his forehead against the table. In response to those words of gratitude from Subaru, Filóre’s eyes widened, looking toward Emilia and the others.

Though he had prefaced it as odd, it apparently did not dispel the reason for her astonishment. However, Emilia also bowed her head toward Filóre.

Emilia: “Allow me to give my thanks as well. We all wanted to do something to help Crusch-san. And you were the one who actually managed to make it happen.”

Beatrice: “Actually, a solution was just being looked into on our end, I suppose. You’ve performed a great achievement, in fact.”

Rem: “I’ve only heard about it, but I think it’s truly admirable.”

Just like that, not only Emilia, but Beatrice and Rem as well all conveyed their gratitude in succession, leaving Filóre’s jaw hanging agape for a time. And then, somehow absorbing that shock she had been struck by, she slowly shook her head.

Then, before them all, calmly showing a smile filled with benevolent love,

Filóre: “—Think nothing of it. I merely did what I had to do. If someone should be saved by that, then that itself is my greatest wish.”

It was a response truly fitting for the nun of benevolent love that Subaru had embraced. —To the extent that he could have said it was beyond reproach, if only her nostrils had not twitched in delight.

Of course, out of both his appreciation and a samurai’s mercy, Subaru refrained from commenting on it.

2

Filóre: “—I was found abandoned in front of a church when I was an infant. That was a little over fifteen years ago now.”

Upon the conclusion of their initial exchange that had started with greetings, Filóre began to recount for them the position she had been placed in, the circumstances which surrounded her, and the story of her own life related to it all.

Subaru and the others reflexively exchanged looks in response to the comment about an abandoned child that initiated the conversation. —Because when it came to the suspicions that “Filóre was the missing princess”, it was truly not a topic that could be avoided.

Emilia: “You were abandoned… so then, you don’t remember your parents?”

Filóre: “Correct, I don’t know their faces or their names. But, everyone in the Church is my family. So I’ve never felt lonely… well, I’ve occasionally been perturbed when some heartless individual would mock me, but I’ve basically been fine. Because someone has always been there for me.”

Subaru: “I see. But you know, did you ever think it was weird or something? After all, golden hair, crimson eyes, and “Filóre” are like a royal flush, or a critical hit, or something…”

Filóre: “This is the Church of the Divine Dragon, remember? It is only natural for the Church to distance itself from the Royal Family and the Royal Castle, so I never received such information… No, looking back on it now, they probably kept it a secret from me on purpose. You jeeerks…”

Her fists trembling upon the table, Filóre lamented her situation.

As one might surmise from their considerably startling first encounter with her, as well as their brief conversation up to this point, Filóre appeared to be the fairly impulsive type, or rather, someone easily swayed by her own emotions.

Her negotiations at the Royal Castle, which united Subaru with her in a bond of powerful empathy, seemed to have also been a consequence of an outburst of these emotions.

Filóre: “From the start, I have thought that the Witch Cult’s debauchery has been unpardonable as of late. Then came the incident in Pristella… I had already run out of patience.”

Subaru: “So you ignored those around you who were trying to stop you, and raised an uproar in the Castle?”

Filóre: “You could have phrased that with a bit more consideration… I know, how about saying I did so in a dignified and ladylike manner?”

Subaru: “Alright then, you raised an uproar in a dignified and ladylike manner.”

Filóre: “…I feel like my commendable qualities aren’t quite coming across as well as I had thought they would.”

Be that as it may, for Subaru, who had obeyed her instructions, it was not on him to take responsibility for the extent of their effectiveness.

At any rate, it was clear to him that Filóre had acted out of a sense of duty and fierce indignation. However, the interest of Subaru and the others lay in the part concerning what had led her to take such an action.

That was—

Emilia: “—A Sacrament, that’s what you mentioned, right Filóre?”

The atmosphere in the common room became slightly tense as Emilia’s words broached the subject.

A Sacrament, that was the “something” that Filóre was said to have used to cure Crusch’s body, going so far as to march into the Royal Castle to demonstrate it; this was the possibility of overturning an Authority.

And for some reason, the Church of the Divine Dragon had concealed its existence, and she had attempted to expose it to the public; it was a means by which they could save the victims of the Witch Cult.

Subaru: "…"

Wetting his lips with his tongue, Subaru tried to contain his faint sense of urgency.

As it was declared to be a Sacrament, it was only natural that it would be quite a significant secret of the Church of the Divine Dragon. Depending on the circumstances, mere knowledge of its existence might have been enough for the Church to treat them as an enemy.

If they were to dig deeper into it, even Filóre would shut her mouth —

Filóre: "The Sacrament? Yes, indeed. It is a secret art handed down from antiquity only within the Church, and there are very few individuals who can use it. The Church calls such individuals Saintesses, and I myself am qualified as well, hence why I can employ that power."[19]

Subaru: "You told us way too readily, is that allowed?!"

Filóre: "Whether it's allowed or not, though the Church has tried to hide it, it has already been discussed extensively at the Castle. It's pointless to try and conceal it at this point… This too, is in the scriptures. "Thou shalt not defile the earth the Dragon hath purified with the poison of selfish desire. It requires a thousand years of prayer, and the tears of sinners, to fill a spring that hath dried up but once.""

Emilia: "Umm, and that means?"

Filóre: "In other words, if you try to profit only yourself, it's incredibly challenging to recover if something were to happen. —

And I thought that right now was the time when something had happened.”

Therefore, contrary to the intentions of the Church of the Divine Dragon, who wished to conceal the Sacrament’s very existence, Filóre had chosen to wield that power publicly, in accordance with the doctrines to which she adhered.

Naturally, the Church of the Divine Dragon was in a state of considerable disorder after she had done such a thing on her own accord, and the Royal Castle, which had incurred a huge debt, was likewise surely in a state of mayhem.

However, setting aside the chaotic consequences, Subaru was certain that her motive was born of good intentions.

Filóre: “Right now, they are discussing how to handle me at the Royal Castle… higher-ups from the Church and my long-standing family are both participating, but…”

Emilia: “Even though it’s about you, Filóre, you aren’t a part of the discussion?”

Filóre: “Even though I wanted to join them, they chased me away! It’s about me, and yet if I were to be present, they said things might get complicated… but there’s at least a slight chance it wouldn’t, so don’t you find that heartless?!”

Beatrice: “It’s lamentable that you estimate the chance of it not happening to be low, I suppose.”

Subaru: “Don’t tell her that, Beako.”

Red-faced, Filóre complained about her unjust treatment, but looking at the impulsive and straightforward girl, he could not help but admit that the judgment of those involved was apt.

Filóre claimed to be fifteen years of age, and contrary to her mature appearance, she was most certainly fifteen years old on the inside—or perhaps, even more childish. This might have also been influenced by her upbringing as a sheltered child, isolated from the rest of the world.

To be honest, Subaru could not comprehend the intention of the Church of the Divine Dragon who had raised her in such a way.

Rem: “Then, those concerned are at the Castle? And so, Filóre-san was left alone in this church?”

Filóre: “It’s as you say. Well, I don’t feel lonely because those kids from before are here for me, but I’ve been instructed not to go off on my own. I want to go and spread the power of the Sacrament as quickly as I can, even a single second quicker, and yet…”

Subaru: “I’ve never heard of this Saintess of Motivation.”

He supposed that was just how much she desired to deliver salvation, but there were also Saintesses that lacked such a saintly affectation.

Nevertheless, it was also as Garfiel had discussed at the Royal Residence: when he thought of the victims in Pristella who were waiting for such a time as this, he could do nothing but agree with Filóre’s sentiments.

If anything, as far as Subaru was concerned, he felt like giving Filóre some encouragement.

Subaru: “I totally get how you feel. Maybe I’ll beg Reinhard, and he can carry Filóre to Pristella in a single leap…”

Filóre: “Guh… hk, what a fascinating proposal…! However, I was told to wait patiently.”

Subaru: “You didn’t make a promise, did you? Besides, even if you promised, if it saves someone in the end, then breaking it just a little bit…”

Emilia: “Subaru? Are you perhaps not only breaking your own promises, but making others break them as well? That’s reaaally not good, you know…?”

Beatrice: “Even a habitual promise breaker has reached his limit, in fact.”

Subaru: “Guhhh…!”

Reprimanded with the nuance of “I understand your feelings, but…”, Subaru could only respond with that gurgling noise. Together with Filóre, who made a similar sound herself, they bent the knee before that promise.

At the moment, all they could do was pray that the discussions at the Castle would come to a swift and constructive resolution.

Rem: “—At any rate, I heard that Filóre-san is a nun of the Church of the Divine Dragon.”

Subaru: “Rem?”

Rem: “Even with such a position, you included Emilia-san so readily.”

Subaru, who had been offering up a prayer in the direction of the Castle, frowned quizzically when Rem suddenly broached this different topic.

However, that subject was not entirely off the mark, as made apparent from the reactions of Emilia, who frowned, and Filóre, who lowered her hands that had been raised in prayer, the same as Subaru.

Rem had pointed it out: when it came to the relationship between the Church of the Divine Dragon and Emilia, her true point was that —

Rem: “The Church of the Divine Dragon reveres the power and grace of the Divine Dragon Volcanica, and the Covenant with it. And, the grandest achievement of the Divine Dragon within the Kingdom of Lugunica is the sealing of the Witch of Envy, isn’t that right?”

Subaru: “Oi, that can’t mean…”

Rem: “The more devout adherents of the Church of the Divine Dragon may feel conflicted concerning Emilia-san… that’s what I’m saying.”

Subaru rose to his feet in spite of himself, but Rem did not turn toward his countenance, nor attempt to meet his eyes. Her lips pursed tight, Rem knew her remarks had been callous, and could very well end up demolishing the heretofore relatively amicable atmosphere of the meeting.And yet, Rem still spoke out. She would not simply avert her eyes from that unnatural situation and allow it to remain unnatural.

Truthfully, Subaru had not perceived that peculiarity until Rem had pointed it out.

There was also the fact that the Church of the Divine Dragon's existence was entirely foreign to him, but what was more significant for Subaru was this: although he felt novel amazement each day at Emilia being an ultra-beautiful girl, from their first encounter until today, she had never once been an object of dread or awe to him.

But, he must not forget. —Due to her lineage and the characteristics of her appearance, Emilia constantly had her resemblance to the most dreaded Witch in this world thrust upon her.

Subaru: "…"

And, that resemblance to the Witch of Envy was certainly an affair that could never be ignored, nor openly approved of by the Church of the Divine Dragon, who dedicated themselves to the Divine Dragon itself, one of the Three Great Heroes who, four hundred years prior, had put a stop to the atrocities of the Witch.

Moreover, Filóre was a bearer of the Sacrament that was a secret of the Church, and a presence placed in a position akin to that of a Saintess. Having been raised under the doctrines of the Church of the Divine Dragon, it would not be strange if she bore such an impression of Emilia.

Subaru: "Am I an idiot? No, I am definitely an idiot."

This sort of thing was something Subaru should have taken notice of, not Rem.

Despite his position as Emilia's one and only Knight, he was far too lacking in knowledge of and vigilance towards places where she might be harmed unjustly. Would he try to make up for it by cursing himself and saying it was his own fault, even if Emilia's face clouded over as a result?

He regretted his own lack of knowledge, and that had been one of the reasons he had hastened back to the Royal Capital, and yet—

Emilia: "Rem, just when have you been studying? You reaaally surprised me."

However, as Subaru felt such regrets, Emilia herself spoke, neither to rebuke her good-for-nothing one and only Knight, nor to express surprise upon realizing Rem's remarks.

She simply smiled, thanking Rem for her decision to bring up that topic.

Rem: "…Something like studying isn't really that big of a deal. It's just, I am also in a position where I have been given a place for myself to belong, so I simply listened to what Nee-sama had to say."

Emilia: "Still, it makes me happy. Even though I made you worry… how weird."

Rem: "—. No, it's not that I don't understand. I often feel pathetic for worrying others, but it also makes me feel cared for."

Emilia: "Fufu, is that so? In that case, Rem, please take good care of me, too."

Rem: "…I think Emilia-san has done so for me already."

Casting her eyes down, Rem directed that retort back towards Emilia, who stared straight ahead at her. However, to Subaru's eyes, that attitude of Rem's was just her way of hiding her embarrassment.

Emilia's pure, honest gaze could strip away any contemplated motives. Subaru understood exactly how Rem was feeling, as he too was frequently made to face himself because of it.

Subaru: “Beako, cheek!”

Beatrice: “Good grief, I sup, pose!”

Immediately following the exchange between those two, Subaru called out in such a manner to Beatrice. As soon as he did, Beatrice slapped Subaru’s face with her tiny palm as if she had been preparing to do so—numbness racing from her lovely hand with a smack, Subaru’s shoulders trembled.

Emilia: “Kya?! Why’d you do that so suddenly?”

Taken aback by that unexpected action, Emilia gently touched Subaru’s cheek. As the coolness of those fair fingertips soothed his stinging cheek, Subaru shrugged his shoulders with a “Nah”,

Subaru: “I just got a little fired up. It’s mentalism by Beako to stand back up… perhaps I’ll call it Bea-ntalism. Or maybe Bea-therapy? Which one do you prefer?”

Emilia: “Sorry, I’ve got no idea what you’re talking about.”

Emilia responded in her usual tone to Subaru, who had spouted out such pointless words.

From that response alone, he recognized that Emilia appeared unafraid of the circumstances which were worrying Subaru, nor did she appear disheartened over Subaru’s shameful display.

Subaru: “Of course, I can’t just rely on that. It’s also a problem that my judgment regarding circumstances that should worry our camp is worse than the amnesiac Rem.”

Rem: “Reflect properly on that.”

Subaru: “You’re telling me that because you think I can do it, right? All right, leave it to me.”

Rem: “—. Well, that’s fine.”

Subaru had begun to lose heart, but with that encouragement from Rem, his motivation was restored. After doing so, Subaru once again turned sharply toward Filóre.

She was a nun and Saintess of the Church of the Divine Dragon. However, that was precisely why—

Subaru: “There is significance in freeing such people from prejudice, I think. So, how about it, Filóre? For a start, how about forming a friendly relationship with Emilia-tan?”

Emilia: “A friendly relationship? Hey, Subaru, do you mean…?”

Subaru: “Yeah, in other words—the two of you becoming friends!”

Firmly clenching his fist, Subaru made that vehement proclamation. And, in response to that, with her amethyst eyes sparkling, Emilia clasped her hands together in front of her chest.

It went without saying that Emilia craved companionship. She possessed the accomplishment of directly making a proposal to Felt and becoming friends with her.

And, it was not only that friend monster, Emilia—

Filóre: “—Friends… with me? Seriously?!”

Making an ostentatious noise, Filóre placed both hands on the table with a thud, jumping at the offer.

Her large crimson eyes trembling violently, looking back and forth between Subaru and Emilia,

Filóre: “No, my apologies. There must have been some sort of mistake. Perhaps I misheard you. You didn’t say friends, you must have said… ah, “friendless”. You meant I have no friends.”

Subaru: “Yikes, this Saintess is far too much of a loner.”

Emilia: “B-But, I might know just how you feel. I was also reaaally anxious when Subaru tried to be friends with me, since I didn’t understand what he might be thinking.”

Subaru: “I’m sorry for making you anxious! My feelings haven’t changed since the start, and have only grown even stronger with the passage of time… ouch! Rem, did you just step on my foot?!”

Rem: “Incorrect. I simply dropped this iron ball.”

Subaru: “You brought the Morningstar with you?!”

Cheerfully, Rem concealed the Morningstar, which she had dropped on top of Subaru’s foot, behind her back. He trembled in fear after she had nearly crushed his foot, but the sight of Rem in a maid uniform, carrying around that spiked iron ball that Subaru had so diligently polished while at the mansion, was heartwarming to see.

Emilia: “Hey, Filóre.”

Ignoring Subaru and Rem, Emilia approached Filóre, who was escaping reality.

Then, when Emilia touched her hands upon the table, Filóre’s shoulders jumped with a start, and she stared at Emilia in astonishment.

Emilia: “Subaru’s the one who suggested it, so by just going along with it, I’m just being reaaally lackadaisical, but how about it, Filóre?”

Filóre: “H-h-how a-about it, you say? I’m, not really sure what you mean… if you don’t say it more clearly, I’ll misunderstand you. Or rather, am I not doing so right now? Is this a dream…?”

Emilia: “No, this isn’t a dream. Besides, let me be clear so you don’t misunderstand me. If you’d like, we… no, let’s be friends together!”

Filóre: “—Yes, of course, very well, I’d be happy to!!”

In an instant, her delicateness and meekness up to that point did an about-face, and Filóre, her face brightening in a flash, clasped Emilia’s hands in return, and the two of them nurtured a new friendship in close quarters.

Despite being overwhelmed by such a speedy development, Subaru sensed that the wind was unmistakably blowing in a favorable direction, and he nodded deeply.

Subaru: “I’m glad we were able to progress the conversation without it turning sour somehow. However, that momentum… it reminds me of when Beako listened to my persuasion.”

Beatrice: “When it came to Betty, it was more romantic and dramatic, in fact! She wasn’t so ravenously starved like this girl, I suppose!”

Subaru: “It hurts, it hurts, it’s cute, it’s cute.”

Upset, with no other outlet for her irritation, Beatrice stamped on the foot opposite the one Rem had nearly crushed, but the weight of it and the way she pouted were adorable.

Furthermore, when he took a glance, Rem was patting her chest as if in relief that Emilia and Filóre were kindling a relationship.

Although it had been something that had to be touched upon, it was a relationship that could have been severed by her. He could surmise what Rem was feeling.

Subaru: “Are you also satisfied, Rem? When it comes to friends?”

Rem: “I don’t believe it is something so simple. Besides, I have Katya-san.”

Subaru: “You don’t really care about how many friends you have? I, for one, consider pretty much everyone I met on the Gladiator Island to be my friend.”

Rem: “I have Katya-san.”

It was quite an obstinate answer. Well, how one categorized their own friends was up to them, so it would be tactless to say much on the matter one way or another.

At the very least, an amicable relationship had been forged between Emilia and Filóre. Could this not be called a historic achievement for both the Emilia Camp and the Church of the Divine Dragon?

Emilia: “I was also able to become friends with Felt-chan, and I’ve promised to become friends with Anastasia-san too, so perhaps I’m good at making friends.”

Emilia was Emilia, and she had gained self-confidence by making multiple friends in a short span of time. At this rate, her momentum might well cause her to end up greeting passersby on the street, one after another, and increase her number of friends that way.

That might not be a bad idea, but while he could not say either way, he felt it might be disgraceful in a different sense, so he would have to put a stop to Emilia’s craving for friends for the time being.

Filóre: “Hey, wait, Emilia… you’ll allow me to call you Emilia, right? We’re friends now, aren’t we? Still, isn’t it a bit cruel to mention the names of friends other than me? It doesn’t really matter, though? It’s fine, but if you could just pay a little more attention to me since we only just became friends…”

Vic.ll20

Filóre was Filóre, and had perhaps been without friends for too long. Her speech had a slight yandere quality to it, as if she was expecting a bit much from her friend.[20]

This was probably due to her desire for friends being overly directed at a single person, so it might be dangerous if she did not make more friends and successfully distribute that desire amongst them. If Rem could not be forced to do so, then it seemed like Subaru, or perhaps Beatrice, would have to take on that role.

Subaru: “But actually, would that be okay from Filóre’s perspective? Of course, the only thing my Emilia-tan has in common with the Witch of Envy is her looks.”

Filóre: “—? Do you have some sort of problem with my Emilia?”

Subaru: “Yikes, this Saintess, it’s no wonder she can’t make friends!”

At this attitude of Filóre’s, who had pulled on the arm of Emilia’s she had grasped, and settled down into her chest, Subaru pressed on his forehead as he thought that this friendship might end up being more troublesome than he anticipated.

Laughing at the exchange between Subaru and Filóre, Emilia hugged her from behind, and,

Emilia: “Geez, settle down. I’m sorry, my friend.”

Subaru: “What the? Why am I having dominance asserted over me right now? Emilia-tan, what am I to you?!”

Emilia: “Huh, Subaru is my Knight, right?”

Subaru: “Right! Phew, that was close. That satisfied my self-esteem.”

The rift between the silver-haired half-elf and the Church of the Divine Dragon that could have arisen had not, but instead, a rift began to arise between Emilia’s one and only Knight and her friend.

—It was on the verge of becoming something much more substantial.

???: "—Filóre, did you kick out Lucien and the others? Didn't you promise to be watched over as proof that you were properly reflecting on your actions?"

Suddenly, the door to the common room was pushed open, and the figure of a young man appeared there.

With a wide-brimmed black hat, clad in attire of deep violet, and with a handsome slender face—once he noticed Filóre, along with Subaru and the others aside from her, within the room, his yellow eyes widening with an "Oya,"

???: "Visitors have arrived, huh? Goodness, those kids, they abandoned their post and didn't even tell me. I'll have to give them a proper scolding later."

Filóre: "Oh, welcome back, Tiga. Hey, look, this girl is Emilia, my friend. Isn't that great? My friend… hehe, friend, hehehe."

With the brim of his hat lowered, the young man's eyes were obscured. Delight overflowing, Filóre introduced Emilia to the young man while still cuddling with her.

She was a beautiful girl, so it was just barely within the acceptable limits, but her face made it appear that she was on the brink of friend addiction.

At Filóre's words, the young man by the name of Tiga said, "Emilia?", and raising an eyebrow, and looking between the aforementioned Emilia, Subaru, and the rest,

Tiga: "I see. I'm also glad you were able to make a friend. However, the way you're making a triumphant face at me is unacceptable. For instance… say, would you be my friend?"

Subaru: "Huh, me?"

Tiga: "Yes, I'm Tiga Rauleon. And you are…?"

Subaru: “Natsuki Subaru. Treat me well, my friend.”

Tiga: “—Ah, likewise, my friend.”

Tiga leisurely walked over and extended his hand, which Subaru shook without any hesitation. He responded effortlessly to the foreign words thrown his way, and he even threw in a wink perfectly. While doing so, he repeated the words “My friend, my friend” over in his mouth a few times, quickly acclimating himself to them.

Meanwhile, Filóre, who had long suffered a friendship deficiency disease, could not hide her shock at the lightning-fast friendship between Subaru and Tiga.

Her eyes widened in astonishment, and pointing at Subaru, then Tiga,

Filóre: “A-Aren’t you scared? What if you get rejected, or something?”

Subaru: “Oi, what’s up with the upbringing where you’re from? She has such a fearless personality, and yet she’s so cowardly only when it comes to making friends, what a strange balance.”

Tiga: “I have no excuse for it. After all, since she has been so strictly sheltered, she craves contact with the outside world. We may have a long association from here on out, so gradually help me tame her. She’s not going to bite you.”

Filóre: “That was an unnecessary comment! There’s no way I would bite! Just who do you think I am?! Aren’t I Emilia’s friend?! And nigh a Saintess!”

Rem: “Is it okay to treat the position of Saintess so lightly…?”

Rem’s murmurs were quite reasonable, as their impressions of Filóre were being tossed all about in a short time.

Be that as it may, the return of Tiga, who appeared to be someone from the Church involved in the matter, probably meant that the discussions at the Castle mentioned previously by Filóre had come to some sort of conclusion.

Tiga: “Indeed, it is so. That said, there’s much we must talk about amongst ourselves. Apologies, but I would like to ask you to leave for today.”

Subaru: “Are you serious, my friend? Isn’t it so distant to have things such as secrets between us?”

Tiga: “Is laying everything bare a requirement for friendship? I’d rather be friends that are considerate about the essential points, and put in an effort together to maintain the relationship between them; how about you?”

Subaru: “It’s no good, I was cleverly rebuffed. Beako, be a sore loser.”

Beatrice: “Unlike with you, there are no such things as trivial secrets between Betty and Subaru, in fact.”

Rem: “That really was just being a sore loser.”

He had not seriously considered what defined a friend, but Tiga’s description had a certain level of persuasiveness, so he was at a disadvantage in continuing to persist.

Therefore, it seemed like they had no choice but to go along with Beatrice being a sore loser, who had understood Subaru’s intentions, and to obediently remove themselves.

Subaru: “Well, we learned a lot. I wasn’t sure until I met her, but for now it seems like Filóre had no intentions of throwing the Royal Selection into chaos.”

Emilia: “Yeah, Filóre is a good girl.”

Filóre: “Hear that, Tiga? That’s my friend.”

Tiga: “I get it, I get it. Thank you for being friends with our Filóre.”

He had wondered what they would do if she refused to detach herself and continued to cling to Emilia forever, but Filóre obediently released Emilia, and so they successfully extracted her without any incidents.

And then, standing next to Filóre in place of Emilia, as she returned to Subaru and the others, removing his hat and bowing elegantly, Tiga,

Tiga: “Thank you, and by the way, it’s not like I’m just chasing off Filóre’s friend and my friend. I have a piece of good news for you as well.”

Subaru: “Good news, for us? What?”

Tiga: “—The word is, that the slumbering Duchess Karsten has awakened.”

Subaru: “—Hk, Crusch-san has…?”

Naturally, Subaru leaned forward, asking for confirmation, and Tiga made a show of giving a fashionable nod. He felt like he had been tricked into giving the reaction that was anticipated of him.

However, he did not mind being tricked. Crusch’s awakening was certainly welcome news.

Subaru: “Emilia-tan, after this…”

Emilia: “Yes, of course. Let’s go visit her. I want to speak with Crusch-san, too.”

Filóre: “Well then, I’ll also tag along with Emilia and the others and —”

Tiga: “Filóre, you’re staying here. You’ll wait with me for Sakura and the rest to return.”

Tiga seized Filóre’s shoulder as she tried to slickly line up with them. Glaring resentfully at that hand of Tiga’s resting on her shoulder, Filóre: “…Isn’t it strange? After all, this is about Duchess Karsten, right? I have a duty to ascertain the results of the Sacrament.

Indeed, a duty. How about it?”

Tiga: “In that case, it wouldn’t make sense if you didn’t also fulfill your duties as a bearer of the Sacrament. Of course, we shall go confirm Duchess Karsten’s condition. But later, as members of the Church.”

Filóre: “Ah, Emilia…”

Emilia: “No, it’s fine, Filóre. I’ll make sure to visit on your behalf, too.”

Filóre: “I’m not getting through?! Even though you’re my friend?!”

She had estimated her friend too highly.

In any case, although he felt bad for Filóre, his desire to verify Crusch’s safety weighed quite heavily on Subaru. That was exactly why he wished to leave right away.

Subaru: “Let’s talk again at another time. I’m glad I got to speak with you today. So, that’s it.”

Filóre: “How perfunctory! I’m not okay with… Mmhmmm mmhmmm-”

Tiga: “Allow me to handle this, and go on ahead!”

Restraining Filóre, who was still brimming with lingering attachments, Tiga assumed the role of a villain and saw them off with an excessively reassuring statement.

And so, despite their feelings of reluctance, Subaru and the others slipped away from the church.

Boy 1: “Aww, leaving already?”

Boy 2: “How was Onee-chan? How was she?”

Girl: “It didn’t go anywhere after all, huh? Good grief, she’s hopeless without us.”

And, as they left the church, the children who had been playing with Filóre saw them off. It was a rather scathing assessment, but it was accurate nonetheless.

In any case—

Subaru: "—Wait for us, Crusch-san. There's so much we want to talk to you about."

Indeed, unable to contain his restless feelings, Subaru's pace only quickened.

3

—And so, after seeing off the fleeing Emilia Camp who had turned up there, Tiga released his restraint on Filóre.

Freed, Filóre staggered and placed both hands on the table, following the lingering vestiges of Emilia and the others, as she turned to scowl at Tiga.

Tiga: "What a look your eyes have. Is there something you want to say to me?"

Filóre: "Hate you…"

Tiga: "Don't just say nasty words! It couldn't be helped. There are things we must discuss, and the fact remains that Duchess Karsten has awakened."

Filóre: "Hmph. The outstandingly sociable Tiga Rauleon-san wouldn't understaaand."

Turning away while pouting, Filóre then picked up her own untouched cup of tea from the table and took a sip.

The course of the conversation had unfolded so tumultuously that she truly did not have a single moment to drink her tea until now.

Tiga's yellow eyes narrowed as he observed Filóre's profile, but—

Tiga: "Even so, of all people, it had to be Emilia-sama."

Filóre: “…What about her? No way, even you with the silver-haired half-elf stuff?”

Tiga: “There’s that too. However, it’s more than that. —Filóre, the insignia?”

Asked this by Tiga, Filóre produced the insignia from her pocket after looking a bit embarrassed. When she opened her clasped hand, the crimson Dragon Gem’s light blossomed.

While gazing at that—nay, while gazing at that light and the girl who had made it gleam, Filóre, he muttered.

That was—

Tiga: “—We’re going to be busy from here on out. After all, we are a year and a half behind, huh.”

Interlude:
“—Why?”

1

—When I discovered that flower bud, yet to blossom, in that courtyard, I unwittingly halted my feet.

It was a courtyard with blossoming flowers of all kinds and hues.

Regrettably, I was not very well-versed in the names or varieties of flowers, but I had heard that these were precious blossoms that had budded from seeds brought from all over the country.

That was how expansive and ornate this flower garden was. The gardeners entrusted with its care must have found their labor’s fruit worthwhile. The refinement of this flower garden was truly proof of such.

In all honesty, when I had first entered the courtyard, I did not harbor many expectations for its flower garden, brimming with color.

I was already deficient in the sensitivity to admire flowers, and did not bear much interest in the courtyard at my parents’ home. Even though I had been spoiled by my sympathetic father and allowed onto this land—the Royal Castle of the Royal Capital Lugunica, I did not estimate myself so highly as to expect my inclusion in the discussions between responsible adults.

Thus, with no other choice, to kill time until the business of my father and the others had concluded, I stepped into the courtyard and was unwittingly bewitched by that flower bud.

???: “…”

What lay before my amber gaze was a large bud with its head drooping.

Enclosed within it were petals with a faint tinge of red, and the reason for my captivation by the bud, yet to blossom, was because my own self, sojourned with an unescaping frustration, seemed to overlap with that flower bud—was a rather poetic thought, and far too excess of an intoxication with myself.

But, it was true that I empathized with the flower bud, yet to bloom its marvel in the midst of a flowerbed blossoming with outsize flowers, their florescence proclaiming their enchanting allure till the very horizons.

—Just what is it that I am capable of, and what is it that is desired of me?

???: “I am…”

Blessed in my birth, blessed in my pedigree, blessed in talent: this conceit I did possess.

I also possessed something akin to a purpose that I must live up to fruits of outcome even greater than those that would correspond to my birth, my pedigree, my talent.

And finally, I possessed the self-awareness that this conceit and this purpose were fatally incompatible with my own desire.

???: “…”

If I were to say it, then amidst the blossoms of flower seeds planted in that flower garden, I was the sole immature seed that remained a flower bud, fostering doubts for how to bloom.

The other seeds bore no doubt, no indecision, and discerned their domains, comprehended them, and implemented themselves fulfillingly.

And yet, I was—

???: “…Just, what kind of a flower will you blossom?”

I inquired so of the flower bud and sealed my breathing, met with silence incapable of responding. Enveloped in the sweet scent of the fragrant blooms, I failed to understand or be understood by even the flower bud with whom I had felt a camaraderie.

After all, what my insolent self wished for was not to blossom into a grand, enrapturing, and vivid flower, but rather to become a gigantic tree that would protect those flowers from wind and rain.

Yes, I found myself who bore this doomed desire to be a futile, comical existence—

???: "Fuwagh?!"

—That moment, something fell onto the flowerbed of swaying buds, in the company of a terribly unseemly shriek.

???: "—Hk."

I widened my eyes upon the abrupt happening, rendered immobile as though my feet were stitched to the ground.

Within my blank white mind, all thoughts suspended, resounded the delayed echo of an alarm bell warning of danger, and the plentitudes of mental preparation and first responses in such a circumstance.

But, before I could haul them out of the depths of my mind, the personage who had fallen onto the flowerbed before my eyes, nearly face-first, sprung himself upright,

???: "Koff kaff! Koffack! Ptui! Wh-What is that, mud? Mud?!"

Vocalizing so, whilst disheveling his beautiful, golden hair and blinking his eyes that were red as glimmering jewels, the young boy who had grandiosely smeared himself with soil crawled, crawled, and crawled himself out of the flowerbed.

That was—

???: "Oh~, as expected of my eminent self… despite imagining it to be the end of the line by falling onto a paving stone head-first, it would seem my eminent self can shrug off even such predicaments with my natural fortune…"

—That was, my first reminiscence with the last Lion King.

2

???: “—Ah.”

A hoarse breath escapes me, and my consciousness returns to life.

My five senses begin to awaken, and a myriad of information is successively dispatched into my brain. —In that moment, the most powerful beseechment to my mind and body is that of inescapable, vehement thirst.

???: “…”

Thirst, yet it is not simply the mere thirst of the throat. Not enough. Not enough. Not enough. In every single conceivable place inside my body, there is not enough water. They are craving moisture, starving for hydration.

My nasal cavity that is the passageway for air and my throat are both thirsty, my gastric lining that digests food is thirsty, even upon blinking my eyeballs become thirsty, the veins that should be circulating blood throughout my whole body are thirsty, and my soul that beseeched this deficiency is thirsty.

Thirst. It is thirst. Thirst is eating to rot my lifeline.

???: “—Aegh, ah.”

My mouth is so thirsty, that my numb tongue is unable to enunciate a proper sound.

Wanting to do something about this thirst, I tried to call for someone. I can’t vocalize any voice. Rather than calling for someone, moving myself will be faster. —No, I cannot even conceive of it. Like how someone who is drowning ends up drowning their rescuer by clinging to them, my mind has turned into a blank slate from the thirst.

My body, thirsted to its utmost, I beseech it from the top of my head to the ends of my feet and scrape together the meager strength that is left in my body and somehow try to upraise myself. I upraise myself. I try to stand up. I stand up. I try to walk. I start walking. I try to search. I search.

???: “—Ah.”

Desperate. I am desperate.

In my mind that is tyrannized by thirst, I admonish myself that this is my last chance.

If I halt my feet, if I slip and fall, if I make even a single error, I won’t be able to do the same thing again. I won’t be able to search. I won’t be able to walk. I won’t be able to stand up. I won’t be able to upraise myself.

I will sink in the deluge of this aimless, barren thirst, and never again, never again, never again—

???: “…”

With every fragment of strength in my frail body, I somehow push open the heavy door and exit outside. As I curse this thirst of my body that would verge on defeat by even the faintest of breezes, I compel my gaze to swivel.

My vision is bleary, difficult to see. Narrow. I immediately discern it is due to one of my eyes being covered. But, even before my vision is secured, a faint, fragrant aroma carried upon the breeze wafts to me.

Lured by it, I tilt my head to discover. —A vase with amber and pink flowers arranged therein.

???: “—Hk.”

No time to think. I pounce at the vase, as though flopping onto it.

As though tearing at it, I extirpate the adorned flowers and tilt the vase in my grasp with both of my arms. And, as though showering in the water that was arranged for the flowers, I drink, drink, drink.

The spilled water traces the edges of my lips and my cheeks, dousing my nape, drenching even my black nightgown. I don’t mind. In a violent fit of coughing, I discard the vase, and the sound of shattering porcelain reverberates.

???: “Eough, eough…”

I violently wipe my mouth with the back of my hand, and turn around. Vases are set in the corridor at even intervals. I approach one with greater strength regained in my feet, throw the flowers aside, and gulp down the water. Toss away the vase. And again I make for the next vase.

Repeating this twice, thrice, pouring water onto my parched body, whilst retrieving my own existence from the thirst, I once again make for the next vase—

???: “—You musn’t!”

Accompanied by a piercing call, my wrist is seized and I turn backward.

The one gripping my wrist, frozen in place with eyes dilated, restraining me is an aged, white-haired butler—before I could haul out the memories of who he was, submerged in thirst as they were, a mired, violent emotion overspills from me.

???: “Let me go!”

My right arm apprehended, I swing my left hand and clobber the opponent’s body with all my might.

I literally hold nothing back. I attack to smash his bones or cleave his flesh, but the aged butler effortlessly parries this with another hand and brings it to a close with both sides unscathed.

Physique, ability, experience, I could discern a sprawling plethora of reasons for it. —But, I won’t stop.

???: “Let me go! Let me go~! Let me go this instant…!”

A strike for each word; for each swing of the arm I am reminded of how to swing, my precision augmenting.

However, no matter how sharp my fingertips are as they rend through the wind, the aged butler defends against them without a modicum of trouble. I can gradually feel the creeping shivers of thirst seeming to crawl up from beneath my feet.

???: “I’m begging you, please let me go! My throat… is parched… I’m thirsty… so thirsty, so thirsty, so thirsty so thirsty so thirsty, I can’t tolerate it… hk.”

???: “Please calm down and compose yourself. I will provide you with water right away. To add to that, you mustn’t walk barefoot. You must receive treatment.”

???: “Water… rea… lly? You have… water…?”

???: “I do. I shall bring it immediately. But before that, please receive treatment.”

The vigor that wrings my body in desperation steadily dissipates at the aged butler’s entreaty.

The thirst yet subsists. The thirst is marginally better than what I had experienced right upon waking up. If he has the water to cure that thirst, then I am glad. It’s a huge help. I’m very grateful.

???: “Treatment…”

As my body gradually relaxes its strength, I incidentally cast my gaze downward upon that incongruous word.

I look to discover that by the aged butler’s and my own feet, are bestrewed red vestiges left on the carpet lying on the corridor. They start midway through the corridor and terminate below my feet. — It’s blood. I didn’t take notice, but I must have stepped upon the broken shards of the smashed vases, and drenched the corridor with bloodstains, it would seem.

What I had trampled underfoot was not just the shards, but also the flowers I had thrown aside from those vases. The trampled, scattered petals meld with the efflux of blood, painting dreadfully foul, mottled patterns.

Dreadfully, foul, mottled patterns. —In that moment, ominous black mottled patches flash through my mind.

???: “—Aa, AAA, AAAAA!!”

My slender throat howls a screech, writhing in agony.

He must have let his guard down, as I was seeming to calm down for a moment. The aged butler’s restraint unfastens in reaction, and I flail my liberated arms to rend my drenched nightgown, to inspect my body.

Coiling bandages, and pallid, wearied skin bereft of color—the parts those bandages are concealing, repulsive black patches drape over my entire frame, cursing this body with toxic venom.

???: “NOOO, FERRIS! FERRIS!! WHERE?! WHERE ARE YOU?!”

The wailing screams escape from me, as my own body seems to me something so unsalvageably defiled.

I don’t want to rip off the bandages and witness what lies underneath. The ugly black patches concealed beneath the dressings, I don’t want them on my body for even a second longer.

I don’t want to look at them.

I don’t want to touch them.

I don’t want to come close to them.

I don’t want to be defiled.

I would rather, just die—

???: “—Crusch-sama!”

This ugly, repulsive body of mine is captured by two slender arms from behind.

They do not pinion me. They have not come attempting to stop me with any such physical technique. I am only being embraced by those arms wrapping around me from my back, purely by force and impulse.

If I wanted to shake free from them, I could. But, not an iota of such intent surfaces within my mind.

My body is simply, as I entrust it, faintly enveloped in a fleeting, radiating blue light.

???: "It's alright, I am right here. I am here, right next to Crusch-sama…"

???: "Ferr… is…"

Ferris: "Yes, yes, hk. That's right. It's Ferris."

The arms coiled around my body tighten their embrace, yet I feel neither ache nor fear.

When I take notice, I have already collapsed at that spot, sitting slumped upon the floor. Naturally, the person hugging me—Ferris, has also sunk to the floor of the corridor with me.

I incline my head to peer, and right there is the lovable boy's face, close enough for our breaths to intertwine. His round pupils quivering in tears, as he is earnestly endeavoring to not let his facial expression collapse, he appears so very beloved and gallant.

In natural spontaneity, the sense of rejection toward all things which brims inside my body dispels.

???: "…But, I am scared. I am still scared. My… body… those black mottled patches… are still…"

???: "Crusch-sama, if you are concerned about that matter, then that has already been—"

Ferris: "—Wil-jii."

As the aged butler is about to say something, Ferris calls him so and cuts him off. Upon sustaining Ferris's glance, Wilhelm—yes, Wilhelm. He's Wilhelm. The aged butler is Wilhelm, is the Sword Demon, is a preeminent swordsman, is a dependable person.

Wilhelm at my front, Ferris at my back; I am interposed between them.

???: "I… am…"

Ferris: "Please listen, Crusch-sama. You need not worry about your body. —Please excuse me."

???: "—Ah."

As he embraces my trembling, racking body, soothing my faltering gaze, Ferris's hand slowly begins to unravel the wrapped bandages. I can only gasp at his tender yet terrifying action, unable to do anything but view as those dressings slowly come undone.

The frayed nightgown that I had rended from the neck to the breast with my own hands, the skin peeking from its gaps comes bare and unconcealed—absent from there are the patches I had feared, as my eyes begin to widen.

???: "Eh…"

Ferris: "It is not only here. From your arms, your shoulders, your legs… the patches have been removed."

Whilst pronouncing so, Ferris unwraps the bandaging on my collar as well, and elevates my arm as I stand stunned. While it does seem parched, desolate from the thirst, all traces of those black mottled patches have disappeared from my arm.

And at last, I notice. —That torment, as though cauterizing my body, as though boiling, scalding water torrenting throughout my entire body, has come to cease without my awareness.

The thirst, persists. Its remnants are yet there.

However, that is the thirst which craves for life that my body is seeking after having broken free from that torment.

???: “Ferris… that curse… did you? From my body…”

Ferris: “…”

The leeway to reflect upon myself is birthed in my heart, as my mind finally arrives at it.

Whilst I continued to rot in that torment, every morning, every evening, every day, Ferris had devoted his power to exhaustion in order to heal it, in full intrepidity and sincerity.

His wish has borne fruit, and he has rescued me from that prison of anguish—

Ferris: “—No, that’s incorrect. I was… unable to do anything.”

However, those questions and anticipations are repudiated by none other than Ferris himself.

Shaking his head, disappointment sojourning in his yellow pupils—imbued with a deep dye of dejection and despondency toward himself, he gently touches my arm from which those patches have vanished as I swallow my breath, watching his lips quiver in trepidation.

He wavers to voice what he must, resolves himself, then wavers yet again, repeating this cycle a number of times, before Ferris finally commits to his determination and vocalizes it.

That being—

Ferris: “In order to heal your body, Crusch-sama, we turned to the cooperation of the Church of the Divine Dragon.”

???: “…Huh.”

Ferris: “A girl who named herself as a Saintess of the Church lent us her strength. I was… unable to aid you, Crusch-sama… I’m truly, very sorry.”

With enough tears to fill a cup in his eyes, Ferris speaks with a quavering voice, to which I am rendered voiceless.

Steadily, my brain, released from the agony, progressively being liberated from the mighty thirst, comprehends the significance of the words he has spoken.

The Church of the Divine Dragon—it is an organization that harbors deep, profound faith in the existence and grace of the Divine Dragon who has protected the Kingdom of Lugunica since antiquity, and lends assistance in maintaining peace and calm for the citizens of the Kingdom.

Forbidden from involving itself in the body politic for the purpose of prohibiting their actions from carrying too much influence, the Church of the Divine Dragon's faith and fidelity, whilst agreeable as a legitimate and splendid thing, to the contrary is something we couldn't easily recognize—for the being that the Church of the Divine Dragon esteems to the utmost, and our way of being, are fully irreconcilable with one another.

???: "—The Dragon."

The Church of the Divine Dragon follows and proffers gratitude toward the Covenant formed between the Kingdom and the Divine Dragon. —That is to say, the preservation of the Covenant is the first priority for the Kingdom's prosperity above all else for them, and the members of the Royal Family who were lost to an inordinately unmerciful blight have been regarded as cogs for the Covenant, the same philosophy as the Kingdom.

—With the same values that disposed his death, the death of Fourier Lugunica, as merely an act of nature.

???: "—Hk."

A chill creeps up through me, the surge of formless emotions bayonet my chest, I feel nauseous.

The thoughts, images, sentiments surfacing in my mind all give a chaotic stimulus to my five senses, light kindles my hearing, odor kindles my vision, ache kindles my taste, voice kindles my touch, taste kindles my smell, things that ought not originally have connection join forces and crusade upon me.

—Why, did that name come forth?

—Why, did that smile emerge in my mind?

—Why, did his voice resound in my ears?

—Why, did I feel that face from those reminiscences?

—Why, did I remember the taste of the blood and tears that grieved his death?

—Why, did Crusch Karsten, remember Fourier Lugunica?

Crusch: "—Ah."

A sensation of revival.

The loss and purpose, the loving affection and sorrow, the rage and joy, the warmth and glacial cold. —That person, eternally estranged and forever distant, the pleasant recollections and unpleasant attachments of him coalesce together, meld together.

But… I am… lethally aware… of one thing.

Crusch: "—The Royal Selection."

A note spills from my trembling lips, to which Ferris's shoulders shudder, and even Wilhelm, whose face I can't see, I can tell firmly stiffens his body.

We are irreconcilable with the Church of the Divine Dragon. Never, could we reconcile with one another.

It is nobody but ourselves who chose, determined, and declared that we could never keep pace, or view the same sights together with them.

And yet, if you're saying I was saved by one whose power we absolutely must never borrow.

Crusch: "Ferris—"

Ferris: "—Yes."

When I call his name, Ferris's voice bears no tremors.

Giving a short bow, his gaze straightforward, forging a resilient expression, he does not avert his eyes. His yellow eyes tell that, regardless of what he may be told now, he has made this choice and has resolved himself for it.

Crusch: "…"

I must say it to him.

I know his reasons. For why he had no other choice but to select that option.

I know it was to save nobody else, but myself.

Just what days of anguish must he have endured as he remained by my side as I continued to rot, every morning, every evening, every day.

Unable to save what he wished to save, with how much powerlessness of his healing hands had he been forced to contend; I had seen it up close, from the closest of distances, with my own eyes, and that's why.

That's why, I must say it to him.

"I'm so sorry for making you worry. I understand what you must be feeling."

Crusch: "…"

That's why, I must say it to him.

"I forced you to take a bitter decision. But, its responsibility rests upon me."

Crusch: "…"

That's why, I must say it to him.

"Please don't lament. It is thanks to you that I am in this condition at this moment.”

Crusch: “…”

I must say it.

I must say it. I must say it. I must say it. I must say it. I must say it. I must say it I must say it I must say it I must say it I must say it I must say it I must say it I must say it I must say it say it say it say it say it say it say it say it say it say it say it say it say it say it—

Crusch: “—Why?”

As though cascading forth, this spills out. This.

This, completely dissimilar in warmth and texture from the words I thought I must say.

Crusch: “Shouldn’t you, have known?”

Stop it, stop it right this instant. Shut your mouth, close your eyes, and lacquer your consciousness.

The things before your eyes, everything that has transpired, the choices that were made, avert your eyes from all of them, forget all of them, defy all of them.

Crusch: “Ferris, you alone, were supposed to be the same as me, and yet.”

I must not say it. I must not let him hear it. I must not let him learn it.

After all, he tried to save me. After all, he devoted his prayers for me. After all, all he did was wish to remove the suffering of what he loves.

That’s why, I must not say it.

Crusch: “—Why?”

I must not.

Crusch: “Why, did you betray our vow to Prince Fourier?”

—That I would have rather died, than betray that person.

Chapter 8:
The Consequences of a Choice

1

???: “—We cannot thank you enough for your continued concern for our household.”

???: “No, it’s only natural. It’s not something you should be thanking us for.”

Saying so, with feelings of great embarrassment from the hospitality shown by the individual who had served him tea—in response to these words of Wilhelm’s, Subaru hurriedly shook both of Beatrice’s arms, who sat upon his lap.

As she stared intently at that behavior of Subaru’s, his state of anxiety was probably conveyed to Beatrice through his heartbeat against her back. She sighed as if she had no other choice, continuing to act as Subaru’s puppet.

—Presently, having concluded their meeting with Filóre, who had thrown the Royal Selection into a maelstrom of chaos, upon hearing the news of Crusch’s awakening from the Church of the Divine Dragon, Subaru and company had been unable to contain themselves, and thus headed directly for the Karsten residence in the Noble District.

Of course, if they were to conform to proper etiquette, it would have been necessary to schedule an appointment before visiting. However, despite forgetting even that and their visit not receiving a single mark in regards to high society’s standards, they still were warmly received.

Wilhelm had ushered them into a parlor, and the four of them sat side-by-side on a couch (with Beatrice on Subaru’s lap) as they impatiently waited for the arrival of that moment.

Likely noticing Subaru’s air of restlessness, Wilhelm, bowing deeply, Wilhelm: “It shall take just a bit more time for Crusch-sama to be ready. My heartfelt apologies.”

Subaru: “No, no, we’re the ones who came here so suddenly. If anything, I’m just grateful we weren’t turned away.”

Wilhelm: “As if we could turn you away. Crusch-sama, too, was most pleased to have you and Emilia-sama come to visit, Subaru-dono.”

Subaru: “No, no, no, when it comes to that it’s the other way around, or perhaps I should say it might be the other way around. I might even cry when I see Crusch-san awake…”

As pathetic as it sounded, there was a very real possibility that such would come to pass, so he hoped that Wilhelm, Emilia, and the rest would be able to prepare themselves in advance for that.

At present, all he could do to endure his restless thoughts was shake Beatrice’s arms back and forth coinciding with each “No” he would give in response to Wilhelm.

Beatrice: “But, no matter how you look at it, you’re swinging Betty’s arms around way too much, in fact! That’s enough, these arms and shoulders are getting sore, I suppose!”

Subaru: “Guh… sorry, my bad, excuse me, I just can’t calm myself down. After all…”

Beatrice, who had been acting as Subaru’s calming doll, finally reached the limits of her patience and barked at him. Poking at Beatrice’s cheek, Subaru paused there for a moment.

Vexing, restless feelings filled his mind. However, it was worth bearing with them.

Subaru: “After all, Crusch-san is…”

Wilhelm: “—Indeed. Regarding that, there is no doubt.”

Filled with a torrent of emotions, Subaru sighed, to which Wilhelm assented with equally profound sentiments. —No, to call them equal would be far too impudent.

Wilhelm's relief must have been many times, many dozens of times, greater than Subaru's. The recovery of the one to whom he had sworn to devote his fealty: that alone would be a colossal occurrence.

Emilia: "I've said it many times already, Wilhelm-san, but I'm truly grateful."

Indeed, it was Emilia, seated next to Subaru, who once again showed her appreciation for the efforts of Wilhelm.

Emilia, who had been present when Filóre had administered the Sacrament of the Church to treat Crusch, had also shown her appreciation for Wilhelm and Ferris that same day. In spite of that, since Crusch's consciousness had not returned after that, now having the opportunity to speak with the awakened Crusch, Emilia's amethyst eyes shone with anticipation yet again.

Beatrice: "Good grief, at this point, what careless blunders you two might make are frightening, in fact. Rem, if you and Betty don't stay on guard here, this may well end up as a disaster, I suppose."

Rem: "I agree. Leave it to me when things go too far. I'm slowly getting used to the handling and weight of this iron ball, bit by bit."

Amidst Subaru's and Emilia's inability to calm down, Beatrice and Rem kept their composure as visitors of one in recovery; it was exceedingly reassuring to know that the two of them were prepared for when it would matter most, but the slight movements of Rem, combined with the sound of chains, were also frightening and exciting.

It seemed like Subaru would also need to wield considerable resolve when asking Rem for support.

Subaru: "Oh yeah, speaking of supporting, what about Ferris? Is he helping Crusch-san with her change of clothes? There are a number of things I want to talk to him about, too."

Suddenly realizing that the visage of one who ought to have been present could not be found, Subaru had such suspicions.

Subaru, Wilhelm, and the rest had the unanticipated joy of Crusch's recovery. However, the one who must have been experiencing that the strongest of all would have been none other than Crusch's one and only Knight.

Of course, it surely was also a terribly bitter feeling for him, that despite being a healer, Crusch's salvation came via the Church of the Divine Dragon, but Subaru held no doubt that Ferris was the sort of person who would rejoice in the well-being of Crusch more than wallow in his own reproachful feelings, born of his sense of powerlessness.

However—

Wilhelm: "…"

Subaru: "—? Wilhelm-san?"

For but an instant, Wilhelm's face stiffened, and in response, Subaru raised an eyebrow in confusion. Yet, Wilhelm swiftly rebuffed that tension with a "Pardon me", saying,

Wilhelm: "Ferris, well… in truth, he is feeling a bit unwell. It would seem that, immediately following that which transpired regarding Crusch-sama's health, every bit of the anxiety he had been bearing until that point erupted all at once."

Emilia: "Oh no, did something happen after that…? I'm worried for Ferris. Even though Crusch-san was finally able to wake up, Ferris might blame himself for falling ill."

Subaru: "Yeah, that's true. Wilhelm-san, is Ferris in bad shape?"

Wilhelm: "…No, things should improve with some rest. Nevertheless, I would ask that you refrain from visiting him for now. I believe that he himself would not wish to interfere with the feelings of everyone who has come to visit Crusch-sama."

Emilia: "I don't think it would be interfering, but… yes, I understand. We'll do it next time."

If it was not one thing, it was another, but if it was truly as Wilhelm had said, then Emilia would nod in assent with his suggestion, and Subaru would also be in agreement with that.

They also planned to sojourn in the Royal Capital a while longer. Even if they were to miss him today, there would be another opportunity to thank Ferris. For now, his wishes ought to be respected. —And, it was just as they caught their breath in that moment.

???: "—I am terribly sorry to have kept you waiting."

Witnessing the individual who had opened the parlor door and spoken so, Subaru rose to his feet in spite of himself.

Appearing there, at the entrance to the room, was a beautiful woman clad in a dark nightgown and pink shawl, with a well-proportioned and slender build, and her distinctive green hair—that person was Crusch Karsten.

Subaru: "…"

The last time he had seen her, Crusch had been gasping in agony, in a state where it was excruciating to even lift herself out of her bed. He was overflowing with profound emotion and joy beyond all expectations that she was standing on her own two feet, appearing before Subaru and everyone else in this manner.

However, as she looked at Subaru with an ephemeral smile upon her lips, half of her face was still wrapped in a bandage that covered her left eye, and that was what invariably caught his attention initially—

Crusch: "Please rest assured. This bandage is only here as I still am having a bit of difficulty seeing out of one eye, but the majority of the abnormality… no, the abnormality has been eliminated."

Subaru: "Ah…"

Crusch: "Thus, please do not look so forlorn."

Upon being told this, Subaru, the one who ought to have come to visit her, had instead regretted making her worry over him.

He had been taken aback that the bandages covering her face still remained, but even more remarkable than that was the fact that Crusch had come to see Subaru and the others, standing on her own accord.

Crusch's condition had been so grave, that it had seemed an absurd tribulation.

Subaru: "…"

Crusch: "—Subaru-sama?"

Suddenly, seeing Subaru sink into silence, Crusch, who had been smiling, narrowed her amber eye. Being stared at by only one of the pair, Subaru chose his words with caution.

After all, if he erred in even a single word or breath, it felt like all of his self-restraint would spill over, as if drops of water, then and there.

Subaru: "…Say, Crusch-san. I had a lot of things, truly a lot, that I wanted to say, and most of them were things like "I'm sorry", or "It was my fault", just those sorts of words of apology alone."

Crusch: "—. Yes."

Subaru: "But, seeing you in person like this, Crusch-san, all that will come up is stuff like "Thank goodness", or "I'm so relieved", just those sorts of things. I'm so, so relieved…"

As a visitor to a sickbed, he should have prepared the perfect things to say in advance.

While on the way to visit the mansion in this situation, and during the period of time in which he had waited, he had been frantically simulating the best words of sympathy he could think of in his mind, and he had thought he had narrowed it down to the best option.

And yet, all of that had vanished the moment he had encountered the real Crusch, and what came to him was naught but a sense of relief, like that of a child, infantile and incoherent.

Crusch: "…"

In response to the words of Subaru's pathetic self-admission being wrung out, Crusch's eye widened for a split second, before she immediately regained the gentle smile upon her lips once more.

Crusch: "I am also relieved to hear you say so. I have shown my unsightly side to you so often, Subaru-sama, that I wondered whether I might soon exhaust all fondness you may have for me."

Subaru: "Of course not! Never, never, there is no way that ever would happen! I mean, I shouldn't keep someone who's in recovery standing as we talk. Umm, please take a seat."

Crusch: "Hehe, then allow me to do so."

Despite his panicked pace being thrown off, Subaru offered her the chair before her, and giggling with a hand covering her mouth, Crusch followed her escort. Somehow, Subaru had ended up making the arrangements, but since it was the other person's abode, it was only natural that it made her laugh.

Subaru, whose speech had become hopelessly awkward, while watching as Crusch sat down with Wilhelm's assistance, gazing reproachfully at Emilia and the others right next to him,

Subaru: "Hey, isn't it unfair that I'm the only one scurrying around? Why am I being made to do all this, huh?"

Emilia: "That's because Subaru was the one worried the most about Crusch-san, right? That's why I thought you might want to be the first to talk."

Rem: "As for me, I'm not in a position to intrude presently. Besides, there is the matter of what happened to Beatrice-chan as well."

Subaru: "What happened to Beako… huh? Why is Beako on Rem's lap? Weren't you sitting on my lap?"

Beatrice: “That was the case, but getting blown away was the result of Subaru’s force when he stood up, in fact! If Rem hadn’t caught her so adeptly, being sprawled out in the middle of the room right now would be probable, I suppose!”

Subaru: “I-Is that so? My bad. You were, quite literally, out of sight…”

Beatrice: “What an awful way of putting it, in fact!”

Puffing out her cheeks, Beatrice obstinately hugged Rem. Leaving it to Rem, who readily accepted that embrace, Subaru also reflected on how he had been too oblivious to his surroundings.

And, hearing that exchange between Subaru and the others, Crusch’s smile further deepened with a “Hehe”. To that reaction of Crusch’s, Emilia, narrowing her amethyst eyes,

Emilia: “I apologize for everyone being so lively when we came here to visit you.”

Crusch: “No, I cannot say I mind such liveliness. Besides, the fact that you came to visit me as soon as you heard the news… it made me happy.”

Emilia: “In that case, it’s no problem… Ah, but, I’ll make sure they don’t frolic too much.”

Concerned about Crusch’s health, Emilia appended a comment very typical of her at the end.

One could perceive the consideration there, and the intent to carefully choose her words. In spite of the setting, Emilia’s clear growth was apparent.

Of course, it would not be a good idea to take Crusch’s words too much at face value, but—

Subaru: “How is your body feeling?”

Crusch: “Indeed. It is much better. It will likely take a while longer to recover my strength, but I do not foresee any major problems.”

Replying like that, Crusch readjusted the position of the shawl draped upon her shoulders. Her complexion was still a bit pale, as one would expect from someone recovering from illness, but her responses were natural, and her sagacity had not dimmed.

From what he could see, the manner in which she walked and such was normal, and aside from the bandage covering her left eye, there seemed to be no vestiges of that day remaining upon her. For the time being, he could breathe a sigh of relief.

Although—

Crusch: “I have been informed of what has happened while I was bedridden… Including the news that Priscilla-sama has passed away.”

If that sagacity was still alive and well, then Crusch surely comprehended that this was also not a situation where she could simply unreservedly rejoice in the rehabilitation of her own health.

Subaru & Company: “…”

Despite knowing it was an unavoidable topic, it had seemed inappropriate to broach it so soon. When none other than Crusch herself brought it up, the faces of Subaru’s group tensed.

On this occasion, he wished to congratulate Crusch on her recovery, and if possible, table the in-depth discussions regarding the Royal Selection for another time—it appeared she desired no such consolation.

Crusch: “As far as I can recollect, I hardly exchanged a single word with Priscilla-sama. However, that she held her own convictions, and that she participated in the battle for Pristella… and by extension, the Royal Selection, of this there can be no doubt. It is for that very reason, that we must continue the Royal Selection for her, as well.”

Emilia: “—. Yes, I thought the same. For Priscilla’s sake, we can’t stay discouraged forever. That’s what I think.”

Crusch: “That is right. Good. You also think so too, Emilia-sama.”

Breathing a sigh of relief before the nodding Emilia, Crusch took a sip from her cup of black tea. Wetting her lips and tongue with it, she stared at her with the amber radiance of only her right eye, and continuing her words with “In that case”,

Crusch: “I believe you would assent to the fact that, presently, that which should be of most consequence is the stability of the Kingdom. The deeds of the Witch Cult are certainly a matter of great regret with respect to the Royal Selection, but to spare too much time dealing with such countermeasures would be misguided, considering the original notion of the Royal Selection.”

Emilia: “Mmm, I get that too. The Royal Selection is to decide the future of the Kingdom, not to do something about the Witch Cult. That’s what you mean, right?”

Crusch: “Yes, that is correct. Certainly, handling such things is indeed a matter that ought to be dealt with by those who govern, but us putting it foremost is precisely what they desire. We all must remember this. Our duty in the Royal Selection itself.”

Emilia: “In that case, Felt-chan is also in the Royal Capital. It doesn’t seem like Anastasia-san has been able to return yet, but if you would like to discuss it all together, I’d be happy to—”

Interrupting Emilia mid-sentence with “—In addition”, Crusch leaned forward slightly. For an instant, Emilia felt as if the blade of a drawn sword had been trained upon her, and her eyes widened.

Ignoring that reaction from Emilia, as the light in Crusch’s amber eye grew all the more intense,

Crusch: “I have heard. The Tower of the Sage… the path to the Pleiades Watchtower has been cleared. I am impressed with the results you have achieved. If that Tower holds a hidden power as rumored, it will surely serve as a deterrent to the other countries. We, alongside the Council of Wise Men, must carefully discuss how to deal with this.”

Emilia: “Crusch-san…”

Crusch: “The crucial Dragonkindling Ceremony… the deadline for elections to decide the next Monarch is less than a year and a half away. From this point forward, the merits of each camp’s contentions will be questioned even more. Now, more than ever, we must observe the faces of those around us, and lend an ear to their voices.”

Emilia: “Wait a minute, Crusch-san, I want to talk with you. Don’t be in such a hurry. Right now—”

Crusch: “—I!”

Emilia: “—Hk.”

Crusch’s words overflowed incessantly without pause, and the instant Emilia tried to constrain that torrent with her own feelings, a powerful voice tore through the parlor.

The cup of black tea in Crusch’s grasp was violently returned to its saucer, tea spilling alongside a shrill sound. Wilhelm took Crusch’s hand at once, put a handkerchief over the hand of his lord that had been doused in tea, and then immediately cleared away the cup.

Meanwhile, Crusch, who simply allowed that to happen, never took her eye off of Subaru and the others, not even for a single instant.

Without averting her gaze, her thin lips trembling,

Crusch: “I… am I wrong…?”

Emilia: “…”

Her tone, which had been imbued with a resolute intelligence until just a moment prior, fell into disarray, her question drenched in tears.

In reality, there were no tears welling up in Crusch’s eye. However, her voice was crying. The vastness of that discrepancy between logic and emotion brutally hewed Subaru’s heart to pieces.

She understood. Crusch understood.

She was sagacious, possessed great knowledge, and diligently worked to continually confront numerous duties and challenges, so it hardly mattered whether Subaru or the others chose their words carefully or not.

That the way she had been saved, had not befitted the Monarch she yearned to be; she understood.

Subaru: "…That's… such a stupid thing to say."

Gritting his molars, Subaru reflected on the conviction that had been born within himself, by himself.

Absurd; he could not help but consider it a truly absurd thing to say. To say that the way she had been saved was wrong, was as if to say that it would have been better for Crusch to continue suffering under the malice of Lust, even now.

What a stupid thing to say. Why would one as admirable as Crusch relinquish their dreams and ambitions on account of the actions of a gang of clowns such as the Witch Cult?

It had been irrational suffering. It had been an absurdity for which there was no reason to experience.

Just what should be said if one were to be rescued from such a place by the warmth of another? Thank you for saving me. I will remember this gratitude and will endeavor to the utmost from here on. —Was that not enough?

Subaru: "—There's nothing wrong with it."

Emotions, alongside a futile fury, boiled up within his heart.

As if given a push by this, Subaru once again found himself on his feet, firmly gripping Crusch's hands across the low table.

Those unseemly black mottled patches no longer existed upon

Crusch's pale fingers from which the handkerchief had fallen. This was Crusch's original hand, which none had the right to defile.

Crusch: "Subaru… sama."

Subaru: "There is nothing wrong with it. Like hell it's wrong. Let's do the Royal Selection properly. Let's talk properly, let's think properly, and let's all compete properly. I'll do whatever it takes."

It was a statement he made knowing full well he would be scolded and cursed at for once again making a promise without thinking it through.

They were an opposing camp. Anyone would likely think it to be a massive boon for Emilia if a powerful rival such as Crusch were to just drop out of the Royal Selection like this.

Subaru: "But that's wrong. It's not true. We all want to make our own person the Monarch, but that's not how the Royal Selection we all wanted to hold should be settled."

Crusch: "…"

Subaru: "So, Crusch-san, there's nothing wrong with it."

As to whether or not he had properly connected those sentences with "so", he lacked the self-confidence in himself to know for sure.

However, even though Crusch was slightly daunted by the vigor of that uncertain Subaru, she let out a sigh, as if some tension somewhere had loosened.

Emilia: "Geez, Subaru, you just let it all out, so you said pretty much everything I wanted to say before I even could. That's not fair."

And, perhaps perceiving a shift in Crusch's mood, Emilia, still sitting on the sofa, pouted as she chided Subaru's behavior.

Instantly, just as he had become heated all on his own, Subaru's ears began to heat up as well.

And then, scolding himself as hopeless, Subaru hurriedly tried to return to his original position—

Crusch: "—. Subaru-sama, your hand is…"

Subaru: "Huh? My hand?"

With that pointed out, Subaru peered down at his hand which had grasped Crusch's own a moment ago.

Now that she mentioned it, he wondered if perhaps she was warning him about his staggering audacity, but that was not it. Crusch's amber eye, paying no heed to that audacity of Subaru's, was,

Crusch: "Subaru-sama, your hand. It was just like my body… it cannot be, did Subaru-sama's hand also receive the power of the Church of the Divine Dragon?"

Subaru: "Ah, no, it was more violent, or rather, the result of it going "bam", but I don't know the exact details of how it happened, so it's quite the scary story."

In truth, Subaru's hand had now returned to its original skin tone, but the particulars of how that came to be were quite violent, something no one could be allowed to imitate.

To put it plainly, it was burned, blown off, and regenerated. — Currently, his leg was in the same state, but he did not feel like trying to test burning and blowing it off to regenerate it.

Crusch: "—ir."

Subaru: "…"

Reflecting on that radical treatment while opening and closing his hand, Subaru suddenly thought that he heard a faint murmur, and unconsciously caught his breath.

He blinked his eyes, looking at Crusch before him. He possessed a feeling of "Impossible, there's no way".

Emilia: “Crusch-san, first take some time to let your body rest. After that, just like Subaru said, I will do whatever I can.”

Crusch: “…Thank you very much. You might regret that, you know?”

Emilia: “The me of today, intends to be better than the me of the past at distinguishing between regrets I should have, and those I should not.”

And yet, the unease and misgivings that had poured into Subaru were brushed aside by the conversation typical of fellow Royal Selection Candidates, exchanged between Emilia and Crusch as they brushed him off.

In reality, Subaru and Emilia’s proposal was nothing more than sending salt to the enemy, but even if they were to ignore it and win against Crusch, they could never be sincerely happy about it.[21]

Therefore, this proposal and determination were consistent with the wishes of the Emilia Camp.

Crusch: “—Fuah”

Following that exchange, Crusch let out a sigh oozing with fatigue.

She was recovering from her ailment, her strength had not yet returned, and some moments had become emotional. It could be said that this had been more than enough of a marathon for Crusch’s stamina.

Rem: “It is time for us to take our leave. Emilia-san.”

Emilia: “Right. Thank you for seeing us, even though you’re reaaally tired and you’ve been having a rough time.”

Crusch: “No, for my part, I apologize for not being able to provide further hospitality. Wilhelm, would you please see everyone out?”

At Rem’s urging, Emilia brought the meeting to a close, and in front of her, the smiling Crusch asked that of Wilhelm. Bowing, Wilhelm accepted, and as Subaru and the others prepared to leave, Crusch also rose to see them off.

And then—

Crusch: “Thank you very much for today. It was a pleasure to be able to meet with you.”

Subaru: “…”

While apologizing for her rudeness in seeing them off then and there, Crusch addressed Subaru and the rest as such.

For a moment, Subaru hesitated, wondering what words to say—

Wilhelm: “—Subaru-dono, allow me to see you off.”

As if perceiving that sensation, Wilhelm interrupted it.

Wilhelm: “My deepest apologies for earlier.”

Having left the parlor, en route to the entrance of the mansion, Wilhelm began to speak as he led the way. At those words, Subaru, holding Beatrice’s hand, widening his eyes as he said “I knew it”,

Subaru: “I noticed you stopped me at the end there… But, I didn’t even know what I was going to say there myself.”

Wilhelm: “Even so, I went too far in cutting off the words of a guest. It was wholly out of concern for Crusch-sama, but I apologize for my rudeness.”

Subaru: “…So you’ve noticed it too, Wilhelm-san. Crusch-san, that state she’s in…”

Wilhelm: “Certainly, she is far from her normal condition, and she will need to rest for a while longer. However, even if both her body and mind are restored…”

Casting down his eyes, Wilhelm put nothing further into words. However, Subaru could roughly surmise what would have followed, that which he did not utter.

No one dared to clearly state it then. But, it was none other than Crusch who felt it most acutely, and for that reason had such fervent emotions spilled out.

Besides—

Emilia: “Ferris must be frustrated, too. I’m sure he wants to be by Crusch-san’s side and support her more than anything right now, and yet his body won’t obey him.”

While peering back toward the parlor she had just left, Emilia also let some of her concern spill out. At Emilia’s words, Wilhelm, walking ahead of her, faintly cleared his throat.

Then, without stopping, calling out “Emilia-sama” in a feeble tone,

Wilhelm: “Earlier, I told you a lie.”

Emilia: “Huh? A lie?”

Wilhelm: “Indeed. —Regarding Ferris.”

Subaru and the others exchanged glances with each other when they heard the name and words conveyed to them.

A lie regarding Ferris, that was what Wilhelm had uttered. He had explained that Ferris had fallen ill, and was in the midst of recovering, but—

Subaru: “Hold up, that’s odd. In the first place, Ferris’s health can’t deteriorate, can it?”

Rem: “No matter how you put it… this isn’t that Reinhard-san we are talking about.”

Subaru: “Of course, Reinhard is exceptional as well, but Ferris is also someone exceptional in this sense.”

Setting aside Reinhard, the most surprising human in all the land, who could fly through the sky while carrying a dragon carriage, Ferris was a healer—moreover, he was the holder of the title of the Blue, professing to be at the highest level within the Kingdom.

Subaru had previously witnessed Ferris be engulfed in a suicide attack by a Witch Cultist, and he had calmly returned from that which had reduced a dragon carriage to splinters.

A so-called super healer, like those from manga and anime: that was what Ferris was.

Of course, even now, he could not say unconditionally that occasions such as running out of Mana or pouring everything into Crusch could not apply.

Wilhelm: “As Subaru-dono has realized, Ferris is not resting. Presently, he is not at the mansion.”

Subaru: “He’s not at the mansion? You mean…”

Wilhelm: “—Please, go to the Royal Cemetery.”

Without answering the question that had unexpectedly surfaced, Wilhelm provided that place name in but a few words, and guided Subaru and the others to the entrance of the mansion.

The Royal Cemetery—from simply hearing that, it seemed to be a place with an evident purpose.

However, just what did Wilhelm intend by informing them of such a place—

Wilhelm: “No matter how shameful I must be, right now, I am one who serves Crusch-sama. I must not take action that defies the will of my master. —Please, lend an ear to what I have to say.”

With that deep, deep bow, Wilhelm sent them on their way.

For the Sword Demon, there existed a problem that could not be resolved with his blade, but even after such anguish, he still desired resolution: with that tinge of grief carved upon his deeply wrinkled face, such a prayer could be felt there.

2

—The Royal Cemetery was situated deep in the heart of the Noble District of the Royal Capital Lugunica.

As could be inferred from its enunciation and subsequent indication, that land was a cemetery—with arrays of gravestones for mourning those who had passed on, a crib for those whose soul's rest was prayed for.

Rem: "There was the Subjugation of the White Whale, correct? The graves of those who participated in that battle and lost their lives therein are also here, so I have been told."

Subaru: "I see. Then, it was way too heartless of me to not have come before. We didn't bring flowers with us today, so I gotta come well-prepared next time."

Emilia: "You're right. We must properly convey our gratitude and appreciation for their toil."

Crossing the black iron gate devoid of any rust, spread out before them was a stone pathway laid in a geometric design, and columns of gravestones along both of its sides—none of the rowed gravestones were simple enough to be called mere stone structures.

Some were crowned with sculptures of Knights displaying the triumphs of their lifetimes, whilst some were like small shrines embellished with delicate caricatures that retold the history of their families. The engraved emblems of family crests basked in the breeze, and the varicolored flowers offered by the mourners bestowed solitary hue in the universe of ashen-grey stones.

Subaru: "As expected, nobles are ostentatious, even with their gravestones… If you remove the gaudiness, this seems closer to the impression of cemeteries I got from western films or foreign dramas, I guess."

Sprawling here was a prudently maintained lawn, and a stone pathway around a moderate hill. The Japanese-style tombstones, grave tablets, or buildings such as shrines or monasteries with which Subaru was familiar were nowhere to be seen in this environ, as a rejuvenating, forlorn zephyr breezed through this space.

Subaru: “Which reminds me, I never thought about it… but are those who have passed on cremated here as well? Or are they given burials?”

Beatrice: “Cremation is the standard, I suppose. Once a living creature loses its life, the soul… the Od from its body falls out. It is unbearable to watch a body, bereft of its Od, slowly crumbling and losing its form, in fact. So it is done before that can happen, signifying to the body, the same as the Od, that it has fulfilled its duty, I suppose.”

Subaru: “I see, so it’s done on account of a being’s structure, not as a countermeasure to the spread of disease or anything like that.”

Thanks to Beatrice’s instantaneous reply to his doubt, he was able to harmonize with this arrangement as well.

That explained why, during the Great Disaster that had transpired in Vollachia, the legions of resurrected zombies were not in incomplete conditions, with rotten bodies and disjoined limbs. In their case, the shapes of their souls utilized to resurrect them were used as the basis, and their bodies were molded into form with clods of earth.

Which was why those zombies had been resurrected in the present age, with their forms intact as they were during their lifetime.

Subaru: “If that’s the case, then the destination of the soul… the cradle of Od Lagna or so, was a significantly valuable place. Like the Sanzu River, the farthest end of time, akin to that.”

Beatrice: “Don’t just grumble such frightening stuff out of nowhere, in fact. The cradle of Od Lagna, don’t even say such a thing as a joke, I suppose. There’s purely a rumor that should one inadvertently witness it eye-to-eye, they would be plundered of their sanity, in fact.”

Subaru: “No, it’s not a joke or anything like that, but truly…

though, that was something Louis just said arbitrarily, so I guess its level of credence is doubtable?"

Cautioned by the grimacing Beatrice, Subaru reminisced of that pure white space, wherein he could say he had spent a rich amount of time, for better or worse.

The Hall of Memories, or so, was the name invoked by Louis Arneb, who personated being the gatekeeper of that place, but in reality, even as this bearing held true, it was unknown what that place tangibly was. Now that Louis's consciousness had vanished to someplace and she had been reincarnated as Spica, there were no means to ascertain it either.

Subaru: "If it really comes down to it, I could find Reid's Book once again and peek inside, resolving to face something unthinkable…"

Rem: "—Um, I apologize for cutting into the conversation, but could you pay attention to this as well?"

Subaru: "Hm?"

Rem: "We've come here looking for somebody, right? Ferris-san, was it?"

With a tug of his sleeve, Subaru turned around to Rem's enquiry.

Her eyes conceived with a deep hue of doubt, Rem was, of course, unaware of Ferris's personage. So it was natural that she would be rather bored, even if she had been brought along to the cemetery.

Subaru: "Aah, sorry sorry! Let's see, the person we'll be looking for now is someone with cat ears and a cutesy vibe. Also has a tail, and is fairly adorable, so I think you'll know it the moment you see."

Rem: "…I was hoping for slightly more useful information."

Subaru: "Well, I thought I gave you plenty of hints… ah, when I say adorable, I don't mean the Beako kind of adorable, but more like the Petra or Meili kind of adorable. About as tall as me."

Rem: "I see, there certainly is a difference in adorableness."

Subaru touted Beatrice's face ahead as he held her up, to which Rem, intently gazing, nodded, as though assenting to his explanation. The Beatrice in question seemed to harbor an expression of deepening dubiety toward that assent, but her unmindfulness of the particulars of her own adorableness could be called one of her charm points.

In reality, there existed an infinite spectrum of adorableness, like beauty closer to adorableness and adorableness closer to beauty, all kinds. Anyhow, with Ferris's characteristics now shared amongst themselves—

Emilia: "That demeanor of Wilhelm-san's, I wonder what it was all about. It's worrying."

Subaru: "—The way he told us to go talk to him, despite also knowing where he was, huh."

Emilia: "Hm, you're right. It's nice to be consulted with and relied upon, but I feel that neither Crusch-san nor Wilhelm-san really show that side of themselves much."

Subaru could in part agree with Emilia's sensibility.

He could tell some sort of dilemma had risen within the Crusch Camp, and that Wilhelm could not move by himself toward its resolution.

Naturally, something did come to Subaru's mind that could have been the impetus for this problem. However, even so, the bonds of the Crusch Camp were strong. Even compared with the other Royal Candidates, they were the two whose bond had been forged for the longest time, the tightest tether.

The depth of those emotions shall not vanish, even should Crusch lose her Memories—was, at the very least, what Subaru felt and believed.

However—

Subaru: "…"

Looking downward upon his right hand, Subaru glared at its vitality. That which crossed his mind was when he had insolently clutched Crusch's hand, and she had stared back at his own hand.

Upon seeing Subaru's hand, and learning of its emancipation from those black patches, hearing that it was not owed to the power of the Sacrament which belonged to the Church of the Divine Dragon, she—

Crusch: "—Unfair."

Said this in a scant voice, verging onto extinguishment.

Subaru: "It was not just me, mishearing things…"

He wished from the bottom of his heart for that to be the case, but Subaru possessed not such convenient ears or cognizance. Those were the true, dusky sentiments that had undeniably spilled from Crusch's lips.

In all honesty, it definitely was shocking. But, for him to desire to not forgive or permit Crusch from even uttering so, that would be sheer pride. Above all, Subaru was painfully sympathetic to the reason why Crusch had blurted that out.

Subaru: "…I could never, talk to Crusch-san about that."

Crusch was the vortex of this maelstrom, just as her body recovered, now encumbered with the possibility of bearing an infinite number of wounds on her heart. What he could not inquire from her directly, would he then ask of her Knight, Ferris; that too was something uncertain.

But, he knew even if he simply returned to his comrades in brazen resignation, he would only continue to harbor ceaseless, unanswered worries.

Emilia: "Hmm, can't see Ferris anywhere."

Lost in thought, upon having taken notice, Subaru and the others had lapped around the cemetery.

Though this site was by no means small, befitting of a cemetery situated in the Noble District, most of the deceased who slept here seemed to be those who shouldered weighty responsibilities of the Kingdom, and were serviced with treatment more than apt, even after death. Farther into the cemetery, each and every gravestone's structure and care was extremely meticulous, and synchronously, the faces of the scant few mourners became more easy to distinguish, so it was difficult to imagine that they had missed Ferris.

It would have been a different story if they just knew whom he was visiting in this cemetery.

Rem: "We looked along the whole pathway, but I couldn't sight any woman with the characteristics mentioned."

Subaru: "To be precise, not a girl, but… well, it's got nothing to do with the appearance, so I guess that's fine."

Rem: "—? Speaking of any more things that stand out, that building over there I would suppose."

As Subaru cut short the detailed explanation, Rem remained suspect of him as she gestured towards a chalky white building, sitting atop the hill in the middle of this grand site, with the lined arrays of stone structures in its backdrop—a mausoleum, as it was called.

Garbed in a solemn and sacred ambiance, making it seem as though the gravestones speckled about its circumference were those who had pledged their allegiance to their lord in servitude, was evidence of it being the resting ground of chosen ones.

This was the Royal Cemetery, and if there was a bed for the deceased who were furnished special treatment, then—

Subaru: "—The mausoleum where the members of the Royal Family sleep, is what it seems."

Emilia: "Then, the royals who have passed away are in there…"

The impetus for the Royal Selection's beginning, the royals who had accomplished an inordinately ephemeral demise, and a gargantuan duty, continuing their lineage of proper pedigree into the modern day in the enduring lifespan of the Kingdom of Lugunica.

Before the mausoleum of those people entombed within, Subaru reached a delayed comprehension. —The austere presence in this place, this was in a certain sense, a microcosm of the Royal Capital. If the Royal Castle was a symbol of authority for the living, then the mausoleum was the same for the dead—

Subaru: "…I'm sure we can't just casually visit the graves of Kings, right?"

Beatrice: "Considering it ordinarily, the mausoleum of royalty would be strictly guarded, I suppose. Those who wish to do evil with the ashes of the powerful are not few, in fact. How wretched, I suppose."

Emilia: "But, we could just ask if somebody was inside… ah, someone's right there."

Although the mausoleum was the only place they had not checked, regardless, it was not a place they could enter with ease.

The chances of Ferris being there became synchronously low, but since they had been entrusted by Wilhelm, they did not wish to return without putting in adequate effort.

With these thoughts, Emilia pointed sharply toward the mausoleum's entrance. There, just as she had stated, a figure was emerging from the mausoleum.

A character garbed in a slender, navy blue tailcoat. The elegance of their conduct as visible from their back potently transmitted their esteem and labor toward the mausoleum.

Subaru followed the hastening Emilia, thinking that since they were visiting the Royal Family's mausoleum, they must be the overseer of the cemetery or the mausoleum, or someone in the same vein.

Emilia: "Um, could you excuse me for a second? I wanted to ask if the young person we're searching for was inside the building you just left."

Rushing over to that character, Emilia spoke to them with no hint of timidness. Her audaciousness would purchase vigilance from the other person, but there were Knights standing at the entrance of the cemetery, and they did vet the social standing of all who passed through the main gate, so it was safe to assume that there were no suspicious figures within the premises.

Subaru wished for their intent to be transmitted to that person by all means—

???: "—Emilia-sama?"

Replying with a voice laced with astonishment, the figure in the tailcoat turned around and set their eyes upon Emilia. Observing them from the front, Emilia halted her feet with a confounded "Huh?".

Subaru, and the others as well, bore witness to the person standing before Emilia as she stood still.

Standing there was—

???: "…Well, you've seen me at a weird spot. It was Wil-jii, wasn't it?"

Vocalizing so, expressing a smile with poignancy not to be reached by such descriptors as astoundedness or self-derision, was Ferris—as he shrugged his shoulders at Subaru and the others, his slender frame adorned with a sonorously masculine tailcoat.

Subaru: "…"

Subaru unwittingly found himself at a loss for words at Ferris's form, his back towards the mausoleum's entrance.

Until now, there had certainly been times when Ferris would don such a guise—concisely, when he dressed as a man within the sleeves of the Knight uniform of the Royal Guard. However, that instance had the pretext of being the official uniform of the Knights, and even that had designed aspects, showing his charm as it befitted him.

However, his tailcoat guise before their eyes was bereft of any such design or craftiness.

What that meant, was—

Subaru: “…Ferris… what… happened?”

Ferris: “Quit it with that expression and voice like it’s the end of the world. It’s not anything important for Subaru-kun and the others, I’m telling you. I just—”

Retaining his poignant smile with the edges of his eyebrows brought low, Ferris tilted his head—and stopped himself. That seemed as though a parting of ways from such gestures.

Without turning traitor to that impression, Ferris continued.

It was—

Ferris: “—It’s just, I was dismissed from my position as Crusch-sama’s Knight. So, I called it a wrap on Ferri-chan, and returned to Felix Argyle.”

Chapter 9:
Crybaby

1

—Felix Argyle.

He knew that to be the legal name of the person standing before him.

He had heard it before from the mouths of others, and above all, it was what the man himself had just introduced himself as. Contrary to the man's cute and dainty appearance, he had thought the name had quite the masculine ring to it.

However, even when the man himself used that name in front of him, Subaru was not able to properly reconcile this fact and phenomenon within himself.

That was the extent to which the man had built his way of life around the image of the nickname "Ferris".

Subaru: "Dismissed, as her Knight…? That means…"

Ferris: "It means I've resigned. Well, it can't be helped. With the Church of the Divine Dragon, Crusch-sama could be saved… ever since the moment I decided to accept their help, I'd been prepared for things to turn out this way. —Ah, Emilia-sama, please don't go feeling responsible or anything."

Emilia: "Ferris…"

Ferris: "When you came to see us back then, it was truly reassuring. Aside from Crusch-sama's allies like me and Wil-jii, there were also other people who were happy to see her safe, it made me think that… what I'd done wasn't wrong."

With the cat ears on his head flattening, Ferris lowered the corners of eyes into a soft smile as he replied.

In the midst of hastening towards him, Emilia skidded to a halt at those words, and her hands started fluttering about aimlessly, as if she were desperately searching for a response that would not come.

Emilia's bewilderment and perplexity were only natural. — However, at the sight of Ferris now donning a tailcoat, reciting his resignation from his post as Knight, Subaru had a different response.

Ferris: "Wait! Subaru-kun, where do you think you're going?"

Subaru: "—Hk, isn't it obvious, I'm going to Crusch-san's place. This sorta thing, it's going too far!"

With clenched teeth, he was already turning to leave when a voice stopped him from behind, to which Subaru growled with a low, jagged response.

He could imagine what the circumstances had been. The Dragon's Blood which had ravaged Crusch's body, to free her of that suffering had required accepting help from the Church of the Divine Dragon, and as a corollary of that, the Crusch Camp's position in the Royal Selection had been teetering.

And, in place of the delirious Crusch, that had been a decision made by Ferris.

Ferris's decision had saved her life, however, this had caused their victory in the Royal Selection to become very difficult. For she, who was fiercely motivated to become the Monarch, it was a decision that Crusch likely would never have desired.

Subaru: "But, didn't you do all of that for the sake of Crusch-san? Despite that, for her to still fire you… that just isn't right!"

Beatrice: "Subaru!"

Due to his unbearable indignation, Subaru shook Beatrice's hand off of his, causing her to shout.

But Subaru did not stop. He was determined to keep going and run all the way back to the Karsten residence, and even if he needed to firmly press Crusch for it, he would make her retract her mistreatment of Ferris.

However, before he could even take a single step to enact that, Subaru was blocked by someone with their arms spread out wide—by Rem, he was halted.

Subaru: “Rem, don’t stop me. I’m about to go off on an excessively emotional outburst, and I don’t want any of you guys to see it.”

Rem: “If you’re aware of how you are getting far too emotional, then please stop there. Besides, before you cause any uproar, how about you properly take a look at the other person’s face?”

Subaru: “Other person’s… face?”

Having silenced Subaru’s impulsive fit, Rem nodded before gesturing with her chin. As Subaru turned to follow her motion, Emilia and Beatrice, who had anxiously been watching over him, entered his field of view, and further beyond them was Ferris, looking down at Subaru from the entrance of the mausoleum.

Ferris, who had been the main driving force behind Subaru’s rage, with a look of exasperation at the sight of his outburst, turned his gaze first towards Rem,

Ferris: “Thank you, Rem-chan… though this is the first time I’ve seen you walking around like this, you’re a much better girl than I could have ever imagined. Maybe your only shortcoming is your taste in boys?”

Rem: “…While I was asleep, I heard that Ferris-san also took great care of me. Out of respect to you as my benefactor, I’ll keep my response graceful… but that just now was a terrible misunderstanding.”

Ferris: “I see. If that’s how Rem-chan views it, that’s fine by me. But, I’m glad you’ve woken up.”

Rem and Ferris exchanged words right over Subaru’s head while he was pincered in between them. With that done, Rem pursed her lips in a complicated manner, and Ferris switched gears with a “That said”.

And, narrowing his eyes as he looked down at Subaru,

Ferris: “You know, Subaru-kun, you really are prideful.”

Subaru: “Prid… hk.”

Ferris: “I think it’s a different nuance from just being self-centered, so even if it’s this word, it’s the one I find fits best, okay? Even though you say you’re not doing it for yourself, and that it’s all for the sake of someone else, you just end up frantically going around in circles, and it just ends up being uncalled-for concern.”

Subaru: “You, phrasing it like that…”

Ferris: “—And so I thought, if Subaru-kun is prideful, then maybe I’m prideful too.”

At that moment, seeing his smile, Subaru felt as if he had been doused by cold water.

Subaru: “…”

Gulping down his breath, he looked at Ferris who, just as he thoroughly criticized Subaru, turned that same vitriol on himself. The atmosphere around Ferris had not changed since they first encountered each other at the mausoleum, seeming to Subaru as if he showed no openings to latch onto, or rather, as if he was almost too composed.

He was a sea of tranquility, so-to-speak. —However, that could not be the case. Thinking about what had happened to Ferris, contrary to a calm sea, he should be in the right in midst of a ferocious storm.

Subaru stared closely at Ferris’s facial expression, searching for any signs of the storm. But, with Ferris himself seeming to not concern himself with that, he closed one eye, letting out an “Ah”,

Ferris: “That’s right. If it’s fine with you, Emilia-sama, won’t you all come in to pay respects?”

Subaru: “Pay respects… do you mean in the mausoleum behind you? Are we allowed in?”

Ferris: “Yes, the administrator entrusted me with the key, and besides, I’m qualified to act as an intercessor, so I come here pretty often.”

Subaru: “Intercessor…?”

Ferris: “Wow, Subaru-kun really is clueless. If you’re trying to be her one and only Knight while being this ignorant, you’re only going to end up embarrassing Emilia-sama, you know?”

Ferris gave a small laugh and stuck out his tongue, leaving Subaru to hold his own.

Rather than it being because of his ignorance being pointed out, it was that the phrase “one and only Knight” coming out of Ferris’s mouth seemed like it would be a delicate topic right now.

Of course, given the mischievous look in his eyes, Ferris had likely said it on purpose.

Whilst toying with Subaru and the others with his tone, Ferris softly caught the closing door of the mausoleum that he had just left.

Ferris: “Let’s go inside to talk about all the various things that have been piling up. —I was just thinking that if I were the only one here to pay respects, His Highness might start feeling lonely.”

2

Located within the Royal Cemetery, the presence exuded by that mausoleum clearly set it apart from the rest.

The building was constructed from the finest white marble selected from across the Kingdom, and was decorated throughout with ornamentations of dragons, the very symbol of the Dragon Kingdom, giving it the capacity to overwhelm any visitor who laid eyes upon it. The exterior walls, shining in the sunlight, exuded a divine aura that seemed to ward off evil, and the dragon sculpture carved across each of the closed doors completed it as a single work of art, seemingly continuing to protect the dignity of the deceased Royal Family.

After stepping inside, what laid in various places throughout the white chalk corridor to follow were the grave markers of the sleeping royalty. The orderly arranged sarcophagi were decorated with carvings and ornaments associated with each Royal Family member, and just looking at them seemed to bring to mind the deceased's life before death.

In particular, the state of the fourth prince's tombstone, which was their objective, especially inspired this feeling.

Ferris: "This is His Highness's… Fourier Lugunica-sama's grave."

Ferris led Subaru's group across the well-polished floor, his boots clacking upon the stone, then stopped in his tracks and gestured toward an especially conspicuous grave marker—the sarcophagus of Fourier Lugunica.

Within the mausoleum, where strict, solemn order was maintained, that principle seemed to waver slightly here.

After all, the fourth prince's gravestone was too colorful for a resting place of the dead.

Subaru: "Are these, offerings? Letters, knitted things, as well as carved wooden animals…"

Ferris: "None of them feel like offerings to royalty, right? In truth, the people who said they wished to offer such things were children who had no conception of such upper-class etiquette, so it can't be helped."

Subaru: "People with no such concept, no way, you mean they're gifts from the general public? Wouldn't those sorta things be censored or confiscated when they're brought in?"

Ferris: "Of course, if it was a prank or something, it wouldn't be allowed to go through. But, the fact that they are not, was something I verified when I accepted the offerings in my role of intercessor."

Crouching in front of the sarcophagus, Ferris answered while squinting at the various items placed on the table.

The items offered there must have been prepared by those who adored the fourth prince laid to rest here, regardless of their status, and would have contained each person's thoughts and feelings.

Intercessors were those who, as a special exception, had the right to bring such offerings with the permission of the cemetery's administrator, on behalf of those who could not visit this place in person.

Essentially, Ferris had been entrusted with the thoughts and feelings of the people as the intercessor for the fourth prince.

Ferris: "By nature, many members of the Lugunican Royal Family had good personalities, who were gentle and well-liked by others, but His Highness Fourier was an individual of exceptionally cheerful and pleasant personality. So he would frequently sneak out of the Castle, and make merry with the people of the Royal Capital."

Subaru: "…Amazing. It's like an episode you'd often hear about in manga and such. But, if he actually did that, it probably ended up becoming a huge problem, right?"

Ferris: "Well, it did turn out like that. The Royal Guard was mobilized to search for His Highness in the wake of his disappearance. In the end, His Highness was at a soup kitchen in the Slums, that turned out to be run by the Church of the Divine Dragon, which almost caused friction between the Castle and the Church, and a big fuss ensued."

Beatrice: "It's hard to laugh that off as a joke these days, in fact."

Over the arched back of Ferris, they looked upon the headstone of the much-beloved Fourier.

As Ferris reminisced with a smile, his words were filled with an undeniable affection for the central figure of those tales, Fourier, and even from this fragment of that episode, it was clear that he was a person who was loved by everyone.

Ferris: "…Did I ever say anything about His Highness to Subaru-kun before?"

Subaru: "…Yeah, I heard that there was someone like that, and that he got along well with you and Crusch-san. Didn't she say that he and I kind of resemble each other?"

Ferris: "Hah? How are His Highness and Subaru-kun the same? I'll kill you, you know?"

Subaru: "I'm pretty sure you said the same thing to me back then!!"

Ferris's voice had taken on a rather serious tone devoid of jokes, so Subaru hastened to defend himself.

In reality, that was about all that Subaru had been told about Fourier. Of course, even Subaru, who was not very perceptive, could tell that this person's death was not unrelated to the reason why Crusch had aspired to participate in the Royal Selection.

Emilia: "So, Crusch-san joined the Royal Selection for the sake of Prince Fourier?"

Ferris: "…As expected of Emilia-sama. You always dive straight in to asking the difficult questions."

Emilia: "Ah, I'm sorry. But, Ferris invited us to pay respects because he wanted to tell us that story, right? After hearing that, I was just thinking that I should try to decide what I'm going to do next."

Ferris: "What you're doing next, huh? And that would be?"

Emilia: "Yes, Subaru stole the show earlier, but I think I'll also go to tell Crusch-san to reconsider. Subaru and I will go talk to her with our utmost effort. How about it?"

Subaru: "I think that's a good idea… Ow, ow, ow!"

Rem: "Please don't speak impulsively. Just where do you think we are?"

As soon as he agreed with Emilia, Subaru writhed in agony as Rem pinched him on the side. Gazing over those antics of Subaru and the others, Ferris strained a smile and stood up,

Ferris: “As I said before, I’d like you to refrain from going over to Crusch-sama and saying all sorts of things. From the beginning, I was prepared for this to happen.”

Emilia: “But…”

Ferris: “I’ve accepted it. I said that I had been dismissed, but it was me who first declared that I no longer had any right to stay by her side. Moreover…”

Holding a finger to his lips, Ferris paused for a beat. Then, pointing that raised finger towards Emilia, and then to Subaru in order,

Ferris: “What would you do, Emilia-sama, if I, or the Council of Wise Men, or whoever, asked you to reconsider your master-servant relationship with Subaru-kun?”

Emilia: “Eh? My relationship with Subaru is something I decided after giving it a lot of thought. So, if someone said something like that to me, I would feel reaaally uneasy and wonder what the heck… ah.”

Ferris: “That’s what I mean. That’s what Emilia-sama is trying to do right now.”

Extraneous and immense meddling from an outsider. With Ferris explaining it so clearly, Emilia’s shoulders visibly slumped. As expected, there was little joy in Emilia’s response, as she did not want anyone to interfere with her relationship with Subaru.

Above all, the current persuasion was effective not only for Emilia, but for Subaru as well.

Ferris, who must have known this, looked past the dejected Emilia, and while shrugging his shoulders at Subaru,

Ferris: “To answer your earlier question, Crusch-sama is not so narrow-minded. Hence, His Highness Fourier is but one of the reasons why she decided to participate in the Royal Selection.”

Subaru: “…But, his part of the reason isn’t so small that it can be ignored, right?”

Ferris: “Oh, you’re quite the nitpicker. You’ve completely lost your cuteness, Subaru-kun.”

However, as if that had not even struck a nerve for him, Ferris continued.

Ferris: “I won’t deny it. The passing of His Highness was a truly significant event for Crusch-sama… and for me as well. I was deeply hurt, and cried so much that it felt I had used up my entire lifetime’s supply of tears. Well, I’m a bit of a crybaby, so I cried a lot after that as well.”

Everyone: “…”

Ferris: “Though she didn’t show it, it also caused Crusch-sama so, so much hurt and suffering. —But, the thing that hurt Crusch-sama the most was after His Highness had passed away.”

Subaru: “Eh…”

Ferris: “His Highness, and the rest of the Royal Family all passed away one after the other, causing great turmoil for everyone. The Duchess Karsten, Crusch-sama, was attending a meeting at the Castle as one of the upper nobles… and there, she came to a realization. Everyone participating in the meeting was more concerned about the possibility that the Covenant with the Divine Dragon might be severed, than about the loss of His Highness and the other royals.”

He spoke quietly, as carefully as possible to avoid getting carried away with emotion. However, this effort only highlighted the grotesqueness of the facts as told by Ferris.

The personalities of the Lugunican Royal Family, the way they were loved, and how warm their hearts were, all could be seen by taking a look at this mausoleum: at all of the tombstones even beyond Fourier Lugunica’s, there were offerings made to pray for the peace of the deceased without exception.

Even the deaths of those so loved were thought insignificant in the face of the Covenant with the Dragon.

Emilia: “So, that’s why she did it.”

It came out like a sigh, a murmur from Emilia, who had come to the same understanding as Subaru. She placed her hands on her chest, and as her amethyst eyes narrowed with a pained look,

Emilia: “That’s why Crusch-san decided that when she became the Monarch, she would have no choice but to make her country stronger, not one that solely relied upon the Covenant with the Dragon.”

Ferris: “—It’s not only that, but, yes.”

Emilia: “It’s not only that, which would mean…”

Ferris: “Crusch-sama really hated the prospect of it… That if she hadn’t been so close to His Highness Fourier, she was sure that she would have thought the same way as everyone else.”

That sort of alternate reality was not something that could be known unless it had actually happened, and since there was no way for such a thing to actually happen, there was no reason for Crusch to be blaming herself in that way.

No matter how she tried to go against it, Crusch would have met Fourier, and arrived at the same idea. Even if she detested the version of herself who had never met him, a version of herself who did not exist, it would only bring her suffering.

Only, on another line of thinking, Subaru also realized that Crusch’s situation was not simply that of a choice in contradiction to her claims in the Royal Selection.

Crusch, who had declared that she would end the Covenant with the Dragon, was saved by the power of the Sacrament of the Church of the Divine Dragon, a group that worshipped none other than that very Dragon. —And that was not all.

Subaru: “Crusch-san vowed to restore an environment in which the Lugunican Royal Family… that Prince Fourier could truly be mourned, and even though she was determined to achieve that, she no longer has the ability to do so.”

Ferris: “…Moreover, the Church of the Divine Dragon did not save His Highness. Even though they saved Crusch-sama.”

Subaru: “—Hk.”

Ferris’s hoarsely spoken words struck a chord with Subaru and the others in the truest sense.

Just a moment ago, he had been fully intent on going to complain to Crusch about Ferris’s dismissal as her Knight, saying that it was going too far, even when taking her poor physical and mental condition into account.

Now that he knew all about the resolve and determination Crusch had carried, about the ideals and vows she had heralded, and about how they had all been shattered in the worst way possible, what could Subaru possibly say to her?

If only Subaru had offered up an arm or a leg, and taken on Crusch’s curse—

Ferris: “That’s why, Subaru-kun is prideful.”

Subaru: “Wha…”

Ferris: “Anyone can see it on your face. It’s no wonder Beatrice-chan refuses to let go of your hand. You may have gotten a bit better, but surely you ought to know when there’s nothing you could have done?”

With his head tilted, Ferris spoke as if admonishing a child, rebuking Subaru for the shallowness of his thinking without getting emotional.

Deep down, he understood. Subaru’s current idea existed only in the realm of theory, impossible to act on; as Ferris had said, it was meaningless.

Even if Crusch's salvation had been carried out by Emilia's Knight, Natsuki Subaru, instead of the Church of the Divine Dragon, it would not absolve her of the fault of relying on an opposing camp to solve her problems. And, that would be too large of a disadvantage in the Royal Selection, which was now past its midpoint.

Subaru: "If one delegates the solving of all their problems to other parties, is that person really fit to be the Monarch, is that what it's about…?"

Ferris: "—. How harsh. But, that's right."

Subaru: "…I'm just parroting what I've heard."

That was something he had heard directly from none other than Crusch herself.

Once, when the Witch Cult had targeted Emilia, Subaru had asked Crusch for help without any bargaining chips, but Crusch had imposingly rejected Subaru's ugly pleas.

That was a lesson Subaru had needed to learn. Hence, he did not begrudge Crusch for that. It was far too ironic that, even though he had no grudge against her, the situation had reversed as it were.

Emilia: "Hey, Ferris, I'm not sure if this is okay to ask, but…"

In place of Subaru, whose head hung low as he found himself at a loss for words, Emilia spoke to Ferris.

Stepping out next to Ferris, she stood in front of the gravestone of Fourier Lugunica, looked at the offerings placed there, then, clutching the magic crystal on her chest, she closed her eyes.

Behind Emilia, Beatrice and Rem could each be seen offering their own prayers for the dead.

After that, Emilia gazed at the particularly gorgeous bouquet—the one that Ferris had adjusted the position of while he had been crouched down, that had been brought here by none other than himself, and she asked the following.

Emilia: “Crusch-san and Prince Fourier, were they lovers?”

Ferris: “…”

At the question, Ferris’s eyes widened slightly, then he gave a small laugh.

And then—

Ferris: “That’s not something for me to say. —It would be far too tactless.”

3

The double doors to the mausoleum gave rise to a weighty sound as they closed, and he met eyes with the dragon sculpted across their surfaces as a single image.

He could tell it was likely the same depiction modeled after the Divine Dragon Volcanica that was also engraved onto the face of coins, but now that he had heard about the blighted love surrounding Crusch and Prince Fourier, his feelings towards that Divine Dragon had grown more complicated compared to before.

Subaru: “I got to encounter the real thing on top of the Tower, but with its empty state of mind, even if it’s supposedly the object of worship for the Church of the Divine Dragon, bound by its Covenant to the Kingdom, it’s just not very convincing…”

Beatrice: “Its style might be to just switch on at times when it is necessary, I suppose. At times when it is not, it might be operating on something like an energy-saving mode, or like Otto when he doesn’t have any work to do, in fact.”

Subaru: “Even if it’s Otto when he has no work to do, treating him as empty-headed is going too far… Wait, if the target of comparison is the Divine Dragon, then wouldn’t that actually be an honor for a citizen of the Kingdom?”

Hearing Beatrice’s hypothesis, Subaru also tried to simulate treating the Otto within his brain as the Divine Dragon, but when Otto did not have any work to do, he became an idiot as a result of the sense of freedom he would gain from finishing all his work, so Subaru was unable to get any useful comments out of him. Heavy drinking in moderation, indeed.

Regardless—

Emilia: “Ferris, what do you plan on doing after this?”

Ferris: “After this, you ask?”

Emilia: “Yes. After all, you can’t return to… it would be difficult for you to return to Crusch-san’s place right now, right? You were always in that same mansion together, so do you have any destination in mind?”

On the way to return the mausoleum key to the cemetery’s administrator, Emilia inquired so, and Ferris scratched his cheek as he hesitated in giving his response with a troubled look upon his eyebrows.

Judging by his reaction, Emilia’s comment had borne a critical impact on Ferris.

There was no doubt that Wilhelm’s decision to inform Subaru’s group of Ferris’s whereabouts must have been an anguished one, founded in worry for the young man’s near future.

Regardless of the circumstances behind it, the master-servant relationship between Crusch and Ferris had been terminated. Under such a situation, Wilhelm, as a follower of Crusch, could not take actions that opposed his master’s will.

Back there, the maximum consideration Wilhelm could offer was to have reliable individuals go to verify Ferris’s thereafter.

Thus, if they were going to respond to that consideration of Wilhelm’s to the fullest—

Subaru: “What Emilia-tan is trying to say is this: For the time being, won’t you come stay with us for a bit?”

Emilia: “Yes, that’s right! How about it? Of course, I’m not saying you need to stay forever. I just think that you're probably sad from parting like this, and that you just need some time. For me as well, it took around a hundred years to accept the fact that I froze all the people in my hometown."

Rem: "I have to say, I think that would be far too long of a wait."

Beatrice: "By the way, it also took Betty four-hundred years to accept Subaru's love, I suppose."

Rem: "I have to say, I think that even for this person, that would be far too miserable."

Due to those misleading statements from the long lifespan duo, Emilia and Beatrice, Rem began to look at Subaru with a bit of pity in her eyes. He would make sure to properly clear up that misunderstanding later on, but at the very least, their proposition to Ferris just now had been made in earnest.

However, receiving those words, Ferris placed his hand over his forehead with a "Tahah~",

Ferris: "For some reason, I had the feeling you'd ask me that, but you really went ahead and did it. I'm a talented master of the healing arts, so I get why there'd be a scramble to secure a claim on me."

Emilia: "Mph, I… wasn't saying it as a joke…"

Ferris: "Indeed, yes, of course, I'm aware that Emilia-sama is always earnest, no matter the time. I'm also glad that you invited me like that. It's the truth, you know?"

Emilia: "…But, the way you answered…"

Ferris: "—Right. Although you invited me especially, I just can't agree to it."

Slowly shaking his head from side to side, Ferris turned down Emilia's proposal with a wry smile. She very much wanted to be persistent against that attitude of his, but she also understood his feelings of not being able to accept.

After all—

Ferris: “Even if we’re separated, I will always treasure Crusch-sama. Even if it was my decision that caused the Royal Selection to become hopeless for her, I just won’t break away to support somebody other than Crusch-sama.”

Emilia: “I-It’s even okay if you hate me. Only, if Ferris could just help us to be sure that you won’t wander off somewhere unsteadily, and that you’ll be alright.”

Ferris: “I wouldn’t hate you or anything. —Ah, that’s a lie. I actually do hate you. Emilia-sama, all the way back from the very beginning, this entire time, I’ve hated you.”

Emilia: “Eh! Really?!”

Having gone so far as to bring out an uncharacteristic bargaining chip, the persistent Emilia was shocked. Nodding “yes” to that Emilia, Ferris gestured to Subaru and the rest with the key to the mausoleum,

Ferris: “It isn’t just Emilia-sama. All of the Royal Candidates other than Crusch-sama, I’ve hated them too, and the same goes for all their Knights. I also hate Beatrice-chan, and although this is pretty much my first time meeting Rem-chan, I hate her too. And I really hate Subaru-kun.”

Subaru: “When you phrase it like that, it sounds like you hate me for real…”

Ferris: “What makes you think I don’t hate you for real?”

Receiving that retort, Subaru was unable to say anything anymore.

Emilia: “…You really won’t change your mind?”

Even Emilia, of all people, could discern that Ferris’s “hate” just now was not how he truly felt. In order to refuse Emilia’s proposal, Ferris had given his likes and hates as a reason. And then, no matter what he was told, no matter how he was treated, he declared that his feelings of backing Crusch would never change.

Ferris: “Please don’t worry so much like that. The Royal Guard… I’m not sure if I can continue there or not, so I’ll go discuss it with the Commander, but regardless, I’m sure there’ll be a high demand for me at healing clinics or wherever else.”

Subaru: “…You aren’t going to give into despair, are you?”

Ferris: “Despair? You mean, to end my own life in lamentation over the world… or something like that? Me? The person who despises casualties the most in this world?”

Subaru: “—. My bad.”

With zero hints of a joke there, Subaru apologized in the face of Ferris’s clear assertion.

Even if he no longer resided by Crusch’s side, Ferris was still the Blue, and he would do nothing that distorted his way of being as a healer. He would have faith in that.

Subaru: “Ahh, but you know! How frustrating! If I can’t go and say anything to Crusch-san, and Ferris also refused the idea of staying with us for a time, then there’s nothing I can do…!”

Rem: “Did Ferris-san not chide you about how prideful that is?”

Ferris: “Oh, yeah, just as Rem-chan says.”

Subaru: “But, Rem…”

Rem: “—. Whatever the case, there are problems that can only be resolved by the parties directly concerned.”

Although they were observing a passing tragedy, they bore no right to rectify it themselves.

As Subaru complained about how frustrating that felt, Rem cast her eyes down, and exhaled a shallow breath.

Rem: “Just as how an outside party cannot meddle with the master-servant relationship between you and Emilia-san, or with the Contractual relationship between you and Beatrice-chan. Between you and myself…”

Subaru: “Rem?”

Rem: “…Between you and myself, what sort of relationship is there exactly? What are you to me?”

Subaru: “Don’t turn it over to me all of a sudden! Me, you, precious!”

Emilia: “The same goes for us! Us, Rem, reaaally, precious!”

Rem: “—. Thank you to Emilia-san.”

Subaru: “What about me?!”

With the entirety of his existence having been completely disregarded, Subaru’s voice cracked as Rem ignored him in a graceful manner.

Behind that exchange between Subaru and the others, Beatrice called out “Wait” to Ferris. Then, as Beatrice lightly pinched the hem of Subaru’s clothes,

Beatrice: “Betty is not as concerned about your near future as Subaru and the others, in fact. However, Betty owes you an enormous debt, I suppose.”

Ferris: “Beatrice-chan-sama, owes me? Did I ever do a favor or something for the Great Spirit?”

Beatrice: “You saved Subaru when he was far too reckless and nearly destroyed his Gate, in fact. Unfortunately, Subaru ignored your warnings and destroyed his Gate, but you served to buy him some time, I suppose. If not for your help, Betty and Subaru would have no Contract, in fact.”

Ferris: “Umm… that gladdens me more than I expected.”

Beatrice: “Enjoying it to the fullest, I suppose. Thus, Betty is of the nature that always repays her debts, in fact. So, if anything ever happens to you, you can count on Betty to come to your aid whenever needed, I suppose.”

Ferris: “Even if Subaru-kun is about to fall off a cliff?”

Beatrice: “After picking Subaru back up first, Betty would come rushing towards you in a great hurry, in fact.”

Hearing Beatrice’s answer as she snorted her nose and placed her hands on her hips, Ferris’s eyes widened slightly, and he placed his hand over his mouth and smiled with an “Aha”.

The impulse behind that smile grew more intense, and eventually, teardrops began to well up in the corners of his eyes.

Ferris: “Ah, how unpleasant. Don’t make me cry, Beatrice-chan-sama.”

Beatrice: “As you have proclaimed yourself, you are quite the crybaby, I suppose.”

Receiving those words from Beatrice, Ferris’s smile broadened ever so slightly.

4

Emilia: “If you change your mind, you can always visit us, okay? I’ll talk to everyone to make sure someone will definitely respond. Can you promise that? Can you keep a promise, Ferris?”

Subaru: “A stray bullet just hit me!”

Rem: “It’s quite justified.”

And so, right up until the very moment of their parting, Emilia and the others did their best to invite him.

It was evident that they showed no signs of malice or artifice, and though he felt more and more guilty over making Emilia’s face cloud over as he rejected her over and over again, there was nothing he could do about it.

Ferris: “It’s not like I feel conflicted about Emilia-sama and the rest, you know?”

Even if he had ceded that qualification of his own volition, Ferris had been Crusch’s Knight.

It was impermissible for him, no matter how temporary, to shelter himself under the umbrella of any Royal Selection Candidate aside from Crusch. He was afraid that it would not look good for Crusch, and above all, he feared what Crusch would think of it.

Ferris: “…On that point, Your Highness was incredible. Were you ever scared?”

At the mausoleum, he had intended to repent before the gravestone and sarcophagus, to the extent that time would allow. And yet, after but a mere moment had passed, a lingering desire to ask that once more had already arisen in him.

Whining and whining; even when he switched to dressing as a man, that effeminacy at his core would not be completely wiped away. Truly, he was disgusted by himself.

Such a person as himself seemed to have been able to make only a single correct decision—

Ferris: “I’m glad that I was the one who suggested it.”

Just as he had told Emilia and the rest, his dismissal as a Knight had been suggested by Ferris.

When the Church of the Divine Dragon had extended their hand to him, and he had decided to borrow the power of Filóre’s Sacrament, he was prepared to lose the qualifications to stand beside Crusch. Merely, Ferris’s soul could not sit there and wait for it to come out of Crusch’s own mouth.

So he brought it up before that, and avoided having Crusch cut off Ferris of her own accord. —What the hell, even though he had been trying to extol the right decision, it was yet another manifestation of that effeminacy that disgusted him.

Ferris: “I’ve been doing nothing but lying…”

He thought he had made the right decision. It was a lie.

He had enquired as to whether Fourier felt no fear. It was a lie.

He had said that he did not feel conflicted about Emilia and the others. It was a lie.

His dismissal as a Knight had been to protect his own fragile heart, and he knew that even Fourier himself had mustered up all his courage when he had asked Crusch to go out somewhere.

And, there was no way he felt nothing toward the ready advance of Emilia and the others, who had achieved many great deeds despite her overwhelmingly disadvantageous position at the start and had greatly inconvenienced the high-ranking nobility with her lineage as a half-elf—and above all, toward the efforts of Subaru, who held the same position as a Knight.

As a matter of fact, Ferris had not asked Subaru about the circumstances surrounding his ungloved right hand.

That Subaru had not broached the subject likely meant that it would have been a troublesome method to be utilized as a cure for Crusch. However, imagination was imagination. He had not confirmed it. The reason for that was obvious: he had fled from the possibility that there was any answer other than relying upon the Church of the Divine Dragon.

It seemed as if just about every action he took was done to prioritize escaping his own pain.

Ferris: “Do I truly consider anyone else precious to me…?”

If he had seriously cared for that person, would he have not cherished that person’s unyielding convictions? If he was aware of the prayers Crusch had sworn before Fourier’s grave, should he have not sought out a path that kept that wish alive, even if it continued to inflict unceasing suffering upon her?

Was it not that very anger at facing this difficult to fathom reality that had allowed Crusch to recall Fourier, and made none other than her realize the cruelty of Ferris’s actions?

What if the confusion of Crusch's Memories that had recalled Fourier Lugunica had been evoked by her wrath at Ferris's action that trampled upon that oath?

Ferris might be detested by not only Crusch, but also by Fourier.

Ferris: "—Hk, quit it, quit it, there's no point to this."

Once again, he realized he was pretending to have a guilty conscience, and was searching for words to console himself.

He did not have time to waste on such trivialities, and so as to not worry Emilia and the rest, as well as Wilhelm, who had been caught between him and Crusch, he needed to determine his position from here on out.

In truth, there was no reason for him to continue as a Knight. Since the title of the Blue was still alive and well, he could turn to the Treatment Center or the Magic Research Institute and receive quite the warm welcome. It would be easy to secure employment, but there was no point in just living his life aimlessly.

Even apart from the certainty that these healing hands would continue to save others, there was hope.

Even if Ferris—no, Felix Argyle had cast away the qualifications to wish for it.

???: "—Oh, what a relief. I was worried we might miss each other."

Suddenly, the ears of Ferris, who had been scowling at the pavestones of the Noble District on the way back from the cemetery, shivered in response to the voice that had begun to speak, which had been directed at him.

He stopped walking, and looked ahead. In front of him, in the middle of the street, stood a lone figure. —The figure there was a familiar one.

It was a man with dull blond hair and deep blue eyes. His tall, slender figure was clad in a well-tailored suit, and his hair and goatee were carefully tidied, giving him a refined air. Given his profession, that was nothing strange.

After all, that person was—

Ferris: “—Russell Fellow, was it? You’re from the Commerce Guild.”

Russell: “Yes, that is correct. I am greatly honored you remember me. Would it be permissible for me to call you Ferris-sama? Or perhaps, Felix-sama?”

Ferris: “…Whichever one you prefer is fine.”

Russell: “Well then, I shall take you up on your kind offer, Felix-sama. Due to my line of work, it is usually less expedient, in a manner of speaking, to call another by a nickname rather than their formal name.”

Ferris: “Hmmm.”

Toward the man who bowed his head in a polite gesture—toward Russell Fellow, Ferris closed one eye.

The other party was a shrewd man who served as the representative of the Commerce Guild of the Royal Capital, an individual famed for being preeminently brilliant even amongst the battle-hardened merchants of the Royal Capital. In fact, he had been enlisted to aid with the Subjugation of the White Whale through the supply and transportation of goods, so he was not an unfamiliar party to the Crusch Camp.

Ferris: “That being said, currently I can’t go along with any get-rich-quick schemes, you know? It’s a shame, but…”

Russell: “Your Contract with Duchess Karsten as master and servant has been annulled. Indeed, I am quite aware.”

Ferris: “…Your ears catch wind so quick, it’s scary.”

Having said that, Ferris regretted that he himself had turned to such a foolish topic.

After all, Russell had clearly been lying in wait for Ferris. If he had never made any such move even once before now, and yet he took such a step on this day in particular, it could only be because a reason to take such action had appeared.

And then, there was one more thing in addition to that, yet another foolish thing that he further realized too late.

Ferris: "…It's still only early in the evening, so why is this road so empty?"

Russell: "…"

Russell stood in the middle of the road, about ten meters from Ferris. No indication of anyone on the streets of the Noble District drew near to Russell and Ferris's surroundings.

If this were late at night or early in the morning, it would make more sense, but it was incomprehensible at a time when the sun had yet to set. And when something impossible occurred, there was always a reason.

On this occasion, the reason why this had been brought about was —

Russell: "Felix-sama, I have something I am greatly interested in discussing with you, and if you do not mind, I would like to offer you an invitation to join me for a meal at my home. If you are still uncertain as to where to go…"

Ferris: "Do you intend to solicit me as soon as I am off my leash? I'm sorry, but such a conversation is—"

Russell: "—No, I am not soliciting you. In truth, this conversation is compulsory."

As if he was lamenting something, Russell slowly shook his head. — In that instant, someone appeared right behind Ferris and pressed a cold blade against his slender neck.

Ferris: "—Hk."

Breath caught within his throat, Ferris's movements were sealed. It was so sudden, there had been nothing he could have done. What he could discern was that the blade pressed against him was slender with a significant curvature, and that the person standing behind Ferris was considerably taller than him. —No, there was that as well.

Ferris: "…It doesn't seem like you are an ordinary merchant, huh?"

Russell: "Who knows? I believe it is certainly a possibility."

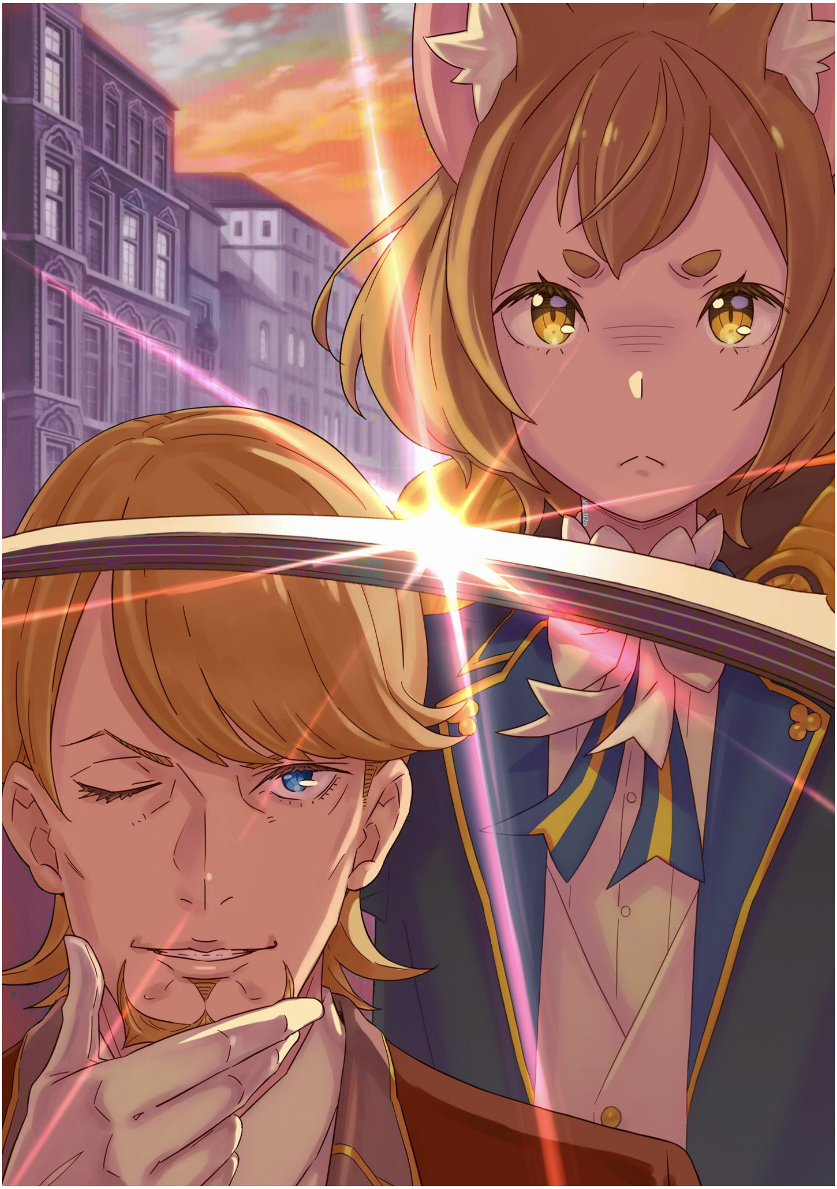
As Russell continued to close the distance step-by-step, while the blade remained against his neck and he was unable to act in response, Ferris at least tried to avert his eyes, feeling disgusted at himself yet again.

Why did he assume that someone capable of bearing such cold eyes would be a normal person?

Firmly biting his lip, he resisted letting any whimper or groan escape him. Ferris cautioned himself that such was the maximum extent of what he could do at the moment.

While examining Ferris from up close, still with those cold eyes, Russell informed him.

Russell: "Now that you are no longer the Knight of the Duchess, I shall not hesitate to interrogate you. —Regarding the Sacrament of the Immortal King passed down through House Argyle."



Chapter 10:
Faith Embedded

1

???: “So in the end, Captain, you’re tellin’ me that even when lookin’ at it with yer own eyes, ya couldn’t tell whether that Filóre Saintess is the real missin’ royal, or if it’s Felt-sama? Hoi…”

???: “But, you saw afterwards that Duchess Karsten’s health had recovered, right? Whether she is royalty or not, it’s at least clear that the power of the Sacrament is real, isn’t it? Hai…”

Subaru: “Yeah. I think that’s something Beako and Rem can also attest to after we went there together. What Emilia-tan and Otto saw wasn’t mistaken… Moreover, her description of Filóre being a reaaally good girl, wasn’t something that I could reasonably deny either. She seemed like an Emilia-tan type of girl without any malicious intentions. Hui…”

Letting out a deep sigh, Subaru recalled the rumored Saintess he had encountered directly earlier on this day at the Church, and with an indescribable mood, he tucked away the plate in his hands on the shelf.

The cupboard provided for the Royal Residence was filled with both wooden and ceramic tableware, and having used those for their meal, Subaru and the others were now in the midst of washing, drying, and putting everything away. Garfiel would wash the dishes at the washbasin, Petra would then wipe them dry, and then Subaru would store them away where they belonged.

Since the Royal Residence was a guesthouse for upper nobles who had business in the Royal Capital, there was fundamentally no aspect of it that left anything to be desired, and provisions to ensure the guests had no inconveniences were constantly being carried out. If necessary, there were housekeepers that could be dispatched to take care of things like cooking, cleaning, and one’s daily necessities, but the majority of nobles tended to bring along their own trusted servants, so it did not seem like they had many opportunities to work.

The Emilia Camp had also developed a style whereby the meal preparations for the day had been tasked to Petra, and the tidying up was being assisted by Subaru and Garfiel, who had lost in rock-paper-scissors.

So as the three of them were coordinating to tidy up together, they had ended up plunging into the current topic.

Garfiel: "…But ya see, Captain, if you're sayin' that'cha guys ain't mistakin' it even wit' yer own eyes, then my amazin' self's true feelin's're of wantin' to do somethin' to help out wit' the problem in Pristella."

Petra: "But, what if that leads to it being discovered that Filóre-san is real royalty? If that happens, Emilia-neesama's run in the Royal Selection might come to an end, you know?"

Garfiel: "That'd be a whole 'nother story, tho'. The Saintness called Filóre's already gone 'n risen to center stage. 'S just that nobody 'cept the big shots in the inner circles know 'bout her yet."

Stirring around the water in the bucket to form soapsuds, Garfiel responded to Petra's words as he washed the dishes. His emerald-green eyes narrowed as he engaged in combat against the stubborn stains clinging to the dishes using a scrap of linen in place of a sponge,

Garfiel: "Not that I've seen her for my amazin' self, but if she's causin' that much of an uproar wit' just her looks, there ain't gonna be no keepin' her hidden even if ya tried. Much less if she's plannin' to go off 'n heal Pristella same like she did the Duchess's body."

Petra: "—Yeah, I think you'd get a perfect score with that understanding of yours, Garf-san. You're now able to properly read the social climate. Good boy, good boy."

Garfiel: "Don't be talkin' bout it like ya were givin' me some sorta test! I'll say this now, but my amazin' self's Petra's senior, yeah?!"

Even when being patted on the head by Petra, who wore an expression most fitting for a teacher, Garfiel could not show any resistance with both of his hands deep in the washbucket, so all he could do was roar like a tiger. Pleasantly watching over their interaction with a faint smile, Subaru could not help but feel that the tides of the state of the world were shifting in an undesirable direction.

Subaru: “At the current moment, it really feels like there’s a yellow light on the progress of the Royal Selection, but…”

From here on out, if it ended up shifting into a red light, would it ever turn back to a green light once more, so that Emilia could honestly continue to fulfill her role as a Royal Candidate?

Subaru: “…”

In all honesty, Subaru feared now that the possibilities for the surviving princess were narrowed down to the two options of Felt and Filóre, the Royal Selection would shift into something that simply sought the answer of “which one of them is the true heir”.

Naturally, as Emilia’s one and only Knight, that was not something he could accept, but even disregarding that point of view, there was something about it that just did not sit right with him.

That was something that had also been raised as a topic while they were en route to the Royal Capital via the “Reinhard sprint” method.

Subaru: “To begin with, before Filóre ever showed up, why was there no development of Felt being decided as the next Monarch the moment she was suspected of being the princess?”

Of course, this world doubtlessly did not keep track of highly reliable evidence that would be useful for identifying individuals, such as DNA tests, fingerprint records, and dental care records.

However, even the reasons why Felt was suspected of being the princess were quite the ambiguous things, such as the rare physical features of her outward appearance and how her age lined up with that of the missing princess.

If that were enough to serve as proof of one's lineage in this world, then it would not have been strange in the slightest for the Royal Selection to have ended on that day, moments before Subaru made a fool of himself in the Royal Castle.

Subaru: "But, that didn't happen. The greatest reason for that was —"

Petra: "—The Dragon History Stone."

As Subaru raised his eyebrows at having been beaten to the punch, Petra stared at him as she handed him the plate she had just finished drying upon receiving it from Garfiel.

Subaru nodded "Exactly", and accepted both the plate and conclusion from her.

Subaru: "Throughout history, it's been a prophetic slab that's assisted the Kingdom in various times of crisis… though, it seems like the Dragon History Stone was what gave the instruction to hold the Royal Selection…"

Garfiel: "What's the matter? When ya say it like that, it kinda sounds like there's somethin' 'bout it that's eatin' at ya, Captain."

Subaru: "No, when I first heard about it, I didn't think much of it, you know? It's a fantasy world, so the thought of there being those kinds of marvelous items actually raised my excitement, but…"

Petra: "But, it's different now?"

Subaru: "Yeah. After all, I've now got various inklings concerning an item that can inform about things that have yet to happen… moreover, those are frequently bad inklings."

As Subaru made a face that appeared as if he had eaten a bitter bug, Petra and Garfiel exchanged glances.

It had been nearly two years since Subaru had started life in another world, and to be frank, there was an excessive amount of things in this world that posed as future sight or the guidance of fate, but were actually just trying to put ideas into people's heads.

In Vollachia, Abel had regarded the Stargazers with open hostility, and the Witch of Greed he had met in the tomb had given Beatrice a book of blank pages to dictate how she lived her life. And above all, he had even heard that the Gospels believed to be delivered into the hands of Witch Cultists would twist their very manner of being into something sinister.

How was the Dragon History Stone any different from those interferences that distorted fate from the sidelines?

Subaru: "I get why someone would get into the habit of relying on something if they were told it predicted the future. All the more so if it has a track record to back it up. But, the age-old trick of a conman is to let you win a little at the start, before crookedly taking a whole lot more from you later on."

In order to drag someone into a convenient decision in the future, they would give them small, inconsequential victories within their sphere of influence.

So long as one was not aware of what they would be made to do for that utmost vital decision, there would be a risk that they might grow far too confident that whatever "fate" was telling them would be something positive for themself.

With those thoughts in mind, Subaru felt a sense of danger within the very prophecy of the Dragon History Stone, but—

Garfiel & Petra: "…"

Subaru: "Huh? Why are you two making faces like that?"

When Subaru conveyed the apprehensions he harbored, Garfiel and Petra stared with their eyes widened.

Though young, they were both reliable confidants when it came to intuition and reasoning respectively, so it was strange for them to have the exact same reaction to a single premise. Even if one of them were to tilt their head in confusion, the other one would be able to provide a beneficial answer. That was what he had anticipated, and yet.

Then, as Subaru marvelled at that, the two of them began to speak in succession,

Garfiel: “How should I be puttin’ this—”

Petra: “—The idea of doubting the prophecies of the Dragon History Stone, it’s so unheard of, it took me by surprise.”

Subaru: “Eh, the idea is unheard of?”

Garfiel: “Uh-huh.” / Petra: “Mm-hmm.”

As the two of them simultaneously nodded in agreement, Subaru wondered if it was some sort of joke. But, their eyes were completely earnest, with a strong hue of genuine perplexity in their expressions, causing Subaru to blink his eyes in response.

Their reaction felt like they had come into contact with something truly unforeseen, as if a question in a quiz was revealed to be solved by some logic they had never even imagined. It had been a while since he had felt this level of culture shock—no, he had only just recently experienced it again through hearing about the hereditary succession of the throne.

Subaru: “To be honest, I think that was just a disaster of me being way too unaccustomed to a monarchy, with the King as the absolute authority… but could this be like a more deep-rooted, religious view kinda thing?”

Different climate and topography would lead to differing manners and customs, so while it was only natural for aspects of common sense to vary, he had actually come quite a long way without any major friction as a result of fundamental differences in values. He had thought he had led a relatively difficult life in another world thus far, but it seemed like he had yet to see the worst of it.

Once again, he grew to understand the weight behind this nation being called the Dragon Kingdom.

Subaru: “Petra is a sweet, beautiful girl that bloomed in a village in the sticks, and Garfiel is a golden rookie who grew up in a hidden village cut off from the rest of the world.”

Positions that, when compared to those born and raised in the big cities, would not receive the same benefits and education as citizens of the Kingdom—even for two such individuals, the fact that they had no concept of doubting the Dragon History Stone, was proof of just how embedded faith towards the Dragon was in the collective subconscious.

If that was so for two of such origins, then those who firmly placed their identity within the Kingdom would be even less likely to arrive at the idea of disregarding the Dragon History Stone. —That was precisely why, under the circumstances of royal absence, this nation had the foundations necessary to carry out something like the Royal Selection without any hesitation.

In that case—

Subaru: “—The thing Crusch-san was attempting to accomplish, was truly something incredible.”

Setting aside whether that ideal was correct or not, in this world so entrenched in its faith towards said Dragon, Crusch’s advocacy to free themselves from the Covenant with said Dragon was an outrageous, humongous decision that Subaru was only now coming to comprehend.

In fact, based on public sentiment from before it started, Crusch had been the prime candidate in the Royal Selection by an overwhelming margin.

The moment the Royal Selection did not end up entirely steeped in the singular color of Crusch, it would have been clear just how difficult to accept her campaign policies were for the current Kingdom. —At the same time, Subaru could also fathom a guess as to her aim in the White Whale Subjugation that had occurred right after the commencement of the Royal Selection.

Of course, regarding the White Whale Subjugation, Crusch would have also had feelings of wanting to allow Wilhelm, a member of her own Camp, to carry out his vengeance. However, the White Whale was one of the Three Great Witchbeasts that had tormented people for hundreds of years, so was she not trying to make a point by bringing it down through their own efforts?

To convey her own resolve and ideals, to say that even without relying on the Dragon's Covenant, she could firmly lead the Kingdom forward.

—Ultimately, through Subaru's interference, the Subjugation of the White Whale was also assisted by the Emilia and Anastasia Camps, and was known throughout the world as an achievement of a united military campaign between the three camps.

Even so, Crusch had not seemed to mind. After all, Wilhelm had managed to carry out his vengeance, and even while exposed to adverse winds from her surroundings, Crusch had managed to take the first step towards realizing her ideal.

And yet, Crusch's ideal had ended up being crushed in an unexpected way—

Subaru: "Am I an idiot? No, I am definitely an idiot."

With his understanding reaching that point, Subaru finally became painfully aware of his own thoughtlessness.

Without truly understanding the significance of the ideal that was on the verge of being plucked away from Crusch, he had visited her and tried to provide comfort by saying he would stand by her out of shallow sympathy and compassion. Pairing that with the tale of blighted love between Crusch and the fourth prince he had heard from Ferris later at the mausoleum, just thinking about how insensitive and superficial his words had been made him want to die in a fit of anger.

But—

Garfiel: "Ya know, Captain. I dunno 'bout sayin' this sorta thing, but when ya let yer emotions take over 'n go off sayin' this 'n that, it's somethin' like "Garagockle's Lovesickness", but—"

Petra: "We've all been saved by Subaru's rashness and recklessness, so we'd appreciate you not speaking so negatively about it…"

Garifel: "Ahh?! Ain't that what my amazin' self was just 'bouta say?!"

Petra: "Sorry, I just wanted to score some points with Subaru."

Poking her tongue out, Petra gave a playful apology, to which Garfiel heaved a crestfallen "Roar…".

Receiving their words, Subaru subconsciously bit down hard on the inside of his cheek. That was because at first he had been surprised, then he had immediately become uncertain of what face he ought to make.

He had regrets about his choice of words towards Crusch, but he did not want to remain grimacing in light of Petra and Garfiel's consideration. As a result, with his expression a half-baked, incoherent one,

Subaru: "…Don't pamper me like that. If I start presuming on it, I'll never stop."

Petra: "Is that so? In that case, I want to start pampering Subaru even more. Right, Garf-san?"

Garfiel: "Dunno if pamperin's the right wordin' here, but both Captain 'n Ottobro don't really tend to look after yerselves even tho' you're always takin' care of others. Every once in a while, it's fine for my amazin' self to raise ya up high in the air for a bit."

Subaru: "Last time you did that, you sent Otto right through the ceiling…"

If he remembered it right, that was a disaster that had played out when Otto had gotten drunk after finishing up a mountain of work, and drawn in by the high spirits, Garfiel had attempted to show his appreciation for him with all his might. Otto had no lasting injuries, and his memory of the incident had vanished with the alcohol, so it was quite the laugh tale now.

Regardless—

Subaru: “I’d thought that there were already tons of things I need to do and things I want to do, but… seems like there’s now one more thing I wanna make sure of.”

With a heart full of gratitude, Subaru reached out and rested a hand on both Garfiel and Petra’s heads. As they leaned into the ticklish head pat, Subaru narrowed his eyes at the soapsuds bubbling to the surface of the washbucket, and foaming apart.

There were countless others who were wiser and more knowledgeable than him. But if, even among such people, the significance of Subaru’s presence could be found within these actions and ideas, then—

Subaru: “First things first, I wanna get to the bottom of what the Dragon History Stone really is.”

What sort of power it was employing, what its intent was in trying to guide them toward a particular future; he wanted to believe that, as a person from another world, casting doubt upon that was Natsuki Subaru’s advantage.

First, he would start with what he already knew. —If he truly wished to be there for Crusch and Ferris in a way they actually desired, after they had left him feeling increasingly frustrated at his own inability to do anything.

Be that as it may—

Subaru: “…If I asked Ferris, he’d probably say that this way of thinking is prideful.”

2

Unexpectedly finding herself listening in on the conversation taking place in the kitchen, she was earnestly wavering on whether or not to reach her hand out to the door.

???: "—Seems kinda like they're in the middle of a conversation that's a bit awkward to ba~rge into."

???: "—Hk."

???: "Ara~? Looks like I took you by surpri~se. If so, I apologi~ze."

At the words of Meili as she popped up from behind to peer at her, Rem shook her head with a "No" as she readjusted her grip on the water pitcher in her hand.

She had paid a visit to the kitchen to refill the half-empty pitcher. Inside, Subaru, Petra, and Garfiel, responsible for cleaning up after dinner, were washing the dishes in coordination, and having a discussion regarding the Royal Selection. Reluctant to interrupt their conversation, Rem had vaguely decided she would just wait until they moved on to the next topic, and had been listening to the exchange from outside the kitchen, but—

Meili: "Don't you think that Subaru-oniisan has a really difficult natu~re? Why's he always trying to shoulder everything by himself, it just makes everyone wo~rried."

As the topic of conversation in the kitchen veered toward Subaru's disposition—to the part of him that would always feel excessive self-reproach, Petra and Garfiel immediately jumped in with corrections and observations, and it was clear that Subaru was starting to get flustered.

Standing behind Rem, it seemed like Meili had pictured the state of things inside, and touching upon it with her own way of phrasing, she widened her eyes and looked to Rem as if seeking her agreement.

Meili: "I wonder… Rem-oneesan, aren't you pretty an~gry?"

Rem: "…I am not angry, but my feelings are rather complicated. After all, I had only just told that person something similar to what Petra-chan and Garf told him now."

Meili: "Ah, that sure would explain why you'd make a face like tha~t.”

Whatever the face she was making, Meili’s manner of speech seemed as if she was walking on eggshells.

Only, recalling when she had told him something similar—when Subaru seemed like he was trying to carry the responsibility even for the death of the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony who had been murdered in the Prison Tower, Rem remembered that she had hesitated to declare it purely a problem of Subaru’s disposition.

After all, she understood that the reason for Subaru thinking that way also dwelled within her own attitude.

Meili: “To begin with, the way Subaru-oniisan only ever seems to be counting his failures isn’t goo~d. Honestly, it’s so insu~lting.”

In front of Rem as she cast her eyes down from the sentimentality, and strengthened her grip on the pitcher, Meili crossed her arms and glared at the kitchen door as she spoke those words.

Rem: “It’s… insulting?”

Meili: “I mean, am I wrong? Despite appearances, even I believe that I’ve been saved by Subaru-oniisan, after a~ll. Same goes for Petra-chan and fanged onii-san, which is why they’re in there encouraging him as they are… yet for him to still be like that, isn’t it anno~ying?”

With a finger over her lips, Meili puffed out her cheeks. Seeing her pout so childishly, Rem blinked several times before bursting out into a sudden chuckle.

Meili: “Ara~, did you laugh at me just no~w?”

Rem: “I apologize. It was a tad unexpected. From my perspective, you and Petra-chan both just seemed like quite mature children for your age, and so…”

Meili: “You mean to say we’re cheeky, I wo~nder? But, although mine is just parroting what I’ve heard, Petra-chan’s is the result of actually growing up, so for both Emilia-oneesan and Rem-oneesan, if you're careless, you might just get overtaken and end up regre~tting it."

Rem: "…I have no idea what you are talking about."

Meili: "Really? Fufufu, rea~lly?"

That instant, Meili giggled with her hand over her mouth, elatedly smiling as if she had gotten revenge for being treated as a child.

Heaving a sigh at Meili's response, Rem turned her gaze back toward the kitchen door,

Rem: "It seems like everyone who's a part of this camp has been saved by that person."

Meili: "See~ms like it. Maybe that's exactly why it's so hard to tell Subaru-oniisan "no" when he's about to do something reckle~ss. — But, I think you don't need to wo~rry about it."

Rem: "—?"

Meili: "After a~ll, I don't think there's anyone who is more shamelessly out-of-place here than I a~m."

Holding her braid of hair in her fingers, Meili shrugged her shoulders. Catching the flicker of complex emotions that colored Meili's voice, Rem narrowed her own pale-blue eyes.

Rem: "…Though it is a bit late now, it is bitter that I do not have my Memories."

Evidently, Meili carried circumstances that were by no means light.

Unlike Emilia and everyone else she had interacted with in the Vollachian Empire, she had only met Meili for the first time in the Kingdom of Lugunica, inside the dragon carriage that Reinhard had carried over.

From a rough explanation, she had heard that Meili was once somebody who was hostile to Subaru and the others, but not wanting to unnecessarily strain the relationship, Subaru's explanation had been far too vague, and ultimately, she never learned exactly what sort of friction had existed between them and Meili.

Only, the intricate emotions that had emerged on her youthful face, appeared to be evidence of hesitation founded in those circumstances.

That was why—

Rem: “Please, do not blame yourself too much either.”

Meili: “…”

Holding her breath at Rem’s words, Meili stared at her intently. As she received that gaze head-on without averting her eyes, Meili parted her thin lips,

Meili: “Is it fine for you to say such a thi~ng? Even though I once tried to kill Rem-onee~san?”

Rem: “—. That… is quite the shock, but it is not something I remember, so…”

Meili: “Well, guess I’m lu~cky… For me to be lucky, I wonder if that’s fine?”

Rather than whispering, Meili muttered those words with a voice that seemed like it would vanish.

Still toying with her braid, her gaze fell from Rem down to the floor,

Meili: “To be honest, sometimes I think it’s too good to be tru~e… The things I’ve done being overlooked, being forgiven by the Kingdom just because of my Divine Protection… even now, I can’t help but wonder if I’m not due for some terrible retribution before lo~ng.”

Rem: “Retribution…”

Meili: “Just like how you’re praised when you do something good, you're scolded when you do something bad, ri~ght? I've ended up escaping from that all this time, you kno~w?"

Perhaps feeling guilty for having been pardoned, Meili's words were pessimistic, and pitiful.

Her deeds that had caused her to think in such a way, Rem knew not. Was her declaration that she had once tried to kill Rem to be taken as serious, or as a joke?

Perhaps, if Rem knew all the details, her thoughts might change. —But, right now, she did not know anything.

And since she did not know, she would never get another opportunity to say the things that she could only say now; so did she believe.

Rem: "I do not mean to make it a competition, but I carry a similar anguish."

Meili: "…Rem-oneesan has something similar… to m~e?"

Rem: "Yes… After all, I do not intend to be a person so naive as to presume it is only natural when someone does a lot for me."

What she thought back on were her own actions when she had awakened in a state bereft of Memories; in an environment with nobody she could count on, she had been terribly cold to him—to Subaru, and repeatedly rejected his hand.

No matter how dire Rem's circumstances had been at the time, there was a limit to how much she could justify her behavior. After all, the gifts bestowed by Subaru were by no means unlimited.

Rem: "I have no choice but to pay the compensation for that pridefulness within myself. Until that debt is settled, I believe I do not even have the right to face him."

Meili: "—. You're really hard on yourself, aren't yo~u?"

Rem: "I wonder, am I really? If I consider it as a recompense for being harsh to another… to a person who cherished me, I believe it is only natural. But, that is just how it is for myself, so…”

Meili: “—?”

Taking a step to close the distance on Meili as she spoke, Rem, after a moment’s hesitation, plopped her hand on the head of the girl looking up at her curiously.

Then—

Rem: “I don’t believe it is healthy for a child like you to live in such fear of some looming retribution, so… I will certainly fight against it for you.”

Meili: “—Ah.”

As Rem falteringly selected her words, Meili expelled a soft sigh. Then, with her eyes downcast, and Rem’s hand on her head,

Meili: “—. Even without your Memories, Rem-oneesan, I think you’re every bit a member of this ca~mp.”

Rem: “…That’s, in what sense are…”

You saying that? Rem knit her brows at Meili’s down-turned head. —It happened then.

Rem: “Kya-?!”

Suddenly, a strange sensation brushed against her hand placed upon Meili’s head, and she reflexively let out a scream.

Taking a look, a small creature had suddenly appeared on the girl’s head, making its way through her dark blue hair. At the same time as she recognized it as a scorpion of a deep crimson luster, her arms promptly jerked back into a fold, water pitcher still in hand—the remaining half-pitcher’s worth of water, drenched Meili from the head down.

Rem & Meili: “Ah.”

Witnessing that disaster, both Rem, the aggressor, and Meili, the victim, stood frozen in shock. Atop Meili's sodden hair, the little scorpion that had also been caught in the downpour was clacking its pincers in protest.

Even though it was the one who had brought about the fright, the scorpion itself had the audacity to still be upset about the whole affair. Furthermore, before Rem could even finish processing that shock, the door to the kitchen vigorously swung open—

???: "Just now, didn't I hear Rem scream?!"

Rem: "…What poor timing."

???: "Huh?! That's the reaction I get for worrying about you?! Also what sort of situation is this?!"

Having heard her scream, Subaru had come rushing out only to be aghast upon setting foot at the scene. At Subaru's usual liveliness, Rem momentarily hesitated on where to start explaining from.

But, faster than she could do so, a voice of laughter puffed out an "Aha-". —It was Meili. Having been drenched in water, she giggled, soaking together with the scorpion perched on her head,

Meili: "Ha~h, how funny. There's not even the time to be feeling do~wn."

Subaru: "What's got you so refreshed? Oi, Petra! Towel! Fetch a towel!"

Petra: "Wah, Meili-chan is dripping wet! We've got to get you into some dry clothes right away!"

Petra came pitter-pattering over with a towel in hand, and wiped Meili's head dry along with the scorpion. As Meili stood there allowing that to be done to her, Rem bowed her head to her, still with the empty pitcher in hand.

Even though Rem had meant to offer Meili a comforting hand, the actual result had been a complete washout. However, as Rem reflected on that, Meili waved her hand saying "Don't worry abou~t it", Meili: “Instea~d, I’ll take what you told me earlier to hea~rt.”

Rem: “…”

Catching a glimpse of Meili’s eyes through a gap in the towel, Rem slightly widened her own in surprise. Even during that brief interaction, Petra had gone around behind Meili and, nudging her shoulders,

Petra: “Alright, let’s go get you changed. Subaru, Garf-san, there’s still tidying up left to do, but…”

Subaru: “Don’t worry, we can handle the rest. Make sure Meili doesn’t catch a cold.”

Meili: “Don’t treat me like a chi~ld.”

With that sulky mutter, Meili was led away by Petra. Right until she vanished around the corner, Meili had kept on waving her hand back at Rem.

After seeing those charming girls off, Subaru turned to Rem with an “Umm”,

Subaru: “Ah, is that Nee-sama’s water? Then, let’s just get that refilled for you first thing…”

Rem: “—. No, it is my fault that Petra-chan had to leave, so I will help.”

Subaru: “Oh? In that case, we’ll do it together?”

Evading the hand that reached for the pitcher, Rem offered her assistance instead. Upon doing so, Subaru looked a little surprised before immediately accepting, and as Rem gave him a bit of a flat stare,

Rem: “…When it comes to this sort of proposal, you agree to it right away.”

Subaru: “Eh? What’s that supposed to mean?”

Rem: “It is nothing. Garf, I will be assisting as well, so please move back a bit.”

Garfiel: “That’d be a huge help, but why’s my amazin’ self the only one ya call in such a rough way?”

Rem: “Because that’s what Nee-sama called you, and for some reason, it feels right.”

With his hands in the bucket at the washbasin, Garfiel furrowed his nose. Sensing Subaru smile wryly at that, Rem reflexively was about to say something—but she let it go.

Had she not reflected on herself just now with Meili?

Subaru: “What’s the matter, Rem, you’ve got this adorable look on your face, did something happen?”

Rem: “Hah?”

Subaru: “Sorry, I got carried away! A-Alright, look, let’s get this all tidied up and then bring that water to Nee-sama!”

Subaru tried to cover up his verbal gaffe with vigor, and making a gesture of rolling up his sleeves, he ran to Garfiel’s side like the wind.

Following along with a sigh, Rem cautioned herself as strongly as she could.

Until she had settled the debts of her past actions, she would never gain the right to face this frustration.

Rem: “The road ahead still has many difficulties in store. Katya-san, Priscilla-san.”

When the day finally came that she possessed that right, just what sort of face would she show to him?

Having yet to find an answer for that, Rem whispered to those she held in deepest affection and reverence within her own heart, before joining the coordinated dish-washing, seamlessly filling the gap that Petra had left behind.

3

—Questions rising anew, matters being posed anew; he had just decided to progress the situation, yet things did not go quite as expected.

From time to time, it would not be uncommon for one's pace on their journey toward achieving a goal to be disrupted by a delay due to one's environment or some unexpected turmoil.

In this case, it was the latter that had dampened Natsuki Subaru's departure.

???: "—Fuah."

With a soft sigh, placing their hand over their wide-open mouth, they concealed that yawn.

Although, aside from it being obvious that they had yawned, he could even see the teardrops that slowly welled up at the corners of their eyes. He had often pondered whether it would be better manners to just openly yawn, or to stifle a yawn to the point of tears. If yawning in itself was considered a breach of etiquette, then what more could be said?

???: "—Your tea."

As he gazed at the other party with such thoughts running through his mind, gently placed upon the table was black tea brewed by Petra, demonstrating the tea-serving techniques taught to her by Ram.

As that warm aroma of fragrant tea leaves wafted through the air, the other party interrupting their own yawn with an "Oh myyy",

???: "What a lovely fraaagrance. I feel a little ashamed, being treated so hospitably despite dropping by so suuuddenly, ehehe."

???: "No, it's fine. We were all just about to have tea together, so I think your "taiming" was actually good. Umm…"

???: “—Sakura Element, that’s my naaame, Emilia-chan.”

Saying so with a faint smile, the woman—introducing herself as Sakura Element, one of the individuals connected to the Church of the Divine Dragon, freely sipped from the cup of black tea offered to her.

It had been on the periphery between early and late morning when Sakura had paid a visit to the Emilia Camp staying at the Royal Residence, right around the time when their minds were just beginning to wake up. It was not something they could say aloud, but the sudden visit without a prior appointment seemed a bit like a surprise attack—

???: “We would have liked to greet you as well, but Emilia-sama is in quite the busy situation with much she must attend to. If you could have, we would have preferred you notified us in advance.”

It seemed that Otto had taken quite a bit of offense at how their pace had been thrown off by her.

His wording was courteous, but a hint of his objection was unmistakable in Otto’s remarks, giving Subaru the feeling that the situation had set Otto’s nerves on edge.

Subaru: “I guess letting off steam yesterday wasn’t enough… You seem to think that if you talk to them in a polite tone, you are being courteous.”

Otto: “I can hear you, you know. That is problematic, Natsuki-san.”[22]

Subaru: “Scary, it’s not even courtesy anymore, it’s a threat…”

Even if Subaru was his ally, Otto was merciless in snapping back at him; but, his preparedness for war was not a manner of scolding Subaru and the others of course, but was a result of receiving an opponent he must be wary of.

Coming right after yesterday, the Church of the Divine Dragon at the center of the controversy had arrived expressly to visit them: there was no way it was not associated with the Royal Selection.

Naturally, Sakura, who had been let into the parlor, must have possessed some cunning reason, but—

Sakura: "—Subaru-chan, riiight? I feel a bit shy when you stare at me so inteeently."

Subaru: "Oh, sorry. You are a beautiful woman, Sakura-san, but was that a bit impolite of me?"

Sakura: "Weeell, what a naughty boy, trying to hit on me while apologizing. I didn't think you would be such a smooth operaaator. I've heard a lot of rumors about you, Subaru-chan, you knooow?"

Subaru: "Rumors? About me?"

Toward that unexpected retaliation, Subaru gestured toward himself, and Sakura smiled with a "Yes".

Stirring her tea like that with a teaspoon, upon taking a sip from that cup once more, she exhaled in a vaguely seductive manner.

Then, tilting her head at the vague silence that had arisen,

Sakura: "…Were you perhaps expecting something from meee?"

Subaru: "No, well, with the way things were going, wouldn't I expect to hear what rumors you've heard about me, Sakura-san?"

Sakura: "Really? Howeeever, I'm sure Emilia-chan and the members of your camp know you much better than I dooo. At this point, does it really matter what kind of rumors are being spread about youuu, Subaru-chan?"

Beatrice: "Indeed, you say such nice things, I suppose. Truly, Betty and the others know Subaru the best, in fact. There is nothing to worry about, I suppose."

Emilia: "Yeah. I'm reaaally proud to have such a splendid Knight."

Beatrice on his lap, and Emilia sitting to his right, gave their stamps of approval, and while he was overjoyed, the gossip concerning Subaru was swept away in an unsatisfying manner.

In any case, the situation was that Subaru, Emilia, Beatrice, and Otto, along with Petra, who stood back along the wall, were all dealing with Sakura, who had hoisted this assault upon them without an appointment.

Currently, the impression he had of Sakura was that of a terribly elusive woman, but,

Emilia: “Sakura-san, are you a good friend of Filóre’s? I just became friends with her.”

Sakura: “Yes, I’ve heard that so much from Filóre-chan that I’m sick of iiit. She just keeps going around saying “My Emilia” this, “My Emilia” that… weeell, I’m a peer of Filóre-chan’s at the Church, so I suppose I’m something like a stand-in big sister to heeer.”

Emilia: “Filóre’s big sister!”

Subaru: “Of course, there’s quite the difference in that lovely liveliness between you sisters.”

Sakura: “I’m merely a stand-in for a big sister, you knooow. That girl grew up as a most cherished child of the Church, kept carefully hidden away, so perhaps you could say she is like the younger sister of everyone in the Church. Ehehe.”

Looking pleased, Sakura said so, the warmth of her smile remaining constant. Hence, it was an enigma as to how much of her explanation concerning Filóre they should earnestly believe.

However, the description of Filóre being raised as a cherished child of the Church that was hidden away weighed on him.

Otto: “Well then, is it correct to believe the reason that Filóre-san never appeared in public was due to the policy of the Church of the Divine Dragon?”

Sakura: “That is correeect. Weeell, that also became pointless as a result of Filóre-chan rushing out on her own with a baaang.”

Subaru: “So Filóre’s rampage was truly beyond the Church’s expectations…”

Without knowing the individual in question, it was a story that would be tremendously difficult to believe, but to Subaru, who had actually spoken with Filóre, it was an outcome completely lacking in incongruity.

Yesterday as well, she had been forcibly put in detention at the church, but at that rate, it felt like she would soon reach the limits of her patience and rush out on her own.

Sakura: "I mean, she actually did rush out. Which is why I visited the lodging of Emilia-chan and the rest of you todaaay."

Subaru: "…Eh?! Rushing out, you're talking about today?!"

Sakura: "Yes, it was this morning. Even though I advised her yesterday about the tasks we had to complete today, she's really such a troublemaker…"

Subaru: "Wait, wait, wait, is it really fine to just treat her as a little miss troublemaker and then go about drinking tea?!"

Though it had not been broadly announced, there could be no doubt that Filóre had quickly climbed the ladder into becoming an important figure for the Kingdom. How was it that the one appointed to be her overseer could relax here so leisurely while such a girl was acting on her own?

Sakura, laughing with an "Ehehe" to Subaru and the others, flustered as they were, as if it were someone else's problem,

Sakura: "Please rest assured when it comes to that. Believe it or nooot, I know where Filóre-chan is headed. To be precise, it's where her friend Emilia-chan iiis."

Emilia: "Ah, is that what it is. She's coming to where I am… she hasn't come though?!"

Subaru: "She didn't come yet, did she?!"

She had seemed to think that it would be grounds for relief, but instead, that information had failed to serve that role, and they had resumed their panic.

From Sakura's confident-sounding wording, it would seem she had something like a note from Filóre that indicated her destination, but no one in the camp had caught sight of the girl in question. Naturally, neither Petra nor Otto knew of her whereabouts either.

Subaru: "Beako obviously doesn't know either. She's been with me all day today since I woke up."

Beatrice: "In fact. Betty went to bed and got up early together with Subaru, brushed her teeth together with Subaru, and had breakfast together with Subaru after doing radio calisthenics together with Subaru, I suppose. During all of that, she didn't see that noisy girl at all, in fact."

Emilia: "Wh-What should we do? What if something were to happen to Filóre…?"

Coming face to face with this, Subaru and the others were incredibly worried over the whereabouts of the missing Filóre.

When she had suddenly appeared, they were surprised by her existence, but now that she had abruptly vanished, she had caused an entirely different shock. It was as if Filóre was a tempest in human form.

And, next to the flustered Subaru and Emilia, Otto let out a soft sigh.

Subaru: "Hey, what's that about, Otto… ah! No way, were you thinking that since it's the source of our worries, you would rather she just vanished so it would cause less problems in the future…?"

Beatrice: "Otto, that's seriously a bit too much like Roswaal, I suppose…"

Otto: "Please stop causing damage to my reputation. You too, Beatrice-chan, do not look at me with those eyes… Just to confirm, is Filóre-san wearing the habit of the Church of the Divine Dragon?"

His veins bulging in response to the knowing glance Subaru and Beatrice shared, Otto then verified Filóre's attire with Sakura.

Upon Sakura's response to that question of an "Of cooourse" and a nod,

Otto: "Then I would not worry about it. Unless something extraordinary were to occur, a woman dressed as a nun of the Church of the Divine Dragon should not get wrapped up in any trouble on the street."

Emilia: "Really? Petra-chan, is that true?"

Petra: "Indeed, I believe it's as Otto-san says. If someone from the Church were to get in trouble, I believe someone around them would certainly offer to help."

Upon hearing Otto and Petra's conviction on the matter, as if it was only natural, Subaru and Emilia could only say "Is that so?", as if seeing a new perspective.[23]

Subaru: "But, that's only if she gets in trouble on the street, right? If there's a development like… like falling into the wicked, evil clutches of some malicious individual, even that wouldn't be foolproof, right?"

Otto: "What are you talking about? A person riddled with wickedness, evil, malice… based on that attitude of Sakura-san's, it seems such worries are unnecessary. The reason she is here in the first place is—"

Sakura: "—Otto-chan, you're quite quick-witted, aren't youuu? Exactly, I am here in anticipaaation."

Right as Otto was convinced of the conclusion he had attempted to state, Sakura snatched it away from him and spoke of the reason for her visit to the Royal Residence herself.

The way she had put it was subtly lacking in its explanation, but its substance, together with the recklessness of the real Filóre, provided Subaru in particular with an answer, a step behind Otto.

Subaru: "In other words, Filóre left to go to where Emilia-tan is, but because she doesn't know the exact location, she'll have to gather information here and there while on her way…"

Beatrice: “Stand-in for a big sister, you anticipated the eventual arrival of Filóre here, which is why you are drinking tea with Betty and everyone else, in fact.”

Sakura: “Clap clap clap, you’re spot on. The children here at Emilia-chan’s place are awfully briiilliant.”

Sakura praised her with gentle applause, but Subaru and the others were not so naive as to take her compliments at face value. Besides, even combining the kindness of the Church of the Divine Dragon towards humanity with the initiative of Filóre, he could not be certain as to whether this woman was definitively safe.

He wondered if Emilia had the same concerns, and as she furrowed her shapely eyebrows,

Emilia: “Sakura-san, you’re so confident, but I’m worried about Filóre. I’ll just go take a little look around here—”

Rem: “—Emilia-san, if I may. A guest has arrived.”

Those worries of Emilia’s were perfectly interrupted by the sound of Rem knocking on the door of the parlor. Everyone’s gaze instinctively swiveled toward the door, and repeating “A guest?”, Emilia tilted her head.

Immediately after, the door was blown open from the other side with such force and a bam—

???: “—It’s terrible, Emilia! Please save your friend!”

Emilia: “Filóre?!”

Before Emilia’s eyes, widened in astonishment, the one who rushed into the parlor in a tizzy was none other than Filóre, the very one who had been the topic of conversation.

Those crimson eyes of hers wet with tears, she dashed over to Emilia, who was staring at her, and dove headfirst into her chest without slowing her momentum at all. The force of it had been nearly that of a headbutt, but Emilia easily withstood that attack of Filóre’s and caught her.

Emilia: “Wah, you surprised me. Are you okay, Filóre? Are you hurt?”

Filóre: “Yeah, yeah, I’m okay… no, I’m not! I’m falling apart! Look, it’s not my body, but my mind that’s falling apart!”

Emilia: “Oh no, that’s terrible… where should I look?”

Filóre: “I don’t know either, so just squeeze me!”

Emilia: “Okay! Squeeze!”

Immediately upon her entrance, Filóre dyed the space in her own hue with tremendous momentum. Emilia’s manliness shone as she went with the flow, responding without hesitation.

As he watched the two of them embrace like that, Petra came up next to him, and lightly pulling on the sleeve of Subaru’s tracksuit,

Petra: “…Is that the rumored Saintess-sama?”

Subaru: “That is the rumored Saintess-sama indeed. What do you think? How different is she from the image you had?”

Petra: “Perhaps it’s quite a bit different… ah, but I think that’s fine. What constitutes a Saintess likely varies from person to person.”

Subaru: “An age of diversity even when it comes to Saintesses, huh… can’t say that really speaks to me.”

Even though Petra was both a good listener and a good speaker, she struggled to put into words how overwhelmed she was.

In any case, the worst-case scenario of Filóre roaming alone throughout the Royal Capital, never to arrive at the Royal Residence, had been averted for now.

Subaru: “And then, there is the objective of Filóre, who’s going so far as to ask us for help, but…”

Beatrice: “For the time being, it doesn’t give off a good feeling, I suppose.”

Subaru completely agreed with Beatrice’s anticipation. Ignoring them, Emilia spoke in a hushed voice to Filóre, who was calming down little by little within her arms, and while soothing her,

Emilia: “So, can you tell me what happened? What do you mean by “save you”?”

Filóre: “That, the thing is… things have become quite disastrous, Emilia.”

Emilia: “Disastrous… gulp.”

At that pompous wording of Filóre’s, Emilia swallowed with a loud gulping noise. Looking at Emilia from up close, Filóre continued.

It was—

Filóre: “—It seems I must participate as a Candidate in the Royal Selection!”

Her voice quavering tearfully, Filóre lamented that undue fate that had befallen her.

Hearing this, Emilia’s amethyst eyes widened, Otto put his hand to his forehead, Petra bit a lip upon her cute face, and Subaru and Beatrice looked at each other, and then,

Subaru: “As expected…”

Beatrice: “That bad feeling was proven right, in fact.”

Filóre: “What in the world am I ever to do… geh! Sakura?!”

At the same time the unpleasant foresight of Subaru and Beatrice came true, Sakura, whose presence had been unnoticed by Filóre due to having her back to the parlor’s entrance, waved at her.

Upon this unexpected encounter with her family, Filóre, the one who had brought such an uproar with her, opened her mouth so very, very wide, that it seemed like her jaw would fall off. —The beautiful girl had been reduced to naught.

Chapter 11:
The Reason the Dragon Gem Shines

1

???: “Don’t you think that Sakura and Tiga are just heartless? If I’d known things would turn out like this, even I… even I…!”

???: “Have you ever thought of saving someone with the Sacrament out of self-preservation befooore?”

???: “I probably would have done it anyway, but the way I’d feel about it would be completely different depending on whether I knew or not!”

Wailing with teary eyes, Filóre glared at Sakura, who sat directly in front of her, and she apparently seemed earnestly aware of her own impulsivity, having completed some proper self-analysis.

Sakura, who had styled herself as a stand-in for her older sister, frowning at that outburst of Filóre’s,

Sakura: “Even if you put it like that, the ones inconvenienced would be us all the saaame. Subaru-chan, Beatrice-chan, you two understand me, riiight?”

Subaru: “I don’t get why you’re dragging me and Beako into this, but I more or less get that the situation was inevitable.”

Beatrice: “Regardless of where responsibility lies, one can imagine from your exchange that Filóre was the one who created such an impetus, I suppose.”

Saying so, Subaru and Beatrice shook their heads incredulously in perfect sync, expressing their opinions on the query from Sakura, who was sitting right beside them.

Incidentally, the seating arrangement on the sofas, which faced each other in the parlor, was currently Emilia and Otto on the host side, with Filóre clinging onto Emilia's arm, and Sakura on the guest side, along with Subaru and Beatrice sitting side-by-side, having changed seats.

In addition to Petra, who had stood by the wall since the beginning, Rem, who had shown Filóre in, joined her, adding to the evergrowing liveliness of the parlor.

Subaru: "That said, the source of the increase in volume is mostly Filóre's fault anyway. To begin with, why are we even sitting on this side? It's a strange pairing."

Filóre: "My goodness! Emilia, did you hear that? That Subaru, he's trying to tear apart two incomparable friends, myself and Emilia. Don't tell me, are you a spy for the Church…?"

Beatrice: "No matter how you look at it, the only one who is a spy for the Church is you, in fact."

Beatrice gave a sigh of lament at Filóre, who wore a countenance as if to say she was filled with dread. Emilia, whose arm was still clutched in Filóre's grip, patted her friend's head despite her wry smile,

Emilia: "Geez, don't look at Subaru like that, Filóre. Subaru is reaaally sweet, and he'd never come between us. To begin with, my relationship with Subaru is completely different from my relationship with you, okay?"

Filóre: "O-Of course, I agree… By the way, which one is more important to you?"

Emilia: "Eh? Well…"

Filóre: "Actually, it's fine! Don't say it! This too, is in the scriptures! "The Dragon bestows ordeals upon us, out of love. Just as gold scorched by flames shall gain further purity, so too shall the soul, through adversity born of that love, emanate a brilliance worthy of the Dragon's will"!"

With her head bowed and clinging to her scriptures, Filóre no longer seemed like a devout adherent of the Church of the Divine

Dragon, but rather was simply covering up that which was inconvenient with the doctrines of the scriptures.

Due to her having cut Emilia off, Subaru's chance to hear where he stood in Emilia's heart from her own mouth was snatched away, leaving him feeling unsettled.

That aside—

Emilia: "About what we were talking about earlier… you said Filóre will be participating in the Royal Selection, so is she taking Priscilla's place after all?"

Ignoring Filóre, whose face was now cycling between red and blue all by itself, Emilia's question was aimed at Sakura, sitting across from her.

Sakura's drowsy, drooping eyes narrowing slightly,

Sakura: "…At the very least, there's no doubt Priscilla-chan's death is part of the reaaason. Otherwise, it would contradict the account of the Dragon History Stooone."

Otto: "After all, there are to be five Dragon Priestesses, those who qualify as Royal Selection Candidates as recorded upon the Dragon History Stone… according to the policy of the Church of the Divine Dragon, you cannot go against that, can you?"

Sakura: "Of course, since that premise had collapsed, we took it as our chance and brazenly strolled into the Castle… please don't think of it as something like thaaat. Even if, by chance, Priscilla-chan's absence allows a vacancy for the position of Dragon Priestess, the Church's policy is to maintain our distaaance."

Otto: "However, that did not occur. The reason for that is…"

Otto deliberately left his conclusion unspoken, but the gazes of everyone present gathered upon Filóre, who had given rise to the first ripple that had led to this situation.

Her throat tightened at the discomfort of having those eyes upon her, and then, clinging to Emilia, Filóre: “Th-That’s wrong, Emilia! I never had even the slightest intention of becoming your enemy! It was just a stroke of bad luck! F-f-f-for the most part!”

As her face turned pale, Filóre’s eyes snapping wide as she whipped around to glare at Sakura,

Filóre: “For the most part, I would complain that the Church’s predisposition to covering things up is suspicious! All of this, it was wrong to have raised me so sheltered until now! I mean, it’s not that I didn’t think it was easy-peasy being exempt from the studies the other children had to take, but to think that it would tear me and Emilia apart… it’s not my fault!”

Emilia: “There, there, don’t cry, Filóre. I’m not angry at all, and I’ve never thought of the other Royal Selection Candidates as my enemies.”

Filóre: “E-Emiliaaa… hk.”

The way Emilia gently stroked her head soothed Filóre’s unruly heart.

Seeing this exchange, Sakura let out an “Oh myyy”, and brought her hand to her mouth with an astonished face,

Sakura: “Usually, she’d be rambling on and on from here, but Emilia-chan, you’re so good at dealing with Filóre-chan… is there some kind of trick to it, or somethiiing?”

Subaru: “Putting aside the quips about every Filóre being rendered powerless before Emilia-tan’s tender tolerance… ultimately, what exactly is Filóre doing here?”

Based on her behavior so far, he knew this was not a proclamation of war against the Royal Selection. He thought there was no way she had seriously run through the Royal Capital just to whine and make excuses.

Beatrice: “Really, I suppose? It would hardly be a surprise if that were the case, in fact.”

Subaru: “I’m with you there, but since that won’t advance the conversation…”

Filóre: “Wait just a minute. Do you think I am that witless? Certainly, I often act without thinking, but today is different. I have a proper strategy.”

Subaru: “A strategy?”

Filóre: “Yes, a strategy! I don’t wish to partake in the Royal Selection. However, I wish to use the Sacrament and fulfill my duty as a Saintess. Therefore, I’ll have my friend Emilia shelter me, and save the people of Pristella in secret! How about it?!”

Subaru: “Is this an evil plan cooked up by a criminal organization from a Sunday morning cartoon?”

It was a plan so sloppy that even a child could poke holes in it. Since her goal was helping others, it was not even an evil plan in the first place, but the most glaring issue was that Sakura had already found out about it.

Ultimately, it was a scheme where she had tripped over her own feet before even reaching the starting line.

Subaru: “Besides, it would look terrible if we were to do something like abducting a Saintess of the Church of the Divine Dragon.”

Petra: “Emilia-neesama has that sort of side too, but having no self-awareness about being a bomb is quite dangerous, isn’t it?”

Filóre: “Huh, does that mean Emilia and I are a good match…?”

Beatrice: “That isn’t something to be bashful about, I suppose.”

Where was the basis for that confidence, with Filóre’s plan having been so tragically rejected?

Moreover, Subaru thought Filóre was taking the whole situation a bit too lightly. For a while now, she had been trying to steer the conversation in the direction of her declining to participate in the Royal Selection, but—

Emilia: “Qualification as a Royal Selection Candidate isn’t something you can just abandon on a whim. Isn’t that right?”

Subaru: “Emilia-tan…”

Emilia: “I also study hard everyday. I’m sure I understand the Kingdom much better than I did at the beginning… and also the binding power of what is written upon the Dragon History Stone. I had my reasons for wanting to participate in the Royal Selection, but I’m sure that even without them, I don’t think I could have refused.”

Staring at Filóre, who was clinging onto her arm, Emilia’s words spilled out earnestly.

It was understandable that the Royal Selection Candidates had no right to refuse. He had spoken with Garfiel and Petra the night before, but the Covenant with the Dragon was solidly and deeply rooted within the Dragon Kingdom.

Actually, Felt had once tried to refuse participation in the Royal Selection. However, she had been forced to participate in exchange for the safety of Rom-jii, who had tried to steal her away.

That meant there was a certain compulsion for the Kingdom to stop at nothing in order to induce the participation of the Dragon Priestesses described by the Dragon History Stone.

Emilia was declaring that the same now applied to Filóre.

Filóre: “But… but, that’s not what I wanted, you know?”

Emilia: “Right, I’m sure you didn’t. I also think that if you hadn’t been able to make the insignia shine, Filóre, then we wouldn’t be having this conversation… However, the Dragon Gem shone, and you were selected, Filóre. I’m sure you understand the significance of that better than anyone.”

Filóre: “Uuugh…”

As Emilia spoke to her with a tone that almost felt motherly, Filóre hung her head weakly.

Filóre was a nun of the Church of the Divine Dragon. Needless to say, as one who held such faith, love, and reverence for the Dragon, it put her in the position where she truly felt the binding power of the Dragon History Stone's account stronger than anyone else.

It could even be said that her behavior up to this point had been a childish escape from reality.

However—

Filóre: "In that case… indeed, in that case, how about this? Emilia and I will form an alliance of friendship. And then, I'll do everything in my power to help Emilia become the Monarch. If we do so, then the Royal Selection…"

Emilia: "Thank you, Filóre. —But, I would reaaally hate that."

Quietly, but with unwavering firmness, Emilia clearly made that declaration.

Filóre's throat echoed delicately with a "Hiu" before the nobility of that voice like a silver bell. To make her point clear, Emilia felt around in her pocket, and opened her palm to reveal the insignia she had grabbed.

As soon as she did, the overflowing crimson radiance of the Dragon Gem shone across the parlor of the Royal Residence with a dazzling light.

Emilia: "I said so before, but I had reasons I wanted to participate in the Royal Selection from the very beginning."

While demonstrating the brilliance of the Dragon Gem, Emilia spoke so that Filóre would listen.

Emilia's initial motivation to join the Royal Selection had been to use the power of the Dragon's Blood kept in the Royal Castle to save her hometown, which had been frozen in ice. But as time went on, as she met others, and as she learned more, Emilia's sentiments regarding the Royal Selection were now beginning to change.

However, that initial desire would neither change nor vanish.

And—

Emilia: “It’s the same for the others as well. Crusch-san had her own, Anastasia-san had her own, Felt-chan had her own… and Priscilla had her own. We all have our own things we wanted to achieve, and so we all joined the Royal Selection. No, that’s wrong.”

Filóre: “Wrong? What’s wrong about it?”

Emilia: “I’m sure that those who can make the Dragon Gem shine, have reasons to participate in the Royal Selection… they all have something that they can only achieve if they are part of it. If so, what is it for you?”

Filóre: “For… me…?”

Emilia gave Filóre, who was blinking in dumbfounded amazement, a valiant and lovely smile.

She had suggested supporting her friend Emilia’s desires should she become a Royal Selection Candidate, but Emilia could not quite accept that was Filóre’s own desire.

Emilia would not recognize her inclusion into the Royal Selection of the Kingdom of Lugunica for such a reason.

Emilia: “Please, don’t say that you don’t want to as soon as it is asked of you, due to feeling overwhelmed. Think about it reaaally carefully. I’m sure you won’t be able to refuse joining the Royal Selection anyway. However, I don’t want someone who joins just because they feel they have no choice but to take Priscilla’s seat.”

—It was a resolute statement, a wish, and also a prayer.

Filóre: “…”

Filóre blinked at Emilia, who had directly expressed everything within her heart. No one said a thing regarding the tension swelling between the two of them, coming in contact with each other with zero distance between them.

Neither Subaru, nor anyone else, wanted to insert their presence into the silence born between them. —So as not to introduce any needless impurities into the decision to come.

Filóre: “—Yes.”

It was Emilia, watching Filóre closer than anyone, who created ripples upon the surface of that silence. She narrowed her eyes, framed by her long lashes, and gave the insignia in her hand to Filóre.

Filóre reflexively accepted that which was offered to her. —Even if it was due to its lack of awareness, the insignia’s Dragon Gem chose not when to shine.

Filóre: “—If… if I were to… participate in the Royal Selection…”

As Filóre muttered this, the Dragon Gem illuminated within her hand, just as it had in Emilia’s. As it glistened with a light the same color as her own eyes, Filóre made a declaration.

In the face of that unescapable destiny known as the Royal Selection that had been thrust upon her, what sort of principles would she proclaim?

Filóre: “I wish to reform the relationship between the Church and the state that has existed up till now. So that those within the Castle and those of the Church will no longer hesitate to extend a hand to the other due to some strange, stubborn formality.”

Emilia: “…”

Filóre: “If I were to become the Monarch, I would make this a country where none would hesitate to help others in need.”

It was nothing more than idealism that had been instilled in her, the full details of which were currently quite lacking.

Yet, in Filóre’s own way, she wished to break the fetters and frustrations that she had experienced growing up and living as a member of the Church of the Divine Dragon, and make the world a better place.

And, now that she was able to tout such principles, there were none who could laugh at Filóre, deride her as someone elevated to her high position against her own will by those around her, or call her begrudging participation in the Royal Selection merely a means to fill a vacancy.

Otto: “…As I thought, I ought to have turned away all visits without an appointment.”

Subaru heard Otto mutter that under his breath, in response to the conclusion Filóre had reached.

Dressed lightly without his hat or mantle, as he ran his fingers through his wavy, gray hair absent-mindedly, he appraised the occurrence happening there.

In truth, Subaru could understand why Otto felt like saying that.

Subaru: “After all, a super strong rival has made an appearance just now.”

Otto: “I think this is a laughably self-destructive move on our part, however… the fact that it was none other than our own leader that encouraged it is what is troublesome.”

Subaru: “Relax. The stronger the opponent, the stronger Emilia-tan becomes, so something like this gives me a good feeling.”

Otto: “If you are trying to cheer me up, could you not tell me something less objectionable than that?!”

Beatrice: “Naturally, Betty would like to feel sorry for Otto right now, in fact. However…”

Beatrice trailed off and narrowed her eyes, and gazing toward what shone radiantly before them—toward Emilia and Filóre, Subaru concurred with that opinion.

Certainly, if one were to limit themselves to only the event that had occurred, it probably ought to have been labeled as a foolish act. An amusing image of Roswaal falling to his knees upon hearing that news afterwards came to mind.

Nevertheless, it was worth it. In exchange for the appearance of a super strong rival, one thing was certain—

Emilia: "—I absolutely will not lose to Filóre."

—Because without a doubt, Emilia, who aspired to be the Monarch, had been able to show her true colors.

2

???: "—And so, I respectfully accept your request for my participation in the Royal Selection."

With one hand placed on her chest, and the other causing the insignia to shine with a sparkle, Filóre made that proclamation with majesty, with boldness, and without hesitation.

This was the Royal Castle, but rather than the throne room where they would be summoned if something significant were to occur, it was a conference room that appeared to be used for slightly more compact discussions. In a space about the size of a school classroom, a round table capable of accommodating approximately twenty people around its circumference had been placed there, and traditionally, briefings between the Council of Wise Men and civil officials of the Castle had often been held here.

Emilia: "See, on the day the Royal Selection started, after Subaru was kicked out of the chamber, we all moved to this conference room to discuss things."

Subaru: "Ah, offstage from me getting thrashed by Julius."

Emilia: "I still can't remember, but… Subaru, you had a fight with Julius? You must have… made up properly. That's why the two of you are reaaally good friends."

Subaru: "Setting aside whether he and I are reaaally good friends, it was a necessary event for Emilia-tan and I to become reaaally good friends."

Subaru responded to Emilia's whispered description with a crooked smile.

In a world where Julius's Name was yet lost, Subaru did not feel like delving deeply into how those involved recollected his disgrace upon that day, even as a form of admonishment.

Fortunately, the conference room had a noticeable amount of empty seats on this occasion, and there were few people here who were involved on that day. —After all, this was a so-called top-secret meeting, with only a minimum number of those involved from each camp, and for the Emilia Camp, that was limited to only Emilia and Subaru, as well as his partner Beatrice.

Although, one of these extremely limited participants, an elderly man with a distinctive long beard who greeted them, was indeed one of the individuals involved with that day.

That elderly man—Miklotov McMahon, member of the Council of Wise Men, while watching Filóre reach a rather preferable change of heart,

Miklotov: "Hrrrmm. We are immensely grateful for that response, even though we were the ones to make such demands, but… could you please inform me once more? I did give my permission, but for what reason did you have Emilia-sama and Natsuki-dono join us here?"

Filóre: "I received advice from their counsel this morning before coming to the Castle. Emilia is an irreplaceable friend of mine, and Subaru is her Knight… to be honest, I wanted to bring along everyone from the Emilia Camp who helped support me in declaring my resolve."

???: "As you can imagine, if you were to do that, the Church, as well as myself, would be in a rather awkward positiiion."

When Filóre responded to Miklotov's inquiry, the sole individual to accompany her from the Church, Sakura, made a troubled face whilst uttering those words.

Filóre seemed dissatisfied with that answer, but since it would be odd for all the members of the Emilia Camp to be gathered en masse for such a ceremonious event, Sakura's view was likely the appropriate one.

However, compared to the impressions left upon Subaru, Miklotov, stroking his long beard, seemed to have been struck by a different portion of what Filóre had said.

The wise elder's astute eyes narrowed, and as he let out his habitual sigh with a "Hrrrmm"—

Miklotov: "A friend, you say. Miss Filóre from the Church of the Divine Dragon, and Emilia-sama."

Subaru: "…Is that it? Emilia-tan is a silver-haired half-elf, and Filóre is a nun of the Church of the Divine Dragon, is that what you are trying to get at?"

Emilia: "Hold on, Subaru…"

Picking up on his muttering, Emilia chided Subaru as he instinctively began to act hastily.

Still, there were no dependable comrades from their camp present outside of Subaru and Beatrice. Thus, Subaru must speak to Miklotov impactfully on everyone's behalf.

As the one and only Knight entrusted with Emilia, he must adamantly contend with such absurdity.

Subaru: "Miklotov-san, you must be aware of Emilia's achievements over the past year and a half. We all know of and have taken account of such things, and yet, I wish the higher-ups of this country would stop continuously taking such a prejudiced view of her. Speaking of her as a half-elf, is it not enough already?"

Miklotov: "Saying, "Is it not enough", seems to show a bit of a disregard for public sentiment. From the start, it was obvious that Emilia and the Witch had nothing further in common beyond appearance and race… however, that alone is momentous. You must understand, do you not?"

Subaru: "Ngh…"

Using his experienced artistry when it came to rhetoric, Miklotov caused Subaru, who had been berating him rather assuredly, to waver. The problem here, once more, was the common sense rooted within the inhabitants of this world, that which would never well up from within Subaru as his own true feelings.

And that was not confined to the silver-haired half-elf, Emilia.

Miklotov: “Inevitably, the fact that you, a nun of the Church of the Divine Dragon, will become a Candidate for the Royal Selection will surely come as a great surprise for many people. It will also be a major departure from convention. This was an exceedingly thorny decision to make.”

Filóre: “…Yes, I am well aware of that fact. And yet…”

Miklotov: “Hrrrmm. “And yet”… what is it that you wish to ask?”

Filóre: “—. And yet, if that is indeed the case, then just why did you go to such lengths for me to enter the Royal Selection?”

That doubt, weaved from Filóre’s lips, was indeed a natural question to ask.

Miklotov’s wording just then gave a glimpse into the state of affairs: that the Royal Castle, for its part, was not in any way readily accepting of a Royal Selection Candidate from the Church of the Divine Dragon.

Filóre: “I’m also a nun of the Church of the Divine Dragon… and although I naturally understand rigid adherence to the record of the Dragon History Stone, the fact remains that even with Priscilla Barielle… that even with her passing, five individuals with the qualifications of a Dragon Priestess had been gathered, and the Royal Selection had begun. The record shouldn’t have been distorted.”

Beatrice: “Or perhaps, has the account of the Dragon History Stone been updated, I suppose? Are you saying that, when lacking five Priestesses, a replacement Priestess was found and it was rewritten as if to promote her, in fact?”

Miklotov: “No, we have received no such report that the record of the Dragon History Stone has changed. Merely, rather than our intentions regarding this matter, it is more a question of national sentiment.”

Subaru: “National…”

Emilia: “Sentiment?”

Subaru and Emilia tilted their heads, as if question marks were floating above them regarding Miklotov’s answer. And then, lowering his voice slightly,

Miklotov: “It shall become public knowledge in due course, but for now, this is confidential. In truth, it appears that rumors are already circulating through the streets. —That Duchess Karsten was granted salvation by a Saintess of the Church of the Divine Dragon.”

Subaru & Emilia: “—!”

Miklotov: “A gag order was imposed within the Royal Castle regarding this matter. Of course, even if you keep information locked up, it will still seep out like raindrops… however, even rumors that the Saintess in question possesses the same characteristics as the long-since vanished princess of Lugunica have spread substantially.”

Subaru: “Isn’t that basically all the information in its entirety being leaked?!”

Miklotov’s face clouded over with bitterness, but if it was indeed true, then it meant that the Royal Castle’s attempt at information control had ended in a completely ill-prepared failure.

Subaru: “I think there’s no way, but Filóre… were you so delighted to have saved Crusch-san that, in your good mood, you spread your own achievement around?”

Beatrice: “Betty has been convinced, I suppose.”

Filóre: “Please don’t be! Also, I didn’t do any such thing! Even I have common sense! Well, I may have told some people close to me, wanting to use them to persuade the people of the Church. But, they shouldn't have spread it around town!"

Subaru: "Hmmm, Beako?"

Beatrice: "Let's say that it's gray as close to black as it can get, in fact."

Subaru more or less agreed with Beatrice's scathing evaluation.

He pitied Filóre, stomping her feet in vexation, but no matter how much she insisted that she had not done so, the feeling that she had indeed could not be erased; such was the impression he had of the girl up to now.

In any case, no matter whoever might have been responsible for the dissemination of such rumors—

Beatrice: "Then, perhaps there might be rumors that Filóre made the insignia shine as well, I suppose? Thus, everyone crowns Filóre, saying that it would be strange should she not be included as a Royal Selection Candidate, in fact?"

Miklotov: "Talk has yet to go that far. However, news of Priscilla-sama's death will soon be announced to the public. If Miss Filóre's existence has become known by that time, naturally the streets will overflow with voices calling for her participation in the Royal Selection."

Subaru: "So before that happens, you want to finish laying all the groundwork in advance, huh…"

If Filóre's participation was a matter of course anyway, it would keep things more transparent for everyone to quickly advance the conversation. While on one hand, he could understand such arrangements by the adults, but sure enough, he was somewhat bothered by Filóre's lack of a veto.

Had she not been able to discuss this with Emilia beforehand, Filóre would have joined in the worst possible frame of mind, completely lacking the necessary mettle of a Royal Selection Candidate.

Sakura: “Now, now, don’t frown like thaaat, Subaru-chan. We successfully came to a conclusion somehow or another, so that means we’re fine, riiight?”

Subaru: “…Is this fine with you, Sakura-san? Initially, Filóre wasn’t supposed to have left the Church, or rather, her participation in the Royal Selection was unforeseen, right?”

Sakura: “—Whether they want it or not, the leaves of the trees are nothing but at the whim of the wind and water.”

Subaru: “…”

As Sakura’s tone of voice suddenly fell, Subaru could not help but look embarrassed.

Those few words were filled with a poignant sense of emptiness—loaded with vacuous resignation, almost as if it were that of an old tree, agape with a large hollow, withering to naught.

It nearly even felt like, rather than speaking about Filóre, those words were rather about Sakura herself, about her own resignation.

Sakura: “Weeell, that which will happen, will haaappen. To begin with, even if she has the drive to do so, she is a year and a half behind the other children, so she might not be able to compeeete.”

Filóre: “Excuse me, Sakura! Why do you have to put a damper on my enthusiasm like that! If I’m going to do it, I’m going to win… my tenacity is truly that of the Dragon’s!”

Subaru: “I’ve been curious, what does the Church of the Divine Dragon think of the way Filóre carelessly makes light of the Dragon?”

Sakura: “Blasphemy, or something along those liiines.”

Filóre: “Blasphemy!!”

It was more scathing than he had anticipated, but as expected, it seemed that they deemed it as behavior not to be endorsed. Filóre maintained a stance utterly distant from the typical image of a Saintess.

At any rate, with most of his questions answered, Subaru now had a general grasp on the purpose of this top-secret meeting and the rationale behind why the participants had been so tightly restricted. That was to say, this was an informal notice, confirming the intentions and plans of the parties involved, before the proper public announcement.

And, when he thought about it that far, suddenly, Subaru's anxiety spiked.

That was—

Subaru: "Say, Filóre, if you are also going to become a Royal Selection Candidate, does that mean you will also appoint a Knight like the other Candidates, like Emilia-tan did with me?"

Emilia: "Ah, Subaru, you might have a misunderstanding about that."

Subaru: "A misunderstanding?"

Emilia: "Umm, it just so happens that all of us Royal Selection Candidates are attended by Knights, but that's not an absolute rule. After all, Anastasia-san and I didn't form a Knight Contract with Julius and you from the start, right?"

Subaru: "That's true for me, but Julius was Anastasia's Knight from the beginning."

Emilia: "Ah, that's right. I'll have to remember that properly, for Julius's sake."

While Emilia made a minor correction due to the influence of the missing Name, Subaru, however, was convinced by that explanation. Indeed, at the outset, Roswaal had accompanied Emilia as her backer, but Subaru had been absent as a Knight—or rather, he had not yet won that trust.

Therefore, perhaps being a Royal Selection Candidate did not necessitate having a Knight.

Subaru: "But, I do think going through the hassle of finding one would bring you more prestige. What are you going to do? The only one close to Filóre that could fulfill the requirements would be… maybe my friend?"

Emilia: ""Mai fhriend"… that's Tiga, right? Still, that might be nice. Filóre also seems to be reaaally close with Tiga…"

Filóre: "Ehhh, my Knight being Tiga? That doesn't feel the least bit special."

Clasping her hands together in front of her chest, Emilia was in complete agreement with Subaru's nomination, and yet Filóre booed that choice with incredible vigor.

Filóre: "Well, Tiga is skillful, so if appointed as a Knight, he would probably do well and not make any mistakes, but he scolds me a lot and is quick to doubt me whenever something happens, so I suppose he lacks the necessary respect and loyalty for a Knight. Besides, even though he's not a Knight, it won't change that he still accompanies me here and there even now, so there's no point in going out of my way to name him as my Knight. Rejected! I do reject it!"

Subaru: "Well, it is your Knight, so I think you should do as you like… huh? In the first place, how would one usually even go about appointing a Knight?"

For example, in Subaru's case, he was conferred his Knighthood by Emilia, and was immediately installed as her Knight, which was how he acquired his current position; but, what of Reinhard or Julius?

Receiving a Knight should not have been something restricted solely to Royal Selection Candidates, but Subaru only now felt shame at his own ignorance of what such Contracts were like in those sorts of situations.

Miklotov: "Hrrrmm, indeed. In many cases, it is typical for a Knight to seek out a lord and swear fealty in order to be appointed. However, for a Knight of great renown, it is not uncommon for some lords to promise a high salary and favorable treatment, extending an invitation to them and requesting that they serve them."

Subaru: "Oh, I wasn't expecting Miklotov-san to explain it to me… By the way, do you employ any Knights, Miklotov-san?"

Miklotov: "There have been many, who have long since come and gone, that have placed their trust in our household. The prevailing view is that, as you might expect, those who have had an outstanding Knight dedicate their sword to them command a certain amount of respect."

Subaru: "That's… well, it's understandable."

Indeed, the status of having the Sword Saint or the Finest of Knights as their foremost Knights ought to have attached quite a great deal of prestige to the names of Felt and Anastasia.

The notoriety of the foremost Knights was an important barometer for the Royal Selection. —Sure enough, Subaru wondered if he had actually become Emilia's strength as a Knight. In addition, he wondered if Crusch, who had dismissed Ferris from the role of her one and only Knight, might now acquire a new Knight.

Subaru: "…"

He did not want that. Indeed, as the individual involved would put it, thinking those thoughts as if clinging to them was a result of Subaru's pridefulness, his desire for everything to go the way he wished.

They might find a different answer to the unavoidable rift that had formed between the two of them, if they took some time to recollect themselves. So, until then, he prayed that she would leave that seat vacant.

Yes, with prideful resolve, Subaru began feeling sentimental.

Filóre: "…Just now, Miklotov-sama said this. That for an outstanding Knight to approach me, I should raise my voice and appeal earnestly."

Beatrice: "—? The passion seems to differ quite a bit from what Betty heard, I suppose."

Subaru: "…Me too, I also felt like the nuance was a bit different, but…"

Clenching her fists tightly and stifling her emotions, Filóre muttered. Beatrice's response to that pulled Subaru back from his sentimentality into reality.

Perhaps having ears that only heard what was convenient for herself, Filóre interpreted Miklotov's statement in her own way, and on top of that, her cheeks were becoming slightly flushed. For some reason, it seemed like something had gotten her emotions riled up to the point of making her cheeks burn, but—

Emilia: "Maybe you already have an idea of who you want to appoint as your Knight, Filóre?"

Filóre: "—! How did you… was it because of our close friendship?"

Emilia: "Mhm, I think so. So, what sort of person are they?"

Subaru: "Just to get it out of the way, Reinhard's already all sold out."

Beatrice: "And naturally, Subaru and Betty are under a sales contract in perpetuity to Emilia, in fact."

With the attention of Subaru, Emilia, Beatrice, Sakura, and Miklotov centered upon herself, Filóre smiled with a somewhat meaningful "Fufufu"; she met all of their gazes, vigorously opening the thick book of scriptures before her.

Filóre: "Please have a listen. This too, is in the scriptures. "The arm of man doth swing the sword, but it be the Dragon's will that deals in life. Under the footprints of a Knight chosen, even the most bloodied of ruts turn to roads of silver"!"

Emilia: "Ummm, that means…?"

Filóre: "Basically, the one most suitable to be my Knight is someone who has been recognized by the Dragon!”

Though it felt a bit like an arbitrary interpretation, ultimately, when it came to a Knight great enough to be recognized by the Dragon, the only person meeting such qualifications whom Subaru could think of was Reinhard.

Taking a more broad interpretation, it was also technically true that Emilia, having cleared the Trial of the first layer at the Pleiades Watchtower, was also someone who fulfilled those conditions.

Subaru: “Though a development where a Royal Candidate ends up becoming another Royal Candidate’s Knight would be quite amusing with how it breaks the system, Emilia-tan has me, so that development gets rejected.”

Filóre: “Emilia being my Knight… th-that is certainly an idea that tempts my heart. However, my hopes and aspirations differ from hers. Please do not lead me any further astray.”

Getting the feeling that he could neither say “Don’t be shaken over something so trivial” nor “Emilia’s the target of comparison, so it can’t be helped that you feel shaken”, Subaru ultimately said nothing to Filóre.

Taking no notice of Subaru’s consideration, Filóre briefly cleared her throat,

Filóre: “Alright? Is it alright? As I have said, if I, a Saintess of the Church of the Divine Dragon, am to stand as a Royal Candidate, then it must be that my Knight is one that has been recognized by the Dragon. And so, as far as I am aware, there is but one personage who meets that criteria—”

When such a prestigious requirement was raised to the forefront, there was just a single person who came to mind, whether one liked it or not.

As irony would have it, he was an opponent who was destined to contend against Filóre, not only in the battle for the throne, but over the question of who was the true survivor of the Lugunican

Royal Family.

None other than the one and only Knight in service to Felt: the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea—

Filóre: “—Heinkel Astrea-sama.”

——.

————.

——————.

Subaru: “Ngh?!”

Feeling as though he had heard a mixed-up reply, Subaru’s throat unwittingly let out a horrendous squeal. However, Filóre wore a smug look on her face upon making her declaration; beside her, Emilia and Beatrice were visibly as shocked as Subaru, their eyes wide open in surprise.

Even if an Astrea was an Astrea, it was a different Astrea than the one he had envisioned.

Subaru: “…Umm, Filóre?”

Filóre: “Wh-What is the matter? Or rather, aren’t everybody’s reactions somewhat strange?”

Subaru: “Yeah, they’re strange alright. Could I please just ask you to tell us one more time? The one most fit to be the Knight of a Saintess of the Church of the Divine Dragon, is who exactly?”

Filóre: “Like I said, I would prefer if you did not make me repeat myself however many times, but… Heinkel Astrea-sama.”

However many times he heard it, the name did not take on a different sound, and as she voiced it, Filóre inclined her head.

From her perspective, it seemed like the reactions of Subaru and the rest were far more difficult to understand. That was only natural. After all, in her eyes, the person known as Heinkel Astrea was—

Filóre: “—One from the lineage of Sword Saints who, upon conquering the Dragon’s Blood that washed over his body, was reforged into an immortal knight, Heinkel Astrea-sama: I wish to name him as my Knight.”

Indeed, having risen to the stage as the sixth Royal Candidate, Filóre boasted that in her position as the sixth, the individual most fit to be her one and only Knight was none other than the Backstabber, Heinkel Astrea.

Vic.112o

Chapter 12:
Groan

1

—Clear skies graced the day since the early morning, as if it were blessing the triumphant future to come.

Subaru: “Or, is it a bit too optimistic of me to be thinking something like that?”

Beatrice: “Betty does not think so, in fact. In all actuality, if Filóre’s Sacrament proves capable of exhibiting the anticipated results, then Subaru’s cheerful mood would be nothing more than an advance celebration, I suppose.”

Subaru: “…If it’s just me celebrating in advance all on my own, then I get the feeling that it really was a bit too cheerful.”

Hearing Beatrice’s follow-up as they walked together, hand in hand, Subaru scratched his cheek with his unoccupied fingers.

Given the situation, a part of him did want to stick up for those feelings of unavoidable cheerfulness, but considering how little he himself had actually contributed to that, he could not deny that his spirits were too high.

In reality, for their upcoming itinerary—making for the Watergate City of Pristella, and using the Sacrament of the Church of the Divine Dragon to provide aid to the victims of the Witch Cult, there would arrive no moment in which Subaru would be of any particular use.

Only, as the Knight of Emilia, who would be performing a distinguished role there, and above all, as an individual who had experienced the fierce battle that raged in the city, he wanted to be present to witness the moment in which the abhorrent scars left behind by that struggle were healed once and for all.

Subaru: “So that’s why, we’ll rely on Reinhard to keep up the hard work for this part, and have him take us along to Pristella as a member of the expedition.”

Beatrice: “Naturally, Betty will be coming with you, in fact. Together with Emilia, who will thaw the residents she had encased in ice, and with Garfiel and Otto, who still have unresolved matters in that town, I suppose.”

Subaru: “Garfiel said something about the father of a family he got along with there being a victim of Lust, and Otto… is going to collect the book he had entrusted to that restorer, huh?”

Beatrice: “Seems like it, in fact… Good grief, what a cunning man, I suppose.”

Puffing out her cheeks, Beatrice grumbled so, and Subaru pondered her complex feelings on the matter.

The book, which Otto had entrusted to the restorer in Pristella, was one of the Tomes of Wisdom considered to have been left behind by the Witch of Greed, Echidna—however, it was the volume that had been inherited by Roswaal. With the single-minded wish to verify its contents, Otto had retrieved the book after it had been mostly reduced to cinders, and while that persistence of his went without saying, it was also difficult to believe the skill of the restorer who claimed he would be able to reconstruct it.

But, for Beatrice, who had lost her own Tome of Wisdom in a fire, it must have put her in an extremely delicate state of mind.

Beatrice: “Do not worry, in fact, Subaru.”

Subaru: “Beatrice…”

Beatrice: “If it’s the matter of Betty’s guide for the future, Subaru now fills that role, I suppose. It is shocking to witness Otto’s destitute disposition as he attempts to recycle burnt cinders, in fact. But, if he can get the better of Roswaal, it is not a bad feeling, I suppose.”

Subaru: “…I see.”

Indifferent to Subaru's worries, Beatrice powerfully puffed out her chest, and finding her to be incredibly lovely, Subaru caressed the head of his adorable Contracted Spirit to his heart's content.

As mentioned previously, the ones travelling to Pristella on the Reinhard Express were, strangely enough, the same members who had gone to Pristella the previous time. If it were possible, Subaru would have liked to mobilize all members of the camp, but he could not put too much strain on Ram, who was currently down on account of overworking.

As for the personnel accompanying them from other camps, there would be Reinhard, tasked with the duty of carrying the dragon carriage, and Felt, who seemed to be responsible for supervising him. —Then, there would be the central figure of this expedition, Filóre, as a key person, and Sakura, serving as her chaperone.

Subaru: "To be honest, given the congestion of things that need to be done now, it's not like I don't get the feeling that it might be way too dangerous to bring Felt and Filóre together in the same dragon carriage so suddenly."

Beatrice: "However, as per what is being said, the two of them have already encountered each other face to face, in fact."

Subaru: "Yeah, it was the day when Filóre first showed up at the Castle, and when she treated Crusch-san. On that day, the two of them met for the first time… it also seems like it was Felt who gave Filóre an insignia, and verified if she held the qualifications to be a Royal Candidate."

Beatrice: "That girl is far too reckless, I suppose. Usually, the idea of placing one's own position into jeopardy, is something one would think twice about, in fact."

Subaru: "To begin with, she isn't the type of person who depends on her ancestry. That unwavering part about her really gives off a cool impression."

Felt's resolute way of living harbored a charisma capable of attracting many people.

In actuality, those who wished to have Felt take the throne were those who had been enchanted by her words, actions, and way of being, perceiving their ideals upon those small shoulders of hers, and choosing to follow her.

If those were the results brought forth by the radiance of Felt's soul, bereft of any other factors, then the current situation was tantamount to an unnecessary plot being thrust upon her.

Subaru: "Felt and Filóre, which one is the real princess, and which is the fake, I wonder?"

Beatrice: "It is a strange premise to begin with, I suppose. Regardless of which of the two is the real one, if they intend on leveraging the possibility, they ought to be proclaiming it more assertively or so it doesn't go to waste, in fact. Get the masses to believe, get the masses to harbor suspicions, that would be the route with the greatest utility, I suppose."

The more he thought about it, the more unreasonable it seemed to leverage the surviving-princess theory.

As Beatrice said, not only were they failing to capitalize on a rare, powerful advantage, but if it turned out that either Felt or Filóre was indeed the real deal, it could even be said that one of them would incur a negative image as the definite fake.

When it came to that, the first thing that weighed on his mind was —

Subaru: "—In the end, what in the world was the Church thinking when they decided to keep Filóre's existence a secret."

According to Filóre, she was abandoned at the doorstep of the Church fifteen years prior, and from there was taken in and raised as an orphan within the children's house of the Church of the Divine Dragon. There, she received a considerably sheltered upbringing, without much knowledge about the outside world, forming her as a monster of ignorant initiative.

Regardless of the fact that her initiative was what gave rise to today's disorder, the Church of the Divine Dragon would have been fully aware of her distinct outward appearance, her age, and her name.

There was absolutely no possibility that they had failed to draw the connection with the Lugunican Royal Family.

Not to mention, if the Sacrament that Filóre wielded had the power to combat the Authorities of the Sin Archbishops of Lust and Gluttony, would it not have been capable of exhibiting its power against the illness that befell the Royal Family?

In that case, why had the Church of the Divine Dragon abandoned the Lugunican Royal Family to perish?

Subaru: "So long as that mystery remains unclear, nobody's going to be satisfied."

With the holding of the Royal Selection known far and wide all across the Kingdom, the citizens of the nation were all paying attention to who would take the throne in this epoch. In both a positive and negative sense, the people would not turn a blind eye to any conspicuous deeds of the Royal Candidates, nor would they forget them.

Hence, he wanted to know what the Church of the Divine Dragon was thinking, no matter what.

For that purpose—

Subaru: "—Miklotov-san's invitation was really a godsend."

Beatrice: "In fact."

Beside the nodding, taciturn Beatrice, Subaru recalled the matter from the previous day—when they had accompanied Filóre as she went to assent to participation in the Royal Selection, and, together with Emilia, they had held an exchange with Miklotov in one of the conference rooms of the Castle.

Filóre's bombshell announcement when it came to the selection of her Knight: he had been sent into a great spur of befuddlement when that had been dropped, and the scene had ultimately concluded rather chaotically, but Subaru had also managed to secure a benefit.

An important member of the Council of Wise Men, and likely one of the foremost intellects in the Kingdom of Lugunica, that Miklotov, had agreed to set aside some time to chat with Subaru.

While the clamorous Filóre Theater raged on in the background, given that there was no harm in asking, Subaru had told Miklotov that he wished to speak with him, to which the latter graciously agreed.

Miklotov: “Hrrmmmm. In that case, I shall fit you into my schedule, Natsuki-dono. It just so happens there is a matter about which I would like to speak with you in private as well, Natsuki-dono.”

Subaru: “I’m extremely grateful, but… there’s something you wanna speak to me about?”

Miklotov: “Indeed. There is a matter I wish to ascertain, a matter about which I wish to inform you, and a matter on which I wish to consult you… I beg your pardon, but it would be a blessing if you could join this old man for a long chat.”

With those words, Miklotov flashed a smile that gave the impression of a good-natured old man, informed Subaru of the location of his residence, and scheduled an appointment for their agreed upon private discussion.

That appointment was today, where he was scheduled to depart for Pristella after the passing of Fire Time.

Before that matter of great importance, as Subaru had promised to Miklotov, he was en route to the specified location by himself—no, having received permission beforehand, he also brought Beatrice along with him, as their two hearts beat together as one.

Subaru: “As per what Miklotov-san said… setting aside whatever he wanted to ask and tell me, it’s kinda scary that he said he wants to consult me on something, though I’ve also got a whole bunch of questions to unload on him. Ideally, I'd like to get him to show us the actual Dragon History Stone, but…"

Beatrice: "The Dragon History Stone is said to be managed as strictly as the Dragon's Blood, I suppose. However, if Betty were to get a glimpse of it, it should be possible to formulate a hypothesis of what its mechanisms resemble, in fact."

Subaru: "It's not like I really think the Dragon History Stone is suspicious in and of itself, but the fact that it completely overlooked the annihilation of the Royal Family, and instead completely described the following Royal Selection is, well…"

It made him begin to suspect that there might have been some sort of malice or contrivance behind that. He did not wish to believe that even the deaths of the Royal Family had been orchestrated.

Subaru: "…"

In the mausoleum, he had laid eyes upon the sarcophagi belonging to those departed members of the Lugunican Royal Family. — Considering the impact the deaths of the widely beloved Royal Family had borne, especially that which the death of the fourth prince had borne on Crusch and Ferris with whom Subaru was well-aquanted, if there had been somebody's will interfering with that, Subaru would never forgive that person, no matter what.

Then, it happened just when Subaru thought so, and firmly clenched the hand opposite to the one holding Beatrice's.

???: "—Seems like you're thinking of some awfully unsettling things again, my friend."

As a witty voice suddenly called out to him from the side, Subaru swiveled his head around in surprise. Upon doing so, his eyes caught sight of a stylish young man waving at him from the vertex of a T-junction in the road.

At that friendly greeting, Subaru broke into a broad grin, and,

Subaru: "My friend? You're acting pretty over-familiar all of a sudden…"

???: “Oi oi oi, you were the one who called me that first! Don’t leave me out to dry!”

Subaru: “Just kidding. I’m happy to see you again, Tiga.”

A look of shock upon his face, the young man—Tiga, glared at Subaru’s face with squinting eyes as the latter extended his hand with good graces, and after a shrug of his shoulders, he shook the proffered hand.

With the successful exchange of the handshake, the revalidation of their friendship was completed, though,

Tiga: “It seems that you too are in lovely spirits, Miss Beatrice. It is an honor to meet you again.”

Beatrice: “There are no objections from Betty either, I suppose… However, why are you here, in fact?”

Tiga: “Well then, allow me to return the very same question to the two of you. Albeit it is not as though I was sneaking around, but just in case, this was supposed to be a confidential summons.”

Subaru: “Confidential… no way, don’t tell me you were also invited by Miklotov-san?”

Tiga: “—. So that would mean, you as well?”

Subaru and Tiga’s eyes widened as they pointed fingers at each other, and Beatrice, standing between them, stood up on her tippy toes to reach up and pull both of their arms down.

Seeing her help out with that cute gesture, Tiga exhaled a soft “Ha”, and,

Tiga: “Wow, and I got myself panicked thinking that I was being tailed. No matter how you look at it, you wouldn’t bring a child along with you if you were on someone’s tail, that’s what I thought, but… nevermind, I’ll leave it be.”

Subaru: “What, don’t call it quits midway through. I won’t get mad so spit it out.”

Tiga: “Really? I guess I’ll say it then, but, I thought that if it was the famous Lolimancer, Natsuki Subaru, then it might be a piece of cake for you to bring a child along while actively tailing someone…”

Subaru: “Asshole, who’re you calling a Lolimancer, you bastard!”

Tiga: “I only said it because you said you wouldn’t get mad!”

At the shameful pseudonym that had resurfaced for the first time in a while, the indignant Subaru attempted to lunge at the other party. But, Tiga skillfully evaded both of Subaru’s hands before quickly hiding behind Beatrice.

Watching over that refreshing, futile struggle, Beatrice faced Subaru and shrugged her shoulders,

Beatrice: “This matter will not proceed otherwise, so you must reconcile right here, I suppose. Subaru needs to act as an adult, in fact.”

Subaru: “Tsk, fine. I’m an adult, so I don’t want to be told this and that by you when you’re made to imitate a child. After all, I’m an adult.”

Tiga: “I don’t think an adult would need to make such a huge display about how adult-like they’re being, for Dragon’s sake.”

Springing his crouched body back up, Tiga readjusted his hat as he gestured his chin in the direction of their shared destination, at the intersection where they had come to a halt.

Tiga: “We are headed for the same destination. And likely, the appointed time is also the same. Let’s go together.”

Subaru: “I’m fine either way, but in that case, he shouldn’t have had to make that odd specification about me coming alone. Wouldn’t it’ve been fine if Emilia-tan or Rem came along with me?”

Tiga: “Setting Rem aside, Emilia-sama is your master, correct? Would you truly drag her along for your own errands?”

Subaru: “It wouldn’t be dragging her along, I just don’t want to leave her side for even a moment if I can help it.”

Tiga: “That’s—”

To meet banter with banter. Although Subaru had merely intended to retaliate in the back-and-forth, Tiga’s mouth closed as if he was at a loss for words, and for a moment, he avoided eye contact.

Seeing that reaction, Subaru exchanged glances with Beatrice, and tilted his head in confusion.

Subaru: “What’s wrong? Did I scare you with my big love towards Emilia-tan and the rest?”

Tiga: “It’s not that your big love or whatever you call it was frightening. Merely, that weighty affection of yours, Subaru, it struck a chord in my heart that even I do not fully understand… something like that.”

Subaru: “—. I appreciate the sentiment, but I’ve already got lots of people whom I’ve set my heart on, so…”

Tiga: “Pretending to be all devoted, you then go with the declaration of a scumbag?!”

Feeling like their usual rapport had returned, Subaru smiled at Tiga’s sentimental riposte. From the beginning, he had thought him to be a person on similar wavelengths to himself, and sure enough, my friend was not just for show.

Tiga was also taken in by Subaru’s grin, smiling as he cast aside the unease from a moment prior.

Beatrice: “That is enough merrymaking from both of you, I suppose. It has come into view, in fact.”

At some point, Beatrice had started to walk a bit further ahead of Subaru and Tiga, and now standing at the corner bend in the street, she beckoned them with her hand. With long, fast strides, Subaru and Tiga hurried as quickly as they could without breaking into a sprint, and both arrived at Beatrice’s side at roughly the same time.

Then, at the outskirts of the Noble District, finding the designated address and a large mansion with the matching roof color he had been told, he fathomed a guess that this must be Miklotov's residence.

Subaru: "Tiga, what did you have to discuss with Miklotov-san?"

Tiga: "Consulting him about something I'm searching for, I guess. What about you two, Subaru?"

Subaru: "Beako and I are pursuing a grand quest of history, we wanted to ask about various things regarding the dark aspects of the Kingdom, and we also were going to see if we could maybe get just a single glimpse at the Dragon History Stone."

Tiga: "I see. So that ties back to those unsettling things you were saying earlier. I offer this warning out of consideration, but it would be best if you did not speak of your plans regarding the Dragon History Stone so casually out on the—"

Roadside; right as he attempted to conclude his sentence, Tiga cut off his words there.

Subaru and Beatrice turned around, wondering what the matter was, and as they were about to proceed through the front gate of Miklotov's mansion, Tiga halted in his tracks, glaring at the surrounding stone walls.

Then, with a definite vigilance in his graceful side profile, he muttered.

That was—

Tiga: "—This is bad, the smell of blood is in the air."

2

Beatrice in his left hand, Guiltywhip in his right. —With those two reliable partners firmly equipped in his hands, Subaru stifled his breath and proceeded into the premises thick with the scent of blood.

???: "—Subaru, don't stray from me. We'll cover each other's blind spots."

The one addressing him in such a hushed voice was Tiga, keeping guard at the front of their formation.

Keeping low to the ground and erasing the sound of his footsteps as he walked, within Tiga's hand was a sword he had drawn in one smooth, soundless motion—a silver crescent that carved deep, sharp arcs: that which he grasped was a shamshir.

From the air of his demeanor, Subaru could presume he was a ready master of that curved blade, and bore an ill-timed thought that Filóre had quite the poor eye for Knights.

Subaru: "…"

Through their clasped hands, Beatrice and Subaru's anxieties were transmitted to each other.

Fortunately, thanks to Beatrice, who was far and away more composed than Subaru, they managed to avoid falling down a vicious spiral of their anxieties being reciprocally elevated by the other's, akin to a self-inflicted Authority of Wrath.

—Miklotov's mansion had been transformed into such a hideous scene that it made him want to avert his eyes.

Having entered the mansion from the rear, they had already discovered over ten people, but every last one of them had already breathed their last, hideously slaughtered corpses each slain with but a single stroke.

Whether those blows that had not inflicted suffering ought to have been branded mercy, or the utter dominance that did not permit any show of strength ought to have been appraised as ruthless, he could not think of any parting words to adorn those who had perished.

Merely, with the fresh, vibrant breath of death so close at hand, Subaru's heart pounded as if it was about to burst.

Subaru: "…"

The situation had already eclipsed Subaru's capacity. Having reached such a judgment, he was convinced that the best course of action would be to immediately leave the mansion and seek aid and reinforcements elsewhere.

But at the same time, there was certainly a chance they could still save lives by proceeding onward now.

That was because—

Subaru: "All of them were only just killed."

Beatrice: "…We are in agreement, in fact. If there was even just one person still breathing, I suppose…"

They discovered the mark of a slash carved into the corridor's wall, and the remains of yet another person collapsed directly underneath. A large, sweeping stroke had been unleashed, and had obliquely sliced through that person together with the wall behind him.

Sliced open by a diagonal slash, the blood of the regrettable dead body had yet to dry, and the bloody stench tinged with heat possessed the characteristic cloying scent of a corpse, peculiar in how the vitality of that which had been alive but moments ago mingled with death.

Subaru: "It pisses me off that my experiences in the Empire are coming into play at a time like this…"

In the life of Natsuki Subaru, there existed one most atrocious, most hellish sight—though it troubled him greatly, it was the gruesome massacre upon the Gladiator Island, where a mountain of corpses had been erected from the faces he knew well. The calamity wrought by the accursed Todd Fang, had scorched Subaru's world to ashes across innumerable deaths.

There, he had seen much death. That was why he could recognize it. Approximately how long ago the living had been made into the dead, and approximately how much suffering they had experienced before they passed on.

Subaru: “They… didn’t suffer.”

This now brought the number of corpses they had found within the mansion to thirteen, but not a single one of them had suffered. However, he was unable to make out whether that was the result of mercy or skill.

The fact that they had died without suffering would likely only serve as consolation to the hearts of those who were able to ascertain it, such as himself. Prideful; even at a time like this, that malediction from Ferris flashed through his mind.

Why was that? Perhaps it was because he thought the one who had said he hated death more than anything else in this world would be able to understand Subaru, who currently felt utterly helpless in the face of this tragedy.

Subaru: “Shit.”

While burdened with the sense of nausea and loss that he still could not grow accustomed to, despite having borne witness to an incalculable number of deaths, Subaru closed the eyelids of the dead, and moved onward.

The reason he refused to withdraw was because the possibility remained that someone still survived in the midst of this tragedy that had only just begun.

He did not wish to withdraw and allow that possibility of life to be destroyed.

In addition—

Subaru: “—Miklotov-san, is someone this country still needs.”

Certainly, Subaru had by no means exchanged many words with Miklotov.

The Council of Wise Men: he did not possess a single good memory of those men who stood at the zenith of those possessing acumen within the Kingdom.

Merely, amidst the few points of contact and recollections smeared with negative thoughts that he would rather forget, there was certainly something Subaru remembered.

Miklotov: “At the very least, he has shown that you are not the sort of half-elf so feared by the world. —You have a fine attendant.”

When Subaru’s shameful conduct was laid bare before a great many people by his egotistical outburst, and he was driven from the throne room without a single ally remaining, those were the words that had been spoken.

Until now, this moment, this very instant, he had not recalled it. —However, that day, in that place, there had been someone who had viewed Subaru’s actions through a different perspective to everyone else.

He had failed to realize that. But, why had that been? Whatever the case, Subaru was grateful.

Subaru would repay Miklotov with fortune surpassing this feeling of salvation.

Tiga: “—Subaru, Miss Beatrice.”

Steeling himself with firm resolve and determination, Subaru used that as motivation to keep himself from running away. Calling out to Subaru and Beatrice was Tiga, who had reached a set of enormous doors.

He could not claim to have examined every corner of the mansion, but he had finished checking all of the large chambers. Insofar as the layout of the mansion was concerned, the very room now before his eyes was the one that would serve as a place of refuge in an emergency.

Therefore, this room was the mostly likely location for the master of the mansion to be—

Subaru: “—Hk!”

With nary a word of warning, immediately following a nod to each other, they plunged in through the opened door with Tiga as the vanguard.

As soon as they entered, the first thing his eyes landed upon was a great and enormous flag of the Kingdom of Lugunica spread out over the white wall within the modest room—that which depicted a single sword at its center, and two dragons facing each other on either side, had been cleaved in twain diagonally, with one of the halves falling to the floor.

And there, he could see, with the national flag that had slumped down to the floor seeming to wrap around their body, a single individual who seemed to have suffered the same slash, dead with their back against the wall in a pool of their own blood.

Subaru: "—Aah."

A groan had involuntarily escaped the back of his throat.

A figure was reclined against the wall, their head hung low and their face not clearly visible. And yet, he knew exactly who it was. Even the distinctive white beard that made it impossible to mistake them for another had been soaked in the vast quantity of blood that had gushed forth, staining it a bright crimson.

Subaru: "…"

It was Miklotov McMahon, never to rise again—a merciless end that came all too suddenly for the great wise man who had sustained the Kingdom of Lugunica for so long.

However, nevertheless, even that death, even that end, served not as the reason for Subaru's groan.

The reason Subaru had groaned was not because Miklotov had been the victim. —It was due to the assailant.

In the center of the room, directly in front of the corpse of the departed Miklotov that was seemingly wrapped in the diagonally bisected banner, stood the figure of the assailant, their back turned.

Upon a slender, well-proportioned back, there swayed beautifully captivating long, dark-green hair. The curves of her body, abundant in femininity, could not be fully concealed by her dark blue attire, painting an aesthetic of fallen virtue upon this terrible scene.

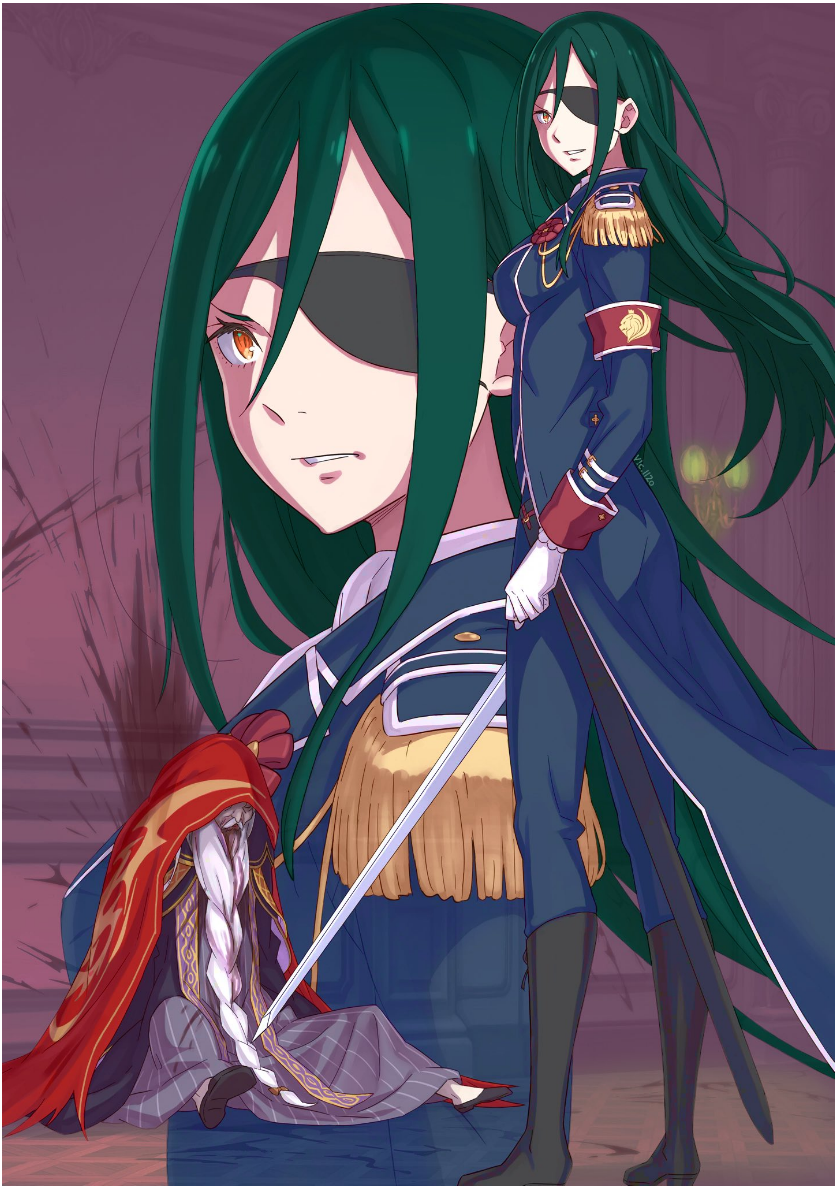
And, not a single drop of gore clung to the long, sharp, straight sword clutched by her hand. —That was only natural. For the strokes of her sword hewed through her opponents not with steel, but with wind.

Subaru: “…”

Aghast, Subaru and the others stood motionless as she slowly turned her head toward them. With one eye covered by an eyepatch, the beauty in men’s clothing captured them in her remaining eye of amber hue—

Woman: “—Ah, Natsuki Subaru, is it? —Pray tell, are you truly the “real one” I know?”

—At that query from Crusch Karsten, amidst the horrid spectacle of rampant blood and death, what escaped from the throat of Natsuki Subaru, was naught more than a pathetic groan.



vic.ll2o

Bonus Short Stories

The Land of Nascent Wolves:
The Magnificence of the Eminent Emperor of Vollachia
(LQ MTL Translation)

“The Prison Wolf General,” Volcas.

The news that a person by that name had filled a vacancy in the “Nine Divine Generals” resonated across the lands of the Vollachia Empire with a massive impact.

It was common knowledge that the “Great Disaster” had caused casualties among the Nine Divine Generals—the Empire’s strongest warriors—and that there had been shifts in their rankings. However, the Empire could not afford to let anyone, inside or outside its borders, think for a moment that its power had diminished.

Therefore, reforming the “Nine Divine Generals” was an urgent task for the Empire. However, in the pursuit of haste, they could not select someone unsuitable. Aside from the promotion of General Kafma Irulux, who had shown his presence during the disaster, the selection of other capable individuals had been postponed.

In the midst of this came the long-awaited birth of a new First General—but the choice was perceived as a radical departure even among all the legendary members of the Nine Divine Generals selected in the past.

The reason being—

“—The new First General, Volcas-kun, is both a Zombie and a Wolfman. It wouldn’t be an exaggeration to say he’s treated as a taboo existence in both the old and new eras of the Vollachia Empire. It’s certainly going to attract a lot of attention”.

“…You certainly have a way of speaking as if this were someone else’s business. After all, it was you who suggested to the Empress that I should do so”.

"Not at all! That was a proposal Medium racked her brain to come up with for your sake! What I did was merely add a bit of seasoning, perhaps. Unfortunately, my sister can't cook much beyond grilling and sprinkling salt!"

Showing his open hands, the slender man—Flop O'Connell—expressed the height of being "offended" with a gentle face. At his empty words, Vincent Vollachia gave a small snort.

Inside the Crystal Palace, in the Emperor's office, Flop appeared before Vincent at his desk with a loose, smiling face. In this Vollachia Empire, taking such an attitude toward the Emperor would have previously meant a charge of recklessness or a severe, life-threatening punishment.

"But now that we've repelled the 'Great Disaster,' such harsh punishments aren't necessary. The rumors of excessive blood purges were likely just to tighten discipline for the coming battle, weren't they?"

"Do not speak so wisely based on mere hearsay, you who do not know the reality of the court. You make me want to recreate the tense Crystal Palace of old".

"But you won't. Right, Your Majesty!"

As Flop pointed a finger at him, Vincent glared at the fingertip with the intent of "disrespect". Flop hurriedly withdrew his finger, and Vincent sighed. He was an utterly detestable man, but in his face, Vincent saw glimpses of the Empress with whom he had been most intimate lately, and he felt foolish for glaring.

"Taritta, see to it that you keep a firm grip on his reins. My tolerance has limits. If you do not wish to be beheaded by association, adapt quickly to the ways of the Imperial Capital".

"M-Me? No, um, I am in the middle of making an earnest effort…"

The one who spoke while looking down was a tall woman with dark skin and hair partially dyed blue—one of the "People of Shudrak" and currently Flop's companion, Taritta. Contrary to her dignified appearance, she shrunk her shoulders. Vincent looked at her and said, “Listen well”.

“Do not speak of efforts that yield no results. Until effort bears fruit, it is nothing more than a path with nothing on it. Do you intend to show me a path and stand proud?”

“Now, now, now, stop that, Your Majesty! Lady Taritta is doing well despite jumping into an unknown world. At the very least, I want to praise her!”

“Flop…”

Taritta turned an entranced gaze toward the back of the man who stood before her as if to protect her. However, since Flop was the one who gave Vincent a reason to poke at her in the first place, it was nothing but a poor self-staged performance. It seemed to work on Taritta, though.

“No matter how much you use that tongue of yours, the required ability does not change. If it is lacking, I will have you step down to a suitable place. That is the promise I made to Mizelda”.

“—With my sister?”

For a moment, Taritta’s vacant expression tightened at the mention of her sister’s name. That was natural. Taritta was with Flop because of her sister’s push. She had once inherited the position of Chief of the Shudrak, but her sister Mizelda had reclaimed it and expelled her—which was a convenient excuse to send her off with Flop on behalf of the entire tribe.

‘Even if she is my sister, there is no need for reserve in your judgment. If her ability is lacking, treat her accordingly. Not just Taritta, but her husband Flop as well. One chance is enough, but you must give them at least one. —With that, I will consider the reward for our former chief to be settled.’

Those were the words of Mizelda, who had entrusted Taritta to Flop and led the remaining Shudrak back to their village in the Buddheim Jungle. During the chaos of the “Great Disaster,” the proud Shudrak, who kept the ancient pact and lent Vincent a hand early on, sought neither status nor honor after the war. They only wished for the bright future of a daughter leaving them.

However—

‘Oh, and show your face once a year, Abel. And if you send an envoy to our village, don’t forget to pick someone with a good face.’

Vincent couldn’t help but be impressed by her, a woman who didn’t forget to demand things for her own selfish desires even then.

“If she hadn’t lost one of her legs, I might have considered appointing her to the Nine Divine Generals”.

“My sister-in-law? Haha, that would have been delightful. Surprisingly, she might have met your expectations. If that had happened, the problem of the Nine Divine Generals would have been solved at once! Or perhaps—”

“…”

Vincent closed one eye as Flop paused. This somewhat pretentious, theatrical way of speaking was something Flop shared with Cecilus, whom Vincent knew well. Both that fool and the man before him understood the power of words and the decoration needed to maximize them.

In short, a statement worthy of the deliberate pause was about to come out—

“—It would also be effective to welcome my sister-in-law as one of your consorts. It would reward her work and widely communicate to the citizens the firm maintenance of the pact with the Shudrak”.

“I wondered what you were going to say…”

“—?! M-My sister, as Abel’s wife?!”

Before Vincent could say anything to Flop’s proposal, Taritta’s voice, turning inside out with shock, drowned him out. As Taritta turned pale enough to see through her dark skin, Flop raised an index finger.

“Listen. Your Majesty’s goal is to rebuild the Empire as quickly as possible. Hiring the ‘Prison Wolf General’ was part of that… but if the goal is to publicly announce the stability of the Empire, the method I just mentioned is also useful. It’s already been proven effective when it was announced that Medium became the Empress”.

“B-But, wouldn’t a second attempt be less effective?”

“If we’re talking about effectiveness, it’s much scarier to be forced into choosing the Nine Divine Generals in a rush. The ‘Prison Wolf General’ is a rare find in terms of both strength and buzz. If someone unsuitable is chosen for the First seat, the ‘Iron Blood Laws’ will collapse. And wouldn’t my sister-in-law feel good about being the Emperor’s wife?”

“T-True, my sister likes Abel’s face, so she might respond if asked…”

Taritta was easily swayed by the quick-witted and smooth-talking Flop. In fact, perhaps gradually warming up to the idea, Taritta began to peek at Vincent with a face that was starting to accept the possibility of a marriage between her sister and the Emperor.

Before Taritta could finish her mental preparations, Vincent opened his mouth to correct the mistaken thought—

“You two, listen well. I—”

“—THAT’S NO GOOD!!”

However, once again, Vincent’s words were drowned out by a louder voice. Standing at the doorway, which had been flung open with great force, was the tall beauty Medium, standing still with her hands thrust out. She looked surprised by her own actions, her blue eyes wide.

“A-Ah? That’s weird. I just tried to open it normally, but it opened with such force. This is a strange door. You should buy a new one!”

“Haha, sister, look closely. You pushed it so hard that the hinges snapped and the door is leaning. Either way, a replacement is a must!”

“Ah! You’re right! Amazing, big brother! You notice the small details!”

“Stop the farce upon farce. I see no point in this. Flop, this is your fault; take responsibility and put the door back. Taritta, help him”.

Scolding the siblings who had started a noisy, poor play, Vincent stood up. As Flop and Taritta struggled to fix the door with its unfortunate hinges, Vincent walked up to the idly standing Medium.

She looked at Vincent and seemed to make up her mind.

“U-Um, Abel-chin, I…”

“It seems your hands are not injured. If you had suffered even a single wound performing such a foolish stunt, I would have had no way to defend you”.

Interrupting her, Vincent took Medium’s hands to confirm they were unhurt. Perhaps thinking she had done something stupid, Medium’s face turned red as she groaned. Looking at the blushing face of the Empress who was taller than him, Vincent thought of why she had rushed in.

“Did you think that if I welcomed Mizelda as a consort, you would become useless?”

“E-Eh, ah, u-um, well, that is…”

“If so, it is a needless anxiety. —Including the two of you over there, what I say next is forbidden from being leaked”.

Holding the hand of the stammering Medium, Vincent gave that disclaimer to her and the two struggling with the door. It wasn’t officially codified or formally processed yet, but—

“First, rest easy. I have no intention of taking Mizelda as a wife. As that man said, there is significant political value in it, but even estimating that value as not being low, I will not do it”.

“I-Is that so…? Why? Do you dislike Mizelda-chan?”

“It is not a matter of like or dislike, nor satisfaction or dissatisfaction. —If anything, this is my declaration of intent”.

“…”

Medium’s large eyes rounded as she questioned his answer. Taritta had the same reaction, but Flop alone had a different expression. As expected, his previous remark was intentional; Vincent cursed his shrewdness inwardly and continued.

“Having settled matters with the ‘Great Disaster,’ I have determined what I must do as the current Emperor. I will renew the state of the Vollachia Empire and reborn this land of the sword wolf. The renewal of the Nine Divine Generals is part of that, and I will similarly change the way of the Emperor. For now—”

“For now?”

“—I will abolish the ‘Selection Ceremony’ where I would take consorts from multiple Vollachian nobles, have children, and make them compete. To that end, I intend to limit my consorts to a single Empress”.

Medium gasped at Vincent’s assertion. It was natural. The abolition of the “Selection Ceremony” denied the long history of the Sacred Vollachia Empire and its “Iron Blood Laws” which demanded the citizens be strong.

Of course, the fact that such a cruel ritual had continued for generations among the Vollachian royalty had a meaning beyond poor taste. It was to maintain the absolute power of the “Sun Sword” Vollachia, which the Emperor inherited—a purpose of sacrificing blood and life.

“Forged by shed blood and echoing cries, the flame of the ‘Sun Sword’ continues to increase its brilliance. I will end that… foolish doctrine”.

“That is an act that might dim the sword that is the symbol of Vollachia. Perhaps Your Majesty will leave his name in history as a foolish ruler?”

“I told you. Talk of the process before results are achieved is not valuable. No matter how my path is spoken of by later generations, I will simply walk until I arrive”.

“…So, can I walk beside Abel-chin?”

Following Flop’s question, which tested the strength of Vincent’s resolve, a question with a sudden drop in tone was layered on. Knitting his brows, Vincent looked back at Medium, his only Empress, with a dubious look.

“At what stage are you stumbling? Do you understand what I… what I was just discussing with your brother?”

“I understand! But Abel-chin is the one who doesn’t understand! Because everything was so sudden! Whether Mizelda-chan becomes a wife or not, and whether no one but me becomes a wife or not!”

“Are you talking about the weight of responsibility? If you truly cannot bear it, I can replace you with someone—”

“—NO! I’M Abel-chin’s wife!”

“…”

Vincent was speechless as his hand was gripped back with a powerful shout. Before him, Medium’s eyes were moist, her white cheeks flushed, and she was out of breath. Feeling a ringing pain in his ears from the sound, Vincent let out a breath.

“If you have no objection, I have nothing to correct. Instead,”

“Yes, yes, yes, what?!”

“No one can take your role. Be very mindful of—”

“That’s obvious! I am me, Abel-chin is Abel-chin, big brother is big brother, and Taritta-chan is Taritta-chan!”

Medium declared this fiercely while still holding Vincent’s hand. The true meaning of her words was slightly different from Vincent’s. However, hearing her say it, Vincent was silent for a while and then let out a soft breath. It became silly to talk so seriously and cautiously. He felt his shoulders become lighter.

“Still, it was unexpected”.

“U-Unexpected? What is?”

“That you were so fixated on the position of Empress. You are given no significant authority, yet are expected to fulfill responsibilities befitting the title. It is a disadvantageous role with little reward”.

“—? Why? Abel-chin is here. Far from a disadvantage, it’s a great deal!”

“…”

“I used to be a traveling merchant with my brother, so I know a good deal when I see one~”

Medium waved her hand with a red face. At her frank answer, Vincent’s shoulders dropped heavily.

“—You fool”.

Behind the exchange between the Emperor and his sole Empress, Taritta, who was helping Flop fix the leaning door hinges, asked him a question.

“…Flop, did you provoke Abel on purpose?”

“Well, I wonder? I do want to apologize for using my sister-in-law as bait, though. But I’m sure she’ll understand. After all, she has a precious sister of her own!”

Enchanted by the smile of the unapologetically grinning Flop, Taritta shook her head. She realized once again that both her sister and the man before her were opponents she couldn’t match. She held a faint doubt about whether not feeling frustrated by that made her a failure as a warrior.

END

Kararagi Reaper Incident VI
(LQ MTL Translation)

1

The moment he felt the air shudder, Julius instinctively relaxed his knees.

A horizontal strike roared through the air, “killing” the space where his head had been a split second before. With a few stray hairs drifting in the breeze, Julius spun his knight’s sword and unleashed a series of thrusts as he rose. One, two, three times—sharp strikes delivered in a single breath, piercing the center of the dark shadow.

Yet, there was no resistance. It was a false afterimage, a decoy he had been lured into striking.

How does he do it? Julius wondered. It was a footwork technique that separated the physical body from the presence, deceiving the opponent’s perception. The moment he realized this, a blast of heated wind erupted around him.

“Ia, Aro!”

Julius called upon two of his six contracted spirits—Fire and Wind. Their combined power scorched the surroundings with a hot gale, forcibly resetting the battlefield. Even an opponent as formidable as his would surely have to retreat—

“—No, that’s wrong.”

It is a rule of battle among the strong that they do not do what is “common sense.” Common sense dictated fleeing the heatwave. Therefore, a truly unconventional opponent would find a way to deal with it without retreating.

“Kua!”

Acting on that possibility, Julius commanded another spirit. The ground beneath him surged upward, and using that momentum, he leaped into the air. At the exact moment his feet kicked the rising earth, a set of fingertips reached out from the soil to grab him, missing by a hair's breadth. The opponent had submerged into the ground to evade the spirits' pincer attack and immediately transitioned into an ambush.

Julius had narrowly escaped into the air, but he knew he was playing right into his opponent's hands. In the sky, there is no convenient place to hide.

"—In, Nes."

Calling the names of his spirits of Light and Shadow, Julius's resolve hardened in the empty air. If his options were dwindling, he would simply put his faith in the possibilities that remained. He cast a Light spell to vitalize himself and a Shadow spell to place a burden on his foe.

Furthermore—

"Kua!"

Tucking his knees and twisting his body, Julius kicked off a platform that shouldn't have been there—a block of ice created by his Water spirit. By kicking it, he caught the opponent (who expected him to be stranded in the air) off guard, accelerating and diving back to the ground in a single burst.

He unleashed a flash of steel aimed at the figure emerging from the earth. He targeted the shoulder, intending to crush the bone and disable the arm to sap the opponent's fighting strength. Once again, the sensation of impact vanished.

Julius landed, his grip tightening on his beloved sword. He had been certain he caught him. A quiet sigh of admiration mixed with disappointment escaped his lips.

"Once again, my reading was shallow…"

"Nah, I reckon that was pretty grand. It was only a mock battle, but I almost got serious there for a sec and nearly wiped ya out by mistake."

The opponent, who had placed a hand-sword against the back of Julius's neck, laughed off Julius's "immaturity" with soft praise. This was Halibel, the "Celebrated One"—a wolfman shinobi of the Kararagi City-States and a living legend counted among the strongest on the planet.

Clearly, the peak was still far away. Though he felt the sting of defeat, Julius gracefully accepted it and sheathed his sword.

2

"To start with, Julius, I reckon you've got a bad match-up with someone like me—someone who has a lot of tricks and doesn't care much for 'fair play' or 'standard tactics.' You're a knight to your core, so maybe you're just not fond of underhanded stuff?"

"Being called 'knight-like' is hard to take as a compliment when I've just been beaten soundly," Julius replied with a tilt of his head. "Unfortunately, my inability to even touch you is my current reality."

"I wasn't exactly complimenting ya, ya know?"

To Julius, being called a "knight to the core" was the highest form of praise. He hadn't been born a knight; he had aspired to become one. It was only natural to be happy when treated as the very thing one admired.

"Ah, perhaps that is a Lugunican cultural thing? In Kararagi, is it more common to admire merchants or shinobi?"

"I can tell you take real pride in being a knight," Halibel said, puffing on his golden pipe and purring with amusement. "In fact, I think it's impressive. Not many people could say it—asking me to train 'em, I mean."

With a golden pipe clenched between his large lips, Halibel chuckled cheerfully. Just as his words suggested, it seemed to be a genuine expression of admiration for Julius. Indeed, the Julius of the past would likely have found various excuses to pass up an opportunity like this.

However—

“I have a goal I must fulfill,” Julius said, turning his gaze toward the town of Banan. “I don’t feel I have the luxury in life to stand still when I know my goal is so high and far away.”

“You’re burnin’ bright without stoppin’… you’re just like the Young Lad. Guess you’re a master and servant who take after each other.”

“—If I am to call her my Master, then I must be so all the more.”

Julius looked toward a specific row house in the recovering town. There, Anastasia Hoshin was resting, her body exhausted and feverish. It had been a harrowing ordeal for Julius; Anastasia had been abducted by the mastermind behind the “Great Gale” incidents across Kararagi and had been missing for a full day. The shock had shaken Julius to his very foundations.

Yet, she had returned on her own—or rather, she had convinced the culprit to carry her back on their back.

“To not only persuade the opponent to release her but to make them carry her as well…”

“She’s got quite the personality,” Halibel agreed.

Julius had requested this mock battle because he couldn’t forgive his own immaturity for letting her be taken. He wanted to absorb every bit of strength he could. All so that he, Julius Juukulius, could place his master, Anastasia Hoshin, on the throne of the Kingdom without any interference or worry.

“By the way, Julius, shouldn’t you be by her side nursin’ her?”

“Ricardo, Mimi, and even Echidna… there’s no end to those who want to care for her. Pushing them aside to stay by her side would be nothing more than my own selfishness.”

Julius had provided magical treatment with his spirits, but Anastasia’s fever was caused by physical exhaustion that magic couldn’t easily fix. Halibel peeked at Julius with his squinted eyes.

“Well, I think it’s fine to stay there just ‘cause you want to, regardless of whether you’re ‘useful’ or not.”

“—? Did you say something?”

“Nothin’, just talkin’ to myself. But if that’s the case, my plan to end training by sendin’ you to her failed, didn’t it?”

“Indeed. So, I would like to continue. Without holding back, as long as time allows.”

I still lack the strength to approach the summit I’ve resolved to conquer, let alone stand alongside it.

Having experienced a defeat more valuable than victory at the Pleiades Watchtower, Julius was convinced that there was much to learn and steal from even this carefree, strongest of Shinobi.

In response to Julius’s determination, Halibel scratched his neck with his large hand and said,

“That reckless ambition is the privilege of youth… though I don’t think you need to put so much pressure on yourself, you know. It’s just that the situation has repeatedly favored me because I have more cards in my hand… Even in terms of pure skill, there probably aren’t five people in the kingdom who could beat Julius.”

As he spoke, Halibel’s gaze fell to the ground nearby—to the mock battle score sheet Julius had drawn there. In these practice sessions, which followed a best-of-ten format, Halibel had consistently won every match so far by reaching ten points before Julius.

However, the number of points Julius was scoring was definitely increasing as well.

“Once I decide to do something, I do it. Once I set a goal, I charge straight ahead with single-minded determination… We really are two peas in a pod, aren’t we, Ana-boy?”

Halibel’s muttered words vanished inside the werewolf’s mouth. Instead, Julius finished smoothing out the rough ground from their earlier mock battle and spun around to face Halibel.

“—Let’s resume, Halibel. There is still time before dark.”

“Right, right. Though night is usually when I’m at my best.”

“Then please, continue through the night as well.”

“Ah, I walked right into that one,” Halibel chuckled. They took their stances once more.

“—Knight of Anastasia Hoshin, Julius Juukulius.”

“—‘The Celebrated One,’ Halibel.”

They clashed again, the shockwaves ringing through the air. Julius believed that every swing brought him closer to his ideal.

3

—In the distance, the sound of clashing blades stirred Anastasia’s consciousness.

The sound of steel striking steel was, in most cases, something that carried an ominous air of violence. This was no exception for Anastasia, and given her creed that conflict brought a hundred harms and not a single profit, it should have been impossible for her to listen to the sound of swordplay with any pleasure.

However, that was a story from a little while ago, before the Royal Selection had begun. Before she knew it, it had become a habit; through the morning practice of the “Iron Fang” members and other such occasions, the instances where she heard the pleasant ring of steel were no longer few.

Therefore, being stirred awake by the sound of a sword clash was, unexpectedly, not a bad feeling at all.

“—Are you awake?”

However, the person the voice belonged to upon her waking was unexpected, leading to Anastasia’s surprise.

Lying on a futon spread directly on the floor over tatami mats woven from igusa, Anastasia tilted her head to the side and turned her eyes toward the direction the voice had come from. There, sitting on the frame of a low-positioned window with one knee drawn up, was the displeased face of a beautiful woman with white hair—Tia.

"…Well now, what an unexpected person to be lookin' after me. To think it's Tia-san instead of one of my own children, I'm truly surprised".

"Don't worry, the puppies and kittens were coming by incessantly. Right now just happened to be a moment when everyone was away. …Well, in the sense that I've been waiting for you to wake up, it's only natural for me to be here".

"Heh, is that so?"

As she spoke, Anastasia slowly sat up and lightly checked her physical condition.

To have caught a fever and become unable to move was a blunder. What had happened? After being taken away and returning by her own power, Anastasia had collapsed almost before she could offer an explanation. She remembered now. Of course, Echidna, who had been with her, surely would have explained things, but—

"That person who looks just like Tia-san… how is 'Black Tia' doing?"

"What's with that unpleasant way of calling her… do you want to be killed? If you mean her, she's staying quietly in a barred room for the time being… I mean, that's not it! This! I've been waiting for you to wake up exactly because I wanted to talk to you about that".

Descending from the window frame where she had been settled, Tia thrust her face close to Anastasia's. Even seen from up close, she was a woman of outstanding, sharp beauty. It was a loveliness that could rival even Emilia's, though Anastasia thought that Emilia, whose gentleness of expression made her more approachable than her features alone, was easier to deal with.

Leaving Anastasia’s inner thoughts aside, Tia prefaced with “Listen,” and continued:

“I heard it from the scarf. It seems you went and made some kind of promise with the thief who stole my Light Jewel. Do you understand? She’s a thief who robbed me of the source of my power”.

“I didn’t quite understand the finer details, but is that how it is? See, that Black Tia person wouldn’t say anythin’ to me except to go die”.

“Of course she would, if she took in my Light Jewel, she’d naturally be swallowed by my emotions! It’s not something a human can handle! It’s the same for an oni! Practically the same thing!”

“I see now”.

Driven by her momentum, one piece of unconfirmed, shocking information after another flew out of Tia’s mouth.

So she wouldn’t notice that she was surprised by the content, Anastasia moistened her lips with her tongue and steeled herself for the razor-thin negotiation that was necessary right after waking up —just as she had done with a different person with the same face before going to sleep.

“By the way, why was it that Tia-san was waitin’ for me to wake up? If you knew the other person was a thief, you could’ve just left me alone and fulfilled your objective”.

“If I did that, I’d be making you break your promise. Besides, if I interfere with you, the people around you will get in my way. Dealing with that knight, or the big puppy and the black puppy, is a pain. That’s why”.

While she sounded like the latter was the main reason, the fact that the first reason came out first suggested she was a person who was hard to hate and honest at her core. She was straightforward in the movements of her heart and emotions, which meant there was room for negotiation.

“To be honest, there shouldn’t be any reason for me to go that far, but…”

The person had taken her away without a word, put Echidna—her family of many years—in danger, and to begin with, had stolen Tia’s precious possession. She had also caused the great winds that destroyed the town; thinking normally, she was someone who should simply be kept in a barred room.

“But, I ended up makin’ a promise. Me, as a merchant”.

She would not bend her way of life. If Anastasia, who was physically weak and possessed no power to fight, started lying even to her own heart, she would truly become a woman weak in both body and mind.

That, she could not do. So as not to deceive all the people who had appraised Anastasia as strong.

“Regarding the treatment of Black Tia, I have to talk with Tia-san and the City Executives, and the things to think about are piled as high as a mountain. Taking them one by one to settle them… Tia-san”.

“What is it?”

To Tia, who was crossly folding her arms, Anastasia slowly placed a hand to her own cheek and created a refined, soft smile—one that looked gentle to those around her, but for herself, was intended for the purpose of attack.

And then—

“I’m sorry to ask, but could you go and call all my children for me? First, I have to tell ‘em I’ve woken up properly and put ‘em at ease, right?”

“Do you think I’m some convenient errand girl? Let me tell you, I’m not the kind of existence you humans can just order around with a snap of your fingers! Honestly!”

Fuming with anger, Tia stormed out of the row house. Watching her back as she left, Anastasia listened intently to the window—to the sound of clashing blades that could still be heard.

Strangely, the ring of that steel seemed elegant to her, and naturally, her heart began to settle.

END

Yae Tenzen’s Crimson Sakura State of Affairs

1

???: “—Excuse me~, could you spare a moment?”

With that, they caught the attention of the retreating figure; turning around, the person in question tilted their head slightly and looked up to meet their gaze. The tall woman stared back at them, a faint hint of consideration flickering within her emerald-green eyes,

???: “Um, you are…”

???: “I’m Yae Tenzen, a maid here at this mansion. I’ve only just recently been reinstated, though~.”

Yae responded with a subtle protrusion of her tongue, and the woman facing her briefly looked up in surprise before a smile formed upon her lips, gently lifting the hem of her skirt thereafter.

With movements so graceful that they inspired admiration within even Yae herself, she offered a curtsy on the spot.

???: “Why, how courteous of you. I am Frederica Baumann, serving as the head maid of the mansion of Margrave Roswaal L. Mathers.”

Yae: “I’m told that Schult-chan received a great deal of kindness from Margrave Mathers, as well as from Emilia-sama, who was a fellow Royal Candidate alongside the Madam, so I would like to express my gratitude once again.”

Frederica: “No, it is nothing. Setting aside the Master’s contributions, I have done little of note myself. And, concerning the matter involving Priscilla-sama… I fear Schult-sama will face many hardships going forward. I am sure Yae-sama and the others in the mansion will offer their support—”

Yae: “—Yae-san, or perhaps Yae-chan.”

Frederica: “Huh?”

The conversation which followed was an exchange befitting maids in the service of a proper, genteel noble; however, Yae interjected with a few words, putting a stop to it.

At Frederica’s expression of surprise, Yae grinned and said, “No, no”,

Yae: “Even though we serve different people, as fellow maids… I was thinking that “Yae-sama” sounded a bit too formal. Would you mind if I suggested “Yae-san” or “Yae-chan” instead? Would it be alright if I called you “Frederica-san”? Or maybe “Freddie-chan” would work too?”

Frederica: “…Those feel, just a little too overfamiliar, so please call me Frederica-san. In return, I will take the liberty of calling you Yae-san.”

Yae: “Roger. Whether or not we maintain this distance will depend on how our relationship develops from here on out∼.”

Frederica: “—. So, Yae-san, was there something you wished to discuss with me?”

Thrown off her pace by Yae’s unexpected behavior, Frederica asked this with a hint of uncertainty.

It did not seem that she thought it had been mere small talk; in response to her question, which could not quite hide the nuance of skepticism, Yae narrowed her eyes like a cat and smiled.

With that—

Yae: “If you don’t mind, would you like to be friends with me, Frederica-san?”

2

—Following the failure of Al’s plan, a swift change in strategy followed.

Yae returned to the Barielle mansion, now bereft of its mistress, Priscilla, whereupon she announced the last will and testament

Priscilla had left behind— which had named Schult as Priscilla's adopted son, and declared the ascension of Schult Barielle, all of which had been done to prepare for the arrival of Al, who was destined to return in due time.

Yae: "—Al-sama, is a monster, after all."

That was why Yae, though anticipating the failure of Al's schemes, refused to believe in his death or his defeat.

Sadly, it was Al who had thrown Yae's spirit off balance, and yet in this twisted situation, it was also Al's presence that just barely kept her from completely falling apart.

Although the exact date and time remained unknown, Al would surely return and resume his mission to fulfill his purpose. When that time came, Yae would have to become the cog that would bring the plan to fruition at last.

That said, if there was anyone capable of defeating Al, however briefly, it would be against Yae's principles to ignore that threat. —As Yae, hailed as a "genius shinobi," would say, the true measure of a shinobi's strength lay not in their power, but in their ability to survive.

So long as one lived, the chance to achieve one's goals was always within reach. While the image most had of shinobi was of those willing to sacrifice their lives, doing so was truly nothing short of throwing their talents down the drain.

So long as she remained alive. In other words, so long as she drew breath, Yae would never abandon her purpose.

That was why—

Frederica: "Well, this is quite the unusual tea. A flavor I have never tasted before."

Having said that, Frederica was successfully lured into Yae's private quarters and was taking a sip from the teacup Yae had offered her. As she smiled at Frederica, Yae continued to hone her blade in her mind.

She was supposed to have received word from the Pleiades Watchtower from Al, who had been accompanied by members of the Emilia Camp, to which Frederica, currently right before her, belonged. Although they did not seem to be composed of their full members, if those people had thwarted Al, she intended to obtain information about them.

Ultimately, if Yae could fully expose the information of all those involved, it would make her thoroughly satisfied.

Yae: “Actually, it’s tea from my homeland~. It comes from Kararagi, among other places, but since it’s hard to come by here in Lugunica, it’s something I use sparingly.”

Frederica: “If that is the case, was it truly all right to bring it out now? Perhaps it should have been saved for a more important occasion…”

Yae: “What better timing than when inviting a new friend over to your room? I don’t think there is, except maybe spending time with a lover, so now would be the best occasion.”

Upon hearing Yae’s reply, Frederica’s expression softened slightly, causing a hint of a smile to appear at the corners of her eyes.

She was an honest, endearing person who reacted in such an innocent way. Even when Yae told her the reason was “to be friends,” she showed no suspicion or wariness; she was simply surprised, and then accepted the proposal. Yet, this did not lead to carelessness or recklessness, perhaps because of her strong sense of duty as a servant.

From her mannerisms alone, it was clear that her aptitude as a maid was exceptional, leaving Yae with a twinge of regret. —If she had not possessed ulterior motives, they might have actually become friends.

Yae: “Well, I guess I’ve never really interacted with anyone lacking some kind of ulterior motive, though.”

From the very beginning, when she had infiltrated the mansion of

Priscilla Barielle as a maid, and throughout her subsequent days of being subjugated by Al, right up to the current situation, Yae harbored ulterior motives behind it all. No one had ever told her to speak honestly, but then again, what did that honesty even mean?

As a shinobi, Yae was a being who had forgotten her own face beneath the mask she wore.

Yae: “Even so, as for Schult-chan and the others…”

Accompanied by a sigh, Yae looked around and found herself in her private quarters, where she had invited Frederica— it was not a newly prepared room, but the very same one Yae herself had used when she had been employed there.

Even though Yae had supposedly resigned, it seemed that Schult had never tidied up the room, but had kept it well-maintained by coming in regularly to clean it. While Priscilla and the others were in the Empire, the other maids who had remained at the mansion had taken over those duties.

As if there had never been any doubt, for even a moment, that she would return someday—

Frederica: “Having a place to belong is wonderful, is it not?”

Yae: “—. Did my face somehow give away what I’m really feeling?”

Suddenly, upon hearing Frederica say that, Yae ran her fingers over her face to verify. However, Frederica shook her head and replied, “No,”

Frederica: “While only a few details, I had heard about some of the circumstances surrounding your departure from the mansion, Yae-san. But, Schult-sama and everyone at the mansion… and above all, Priscilla-sama had reserved a place for you to return to. Since I, too, have experienced returning to a place I had once left, I could not help thinking that.”

Yae: “A place to return to, you said? Does that have anything to do with your family?”

Frederica: “—Yes, that is right.”

When pressed a little further, Frederica replied with a smile. Seeing the calm composure concealed within that smile, Yae’s opinion of Frederica was elevated one level.

It would seem that their opponent was not so easy to deal with as first thought.

Frederica: “Do you know about my family?”

Yae: “I wouldn’t exactly claim to know that much about it~. Seeing as I was technically a part of the Madam’s camp myself, I suppose the extent of my knowledge is that Frederica-san and her sibling joined your camp together?”

Frederica: “So that is the case… It is quite the relief to know that Garf’s reckless behavior is not widely known.”

Yae: “I hear that he’s quite strong, right?”

Frederica: “Not everything in this world revolves around that. Regarding that matter, not just myself, but my camp has been discussing various aspects of that as of late.”

Yae: “Heh~, everyone in the camp. So, you all get along quite well, would you say~?”

Frederica: “That is correct. Rather than just fellow camp members, I suppose you could say that we are more like family.”

Yae: “—Family.”

And, as Frederica said that, her gaze lowered to her teacup, and Yae muttered the same word.

To Yae, the concept of a family was something she had no connection with, a word which rang hollow. She had lost her family the moment she was abducted to the shinobi village, and she had never formed any bonds with anyone afterward. While she might have used her feminine wiles as a cover, her ironclad rule was to never let anyone near her heart, even if she did let them near her body.

Because Yae possessed such exceptional ability, she never needed to exploit women as a shinobi. Yet, perhaps conversely, because she had become emotionally involved, she had ended up in this state of affairs. Despite having mocked the village's ironclad rule countless times, there was a clear purpose to it, to the point where the village chief's laughter seemed to echo in her mind.

That was why—

Frederica: "Is it not true for Yae-san and Schult-sama as well? To me, the trust Schult-sama has placed in you, Yae-san, felt like something more than just a simple master-servant relationship… or rather, something more than just coworkers."

Yae: "…"

Caught off guard by these unexpected words, Yae could not help but wrinkle her brow.

Frederica's reevaluation of their relationship was prompted by Schult's sudden change of position.

Merely half a day ago, Schult had just been a common servant, but now he had become the heir to the Barielle Domain.

Yae's position would also no longer be that of Schult's coworker, but rather, one in which she would need to regard him as her master. Though but a minor detail, it was a necessary shift in mindset.

That said, that was a different matter altogether.

Yae: "Saying that Schult-chan and I are family is a bit of a stretch, isn't it? From Schult-chan's perspective, the Madam has just passed away, and he is going through a difficult time. It's just that I happened to come back, and I'm someone he can easily lean on."

Frederica: "Truly, when one experiences profound suffering, the person with whom one can confide and share that pain without hesitation, even if they are not family, is someone truly precious.

That would be called a friend or a lover. Yae-san, which one are you to Schult-sama?”

Yae: “…Well, well, it looks like you’ve managed to best me this time.”

Yae was neither Schult’s friend, nor his lover, of course. That said, even with both of those options off the table, it would not leave family as the only remaining possibility, yet the argument that she was one to whom he could entrust his deepest emotions was something she could not refute.

In reality, Yae intended to leverage those feelings, which was why she had returned to the Barielle mansion. Yet, despite being aware of this, she resented having it pointed out by someone else.

Frederica: “Hehe.”

Yae: “—. What’s so funny?”

Yae narrowed her eyes at Frederica, who had suddenly burst out laughing, her hand covering her mouth.

Frederica: “Nothing… Actually, when Yae-san first invited me to her room, I was a bit nervous. I was unsure what Yae-san was thinking.”

Yae: “So you thought I was lying when I said I wanted to be friends? If that’s the case, that makes Yae-chan feel pretty lonely.”

Frederica: “I would not go so far as to call it a lie, however, I am also a member of Emilia-sama’s camp… I am always on my guard to ensure that my words and actions do not give anyone an opening to exploit. That is why…”

Yae: “That is why?”

Frederica: “Why not start with something a little more straightforward? After all, I still hardly know enough about you, Yae-san, to refer to you as a friend.”

Frederica tilted her head slightly, her long, golden hair cascading down her slender shoulders. The gleam in her jewel-like emerald eyes was certainly not the look of someone plotting something. Nor, however, did she appear to be a frail creature merely waiting to be devoured.

Faced with that gaze, Yae lifted her teacup and said, “For example…”,

Yae: “Could it be something like, how this tea is something I actually brewed myself?”

Frederica: “Yes, exactly… That said, this tea you brewed, Yae-san. It has a distinct flavor, yet the way the aroma lingers in the nose is quite addictive…”

Yae: “Since there weren’t many ingredients to work with, I have come to value things that can be savored with a little creativity.”

Frederica: “Oh, I quite understand. Believe it or not, I am quite the expert at foraging for wild plants when out in the mountains and forests.”

Thumping her chest proudly, Frederica ostentatiously declared her credentials. But, to Yae, who had been abandoned in the woods during survival training, it was a rather presumptuous remark.

Yae: “When it comes to foraging for wild mountain plants, I’m pretty good at it as well~. After all, the ingredients you find in the mountains are not something you can just eat without a second thought, unless you know how to tell which ones are poisonous~.”

Frederica: “Hmm, I can distinguish them by scent, so I will not be outdone.”

Yae: “Well, I don’t intend for this to turn into a contest or anything, though.”

Seeing Frederica, who looked as if she might roll up the sleeves of her maid uniform and dash off into the woods at any moment, Yae opted to back down from the challenge in order to curb her enthusiasm.

Of course, those sorts of worries were completely unfounded.

Frederica: “I hope that by sharing more conversations like this, we can gradually become friends.”

Yae: “I see, I see. So, Frederica-san is the type who starts with relatively low hurdles, but then really puts you to the test with the number and placement of the hurdles later on~.”

Frederica: “For some reason, it feels like my intentions are being misunderstood… besides…”

Yae: “—?”

Frederica closed one eye and appeared ready to say something, prompting Yae to raise a questioning look. Then, Frederica brought her hand to her mouth, exposing the faintest hint of her fangs, and said,

Frederica: “I know this is a bit of an afterthought, but regarding your choice of words… “timing” and “type”, where did you pick up those expressions, Yae-san?”

Yae: “Ahh…”

Now that she understood the intent behind Frederica’s question, Yae felt a sense of realization.

Al’s vocabulary and actions had significantly influenced Yae’s choice of words. Setting aside the way Al carried himself, which had led Priscilla to deem him as a “jester”, his peculiar way with words had influenced everyone present at the Barielle mansion in some manner.

Yae was among them— she had initially adopted them to harass Al, but before she knew it, she had mastered them on a subconscious level, and they had become an ingrained habit.

And from time to time, Frederica and Roswaal also used expressions that bore a similar nuance to the words which Al employed.

It would seem that there were some similarities between Al and the Lolimancer from the Emilia Camp.

Frederica: “—Yae-san?”

Yae: “That’s top-secret— as in, where and when it’ll be revealed will remain a mystery for now. I’ll tell you once I can finally call you Freddie-chan.”

Frederica: “…This time, it would seem it is my turn to be countered…”

Frederica wore an expression that straddled the line between displeasure and pouting as Yae replied with a finger to her lips.

It would seem, in both the maid showdown and the friendship showdown, a stalemate was brewing. Faced with Frederica, who proved to be a tougher opponent than anticipated, Yae felt not only frustration and impatience, but also a sense of intrigue. Thinking back on it, she recalled that she had initiated the encounter.

Yae: “It is such a rare opportunity to discuss things like this with people my age, so this has been quite enjoyable.”

Even if behind it all lay an ulterior motive, such as gathering intelligence for Al. —After all, Yae had truly enjoyed herself. Despite her objective to assassinate Priscilla, or her attempts to simply survive being killed by Al, or even her exploitation of the will to deceive Schult, the fond memories of those happy days spent at the Barielle mansion made this a cherished place, one dear to Yae’s heart.

That was why, even if there had been an ulterior motive, she could still enjoy talking to Frederica.

Frederica: “Perhaps, it might be a good idea to hold some sort of social gathering for the maids. We could limit it to those houses involved in the Royal Selection, or we could leave it open to anyone.”

Yae: “So, we get to vent about our Masters and gossip about them, things we usually don’t dare say. Kyaa~, Freddie-chan, are you daring or what?”

Frederica: “I would never say anything of the sort! Besides, is it not a bit early to be calling me Freddie-chan?”

Yae: “Putting aside the nickname for now, I had plenty of complaints about the Madam, you know~. For example…”

The recollection of that beautiful woman of crimson flashing through her mind, the words she had spoken to Yae, that striking figure seen from behind, and the dazzling presence she had exuded: she recounted all of this to Frederica.

Watching Frederica’s reactions of surprise, admiration, and sometimes utter bewilderment, Yae secretly grinned at the smooth progress of her plan to win Frederica over, and the tangible progress she was making in building their relationship.

With a stifling smirk of satisfaction, the plan of the Crimson Sakura continued in secret while she awaited Al. —Far from monotonous, the Shinobi’s covert operations continued, intertwined with the pleasures of conversing with a friend.

END

Unadapted Comic Alives

Visual Complete Vol. 1: Emilia (Translation Pending)

Visual Complete Vol. 2: Ram (Edited Machine Translation)

Character – Ram

The older of the twin maids who work at the Roswaal mansion, where the injured Subaru was brought.

She is an arrogant and abrasive person with a sharp tongue. Compared to her younger sister, she is lacking in all areas, including cooking, washing, sewing, and cleaning.

She has a sharp gaze, harsh with her words and actions, is a teacher with a no-nonsense approach to education, and has an unbearable personality to match.

She is devoted to her master, Roswaal, and in general, she does not open her heart to anyone except Roswaal and her younger sister, Rem.

She is in charge of Subaru's education while working at the mansion, and she continues to bully the incompetent protagonist with her venomous tongue.

Comments

"Of course, ability and loyalty are necessary to work at the Mathers family's mansion, but the two who stood out in those two senses are —Ram and Rem."

"The older sister, Ram? Hmm, yes… I am a little worried about Ram's ability as a servant."

"Although it would sound better to say she is good at getting their work done, she has a terrible habit of cutting corners to get things done efficiently, and to begin with, she already had a rather arrogant way of speaking… it is difficult to say if she is particularly suitable to be a servant.”

“However, there is no doubt about her ability in other areas and, above all, her loyalty to the master of the house… Roswaal L. Mathers-sama.”

“It would be safe to say that half of Ram is made up of her feelings for Roswaal-sama, and the other half is her feelings for her younger sister, Rem. No, that is no joke.”

“I believe her feelings are different from that of obsession. Ultimately, it is a type of deep affection.”

“She is very devoted to who she confides in. And when that is combined with her excellence, the results are simply bountiful.”

“That girl fully believes in Roswaal-sama and fully believes in herself who fully believes in him. She does not waver or hesitate in that, and if anything stands in her way, she will not hesitate before taking on a challenge… I think that is simultaneously both a strength and a worry.”

“The only person who can truly be said to be Roswaal-sama’s confidant is Ram… I think that Ram is the only one who knows Roswaal-sama’s true thoughts and intentions.”

“What is the Master thinking, and why does he keep Ram by his side?”

“Whenever needed by the Master, Ram responds without hesitation.”

“I am both a little afraid and a little envious.”

“…Garfiel would assuredly be angry if he heard me say something like that.”

Comments on Ram, from a scary-faced colleague

Character – Reinhard

A handsome young man with blazing red hair and eyes as blue as the clear sky.

A perfect superhuman with refined manners whose every word and action is full of consideration for others.

Heralded as the Sword Saint and the Knight Amongst Knights, he is a celebrity who is well known throughout the Royal Capital.

He usually serves as a member of the royal guard in the Royal Castle, but on his days off, he can be found strolling around the Royal Capital.

What did this young man, who always does his best for the city's people, see on his day off?

Comments

"If asked who my most respected friend is, I would not hesitate to give his name."

"He is a member of the Kingdom of Lugunica's Royal Guard, the Knight Amongst Knights, and the Sword Saint."

"Indeed, this generation's Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea's name."

"Although we are both part of the Royal Guard now, I have known him for a long time."

"I believe the first time I saw him was when my father took me to the Royal Castle."

"I was only about ten years old, so he must have been around seven or eight."

"To my embarrassment, I was a child who lacked awareness of my position at the time."

"Of course, I had learned proper etiquette and how to behave at the royal palace, so I was not disrespectful."

"However, looking at him then, I was reminded that I had no understanding of the true nature of any of those actions.”

“Even at such a young age, Reinhard had already been vividly aware of his position and strength.”

“He was never prideful of the immense power he bore, nor did he ever neglect to use it to help others.”

“When I first witnessed him at the Royal Castle and viewed the sincerity in his eyes, I felt quite ashamed of myself.”

“It is because of that encounter with him that I became the person I am today, someone who diligently works to improve myself to the point of being deemed the Finest of Knights. I would like to thank my friend for that.”

“My motivation behind diligently striving to better myself to the point I have been deemed the Finest of Knights is my encounter with him on that day. I would like to thank my friend for that.”

“…However, I sometimes find myself thinking.”

“I wonder if he, if Reinhard, ever feels any discomfort from standing tall like that all the time. I have never asked him about it personally, but the environment he is in is not exactly an ideal one.”

“Even though he must have had times when he suffered and wanted to give up… he has never demonstrated it. That is what gave me my opinion of him.”

“I hope my friend can find someone he can confide in and distribute his burdens with.”

“I cannot help but loathe my immaturity, which prevents me from being in a position to be relied upon.”

Comments on Reinhard, from the Finest of Knights

Character – Elsa

A beautiful woman with long, black hair, a rare sight in this world, who exudes a seductive aura.

She flaunts her glamorous figure in a provocative outfit, and does not hold back in showing off her seductive charm to those around her.

However, despite her demure appearance and gentle tone, there is a darkness lurking in the depths of her eyes that sets her apart from other working women.

It seems she had some business at the loot house, and made an appointment to meet Felt there.

Comments

???: “Oi! Have you found the woman on the wanted poster?!”

???: “Nah, she ain’t here. Her appearance stands out, so there’s no way she could’ve been overlooked…”

???: “Do you suppose she’s hiding somewhere? She clashed with Reinhard-sama, didn’t she? A bunch of people saw the light of his sword strike the sky. I don’t think she could survive that…”

???: “The fact that Reinhard-sama couldn’t finish her off is probably the cause of all this fuss!! She’s a menace who escaped from the Sword Saint’s blade. How can you call yourself a knight if you’re just gonna let her run wild in the Royal Capital?”

???: “Don’t yell at me, sorry… But, what kind of person is the woman on the wanted poster?”

???: “You didn’t even know…! Oh, shit! That woman is Elsa Granhiert, but she’s also known as the Bowel Hunter.”

???: “Huh, the Bowel Hunter…?! Who’s that…?”

???: “She’s a savage killer who loves to slash open her victims’ bellies with an absurdly huge knife and watch their guts pour out.”

???: “Apparently, she calls herself a mercenary. However, she’s considered a menace and was accordingly placed on a wanted list.

If you find her, report to the guards or the knights. If she makes any suspicious moves, arrest her immediately… so they say.”

???: “If she’s earned that kind of reputation, she must’ve committed some terrible atrocities…”

???: “Her most notorious deed is the Red Snowfall on the Orcos Domain, which took place in the northern country of Gusteko.”

???: “There was a noble lord named Orcos who ruled a domain along the border between Lugunica and Gusteko. When he had a dispute with another noble lord from a neighboring domain, Elsa was apparently among the mercenaries hired by the rival side.”

???: “No way, the one who killed that lord was Elsa…”

???: “No, it wasn’t just that. The Bowel Hunter had the initiative to kill everyone associated with the domain. Not just the people connected to the Orcos Domain, but the entirety of the faction of the lord she was employed by.”

???: “Wh-Why would she do that…?”

???: “Who knows? Anyway, after that incident, she became wanted by Gustekan authorities for being a menace. And because of that, in Lugunica, if you see her, you’re supposed to contact the authorities immediately.”

???: “Now that you know how dangerous they are…”

???: “Uh, hey… that woman, she had black hair, black eyes, and a big knife, right?”

???: “—? Yeah, that’s right.”

???: “Co-Could that possibly be her right there?”

The final conversation between guards searching the Royal Capital for the Bowel Hunter

Glossary

☆Out Off (The Convenience store)

Subaru: “Kicking off our explanation of terms, we have a convenience store from my old world.”

Emilia: “Convinyence stoar… huh, what does that mean?”

Subaru: “A convenience store is a type of store where you can buy just about everything you need for daily life. Out Off is a major nationwide convenience store chain. There were two of them within two hundred meters of my house, and it felt like they were eating into each other’s business areas. I understand the strategy of dominating a certain area, but isn’t that taking it too far?”

Emilia: “Um, I’ve got no idea what you’re talking about, Subaru, but you’re probably right.”

☆Demi-Humans, Demi-human Species, and Demi-Human Tribes

Subaru: “My image of them is that they are humanoid races other than humans, but is that correct?”

Emilia: “Well, that’s mostly true. The most well-known demi-human races are the elves and dwarves. There are also the Giant Tribe and the Dwarf Tribe. The beastman types are divided into the Beastman tribe and the Half-beast tribe. If you include those who are half-human, there’s a reaaally large number of them.”

Subaru: “From what I saw when I was in the Royal Capital, it looked like there were a lot of humans. It seems like demi-humans and humans live together, but do they ever have any conflicts with each other?”

Emilia: “I heard that the relationship between demi-humans and humans varies from country to country. In Lugunica, they coexist now, but a while ago, there was a civil war between demi-humans and humans. It’s a problem everyone has to deal with, but I hope we can reduce these misunderstandings… even if only a little.”

☆The Royal Selection (The Pick for the Throne)

Subaru: “The fact that the royal bloodline has ended smells of a fishy conspiracy.”

Roswaal: “It has been thorooooughly~ investigated, so there’s no doubt. The decision was made after considering the possibility of them… feigning illness. Everyone in the royal family has passed away with nothing to hide.”

Subaru: “That’s a pretty irreverent guarantee… Anyway, that’s why the opportunity has come to Emilia-tan. Since it’s a selection, after all.”

Roswaal: “Of cooourse~, there are other candidates as well. All of them are people who are very motivated to take the throne for themselves. Ahaaa~, this is getting intereeesting~, isn’t it?”

Subaru: “At the very least, Emilia-tan and I are feeling uneasy about the smile you’re wearing right now.”

☆The Royal Capital of Lugunica

Subaru: “The Kingdom of Lugunica’s capital… Its biggest city and the place I was initially summoned to.”

Reinhard: “The population of the Royal Capital is around three hundred thousand. However, that is just the number of permanent residents, and it is difficult to accurately measure the number of people who are coming and going to and from it at any given time.”

Subaru: “By the way, what’s the population of the Kingdom of Lugunica as a whole?”

Reinhard: “It is said that the entire Kingdom’s population is around fifty million. However, this is not an accurate figure that has been gathered by traveling around the various regions. It is a sum of figures that have been collected from regional lords. Still, there is a possibility that the numbers of their subjects have been inflated in order to collect taxes, so I do not consider it a very reliable figure.”

Subaru: “How unexpected to hear an illicit story about the Royal Capital…”

☆Kadomon’s Fruit Stall

Subaru: “This is Mr. Save Point’s shop. For some reason, whenever I Returned by Death, I ended up back here, so I was scared that maybe it was being caused by the old man.”

Kadomon: “Stop making a racket. If you’re not gonna buy an appa, then get lost.”

☆Insignia

Subaru: “It’s a sort of badge in the shape of a winged dragon with a red jewel in its mouth.”

Felt: “I was hired to steal it from the silver-haired nee-chan, and if I hadn’t messed up after that, I woulda gotten paid a holy gold coin for it… shit, I screwed up.”

Subaru: “But if you’d succeeded, you would’ve become a national criminal. Since it was a qualification for participating in the Royal Selection, the guards throughout the Royal Capital would’ve been desperately searching for you.”

Felt: “…Either way, it didn’t turn out well, dammit!”

☆The Forbidden Library

Subaru: “There’s a nasty rumor that the reclusive loli in the Roswaal mansion calls her room that…”

Beatrice: “Do you wish to be blasted away, I suppose? With Betty’s Door Crossing, this is a place that is separated from the rest of the world—that’s the Forbidden Library, in fact. It is connected to only one door in the mansion at a time and is always changing, I suppose.”

Subaru: “For all that, it’s pretty easy to find.”

Beatrice: “You’re just an anomaly, in fact! Normally, it shouldn’t easily… ah, Now Betty is angry, I suppose!”

☆Contracts

Subaru: “I can write it down if you don’t believe me. It can be used as evidence in court later.”

Beatrice: “Binding oneself with the soul, rather than with paper. In this world, that’s the idea behind making Contracts, I suppose.”

Subaru: “Binding someone with your soul sounds cool. They must feel like they’ve made a commitment, right?”

Beatrice: “Even if you disregard them and move on, demi-humans and those involved with magic emphasize a great deal of importance on Contracts, in fact. Especially with the older races and spirits, you can be sure that the topic will invariably come up if you talk about them, I suppose.”

Subaru: “I heard that a Contract also binds Emilia-tan and Puck.”

Beatrice: “How regrettable, in fact. If there were no contract between Bubby and that girl, Betty would forcibly tear them apart and keep Bubby by Betty’s side, I suppose…”

Subaru: “What are you raving about, you loli? Scary.”

☆Gates

Subaru: “So, it’s okay to think of it as an organ that’s necessary for a magician to use magic, right?”

Rem: “It’s not something you can physically see, so it’s a bit of a stretch to call it an organ, but it’s what allows you to take mana from the air, convert it into magic, and release it back into the world. That’s what it does.”

Subaru: “The better the magician, the bigger and more numerous the Gates they tend to have. Roswaal’s probably an anomaly, though.”

Rem: “The world has blessed Roswaal-sama as a magician. Rem, Nee-sama, and Emilia-sama are above average, and Subaru-kun is below average. No, well below average.”

Subaru: “You didn’t need to say “well”, did you?! I already knew without you telling me!”

☆The Sword Saint

Subaru: “With such a bombastic title, it really resonates with my chuuni mind.”

Reinhard: “I am honored that you like it, but I personally feel that I am still too inexperienced to carry the title. The title of Sword Saint has been passed down through the generations.”

Subaru: “I seem to remember that building and the sky being cleaved in half; is that not enough? Are all the previous Sword Saints monsters like that?”

Reinhard: “The first Sword Saint is said to have clashed with a dragon using only a sword. That sword has been passed down to me, but the dilemma is that my own will cannot draw it. It would be presumptuous of me to call myself a Sword Saint when the sword itself has not even recognized me, would it not?”

Subaru: “From my point of view, it seems like the sword is a bit too extravagant.”

☆Satella

Subaru: “Well, if I remember correctly, she’s called the Witch of Envy or something like that…”

Emilia: “I’m sorry, I don’t want to talk about this.”

Beatrice: “Even saying the name of that abominable Witch you should hesitate to utter, I suppose.”

Rem: “Please don’t say anything rash and upset Rem.”

Ram: “It’s no use expecting such subtlety from Barusu.”

Subaru: “What’s with this ganging up on me…”

☆Return by Death

Subaru: “It’s the power to literally rewind time and restart the world by dying.”

Ram: “Well, it seems like Barusu’s hopelessness has finally spread to his whole body.”

Subaru: “Can you stop patting me on the shoulder as if you were comforting me with that sad look on your face? I can talk about it because we’re in a meta place, but I don’t know why I have this ability, either! I wish I could’ve been given a cheat that would have just made me super strong!”

Ram: “That’s what makes Barusu Barusu because he can only see such a bleak future due to his rash decisions. I guess you could say Return by Death is cause for celebration.”

Subaru: “Damn, I can’t deny that… Remember this. My future prospects will show you one day…!”

☆The Great Waterfall

Subaru: “When I say even further east than the easternmost point, people laugh at me and say that’s nonsense.”

Puck: “The Great Waterfall is a waterfall that runs off the world’s edge. At the edge of the continent, at the end of the world, the sea ends, and there is a waterfall that goes on forever. Where does it disappear to when it falls? Not even Spirits know what lies beyond the end of the world.”

Subaru: “That’s pretty scary. I see. No wonder why they laugh when they hear I’m from beyond the Great Waterfall. That damned Reinhard, he was probably making fun of me…”

Puck: “It is said that only Dragons know what lies beyond the Great Waterfall. Although they certainly exist, they have no place to live, and it is said that they have their own paradisebeyond the Great Waterfall and that they spread their wings and fly over to this continent from time to time.”

Subaru: “You’re not fooling anyone with that line about literally spreading your wings and taking a vacation, so don’t laugh!”

☆The Loot House

Subaru: “It’s a den of thieves where the unscrupulous criminals of the Royal Capital amass their ill-gotten gains.”

Rom: “Don’t make it sound so foul. This is the headquarters for ne’er-do-wells.”

Subaru: “Even if you change the wording, the meaning doesn’t change! Since when have you been in that kind of business?”

Rom: “It’s been ‘bout fourteen or fifteen years since I settled in the Royal Capital… I’ve been doin’ this for a long time… but I guess I’ll be hangin’ around for a little bit longer.”

Subaru: “Use this opportunity to find a proper job. Maybe it’ll help put a stop to Felt’s bad habits.”

Rom: “You’re just a nobody who doesn’t know anythin’, sayin’ whatever ya want…”

☆The Natsuki Family

Subaru: “I’m from a family of three, consisting of my father, mother, and me. Since I, the eldest son, was teleported, the family line will end with me.”

Emilia: “Do-Don’t say such sad things. After all, there’s a chance that Subaru might get a new younger brother or sister.”

Subaru: “That’s not something to joke about. I’m afraid that if they find out I’m gone, they’ll have no qualms about making more children. I don’t wanna imagine my parents doing something like that!”

Emilia: “But I’m sure they’re worried… I hope they can find peace of mind soon.”

Subaru: “…I don’t know. Maybe they’re better off without me.”

Emilia: “Subaru…”

Subaru: “I know that’s not true. I’m the one who should know better than anyone.”

The second half of the glossary continues in Volume Three.

Extra Episode “Ram”

1

The faint sound of a pen nib skimming across a paper was the only echo in the silent room.

A girl with short, pink hair sat at a desk, holding a quill pen.

Her face was more cute than beautiful, and her strong-willed, light-crimson eyes were distinctive. She was wearing a maid outfit that exposed her shoulders and back, and even though it was the middle of the night in her own room, she was still donning a white headpiece on her head.

—Even though this was her private room, it served as proof of her steadfast attitude towards her duties. On the desk in front of the girl were a number of papers, and as she looked through them, she sometimes wrote her signature, sometimes wrote responses on blank sheets of paper, and left scribbles one after another on the notepad at the edge of the desk.

Her concentration was so intense that the cup of tea she had on the desk had completely cooled down and had been left untouched.

???: “—Whew.”

Suddenly, she exhaled and ceased moving the quill pen. The girl cast aside the last of the documents she had been looking through, and, touching her eyelids with her free hand, she looked towards the window,

???: “…Feeling exhausted, and it’s already this late?”

The girl muttered this when she saw the morning sun rising faintly from beyond the mountains in the distance.

???: “There won’t be much time left now.”

As she said that, the girl quickly gathered up the papers on the desk, put away the quill pen, among other things, and then looked at the now completely cooled cup of tea. She took a sip, lightly moistening her tongue and lips, and then stood up. She made her way to her bed, removed the white headpiece and ribbon from her head, untied her shoulder straps to shed her maid uniform, revealing her white-naked body.

???: “It’s cold.”

The girl, now in her underwear, put on a thin nightgown-like negligee and crawled into the covers.

She placed a pillow under her head and closed her eyes, and her tired consciousness drifted quickly into sleep. It was almost sunrise—there were probably less than three hours until she had to commence work.

For spending that brief time sleeping was simply a part of the girl’s—of Ram’s daily routine.

2

???: “Nee-sama, Nee-sama. It’s morning. Time to wake up.”

For this girl, her day always began with the voice of her beloved other half.

She felt the sensation of someone shaking her shoulders from above the bed, and her consciousness slowly returning to reality. She opened her eyes in response, and her gaze met with the light-blue eyes of the person looking in at her.

???: “Good morning, Nee-sama. Today is another beautiful day.”

When their eyes met, and the other person realized that she was conscious, her lips parted in a thin smile. It was a fleeting smile that seemed to disappear, a smile that only those who were close to each other could understand.

She thought to herself that if she smiled more clearly, she would have a smile as lovely as a flower.

The same could be said of the other girl. After all, the person who woke her up was her twin sister, who had the same appearance as her.

???: “Nee-sama, are you awake yet?”

Ram: “…Mmm, just four more hours of sleep.”

???: “Sometimes Rem would like to let Nee-sama sleep a bit longer… but that would set a bad example for Subaru-kun. He never oversleeps, no matter what.”

Ram: “Hmm… It’s quite a pain when Barusu laughs over oversleeping.”

The words of her younger sister—Rem, reminded her of the boy with black hair. He had joined them as an apprentice servant at the mansion just a few days prior. The boy’s abilities were so poor that he was practically useless as a servant in a nobleman’s mansion, but for that very reason, she wanted to avoid showing any weakness.

Reluctantly, she rubbed her eyelids and sat up, and Rem supported her unsteady upper body with an outstretched hand. Leaning on Rem’s support, she slid her hips down, sat on the bed with her feet on the floor, and,

Ram: “Rem. —As usual, please help Ram get ready.”

Rem: “Yes, Nee-sama. As usual.”

In response to her haughty older sister’s orders, the younger sister did not disobey but nodded with a look of delight in her eyes.

Having gone behind the bed, Rem slowly combed Ram’s pink hair with a comb in hand.

Feeling the careful touch of fingers on her nape, as if handling jewels, Ram glanced out of the window and estimated that it had been around three hours since she fell asleep.

Rem: “Nee-sama, are you tired? Your workload has increased, as you’re also looking after Subaru-kun’s studies.”

So asked Rem, who was busy preparing her older sister. Usually, they would be having a conversation, but today, they were both silent, lost in their own thoughts. Ram shrugged and said, “No, that’s not it,” sensing the concern in her sister’s sigh.

Ram: “Teaching Barusu is no different from training a dog. It’s not exhausting, and yesterday we finished early, around midnight.”

Rem: “If that’s what Nee-sama says, then that’s fine… but if you’re tired, please let Rem do your work for you. Please don’t overdo it.”

Rem’s voice resonated pleadingly as she combed Ram’s hair. However, she could not afford to rely on Rem’s kindness. Rem was already undertaking more than eighty percent of the general household chores in the mansion by herself. Ram and Subaru were in charge of the remaining twenty percent, and even that was not being satisfactorily completed.

Ram, of course, and even Subaru, did not want to put any additional burden on Rem.

Ram: “If anyone should be taking a break, it should be you, Rem… Ram knows exactly what Ram can handle, so to say that is unreasonable.”

Rem: “With those feelings alone, Rem can work for ten or even a hundred years without needing a break.”

Ram: “We’ll see about that.”

It was an exaggeration, but her attitude was certainly not a lie. Rem, who idolized Ram, seemed to be trying to confirm her own sense of worth by devoting herself to her. Ram, who sensed that this was a distortion, was unable to say anything because she was similar to Rem.

—Rem's words, "ten or even a hundred years" pierced deeply into her heart. If nothing changed, Rem would continue to spend her days relying on Ram as she had said. Although that was not necessarily a bad thing, she did not think it was right either.

Ram: "That's why, just for a little while Ram will…"

Rem: "—? Nee-sama, did you say something just now?"

Ram: "It was that no matter how much sleep Ram receives, it would never be enough. Why is it that sleepiness never seems to dry up but just keeps on flowing? Is it because dreams quench your heart just like spring water quenches your thirst?"

Rem: "Quite the poet… Nee-sama is so wonderful…"

Rem finished combing Ram's hair, muttering absentmindedly. Then, Rem decorated her sister's hair with a ribbon that matched her own, placing it in a position that was symmetrical to her own, and then,

Rem: "Nee-sama, it's time to change into your uniform…"

Ram: "Yes, hurrah!"

In response to Ram saying that in a casual manner and raising both her arms, Rem remarked, "Excuse me", then proceeded to slip off Ram's nightgown. The morning air was chilly against her naked body, and while Ram's eyes narrowed from the cold, Rem brought out a change of uniform from the closet—the same type of maid uniform she had worn the previous night, and dressed her older sister.

She slipped her head through the opening at the neck and shook her head lightly, and finally, Rem put a white headpiece on her head,

Rem: "Yes, Nee-sama. You look wonderful today."

Rem carried a full-length mirror to the bed and Ram observed herself while sitting down. While she adjusted the slightly wrinkled chest area and the angle of her ribbon—Rem diligently put on Ram's white stockings, which reached past her knees, and her preparations were complete.

Ram: “Haah… Well then, shall we get back to work today?”

Rem: “Yes, of course. By the way, Nee-sama, what’s that stack of papers on your desk…?”

Ram, who was yawning with her hand over her mouth, was called out to by Rem, who had verified her sister’s personal appearance. At these words, Ram glanced at the paperwork she had been working on until the early hours of the morning—the documents she had completed were on Roswaal’s behalf. They were related to the internal affairs of Margrave Roswaal L. Mathers’ domain. Ram had not told Rem about the fact that she was helping out in a way that went beyond the duties of a mere servant. She had no intention of telling her sister about it in the future, either, making her feel guilty.

Ram: “It’s nothing important. Barusu was studying his letters, so Ram was looking around for something that might be useful for children learning how to write.”

Rem: “For Subaru-kun… as expected of Nee-sama. Would you like Rem to help too?”

Ram: “No, it’s okay. Rem is much busier than Ram, so you should prioritize your work. Although Ram was the one being worried about, so it seems like Rem is the one who has not been sleeping enough. Your eyes look tired.”

Rem: “Nothing can be hidden from Nee-sama. It seems that Rem stayed up a little late.”

The younger sister, wearing a forced smile, showed no sign that she knew her older sister had stayed awake even later than that. Ram pushed Rem’s back towards the door as they headed outside, and,

Ram: “If you’re in trouble, just say so. Ram is here for you to rely on in times of need.”

Rem: “…Yes, if that happens, would you please do that, Nee-sama?”

When Rem gave a weak smile, Ram patted her shoulder to reassure her. Then, as they were about to leave the room and venture downstairs.

???: “Haah… Ah, good morning, Mesdames-senpai.”

Subaru appeared at the end of the corridor, putting a hand to his mouth and yawning with a carefree expression. He was wearing a strange gray outfit—and seemed to be on his way to interrupt Emilia’s morning routine.

Ram: “How can you be so brazen as to do it morning after morning?”

Subaru: “Don’t make it sound like I’m doing something bad. I’m just going to obtain some motivation for the day.”

Subaru, with his lips pouted, argued with Ram, and then he raised his hand in surrender to the two of them,

Subaru: “I’ll join you for work after my morning routine, so thanks for your efforts today.”

Dangling his hands with a nonchalant demeanor, Subaru turned and walked down to the opposite side of the hallway. Noticing how Rem emitted a wordless exhale as she watched him pass by, Ram, thinking about her sister’s unusual reaction, declared,

Ram: “That’s why Ram has a little… hope for you, Barusu.”

Rem: “—? Nee-sama, just now, did you say something?”

Ram: “No, it’s nothing.”

Upon hearing her sister’s mutterings, Rem, with a furrowed brow, asked her a question, but Ram simply shook her head to dismiss it. Then, taking her sister’s hand, she led her towards the stairs leading downstairs, and as they set foot on the first step,

Ram: “Well then, today is another busy day for everyone except for Ram.”

And so, she pompously declared that she would skimp on her work.

Continued in Volume Two of Re: Starting Life in Another World from Zero

Visual Complete Vol. 3: Rem (LQ AI Translation)

Rem

At the mansion where Subaru, who had sustained an honorable wound, was carried in, she is the younger of the twin maids who single-handedly takes on all general chores. She is the one in charge of the politely insolent, sharp tongue. It is no exaggeration to say that the mansion's functions are maintained entirely thanks to her competence.

Her gaze is gentle, she teases kindly, and she hardly ever shows even her business smile to anyone other than the older sister she reveres.

She wakes her sister, gets her dressed, tends to her hair, nails, and skin, and feels happiness in the environment where she can work together with her sister. Her recent worries are the noisiness of the new servant, and the fact that her breasts have started to grow so that her clothing size no longer matches her sister's.

COMMENT

For Ram, she is the cutest little sister in the world, Ram's precious other half. Naturally, is that not so?

She is the other half who was born as Ram's twin, she adores Ram more than anything, and ever since she was small she would trail after her saying, "Onee-chan, Onee-chan"… there is no way Ram would not dote on someone like that.

However, Ram was the only one that child could open her heart to and interact with like that.

She has been shy around others since she was small… and that personality has not changed very much even now.

I have no intention of shifting responsibility by saying that those around her were at fault.

Neither their parents nor the rest of the clan meant any harm, and Rem herself probably does not think of it that way either.

That is why Ram ought to have noticed both that that child was suffering, and that the people around her were doing that to her without any malice.

—If the current Ram is the result of continuously overlooking that, then that is probably her punishment.

It is not as though Ram wishes to offer some confession.

Let us get back to the point. That child who, when she was little, used to call Ram “Onee-chan” like that, before Ram knew it started addressing her as “Nee-sama,” and she stopped hiding behind Ram’s back…

Rem is surely trying to act as Ram’s replacement.

If she were doing it to satisfy her own pride, that would be fine, but she is surely only being driven on by her guilt.

I wonder hen will Rem finally be able to realize it.

That she has long since outstripped the back she used to hide behind.

That Ram has already decided on the path she will walk as Ram, so Rem is free to do as she likes as well.

If Ram is the one who tells her this, that child will only think of it as mere consolation.

So there is no meaning in having Ram be the one to tell her.

Unless someone, someone that child can think of as precious, says it to her, it will be meaningless.

—I wonder if someday little sister who is the most precious in Ram's world will be able to obtain that.

On her younger sister, the elder lets this slip with a serene expression

From "The Sound of Chains"

Unable to resist the sudden urge that welled up, Subaru opened his mouth wide and let out a yawn.

He roughly wiped away the drowsiness that had collected as tears at the corners of his eyes with his sleeve, then stretched his back with a sharp motion. The evening sky was dyed orange as a parting gift from the setting sun, and the flowing clouds seemed to be gently praising the end of the day.

Seeing the clouds off, Subaru rolled his arms, legs, and neck to check how his body was doing. The effects of the hard labor were still there, but he did not feel as exhausted as he had on the first night.

Subaru: "It's not like my body's gotten any stronger, so I guess I've learned to move it in a way that makes me tire out a bit less."

It was probably not his body getting used to it, but rather his getting used to the work and improving his efficiency that had led to his fatigue lessening.

Since Return by Death did not lead to any strengthening of his body, getting accustomed to the experience he gained was an essential element.

Rem: "Subaru-kun, sorry to have kept you waiting.—Are you all right?"

Subaru: “Mm. Yeah, I’m fine, I’m fine. Rem-rin, you done with the shopping too?”

Rem: “Yes, without any problems. Subaru-kun was very popular, was he not.”

Carrying a tote bag with their purchases in it and offering words of appreciation to Subaru was the blue-haired girl—Rem.

Rem, looking good in her maid outfit, held down her hair as it fluttered in the wind and, with a faintly softened expression, looked at Subaru. At Subaru, whose butler outfit had been dirtied by mud and dust, and then snot and tears on top of that.

Subaru: “For some reason I’ve always been the type that little brats really take a shine to, y’know. I guess it’s that uncontrollable motherly something inside me that just irresistibly draws in their inner child or whatever.”

Rem: “Children, like animals, rank people by their character. They instinctively know whether someone is an opponent they are allowed to make light of.”

Subaru: “That’s not a compliment, right?”

At Rem’s biting comment, he found himself convinced that in that respect she really was Ram’s sister.

Blunt Ram and roundabout Rem. Dealing with the two of them required mental toughness. Of course, if he was not tough physically as well, the work itself would never get done in the first place.

At present, Subaru and Rem were in a settlement named Arlam, the village closest to the mansion.

Roswaal, who despite appearances held the position of Margrave, was a proper noble who owned several tracts of land as his domain. Arlam Village, right next to the mansion, was no exception, and the residents, upon recognizing Subaru and the others as a matter of course, would call out to them in a friendly manner.

The twin maids, who often had opportunities for contact with them on shopping trips and the like, were of course well known, and even Subaru seemed to have his existence at least widely recognized. Surprised at the speed with which rumors spread in the countryside, he nevertheless felt embarrassed yet happy to be so warmly welcomed.

Subaru: “That said, what is with how overly friendly those brats are…? Do they just not get the kind of hard-boiled aura I’ve got going on here, where if you touch it carelessly you’re liable to get burned?”

Rem: “First you talk about your motherly side, then you try to act like an adult; Subaru-kun is very busy all on his own, is he not.”

Subaru: “I kinda feel a prickly edge to that “all on your own” part, but honestly, when I was busy I think things were actually more peaceful because nobody bothered me. I should’ve just tagged along on your shopping from the start, Rem-rin.”

Since Subaru was useless, unable even to tell different ingredients apart, he had been entrusted with killing time in the village while Rem did the shopping. During that opening, the children had discovered him and effectively abducted him.

Subaru: “They just don’t have enough respect, that’s the problem. That’s why I can’t bring myself to like little brats.”

Rem: “Did Subaru-kun properly show the children anything that would be worth respecting?”

Subaru: “Can’t argue with that flawless logic! Still, I kinda feel like getting treated like a pushover right from the start isn’t quite right either… Ram would probably handle that sort of thing way better.”

Rem: “Nee-sama is wonderful.”

The conversation was slightly talking past each other. Seeing the way Rem boasted about her sister, her nose practically in the air, and yet with no hint of any hidden sarcasm in her attitude, Subaru guessed that this was her honest opinion.

Subaru: “Honestly, with Ram’s personality, it feels like she’d be causing friction pretty often, though.”

Rem: “Nee-sama’s fearlessness is one of her charms as well. It would be far too impossible for Rem.”

The words she added sounded somehow forlorn, and Subaru furrowed his brows but could not press the issue.

Rem: “Come to think of it, how is Subaru-kun’s studying coming along?”

With Subaru suddenly at a loss for words, Rem changed the topic as if to shake it off.

Subaru: “I wanna say “steadily”… but it’s not going quite that smoothly. Just like with anything, you gotta take your time and let it grow nice and slow. Same as love!”

Rem: “It would be nice if it did not wither partway through.”

Subaru: “The love in that comment just now from you, Rem-rin, is already totally withered!”

He shouted, and when he saw a faint smile appear on Rem’s face, Subaru also smiled in relief.

—It had already been four days since Ram had proposed private lessons at night. The idea had been that they would take turns being responsible for Subaru’s education, but Rem’s turn as instructor had still not come around.

This simply meant that Rem had been that busy, but for Rem herself, it seemed to have become something she felt guilty about instead.

At Rem, who was showing the rare sign of hesitating, Subaru waved his hand while keeping his smile.

Subaru: “Don’t worry about it. It’s not like I’m being neglected or anything, and I’ve got no complaints about Ram either. Well, I would like her to stop just casually climbing into bed and falling asleep right in the middle of teaching me, because that really kills my motivation.”

Rem: “Nee-sama is only behaving that way on purpose, to stir up Subaru-kun’s motivation.”

Subaru: “What’s with that absolute worship of your sister, that’s on a whole other level. She’s seriously oni-believable.”

Rem: “Oni… believable…?”

Rem tilted her head at the coined word, which had lately been one of Subaru’s personal buzzwords.

Subaru: “It’s the Oni version of “godly,” y’know. Oni-believable—pretty catchy, right?”

Rem: “You like Oni?”

Subaru: “Maybe I like them more than gods. I mean, the gods basically never do anything for you, but I heard that if you talk about your future plans with an Oni, they’ll laugh along with you.”

Apparently they especially got fired up when you talked about the next year. As Subaru pictured himself throwing his arm around a red Oni and a blue Oni and roaring with laughter together, he suddenly noticed that a definite smile had etched itself onto Rem’s face.

Subaru: “Oh…”

He had seen her give the occasional small smile before, but this was the first time she had shown him a proper smile like this. He did not know what had unbound Rem’s heart, but Subaru snapped his fingers and said,

Subaru: “That smile of yours could rival a million volts of night scenery.”

Rem: “I’ll tell Lady Emilia.”

Subaru: “That wasn’t me hitting on you, okay?!”

Straightening his posture, Subaru solemnly begged for forgiveness. Then Rem slightly raised her brows at the sight of him.

Rem: “What happened to that hand?”

Subaru: “Hm? Oh, I got super chomped on by the mutt those brats were leading around.”

His left hand, with a clear bite mark imprinted on it, had stopped bleeding, but a little blood was still seeping out. Incidentally, the back of his butler outfit was stained with snot, but he would not notice that until after he returned to the mansion.

Rem: “Shall I heal the wound?”

Subaru: “Eh? Wait, Rem-rin, you can use recovery magic and stuff too?”

Rem: “Only simple things, but enough for first aid. Would you prefer Lady Emilia instead?”

Subaru: “Mm, that’s a very tempting offer I can’t really turn down. But… I’ll pass on both.”

Looking at the marks left by the canine teeth on the back of his left hand, Subaru refused the offer.

For one thing, he judged the wound to be a perfect marker. What had made Subaru aware of the start of this loop had largely been the disappearance of the wounds he had obtained up to the previous loops.

Whether he had wounds or not served as an effective basis for judging Return by Death. Had he not happened to be bitten by a dog, he would have had to resort to self-injury with some convenient blade or feather pen.

Subaru: “Well, you could call it an honorable wound. Nobody gets to go on living their whole life in the same pristine state they were born in.”

Rem: “They say scars are a man’s badge of honor. In reality, it just means he slipped up on the battlefield, though."

Subaru: "That might be one side of the truth, but could you not make it sound so dry?!"

Rem was casually sharp-tongued, but seeing the way she tilted her head, she apparently had no awareness of it. That was scary in its own way.

Subaru: "Even so, I feel like there've been plenty of times before when I cut my hand and stuff right in front of you, Rem-rin, so how come you suddenly offered to heal it just now? Or rather, why didn't you ever offer up till now?"

Rem: "If it does not hurt, you do not remember it, and I think it is better for the warning to remain."

Subaru: "That's some casually Spartan educational policy there… So, what was the reason for the offer just now?"

Putting aside why it had been overlooked until now, he wanted to know why she had not overlooked it this time.

At Subaru's question, Rem kept silent for a while.

Looking at her profile as she clammed up, Subaru wondered if it had something to do with that smile from earlier.

Therefore,

Subaru: "The scarecrow was outstanding in his field. The calendar's days were numbered. Who's the one spouting all these lame puns?!"

Rem: "Did you suddenly lose your mind?"

Subaru: "You're jumping to conclusions way too fast. That's not it, I was just trying to check the reason behind that smile of yours earlier, Rem-rin."

He had thought she seemed to react to "oni-believable," so he had wondered if maybe that was it.

Subaru: “Thought there might be grounds for suspecting you’re secretly a top-class dad-joke lover. And then you’d get in a good mood over it and start being nicer to me, y’know.”

Rem: “Please assume that Rem will never again have an opportunity to heal Subaru-kun’s wounds.”

Subaru: “You’re that mad about it?!”

Rem: “The last time Rem was this angry was when Subaru-kun secretly spoke ill of nee-sama.”

Subaru: “That was actually pretty recent and happens pretty often!”

Because of that unnecessary extra remark, the sharpness in Rem’s gaze at Subaru increased.

Trembling, Subaru gave up on defending himself, closed his mouth, and looked up at the sky. Beyond the evening gloom, night was slowly approaching. At that fact, he felt his hands and feet stiffen with tension.

—After all, today marked exactly the fourth day in this second world as well.

Subaru: “The real game is whether I can make it safely to tomorrow morning.—But before that,”

Whether he would be able to make a date promise with Emilia in the first place was also an important battle.

Excerpt from “Re:Zero -Starting Life in Another World- Volume Two”

COMMENT

What kind of understanding do you have of the existence known as spirits, I wonder?

Most people treat spirits with reverence as supernatural beings.

As for my own personal view, I have no doubt that they are natural beings.

A being in which the Mana filling the air transforms, and with that Mana as its core, Od and self-awareness sprout—

If I were to line it up in needlessly complicated terms, that is what a spirit is.

That said, a spirit that has just been born has almost no firm sense of self or power to interfere with its surroundings.

Those kinds of power and awareness bloom over the years, as it stores up Mana in its core and thickens its Od.

Since Mana is something that exists anywhere so long as it is within the air, spirits are, in principle, removed from death simply by existing…

When you think about it like that, don't you find them to be quite fascinating, and hard-to-come-by beings?

I've let the preface run long, haven't I. It's a bad habit of mine… but it was a necessary explanation as well.

As I just said, spirits are natural beings, and their birth has to rely on accidental miracles.

Of course, since spirits, which have little need to worry about perishing, only ever increase in number, even if their birth is rare, their total count is something you could call innumerable all across the world. Most of them are lesser spirits, poor in self-awareness and power, though.

An individual with power—for a being that can truly be called a spirit to come into its own is that difficult a thing.

But you know… don't you think that giving up just because you can't rely on accidental, natural occurrences is far too timid a way of thinking?

As I explained a moment ago, the existence of a spirit is a transformed Mana as its core—made into Od, and by having that absorb Mana, it sustains its own life.

If the definition of a “spirit” is fulfilled by meeting these conditions…

then might it not be possible to artificially alter Mana and create life with it as the core?

There was quite a bit of trial and error involved, you know. Under the very first set of conditions, I couldn’t accomplish this. But I managed to find a way to relax the conditions somewhat, and thanks to that, you could say this attempt succeeded.

There are only three successful examples. As for where those successes are now, and what they are doing —ah, now that is a very, very fascinating story.

A Witch’s Lecture

Beatrice

A young girl who serves as the librarian of the Forbidden Library, the room hidden within Roswaal Manor by means of “Door Crossing.”

Her adorable looks and gorgeous dress give those who see her the impression of a fairy.

However, she is fundamentally sullen, arrogant, and a misanthrope. She adores Puck, a spirit, and calls him “Nii-cha.”

Ever since their first meeting, she and Subaru have had the worst possible impression of each other, and yet they somehow get along, making for an unfortunate relationship. She usually shuts herself away in the Forbidden Library and sits alone on a stepstool in the room, as if waiting for someone.

Roswaal

A noble of the Kingdom of Lugunica, and a powerful man holding the position of Margrave.

One of the foremost magic users in the Kingdom, he is also known in the Royal Castle as the Head Magician of the Court.

A peculiar man who ruins those grand titles and his overflowing talent with eccentric behavior, strange remarks, and clownish makeup.

An oddball who likes to paint his face white, put on a clown's makeup, and stir things up with words and deeds that make fun of others.

Just what kind of relationship could Emilia possibly have with this man, whose given nickname is the Demi-Human Lover.

COMMENT

Hah? Makes my guts churn. Don't ya go carelessly tossin' that bastard's name around in front of my amazin' self.

Granny 'n the rest keep runnin' their mouths 'bout how he's some guy we owe a huge debt to…

As if that bastard's the type ta help people out without some kinda scheme or payback in mind.

…Sure, it ain't wrong that our amazin' selves are relyin' on that bastard's strength for how we live.

We're not clueless 'bout bein' under his protection, either. I can see he’s movin’ so trouble doesn’t spill over onto us.

But listen up! Bein’ grateful for that kinda stuff, and actually likin’ what kinda person he is, are totally different damn stories!

The only reason that bastard hasn’t asked our amazin’ selves for anythin’ yet is ‘cause it ain’t “that time” yet.

To begin with, if he really were some desireless bastard, there’s no way he’d be snaggin’ himself titles like Margrave or Head Magician of the Court…

…snatchin’ up those fancy titles one after another, takin’ the whole lot for himself, no way in hell that’s happenin’ if he’s really got no desires.

And ya can see clear as day that if ya grilled the man himself on it, he’d just dodge ‘n weave with some slippery answer.

Seriously… I’ve got no damn clue what part of a bastard like that Ram even likes…

Every last one of ’em’s missin’ any real sense of danger, ya know.

At this rate, our amazin’ selves are gonna get dragged into some huge mess someday.

What that bastard’s calmly gettin’ ready for is that kinda problem, and Granny ‘n the others don’t get that at all.

That’s why my amazin’ self’s the only one who can move.

No matter what impossible demands that bastard brings, my amazin’ self’s gonna have ta brute-force every last one of ‘em.

Sharpen my claws ‘n fangs, and have my amazin’ self face that bastard head-on—that's the only way.

…Under that clown makeup, I've never once seen that bastard's eyes really smilin'.

How're ya supposed ta truly trust a bastard who's never once shown a real smile.

It's like they say, "Balincron's bonds are in smiles where ya can see yer teeth," right.

Hah? Oi, quit messin' with me!

The fact my amazin' self hates that bastard Roswaal's got nothin' ta do with Ram!!

《Testimony about Roswaal from a person with a nasty glare and worse attitude》

Glossary

☆ Nii-cha

Beatrice: "Nii-cha, you are wonderful… Nii-cha's fluffy fur always seizes Betty's heart and never lets go, I suppose. Such sinful fuzziness, in fact…"

Puck: "Hehe, my fur never goes a day without being brushed by Lia's own hands, you know. Whenever I appear in front of people, I want to be the best me I can be—that's what this is a sign of, nya."

Beatrice: "Nii-cha really is just too amazing, I suppose… Betty is completely lovestruck, in fact."

Puck: "Honestly, Betty is such a spoiled little girl that there is just no helping her.”

Subaru: “Who the hell is this even for, with all this flirting right from the opening?! This is supposed to be the start of the second half of the glossary, you know?!”

☆ Half-Elf

Subaru: “A mix of Elf and human blood… that’s what it means, right? I was thinking, but do there even exist half-breeds between Elves and races other than humans?”

Emilia: “Mm, well… I wonder. I don’t really know, but normally when you say “half,” you mean a child born between a human and an Elf. And even those, there are almost none of.”

Subaru: “From the circumstances, I kinda get the feeling there’s probably a lot of complicated stuff involved though.”

Emilia: “We’re not thought of very well. That’s why people who treat me the way you do, Subaru, are reaaally precious to me… Yeah, it saves me.”

Subaru: “If my ignorance is actually useful off-screen, then that’s more than enough for me.”

☆ Bowel Hunter

Subaru: “…Do we really have to dig this topic that deep?”

Elsa: “You don’t particularly have to worry about it. It’s not like I expect to be understood, or even want to be.”

Subaru: “Right now, it’s the title of the person who’s sitting proudly at number one in my personal kill count. Even speaking on a meta level, just hearing it makes the belly she sliced open feel like it’s aching again.”

Elsa: “Since I’d very much like to have another chance to peek at your bowels someday, do take good care of your stomach, won’t you.”

Subaru: “This is the first time in my life anyone’s shown me “concern” that does absolutely nothing to get my heart going.”

☆ Hikikomori

Subaru: “It is the term for warriors who sacrifice their own future and keep fighting to protect the peace of the family who come home tired day and night. The only comfort their hearts get is the time they spend with the lover waiting for them on the other side of the screen.”

Emilia: “That sounds like a reaaally tough job… Subaru, are you a hikikomori too?”

Subaru: “Geh.”

Emilia: “—? Huh? Did I say something wrong?”

☆ Magic Ore

Subaru: “Stones that store mana and have a bit of magic-ish power imbued in them… right. I heard they get used here and there for things like heating bathwater or in kitchen appliances.”

Ram: “They are something closely tied to the very foundation of everyday life. Magic ore itself is a pure, colorless lump of mana, but by giving it direction from the outside, you can make it serve all sorts of roles. There are many situations where it sees heavy use, like the magic lamps that light up the royal capital at night. It is just that…”

Subaru: “That kind of wide deployment has not spread all the way out to the countryside or every last corner of the kingdom yet, even if it has in the royal capital and other big cities, huh. Well, I never saw that sort of thing even in the slums, so it is easy enough to imagine there being that kind of dilemma.”

Reinhard: “It is frustrating—that is all I can say, and that is what pains me. I am always thinking that I wish I could do more, devote more of my strength, for the common people. —I even find myself resenting how lacking I am.”

☆ Witchbeast

Subaru: “Ah, so they really do exist. Creatures that get treated like that… basically, monstery things.”

Roswaal: “I do not quiiite get what you mean by “monster,” buuut the common understanding is that witchbeasts are artificial lifeforms whose instincts are set to harm humankind~.”

Subaru: “Artificial lifeforms… so this world actually has the tech to make living creatures?!”

Roswaal: “Maaaybe that was a baaadd choice of words. Artificial or not, they were not created by humans. Witchbeasts were born from the Witch herself. Lifeforms brought forth by the Witch’s hand, made to harm humankind, are what we call witchbeasts. Their appearance is close to that of existing animals, buuut every witchbeast has a horn growing from it, so they are easy to recognize. With a few exceptions, tha~t is.”

Subaru: “The Witch… huh, the Witch. And you are not gonna give me a detailed explanation, anyway, right?”

Roswaal: “Now, is that not the sort of thing we should sa~ve for the next glossary entry?”

☆ Witch

Subaru: “Last time, I really got chewed out over that whole “Witch of Envy” thing, though.”

Puck: “If I had to put it into words, witches are more like humanity’s external enemies, the kind that go down in history, I guess. Generally, when people say “the Witch,” they mean the Witch of Envy, but for someone like me who knows the world as it used to be, there were six other witches as well. As for whether I knew them… well, it is more like I did not, really.”

Subaru: “I sorta read the Witch of Envy’s story in a loose, fairy-tale kind of way too. She is like the shared image of “scary things” in this world, yeah? Seems like people are still pretty damn afraid of her even now.”

Puck: “That is because she has not been completely destroyed. Even now, the Witch of Envy is sealed away in a shrine near the great waterfall to the east of Lugunica. So the time when everyone can truly sleep in peace is still a long way off.”

Subaru: “That’s one… crazy long-lived witch, I gotta say.”

☆ Witch Cult

Subaru: “That is the word that came tagged onto a baseless false accusation. As for what it means… I can sorta guess.”

Rem: “Is that so? Then please, try saying it.”

Subaru: “You people have been badmouthing witches and witchbeasts to me nonstop up to this point. So the Witch Cult is a group that worships that witch or whatever, right. Just from how over the top your reaction was, Rem, I can tell they are a nasty bunch everyone knows about.”

Rem: “For you to understand that much… then as I thought, Subaru-kun, you are also connected to them…”

Subaru: “Any way this conversation goes that ends with that conclusion is a BAD END, so we are not doing that! It is a conclusion anyone could come to!”

☆ Mana

Subaru: “It is that stock name you always hear in games and stuff for some invisible, mysterious particles.”

Beatrice: “I have no idea what you are suddenly talking about, but Betty will just ignore it and move on, I suppose. Mana is, so to speak, the raw magical power mixed into the air… that is what it is, in fact. It is indispensable for using magic, for spirits to maintain their existence, and for living beings to lead their lives, I suppose.”

Subaru: “I kinda get that spirits need mana, but do humans and so on also, like, die without it?”

Beatrice: “If food and sleep are the sources of power needed to maintain the body, then mana is the source of power needed to satisfy the soul, I suppose. If either one runs dry, life cannot be maintained, in fact. That said, it is not as if mana gets lost to the extent that a single human wastes away and dies all that often, you know.”

Subaru: “I just felt a death flag go up super hard right now!”

☆ Magic

Subaru: “At last, we’ve got actual fantasy! You really can’t do without this, y’know!”

Rem: “It is fine for you to be so very excited about it, but Subaru-kun does not have any talent for being a magic user. Precisely because you cannot reach it, it might be something you long for, something a little painful, though.”

Ram: “You take the mana that fills the atmosphere into your body through the Gate. Then, by means of a chant, you give the mana you have taken in change and direction, and release it outside again through the Gate to activate it—that is about the extent of the principles of magic in this world.”

Subaru: “There are six attributes in all: fire, water, wind, earth, Yin, and Yang, right. No matter what kind of effect a spell has, basically it can be broadly divided into one of those six, or so I heard.”

Rem: “Rem is water, Nee-sama is wind. Just as Subaru-kun is Yin, the attribute each person excels at changes from person to person. When it comes to someone like Lord Roswaal, he possesses the highest aptitude for all of the attributes. Lady Emilia is fire, but the conditions are a little different for spirit users.”

Ram: “And that was a simple explanation of magic that even Barusu and a dog could understand.”

Subaru: “Do you sisters have some kind of disease where you will die if you do not use me as the punchline?”

☆ Meteor

Subaru: “Who’d have thought we’d get a triple bombardment of magic-related topics! Last up, we have Meteor.”

Felt: “That thing you used in your negotiations with me, with the pitch that it’d sell for a stupidly high price, right. Going by what Old Man Rom said, it’s crazy rare or something.”

Rom: “In practice, talent and training on the part of the person are what matter for magic. Precisely because they ignore that whole area yet can produce effects similar to magic, Meteors are highly valued. It is even said that, aside from the ones whose method of manufacture is known, creating new ones is impossible.”

Subaru: “So in this world’s setting, they’re treated like ancient weapons… or something like that. The kind of super rare thing that sometimes gets dug up in ruins, I guess.”

Rom: “It is true that most Meteors are found as excavated relics. Apparently, the original meaning of “Meteor” is something like “a gift that comes falling out of nowhere.” Owing to how useful and how rare they are, the reality is that they fetch a high price wherever they are traded.”

Felt: “Well, whatever the story behind ‘em is, the fact they sell for a lot is more than enough for me. I just wanna somehow sniff out another one and have it warm up my wallet.”

Subaru: “What a brat with no sense of romance…”

☆ Appa

Subaru: “The fruit of wisdom that Adam and Eve bit into, which became the cause of their expulsion from paradise. It gave the two of them, who had known nothing, the ability to think, and incurred God’s displeasure… That proof of sin is the apple. This is the name of a fruit that closely resembles it. Come to think of it, I still haven’t achieved my goal of getting my hands on one of these.”

Kadomon: “You sure yap on and on, don’t you, kid. If you’re not buying, then hurry up and get lost.”

Subaru: “Yeah, yeah. …Next time, I’ll definitely buy an appa from you, old man.”

☆ Loop

Subaru: “I use this as a blanket term for the time regression surrounding my situation, including Return by Death.”

Emilia: “We still do not know why you can go back in time, do we.”

Subaru: “For now, the only thing we have figured out is the conditions for a loop to occur. Who is doing it, what their objective is, what they want me to do… all of that is still completely missing.”

Emilia: “Just hearing that you can come back even if you die, it sounds like a good thing, but…”

Subaru: “The pain still hurts just as much, and the memories from that time only remain inside me, and dying itself comes with a pretty huge sense of loss… but, well, it’s not all bad.”

Emilia: “…Subaru.”

Subaru: “There are times when, rather than being given some half-baked power, the possibility of maybe being able to take back something irreversible is the more precious thing. I am sure what I have is that kind of power.”

Emilia: “Yeah… I can’t say this in the main story, but I reaaally rely on you.”

Subaru: “Yeah, lean on me. —Even if you forget, I won’t forget that.”

Re:Zero Interlude 3

1

Before the morning sun could peek out from between the mountains, right around when the little birds began to chirp, that girl shrugged off her nightclothes and wrapped her bare white skin up in a maid outfit with plenty of exposure.

She was a girl with short blue hair and pale-blue eyes that carried a gentle radiance. Her features still retained a youth that made cuteness come before beauty, and in contrast to that face, the server's uniform that bared so much of her skin gave rise to a sinful allure.

She carefully folded her nightclothes and set them on the bed, smoothed out the wrinkles in the uniform she had put on, then placed a white prim headdress atop her head and adorned her blue hair with a blue-violet ribbon. When she stretched her white socks tight up to mid-thigh and straightened her back, the result was the girl called Rem, head of the staff of the Roswaal Manor.

Rem: "Mm… All set. Perfectly prepared."

She reflected her outfit in the full-length mirror, meticulously checking to make sure there was nothing unsightly. Up until now as well, Rem had paid attention to her appearance so as not to bring shame upon her master, Roswaal, but since the other day, she had begun to be especially concerned about that area.

Rem herself understood the cause very clearly.—It was for the sake of one boy.

Rem: "…Rem absolutely cannot let Subaru-kun see the soft, mushy face she has right now."

Just picturing the black-haired boy in her mind, and then seeing in the mirror a face of hers she had never seen before, Rem faintly colored her cheeks and averted her gaze.

The magic stone above the door indicated that there was still plenty of time before work began, but taking into account that she was already awake and her thoughts were so relaxed right now and such, Rem turned her steps toward the outside of the room.

Rem: "Because Rem has to do something about this face before going to wake Nee-sama."

Leaving that excuse behind in the room even though no one was there to hear it, Rem left her own room.

2

Over these past few days, there had been a witchbeast disturbance that had tormented the Roswaal Manor and the nearest part of its domain, Arlam Village.

Roughly a week had passed since that incident was resolved, and both the village and the mansion had already regained their usual everyday routine.

In the absence of their master, the wounds that Rem, who had been running all over to resolve the incident, and her older sister Ram had sustained were already healed, and there were no physical issues that would interfere with their daily work.

Only, if there was a problem, it would be an issue not of the body but of the mind.

Rem: “Nee-sama, it is morning. Please wake up, Nee-sama.”

Shaking the shoulder of her identical older sister, Ram, who was curled up in bed, Rem kept calling out to her.

It was part of the daily routine for Rem, who always woke up first, to come and wake Ram before their work hours began.

And it was also routine for Ram, eyes half-open at the sound of that call, to stubbornly mutter something like, “Five more minutes…”.

Rem: “That will not do, Nee-sama, please wake up. If our preparations are not finished before work begins, Subaru-kun will get up. Letting them be slower than Subaru-kun’s preparations, when he has only just recovered from being ill, would be unthinkable. Are you trying to make Subaru-kun overexert himself, Nee-sama?”

Ram: “Lately, Rem has been paying more attention to Barusu than to Ram, and Ram does not like that, so Ram is not getting up.”

Rem: “Nee-sama, do not say things like that… But if you did, then today Rem could work alone with Subaru-kun… Nee-sama, please, take your time and res…”

Ram: “Ram is going to get up after all. Now then, Rem, help Ram get changed.”

At the sight of Ram snapping her upper body upright and throwing her hands up right there as she demanded to be changed, Rem let a small smile slip.

Then, moving around behind her impatient older sister,

Rem: “Rem is glad you got up, Nee-sama, but let us comb your hair before getting you changed. Nee-sama, your bedhead is especially bad today.”

Ram: “Lately, Rem has not been coming to sleep next to Ram, so Ram has been having bad dreams. That is the reason, obviously.”

Rem: “The only time Rem slept next to Nee-sama like that was back when we first came under Master Roswaal’s care.”

As those nostalgic memories resurfaced, Rem ran the comb she had taken out through Ram’s short, pink hair.

It had exactly the same texture as her own, and she had been tending to it like this for over six years now, had she not?

Then, suddenly realizing that, if not for the color of her hair, her sister’s back looked exactly like her own, Rem murmured quietly,

Rem: “Should Rem try growing her hair out…?”

—The reason Rem kept her hair short was none other than because she had wanted to have the same hairstyle as her sister.

She had thought that if she matched her sister’s hairstyle, her clothes, and, on top of their identical looks, even those little details, she might be able to draw at least a little closer to that sister she could never reach.

But now, she was starting to think that it might be all right to change that somewhat childish way of thinking just a little.

Rem: “Nee-sama, if Rem were to grow out her hair, would it not seem strange?”

Ram: “…Are you asking whether Ram would think it is strange? Or are you asking whether someone else would not think it strange? Ram’s answer changes depending on that.”

Rem: “Would Subaru-kun think it… strange…?”

When she timidly voiced the source of her unease, Ram, whose hair was being combed, let out an exaggerated sigh.

Dropping her shoulders, Ram left her hair in the hands of her anxious-looking little sister and said,

Ram: “Did Barusu say something to you or something?”

Rem: “No, that is not it. It is just… um, Subaru-kun seems to have feelings for Emilia-sama… so…”

Ram: “Emilia-sama does have long, beautiful hair. So, you are trying to get even a little closer to Barusu’s tastes… I see. How admirable of you, Rem. You are so admirable it makes Ram want to tear Barusu apart.”

Ram’s tone growing harsher stirred both anxiety and relief in Rem at the same time: the joy of being worried over by her sister, and the anxiety that perhaps her sister and Subaru did not get along.

Rem: “Nee-sama, do you dislike Subaru-kun?”

Ram: “Not disliking him and refusing to recognize him as Ram’s little sister’s sweetheart are separate issues.”

At Ram’s curtly cutting words, Rem could not help widening her eyes.

For, in other words, what Ram had just said could only mean that she did not hate Subaru.

Rem: “Nee-sama, thank you very much.”

Ram: “This is not a situation where Rem should be thanking Ram.

Rem reacting like that only gives Ram more reason to pile up complaints against Barusu."

Ram kept grumbling and complaining, but at her core she must have been acknowledging Subaru as well.

Feeling happy to be worried over by her older sister, who had trouble being honest, Rem continued slowly running the comb through Ram's pink hair.

3

After changing Ram into a matching maid outfit and stepping out of the room, the two of them split up to deal with the miscellaneous chores around the mansion in time for the start of their shift.

By the time Rem, who went around each room opening the windows and airing them out, finished making a full circuit of the building, Ram, who had been getting the cleaning tools ready, would arrive so they could begin cleaning—such was the routine.

Ram: "Well then, shall we go wake Barusu soon?"

Rem: "Yes, that's right, Nee-sama. Oh, right. Since Nee-sama is bringing the cleaning tools and must be tired, Rem will go by herself. Let's do that."

At Rem, who clapped her hands and let her eyes sparkle as if she had just had a brilliant idea, Ram let out a small sigh and sent her off.

With a mood that made it feel like she might start skipping at any moment and with steps that seemed to glide along the floor, Rem made her way to the front of Subaru's room, and with a knock so faint it felt like it might disappear altogether, she tapped on the door.

Rem: "Rem has knocked. Excuse me."

Saying that, making sure at least to put up that one preemptive excuse, she slipped into the room without a sound, like a shadow.

At the back of the room, in the bed, there slept a boy breathing quietly—Subaru.

Unaware of Rem's intrusion and still deep in his dreams, Subaru was, contrary to the noisiness he showed when awake, unexpectedly neat in his sleeping posture and quiet in his breathing.

Even his sleeping face, when those sharp, sanpaku eyes of his were closed and entrusted to slumber, seemed, to her, to look his age or even younger.

Rem: "…"

Realizing she was wordlessly staring, entranced, at that sleeping face, Rem's cheeks flushed at her own shamelessness.

That she was an Oni whose heart could be swayed this much by such flighty emotions—she had never imagined it.

From before, Rem had never truly been able to agree in her heart with how her older sister Ram was so deeply intoxicated with Roswaal that she would gladly offer up both body and soul to him.

There was a difference between the feeling of gratitude Rem held toward Roswaal and the feeling of yearning Ram held toward him, but Rem had been unable to understand that large difference, and had thought she would never be able to feel for someone the way her sister did.

However, now that she had come this far, the existence of Natsuki Subaru had grown far too large inside her.

The feelings with which her sister adored Roswaal that much—Rem could now clearly understand them as they were.

And she also understood that such ardor was something that could be this impossible to put the brakes on.

Rem: "Is it really all right to be this defenseless in front of Rem, Subaru-kun…?"

Bringing her face close to the sleeping Subaru, Rem whispered that at a distance where her breath might reach him.

Those lips, moving as he breathed, would be within reach if she only leaned in a little more.

Even though she knew that the one he held in his heart was someone other than herself, the fact that she could still think such things made her feel terribly base.

Rem: “…This will not do. At this rate, Rem feels she won’t be able to hold back. Quickly—”

It was just when she thought she would wake Subaru up and shake off these wicked thoughts.

Suddenly, an arm伸ed out and went around Rem’s upper body, and with her body going rigid in surprise, a man’s arm strength abruptly pulled her close.

Rem: “—!”

With her head gathered in and held to him, Rem was drawn into Subaru’s chest. Her mind went into a panic, and her heart pounded so wildly it felt like it might explode.

Not knowing what had just happened because of this sudden action, Rem, her face still pressed to Subaru’s chest, looked up.

Subaru: “Munya…”

With a troublesome sleeping habit, Subaru’s expression loosened as he gained a hugging pillow, his sleeping face relaxing in contentment.

On one hand, she felt relieved that this had not been something Subaru had done while awake, but on the other, she could not help feeling disappointed.

So, as a sort of compensation for the nuisance, she decided to fully savor his body heat and scent with her whole body.

Rem: “Rem came to wake you up, but has ended up being pinned down. Like this, there is no way to wake you. So, regrettably, Rem will continue to resist like this until Subaru-kun wakes up.”

Leaving behind those words, which were only a pretense, Rem rubbed her nose and forehead against Subaru’s chest and continued to luxuriate in the warmth and feel of it.

Once in a while, a morning like this was all right, too.

—Until Ram, who had come to call for the Rem who was not returning, visited the room, and, seeing her little sister’s figure dragged into the bed, raised her staff and stirred up the wind—until Subaru’s scream echoed through the dawn sky, that embrace continued on and on for a very, very long time.

To be Continued in Volume Four of Re: Starting Life in Another World from Zero.

Red Snowfall on the Orcos Domain (Edited Machine Translation)

1

…As far as the eye could see, the land was engulfed by white snow falling from the heavens.

???: "…"

Thick clouds of snow obscured the light, and the snowfield was covered in darkness despite it being midday.

The snow that had been falling since last night showed no signs of letting up, the delicate ice crystals concealing everything beneath them. There were countless footprints that clung to the snowfield, scattered swords and shields here and there… and also the corpses, bathed in red blood, lacking their hands and legs.

???: "…"

The expressions of the corpses were filled with anguish, proof they struggled for life until the end. However, the icy wind that blew over them drowned out their despair, and their lamentations failed to reach anyone's ears.

…Except for one person. Only one person was standing amongst the corpses lying on the snowfield.

Woman: "… Nothing has changed here, has it?"

Whispering there was a black-dressed woman, standing in the middle of the blizzard.

Her long, lustrous, braided black hair swayed in the cold wind, and her black eyes, rare to this world, gazed over the field. Those dark, slightly euphoric eyes were drenched in excitement.

In her vision lay countless corpses that would never move again.

Despite the scene, so horrific that any ordinary person would turn away, the aura of the woman seemed all the more radiant.

If every flower had its own most alluring arrangement, then it was in this very scenery, brimming with the aroma of death and blood, that this woman’s charm was at its most spectacular.

Such was the impression her menacing and mysterious allure evoked, in the midst of the gloomy, drifting, thick snow.

???: “…”

Rushing to the battlefield late was a group of fully armed men, gasping and speechless at the sight before them.

The warriors, clad in fur armor and helmets, armed with swords and axes, were thoroughly petrified at the sight of the woman standing alive on the blood-stained snowfield.

Woman: “…Oh, my.”

The woman slowly turned to the speechless men.

She slackened her scarlet lips and graciously raised her hand towards the men.

In the woman’s hand was a curved knife responsible for the countless corpses.

Woman: “…I apologize. I couldn’t wait, so I went ahead and took care of them.”

With a flirtatious smirk, the woman delivered an apology to the men, clearly only as a mere formality.

However, not a single man raised his voice in response to her apology in protest about her stealing their work.

2

…The Holy Kingdom of Gusteko was known for having the harshest natural environment out of the four major countries.

White snow that never stopped falling, and never-melting permafrost. In this world of extreme cold, where growing crops and raising livestock were fatally unsuitable occupations, there was an endless series of challenges to survive through every day.

Rooted in that harsh environment, the doctrine of the Holy Church of Gusteko was born.

According to the doctrine, the frozen earth and the cold wind were all trials given to the people by a greater being; the only way to give peace to one's soul in the afterlife was to endure those trials.

It was hard for those born in wealthy countries to comprehend, but the doctrine had spread throughout Gusteko, and most people didn't doubt its teachings. The streets were saturated with people who wanted salvation, and all were desperate to cling to a hopeless dream.

This was the reality of the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko, and it's cold history that had continued for hundreds of years.

Red-faced man: "…And so, those guys got completely routed! Because of that, they said we could take as much as we wanted from the buffet!"

The man, clearly intoxicated, spat and slammed his glass down on the counter.

He was a huge, ruddy man with a crooked nose reddened by drunkenness. Although his vulgar gesture splashed alcohol, he received no admonishment… rather, the man's shouts were accompanied by cheers, and the surrounding drunks began to clink their glasses together in unison.

At the moment, the inside of the bar was occupied by a group of men drinking heavily. The men were in a good mood and paid well, and there were no other customers to be disturbed. And so, the now-lawless bar's owner said nothing to the group.

Red-faced man: "Oh, the joy of labor! The water of life! We give thanks to the Holy King and the Merciful Mother of the Holy Church of Gusteko that we have survived to this day! Cheers!”

Mercenaries: “Cheers…!!”

The empty glasses were filled, and the others raised their glasses in response to the toast given by the red-faced man.

He was clearly mocking the teachings of the Holy Church, but none here would accuse him of that. The doctrines of the Holy Church were known to all of Gusteko, and these men were no exception; however, whether or not they actually followed the teachings was a different story.

The doctrine didn’t fill your stomach, and it didn’t save your life. … At least, that was the way they saw it.

???: “…”

The owner of the bar, the only outsider, was reluctant to face the men.

As a man fifty years old, who had been running a tavern in this country until his age, Gusteko’s teachings had been familiar to him since he was born. Of course, he was well aware that there was no salvation in the world like the doctrine described, but it still felt unpleasant for the teachings to be ridiculed.

Of course, he wasn’t experienced enough in customer service to be able to say that to a mercenary corp full of brutes.

Red-faced man: “Even so, they were attacked to such an extent. The lot at Orcos Domain must be looking pale right about now… oh.”

Suddenly, the expression on the red face that had been in good spirits and smelled of alcohol shifted.

A bell had sounded at the entrance of the tavern, announcing the arrival of a new customer. Tonight, the tavern was reserved for the men, and not a single person in the village was unaware of that. So who was the uninvited guest?

Red-faced man: “…Fweet.”

The red-faced man whistled as a figure leisurely crossed the bar and headed for the counter. The reaction of the people around him was more or less the same, the drunken gazes welcoming the newcomer with an ulterior motive.

Of course. …It was a woman with beauty that would set any man's lust ablaze.

Woman: "Some milk, please."

Sitting at the counter, the woman placed her order, and for a moment the shopkeeper admired her appearance. She had dark, slightly droopy black eyes, and long, glossy black hair that wasn't something one saw often around the Gustekan town. Her red lips had been moistened with her tongue, and a thin nightgown wrapped around her entire body.

The woman raised a shapely eyebrow at the quiet owner, propped one elbow on the counter, and repeated,

Woman: "Milk, that's what I'm ordering."

Shopkeeper: "…Oh, yeah. Right, I'm sorry."

The shopkeeper shook his head lightly at the affirmed order before reaching for the milk.

In the frigid cold of Gusteko, milk was a precious commodity, far more valuable than alcohol. Even if he disregarded that, it was rare for a customer to order milk instead of alcohol in a bar.

Naturally, the order could easily be used to start a quarrel or conversation…

Red-faced man: "…Hey, hey, you can't come to a bar and order milk, can you?"

Sitting next to the woman without asking, the red-faced giant took advantage of the opportunity. The man placed the empty glass on the counter and held up two fingers to the owner.

Red-faced man: "Drinks. One for me and one for my sister here."

Woman: “You’ll buy me a drink?”

Red-faced man: “Oh, yeah. We can buy a whole keg and still have change with the money we made today. I’ll let you get as drunk as you want, okay?”

In response to the woman’s flirtatious glance, the red-face smacked his chest and replied with authority. The shop-owner glanced at the listening woman, whose face broke into a thin smile, nodding at the giant’s offer.

The shopkeeper, relieved to see the situation hadn’t turned violent, presented a glass of alcohol to both of them. Accepting the glasses, the woman and the red-faced man bumped them together in a toast.

Red-faced man: “…To the Holy King and the Merciful Mother.”

Woman: “Oh, that’s unexpected. You’re a follower of the Holy Church of Gusteko?”

Red-faced man: “Well… I’m not a sincere believer. I was baptized when I was a kid, but now, I’m in this line of work… I’ve long since lost my appreciation for the doctrine, and my right to cling to the pity of the Merciful Mother, too.”

Woman: “Indeed… I know how you feel. I’m from this country, after all.”

She expressed her agreement with the red-face while sipping her drink.

Regardless of the chilling emotion in her voice, the red-faced man’s eyes were glued to the woman’s beautiful profile. The man’s throat gulped in slight arousal at even the way she seductively swallowed her liquor.

Red-faced man: “What brings you to this bar? Didn’t you know we had the whole place to ourselves today?”

Woman: “…? Does that mean I have to leave?”

Red-faced man: “No, no, it’s the other way around. I’m all for having a nice lady like you around, but even the villagers are avoiding the stores tonight. What are you doing here on such a day…?”

Woman: “…Igor Kenash.”

Interrupting the man’s words, the woman said just one phrase. When the red-faced giant rolled his eyes at the name, the woman narrowed her black eyes and licked her lips.

Woman: “I’m here on his orders. Do you know Baron Kenash?”

Red-faced man: “…You might know this, but it’s Baron Kenash who’s footing the bill for our drinks today. I see… that husband of yours is very kind!”

Woman: “Oh, dear.”

The giant man’s ruddy face broke into a broad smile as he roughly hugged the woman’s thin shoulders.

The woman’s small surprise at the behavior brought a booze-soaked grin to the man’s face.

Red-faced man: “It was very generous of him, not only in paying for the drinks, but also to include such an excellent woman. The Baron truly knows how to deal with people like us!”

There had only been scrawny girls in the village to satisfy the lust of the mercenaries; the only town with a decent brothel was distant, and the woman in front of them was the perfect reward for the men who had deceived their desires with alcohol thus far.

The man, deeply moved by his employer’s consideration, was about to put his hands on his gift when…

Unknown: “…Logres! Is there a Logres Hyatt?”

Red-faced man: “…Ah?”

Suddenly, someone rushed into the tavern. The men in the tavern looked back sullenly at the call that followed. Among them, the one most irritated was the red-faced Logres, the very one called by name.

Having his fun interrupted, Logres glared at the newcomer with scowling eyes.

Logres: “So you’re the Baron’s errand boy, huh? What do you want?”

Igor’s Subordinate: “Master Igor wants to see you. The leader of the Crimson Hunting Squad must come to the residence immediately.”

Logres: “…Immediately? Right now?”

Igor’s Subordinate: “What other interpretation is there?”

In response to the younger man’s sarcasm, Logres rubbed his crooked nose in visible annoyance. It was a call from his employer. He couldn’t say that he wouldn’t comply, but…

Logres: “…”

If he merely turned his head, he would find a beautiful woman with an alluring aura right beside him.

If he left this place, he would have to leave his reward behind. And, he would have to give it to his subordinates around him.

Logres: “…Tomorrow isn’t good enough?”

Igor’s Subordinate: : “Master Igor says it’s urgent. You’ll have to comply with his request, Butcher!”

Logres sighed at the still inflexible reply.

He couldn’t give priority to his desires in the present and lose his source of food for tomorrow, and beyond. It wasn’t possible to survive in the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko with such a careless attitude.

Logres: “Sorry, sis. I’ve been summoned by the boss. It would be a shame to leave a beauty like you here…”

Woman: “It’s alright. But don’t worry. …You’re not the only one who’s getting called out.”

Logres: “Oh?”

As Logres wracked his brain in confusion, the woman who was still in his arms asked, "Right?" to the young errand man. His expression instantly stiffened at the question.

The young man, who had been unconcerned even when surrounded by rogues, had begun to sweat on his forehead.

Igor’s Subordinate: “…Yes. Master Igor has called for you. Can you please come, too?”

Woman: “Yes, of course. So I hope you won’t be too frightened.”

Igor’s Subordinate: “I’m not frightened…”

Woman: “I’m sensitive to smell. Those frightened have a frightened scent, and those angered smell of anger… you know?”

The young messenger was dumbstruck at the rejection of his immediate rebuttal. The woman licked her lips and looked over at Logres.

Woman: “We’ve both been called to the same person. …Can you escort me there?”

Logres: “That’s fine, but… sister, what’s your name?”

Unwrapping his arm from around her shoulders, Logres kept an eye on the woman’s movements.

The woman’s grin deepened at the soldier’s drunken gaze, now weakening in intoxication, her smile deepening to the utmost amount, and with an arousing allure that seemed to hang in the air, she gave him her name.

Woman: “…I’m Elsa. Elsa Granhiert.”

Mercenaries: “…”

At the mention of her name, a hush spread through the tavern at once. The drunk but battle-hardened mercenaries all fell speechless and exchanged glances.

Logres covered his face with his palm, marvelling at the absurd significance of just one simple name.

Logres: “Oh, shit. I thought you were just a nice lady, but you’re… the Bowel Hunter.”

The best proof of her infamy was the fact that his voice was fully devoid of lust.

3

Man: “You sure took your time, didn’t you? I was beginning to worry that you might not come.”

Logres: “…Well, I’m sorry about that.”

Man: “You’ll have to be careful next time. I do not have a very big heart.”

At the greeting he received as soon as he entered the room, Logres scratched his head in helplessness. Unaware of the subtle sarcasm in Logres’s reply, the man nodded magnanimously and welcomed him and Elsa into the room.

In an ornate room with a long, wooly carpet, facing Elsa and her companion across an unnecessarily expensive desk was Baron Igor Kenash, the man who had called them here.

The hair on his head was thinning, and his face was greasy and glistening. With a belly flab from alcohol and luxury, and a dialect that grated the nerves, Igor was not a person to be liked. No matter how many times they came in contact with him, that impression would not fade, but instead only grow stronger.

However, that was just a generalization. Elsa didn’t care very much, but…

Igor: “Oh, Elsa! My subordinates report that your work was truly magnificent! Beautiful and skillful… What a wonderful woman. Just as I had hoped!”

Elsa: “Thank you for the compliment. I, too, enjoyed the work.”

Igor: “Mm-hmm. So, what do you think? Have you made up your mind to become my property yet? Hmm?”

Igor’s eyes practically licked her, the baron not even bothering to hide his lecherous stare and ulterior motives.

She was dressed in a black evening gown, and although the amount of skin exposed was minimal, the way the cloth revealed the lines of her body, made men’s imaginations run wild. Igor, too, was captivated by her sensuality.

However, Elsa shook her head at Igor’s emotionless pick-up line.

Elsa: “I’m sorry, but I have to decline. I don’t find men with unhealthy lifestyles attractive.”

Igor: “How honest you are! You’re the only one who’s ever turned down my advances so firmly!”

Igor laughed in amusement at Elsa’s dauntless reply. It wasn’t an easy task to go against the will of the baron, the most powerful man in the area.

In the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko, the disparity in status was absolute. It was a reality that cannot be overcome.

Logres: “So, the Baron is free to make passes on the lady… what can I do for you?”

Igor: “You’re very direct, aren’t you?”

Logres: “Well, I’m not so handsome that someone would want to spend time with me outside of business. Also, if I return too late, the fools will empty out all the expensive liquor. Which is quite worrisome.”

Although Logres had contemplated Elsa’s boldness, he himself was also quite direct in his remarks. Igor laughed at their attitudes and ran his hand through his head of scanty hair.

His lustful face changed into something more ugly, as his eyes began to harbor a cruel tint.

Igor: “You two have done well so far. I’d like to reward you for your achievements and make you my full-fledged protégés. On top of that, I want you to begin an operation to purify the Orcos Domain.”

Logres: “Purifying Orcos Domain, huh?”

Igor: “Yes, purification. Our neighboring domain ruled by Viktor Orcos has now become a breeding ground for abhorrent human trafficking. His Highness will be terribly distressed by this fact. We must bury this incident in the snow as soon as possible, secretly.”

With clenched fists, Igor authoritatively explained the sordid affairs of the Orcos Domain, which was right next to the Kenash Domain he ruled. Viktor Orcos, the Baron of Orcos Domain, was suspected of complicity in the human trafficking of his own people, who were secretly captured and sold as slaves to other countries.

Naturally, Viktor was asked to give an explanation by the Holy Church of Gusteko, which ran the Holy Kingdom. However, he refused the request and prepared to fight a full-scale war with the private army he had gathered in his domain.

Igor: “This is nothing but a betrayal of the Holy Church and proof that the Baron has committed treason. We must get the situation under control as soon as possible…”

Logres: “A church with the power to appoint Barons in various regions can’t afford to lose its influence with its followers …if the Holy Church’s power is weakened, the effects on the other countries will be immeasurable.”

At the Baron’s explanation, Logres pointed out an issue. Igor, with his flabby face, drew his chin back at the mercenary’s point and added, "That’s not all."

Igor: “If the Merciful Mother from the Holy Church, the… Spirit Beast Odglass, finds out about such a thing, the country will be destroyed.”

Igor’s quivering voice was filled with a mixture of uncontrollable fear and awe.

It was fear and reverence for Odglass, the Spirit Beast who was considered the Mother of the country..

Odglass was a great spirit with outstanding power even among spirits, and counted within the Four Great Spirits. Normally, spirits didn’t interfere with the way of the world, but Odglass was an exception among them, and she continued to take a friendly position toward humans.

The Great Spirit called all the lives in the harsh land of Gusteko as her own children, yet spared little mercy for them. The simple fact that humans were able to live in Gusteko, which was covered by permafrost, was primarily due to the help of the myriad of spirits and micro-spirits under the control of Odglass.

Due to this, Odglass and the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko had a long and profound friendship.

The authority to decide the head of the Holy Kingdom and the Holy Church, the Holy King, had been delegated to Odglass, and this tradition had been passed down from the beginning of the history of the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko.

That format was unbreakable. Odglass had always been, and would always be, the Merciful Mother of the Holy Church. …With the Holy King as their puppet, the Church would continue to rule the country.

Igor: “We must prevent the collapse of tradition. ……This is the mission that we have been tasked with at this time.”

Logres: “I’ve roughly grasped the situation… if it’s so urgent, wouldn’t it be better to mobilize the Holy Church’s Acolyte Knights? Honestly, it would be a great help if you simply don’t assign the work to us.”

From the standpoint of a hired hand, Logres scratched his bulbous nose and made a proposal.

The Acolyte Knights that Logres mentioned were the holy warriors of the Holy Church of Gusteko. It was rumored both in and out of the country that they were a select group of elites who had received the blessing of the Holy King and wielded superhuman strength, some said they rivaled the Nine Divine Generals of the Vollachia Empire.

If the rumors were true, the power of the Acolyte Knights should easily seize Orcos Domain.

Igor: "Unfortunately, we need the approval of His Highness to move the Acolyte Knights. If His Highness finds about this incident, it's only a matter of time before the Spirit Beast finds out."

Elsa: "Oh. Won't the Holy King be heartbroken by the scandals in Orcos Domain, too?"

Elsa, who had been silent so far, asked a question to which Igor crossed his short, stocky arms.

Igor: "Of course, His Highness will be troubled if he learns of this incident. We have to take the initiative to solve the problem before that happens. As long as the problem is solved, there's no need to go to the trouble of reporting something that will only cloud His Highness's mind. …Do you understand?"

Elsa: "You guys will have to work hard too to keep your warm beds and meals."

Igor appeared slightly apprehensive at Elsa's unfocused thoughts.

However, the Baron quickly straightened his grimy face and ordered both Elsa and Logres once again.

Igor: "From tomorrow onwards, you will be the key players in the purification operation. My soldiers are lacking in experience on the battlefield, but they are more experienced in military tactics. Let's see what the Butcher and the Bowel Hunter are capable of."

Logres: “This is the first time I’ve ever had someone expect me to use my head as well as my strength… Well, I’ll be the Baron’s faithful hands and feet as long as the money is paid. Please use me as you see fit.”

Elsa: “I feel the same as the one on my right, although I’m not really that interested in compensation.”

Following the mercenary-like remark of Logres, Elsa moistened her lips and smiled.

Taking the positive reactions of the two mercenaries as an affirmation, Igor nodded and reached his hand to his flabby chin.

Igor: “…So, let’s bury Viktor Orcos’ sins in the snow, and cleanse him away.”

Contrary to his terribly lazy appearance, his eyes gave off the impression that he was both shrewd and sharp.

4

…The next day, the full-scale Purification Operation of Orcos Domain was put into action.

Baron Igor Kenash’s plan for the Purification Operation was very simple.

Igor’s private army, led by the Crimson Hunting Squad, spearheaded by the Butcher Logres Hyatt, would attack the garrison of Orcos Domain one after another. As a diversion, the Bowel Hunter, a lone force, would infiltrate the enemy territory, assassinate commanders and reserve troops, and defeat them one by one.

Once the chain of command was broken, all that was left was for the Crimson Hunting Squad to wear down the guards.

It was a simple strategy, but the results were plain to see. Due to both the strength of the Crimson Hunting Squad, and the skill of Igor, who properly utlized Elsa, an assassination specialist.

Logres: “Surprisingly, our employer has quite astute judgment.”

Logres muttered to himself as he hid behind a shield, escaping the rain of arrows falling on him.

The temperature was low, and he could see his white breath as he exhaled. He felt his body temperature climbing and steam rising up from his neck and forehead.

Hearing Logres’s murmurs, his subordinates, who were also hiding, turned to look at him. Waving his hand lightly at their gaze, Logres picked up some snow and smeared it on his face.

Logres: “ So far, we’ve won many battles in a row, and to top it off, we’ve lost hardly any of our allies… in fact, the only losses have been coming from hired hands like us. Considering that his forces haven’t really reduced in number shows the wealth he gained by sucking the sweet juice out of the Church. It was beyond Elsa’s expectations, too.”

Mercenary: “That lady? It’s a shame that such a beautiful woman is so crazy. “

Logres: “She would be great if she weren’t so crazy… her fetishes are completely perverse.”

Mercenary: “Fetishes… not in an erotic way?”

Logres’s face contorted into a wry smile at his subordinate’s absurd question. He raised his hatchet and used its tip to indicate the target of the attack, the fort defended by the garrison.

His men followed his gesture with their eyes, tilting their heads… and the next moment…

Mercenary: “Oh, geez…”

Logres: “See that… if you can honestly see that woman erotically even now, you have my respect.”

Logres’ lips curved at the reaction of his subordinates, whose eyes had widened and faces had paled. They all looked up at the upper level of the fort - where they witnessed countless flowers of blood bloom.

And the dark figure of a woman running through the blooming field of scarlet flowers, a deranged grin on her face.

5

…Energizing. Enchanting. Endearing, exhilarating, exciting.

Elsa: “My, my, how wonderful. …What a thrill.”

She spun her precious knife in her palm and mercilessly slammed it into the figure standing in her way.

Elsa’s beloved blade was bent in the reverse direction from the original shape of the knife. That ensured just the right amount of weight was placed at the very edge of the special blade, and enabled the power to cut anything apart with a single blow.

Indeed, the blade struck the guard’s helmet, ripping into his skull through the headgear. Grey matter spilled out of his brain, and the blank-eyed guard, on the verge of collapsing, swung the greatsword in his hand.

Elsa: “Incredible. So irresistible.”

Elsa marvelled at his will to fight, even with half of his head cut off.

The man unleashed a two-handed strike with his blade powerful enough to cut through a large frozen tree. To deal with the blow, Elsa cleaved off the attacker’s wrist.

Guard: “…”

The guard spoke no words in his last moments. She slammed a kick into his chest, blowing him away with approval. More enemies still appeared from the corner of the corridor, stifling their furious, screaming hearts at the sight of their companions’ corpses.

There were already more than a dozen bodies piled up in the passage beneath Elsa’s feet. All of them were warriors who had confronted Elsa and fallen prey to her savagery.

Respecting their mortal struggle, admiring the new advancing opponents… then, ripping their bellies open.

Elsa: “Hah, ahahahaha!”

Elsa retaliated to the precious lives striving to resist with the utmost level of affection. She put her adoration into the end of her blade and her feelings into each strike… and her heart was moved to tears by all the life pouring out.

In blood, in flesh, in bone, in life, in bowels… this moment was all that Elsa wanted.

???: “…”

Elsa: “… it’s here.”

She kicked open the iron door at the upper layer of the stronghold, at the back end of the passage, and burst into the room.

Elsa, carrying a bloodstained knife, was greeted calmly by the master of the room, an old soldier. The elderly warrior was clad in aged armor and held a steel mace in his hand.

His surging, powerful fighting spirit was plain to see. It was visible in his body; this old soldier was the very best of all the guards in the fortress.

Old Soldier: “I didn’t expect to be facing a woman.”

Elsa: “Oh, you don’t like female opponents? I’d be disappointed if that diminished your determination.”

Old Soldier: “That’s a useless concern. …No matter who I’m dealing with, I’ll not show mercy to my enemies.”

Elsa tilted her head as she asked her question, and the old warrior’s words brimmed with his entire, evident fighting spirit. The sensation warmed her skin, and Elsa leaned forward, shivering.

Elsa: “I’m the Bowel Hunter, Elsa Granhiert.”

Old Soldier: “There is no name to call a villain. …I will conquer you, demon.”

At the refusal to impart his name, Elsa smiled thinly at the old soldier, who closed their distance in a single bound.

His weapon, a massive lump of steel, was swung from above his armor and flashed downwards with speed and power that was unbelievable for an older man. The blow shattered and pierced through the floor of the stone fort.

It was a strike so powerful that the entire fort seemed to shake from the impact, a cloud of smoke billowed into the room, and when the smoke cleared…

Elsa: “… Ah, I knew it.”

Elsa’s loud footsteps rang as she used a powerful swing to clear the smokescreen, peering down at the floor. The aged soldier had been hit by Elsa’s blow and fallen, his limbs splayed out.

At the view of the dying old soldier, Elsa’s eyes quivered, entranced, as she let out a hot, intense sigh.

Elsa: “…Considering your intestines have an exceptionally lovely color.”

Such was the end of the battle that determined the fall of the fort that day.

6

The visitor who stepped into the room stiffened, his face showing surprise at the sight. A huge, red-faced man, his eyes had widened and cheeks tightened. Elsa tilted her head curiously at his reaction.

Elsa: “…What’s wrong?”

Logres: “What’s wrong with… well, what are you doing?”

Elsa: “Can’t you see?”

Logres pointed with his thick fingers, and Elsa held it up for him to see. But the giant man’s confusion redoubled, and Elsa frowned with her shapely eyebrows.

Elsa: “I’m knitting yarn, and we’re in a cold country. This should be nothing unusual, I believe?”

Logres: “Knitting itself isn’t unusual, but the one who was knitting was surprising… to think that even a woman like you knits.”

Elsa: “Oh my, how heartless. Regardless of your doubts, I’m pretty confident in my knitting skills.”

With that, Elsa spread out her knitting project in plain sight and showed it to Logres.

It was an unfinished doll, just beginning to look vaguely complete. The design looked like it was for a child, and the cuteness and delicate construction of the doll demonstrated a great deal of skill even to the untrained eye.

To be honest, it didn’t overlap with his impression of it’s creator, Elsa.

Logres: “I never imagined that doll-making was your hobby. How long have you been doing it?”

Elsa: “Since last night, if the question is when I started making this doll. If it’s about doll making itself, then it’s been over a decade.”

Logres: “Hmm… the replies are a surprise for both questions.”

Scratching his nose at Elsa’s answer, Logres chose a bunk to sit on.

The room assigned to Elsa was one of the rooms in the fort they had just conquered that day. The owner of the room seemed to be a man who didn’t like extravagance. Elsa was also a carefree and self-assured person, so she would likely get along with the owner of the room.

Elsa probably killed that person herself, though.

Elsa: "…"

Without any particular sentimentality, Elsa silently moved her hands and continued to work on making the woolen doll. Woven dolls didn't really require any difficult tools or thinking. She used a crochet hook to make the head, body, limbs, and other parts, and finally joined them together to create a single form.

Elsa's favorite part of the process was filling the woven parts with cotton.

Elsa: "When I put cotton inside the doll like this… I feel kind of fulfilled."

Logres: "Oh, I see… that does sound like a hobby of the Bowel Hunter."

Elsa: "I'll take that as a compliment."

Instead of her handicraft skills, somehow her motives were being praised… she found it hard to understand.

In any case, Logres watched with an incomprehensible look on his face as the doll was magically completed in Elsa's hands. Although she was skeptical of his behavior, Elsa didn't say anything about it.

It was the other party who had come all the way to visit her. If he wanted to talk, he would do it on his own.

Logres: "…"

For a while, the only noise in the room came from the sound of Elsa silently working on her doll.

And just when the doll was almost finished…

Logres: "…Elsa. Don't you think this Purification Operation smells fishy?"

Elsa: "Fishy?"

Logres: “It’s just my intuition, but… I don’t like the way the situation meshes together. I was just wondering if you also had smelled something off around you.”

Finally, Logres began to explain the reason for his visit. At his question, Elsa paused and re-crossed her legs in her chair, thinking.

The Purification Operation… regardless of the merits of the name, the plan itself had been executed flawlessly so far. The garrisons in the various regions of Orcos Domain, which were the objective of the operation, had been conquered one after another, and the inner citadel was just before their eyes.

Elsa herself was satisfied that she had fulfilled most of the objectives that Igor had hired her for.

Elsa: “We should be happy that the operation is going well, right? The damage is minimal and the winning streak continues… isn’t that what you want, too?”

Logres: “If it weren’t for the fact that my employer has some sort of ulterior motive, I could get drunk in a bar every night if I wanted to… I can tell that the Baron is a really shady fellow. Well, that’s how it’s always been with the Gusteko Church.”

Elsa: “…When we first met, you were angry with the Holy Church.”

At Logres’s abject response, Elsa recalled the first time she met him at the tavern.

She had a faint memory of the conversation she had with him when present at the Crimson Hunting Squad’s rented bar, before the Purification Operation to overcome the hostile forces began.

Elsa: “…Yes, that must have been you. Though I don’t remember much.”

Logres: “You say that with a lot of confidence for someone who has a bad memory.

Elsa: “I may not remember events very well, but I’m confident in my ability to remember smells. I can recall the smell of your anger.

Do you have bad memories of the Gusteko Holy Church?”

Logres: “… It’s not interesting to listen to my personal story, and you’re not interested in it in the first place. You don’t want to talk about your old life too much, do you?”

Logres sniffed unhappily and glared at Elsa, as if she had hit a sore spot. At the look in his eyes, she touched her black hair and twisted her fingers in the braid.

Elsa: “…I was originally sold by my parents as a slave.”

Logres: “…”

Elsa: “See, black hair and black eyes are rare, aren’t they? I think my parents didn’t have my colors, but I found out much later that it was due to an old bloodline.”

Logres was taken aback as Elsa began to talk about her past with indifference. As he watched in astonishment, Elsa continued to speak.

What came back to her mind were the chilling memories of being sold by her parents and thrown out into the cold world.

Elsa: “But I escaped with the other children before the slavers could turn me into a true commodity. If I had failed, I’d probably be in a whorehouse by now, or long dead. Compared to the girls who were caught on the way to escape or the ones who fell off the cliff and died, I guess I was lucky.”

If one was caught by slavers, they would be forced into a terrible environment and made an example of by other slaves. If isolated in a blizzard, they would die a slow death, their limbs rotting away from frostbite. Others would have been attacked by the beasts of the snowy fields and eaten alive.

She knew that she was lucky that she didn’t suffer any of those consequences and lasted as long as she did.

Elsa: “The rest of the time, as a random orphan, I got into all sorts of wrong things. In the process, I learned how to use a blade, and here I am. …I guess that’s about it?”

She had omitted a lot on the way, but it was a frivolous time in which she couldn’t find anything to talk about.

In any case, that was the end of Elsa’s personal story. Looking back, she could honestly say that her life’s history was so empty that she could tell all of its contents in a short time.

Contrary to Elsa’s dull feelings, Logres looked uneasy. He scratched his nose, his coarse-looking face reddened, muttering "Ah…" and "Er…", trying to choose a word.

Logres: “……why are you talking to me about that?”

Elsa: “…?”

Logres: “If you look at me with that expression, I’m going to think I’m weird.”

Elsa: “I won’t tell you something I don’t want to tell you. I didn’t hide it because it wasn’t something to hide. That’s all you’re asking?”

Logres: “Your values are too strange… I’m realizing that the hard way.”

Sighing in resignation, Logres propped himself up on one elbow on his knee, turning his gaze away from Elsa.

Logres: “… My family used to be in a good position in the Church. We had a lot of money when I was a kid. But when I was fifteen, my parents lost a power struggle, and we fell into ruin. Their property was confiscated, my father was executed, and my mother was taken away by a religious cult. So, as a fifteen-year-old kid, I was thrown out into the snow alone, scrambled to get by, and now I’m a respectable drunk.”

Rubbing his red face, Logres wore a thin smile and spoke with an alcohol-induced hoarse, raspy voice.

At his words, Elsa closed one eye, fiddling with the doll in her hand.

Elsa: “See, it’s not like that’s the kind of life to frantically hide, right?”

Logres: “That’s not it. The issue is that it’s a boring story that would put its listeners to sleep. …Now, although it’s the kind of personal story where even I would doze off telling it, it does have a purpose. It’s simply that the fishy smell reminds me a lot of that tragic life experience.”

Elsa: “…The power struggle in the Holy Order that your father lost?”

Logres: “There isn’t a single Gustekan citizen with power who isn’t involved in the affairs of the Holy Church of Gusteko. Our employer, the Baron, and his opponent, Viktor Orcos, definitely have something in common. And it’s undoubtedly a big deal.”

In a somewhat condescending manner, Logres urged Elsa to be cautious. Rising from his bunk, the giant man continued in a slightly hushed voice.

Logres: “If Viktor Orcos is as bad as his reputation says he is, treating his people like slaves and selling them off, then the high morale of the… Orcos Domain’s garrison doesn’t add up.”

Elsa: “…”

Logres: “Why would they risk their lives to the last soldier to fight for a prick? There’s no way.”

Viktor’s private army continued to resist to this point, and Logres remarked upon the motive for their strenuous struggle. His words also reminded Elsa of the old commander she had killed half a day ago.

That will and attitude certainly couldn’t have been half-hearted, but…

Elsa: “To be honest, I don’t really think I care.”

Logres: “…That’s your conclusion after all this talk?”

Elsa: “I’m not good at thinking. I like to do things the way I feel… like this.”

Elsa showed the exhausted Logres the woolen doll she had completed during the conversation. She pinched the limbs of the human-shaped yarn doll and shook its soft body from side to side.

Elsa: “It’s quite well done for amusing oneself, isn’t it?”

Logres: “Ah, yes. Well done. I don’t know if I can make anything like that.”

Elsa: “The only thing you need to carry around is a crochet hook and yarn. I’ve already made more than a dozen of these during this mission. After seeing good bowel remains in particular, I make a lot of progress.”

Logres: “I didn’t ask.”

As Elsa’s cheeks flushed with excitement, Logres felt more of a wall of incomprehension than a man’s lust for her. With that, he waved his hand, compressed his huge frame, and headed for the exit of the room.

Logres: “It doesn’t mean much, but put what I said in the corner of your mind. Use your intuition.”

Elsa: “What were you talking about just now……?”

Logres: “Hey, hey, hey, hey, hey, hey.”

Elsa: “I’m kidding.”

Seeing Logres’s panic at the elusive response, Elsa put her hand over her mouth, wearing a slight smile. Shrugging his shoulders at the smirk, the giant man turned to leave the room this time.

And just before he went through the door, he suddenly looked back at the room and…

Logres: “Well, even though you made ten dolls, you… didn’t put any in the room.”

She looked at the doll held to her chest and tilted her head at the fact that its siblings weren’t in the room. Thinking about Logres’ words, Elsa narrowed her dark eyes.

She spoke after she licked her red lips.

Elsa: “…In that case, I guess I won’t tell you where the dolls are.”

And, in a bewitching and mischievous manner, she brushed off Logres’ question and sent him away.

7

Regardless of Logres’ suspicions, the Purification Operation continued without a hitch.

With the fall of the fort due to the efforts of the Bowel Hunter and the Crimson Hunting Squad, the war situation in Orcos Domain quickly turned in favor of Baron Igor Kenash.

Even disregarding Elsa and Logres, the Baron’s private army also won a number of victories on other fronts, boosting the morale of the entire Igor camp.

Igor’s Subordinate: “I didn’t know that war could be so bloody… haha, I can see why history is full of battles.”

These were the words of the young man who was in command of the private army in place of Igor, the Baron’s protégé and who came to call Elsa and Logres at the tavern before.

Igor seemed to value him, and all the instructions of the baron who remained in his mansion were conveyed through him. Elsa and the Crimson Hunting Squad also operated with the Baron through him.

Logres: “Consecutive victories in a row, that’s certainly good news… although carelessness should be avoided.”

Elsa: “‘A midway victory is like drinking sake in front of the enemy'… that's the quote from Hoshin, isn't it."

Logres and Elsa both dismissed the feelings of the young man, who was ecstatic over his side's victories and expected them to feel the same. Elsa aside, Logres was probably just trying to offer friendly advice.

The young man, however, was very unhappy with their opinion.

Igor's Subordinate: "Hmm. I know that without being told. However, the morale of the allies is high, and even though the situation is favorable, you're being timid, Butcher.

Logres: "We've proceeded with the war like a slaughterhouse, carefully chopping off the heads of the enemies like they're livestock. That's why they call us pig killers. Since there's no way that my approach can be called cowardice or weakness, I can't say that either I or my Crimson Hunting Squad is weak."

The young man blushed as he was belittled for getting carried away with the incomplete victory. It was difficult to leave the argument like that due to his frustration, and he wouldn't have been able to back down if he didn't let it go.

In the end, there was no stopping the excitement of the young man overcome by his belief in their victory.

Igor's Subordinate: "…As per Igor-sama's instructions, we'll push up the battle line. After the garrison retreats, leave it to us to deal with the soldiers. The Crimson Hunting Squad and Bowel Hunter are ordered to attack."

Logres: "…We've been drawing the short straw lately, haven't we?"

Elsa: "Ah, really? I've been enjoying it in my own way."

The corners of Elsa's lips lifted at Logres' grumbles about the impending torment of marching through the middle of a blizzard.

At the elated young man's command, Elsa and the Crimson Hunting Squad had commenced moving their forces to raid a defensive encampment of Orcos Domain. An opportunity to bring it down at this time period had opened up. It was normally a well-lit time of day, but the blizzard and thick clouds had made the environment so dim it was as if it was midnight.

Elsa: “It just occurred to me…”

The snowfall was so heavy that the footprints they had made would soon disappear. Elsa, the only one moving smoothly, tilted her head as the others struggled along the knee-deep snow-covered path.

Elsa: “You guys are called the Crimson Hunting Squad, but you wear white furs for work?”

As Elsa voiced her question, she had noticed the group of people stirring in her vision were all clad in white fur.

It was the fur of the White Wolf that inhabited the northern part of Gusteko. Despite its beautiful white appearance, the fur was extremely tough and had high insulation properties. It truly was equipment for working in the snow.

Logres bristled when she pointed out the inconsistency between the beautiful fur and the name of the mercenary group.

Logres: “I’m just bluffing, you know. If you call yourself the Crimson Hunting Squad, everyone will assume that you’re the ones in red. We profit if even one person falls for it.”

Elsa: “I see, you’re quite underhanded.”

Logres: “At least make it sound like I’m wickedly cunning or something. I mean, don’t I have the aura of the Butcher?”

Elsa: “Indeed. By the way, does anyone know why I’m nicknamed the Bowel Hunter?”

Logres: “The scariest part is that you seem like you’re serious about that name.”

He interpreted her serious riddle as a quip, and she wound up unsuccessful in her goal of distraction. The members of the Crimson Hunting Squad still seemed to have regained a bit of their composure, though, and Elsa fiddled with her braids at their reaction.

Before long, a building came into view at the end of their vision, clouded by the snowstorm. It was probably the defensive position they were aiming for, and their presence had likely become visible from the other side.

Elsa: “The procedure will be the same as before.”

Logres: “Flashy diversion, and Elsa will sneak in. Alright. Don’t mess up.”

The exchange before the offensive was brief. Elsa would go behind the building, and the Crimson Hunting Squad would draw the enemy’s attention to the front.

Crimson Hunting Squad Member 1: “Elsa-san, be careful.”

Crimson Hunting Squad Member 2: “Don’t get too bloody!”

Crimson Hunting Squad Member 3: “I’ll see you in my dreams!”

Logres’s men also called out to Elsa as she set out alone on her dangerous journey.

Having fought together more than ten times, there was no doubt in their minds about Elsa’s abilities. Elsa also had a certain amount of trust in the fighting style of the Crimson Hunting Squad.

Elsa: “I can’t tell them apart, though.”

Muttering inaudibly, Elsa left the group and went off on her own.

Leaving no tracks on the snowy path, Elsa looked up at the approaching buildings.

The building concealed within the blizzard was completely visible from the outside by the illumination of a crystal lamp.

This level of carelessness was extremely rare. Considering their looming defeat, they were awfully easygoing…

Elsa: "…"

Was it possible that the enemy was lacking in intelligence and had a poor understanding of the situation?

As soon as she began to have doubts, she heard the faint sound of battle from the direction where she left the Crimson Hunting Squad. It was the signal the guards of the stronghold and Logres had begun battle.

Elsa's role was to use the battle as a cover to infiltrate the building and take down the key parts of the enemy. However…

Elsa: "Oh, my."

While Elsa scaled the back wall and searched for a passage to sneak in through, the rear entrance of the building opened and a dragon carriage rushed out right beneath her eyes.

A white dragon with a white canopy to disappear into the snow, just like the equipment of the Crimson Hunting Squad. The dragon carriage's speed didn't let up, instead accelerating to full speed away from the battlefield.

Elsa: "…"

Igor's forces weren't particularly deployed in the direction of the dragon carriage's escape. Logres, clashing with the enemy in front, wouldn't be able to notice the carriage's existence. If Elsa missed it, the dragon carriage would be able to escape without any hindrances.

The question was whether or not the dragon carriage was worth postponing the capture of the enemy territory.

Elsa: "…Well, I can think about it after I catch it."

Even if gaining control of the battlefront was delayed a bit, Logres and the others would be able to hold out.

Elsa chose to follow her intuition rather than thinking. And her intuition ordered her to chase the dragon carriage.

Elsa: "…"

Normally, it would be nearly impossible for humans to catch up with a fleeing earth dragon on their own.

The dragon pulling the fleeing carriage was of the Aires species, which among ground dragons were the most suited for cold climates. They had scales the same color as their white fur, and they raced across the snow with their huge bodies, driving their claws into the snow in order to anchor themselves.

Humans who would get their feet stuck in the snow could never catch up. Elsa, despite rushing and running through the snow, was no exception. Therefore, Elsa followed a simple plan.

…If she couldn't catch up with the fleeing earth dragon, then she wouldn't allow it to escape.

Elsa: "…"

She held the blade aloft and threw it like a discus, swiftly sending it spinning at the fleeing ground dragon, cutting its thick neck in two from behind. Splattering scarlet blood onto the snow, the earth dragon failed to notice its own death as its head fell off. Immediately, the large frame of the earth dragon toppled over and the dragon carriage shook violently as it came to a halt.

Elsa: "Objective accomplished. As for what's inside… ah."

Elsa walked up to the halted carriage, but just before she attempted to open the door, she was forced to jump back as a slash from inside broke open the door of the carriage.

Elsa: "…"

Slowly stepping out from within the dragon carriage, there stood a robust man in his prime with close-cropped grey hair. Despite an old, vertical scar that broke into his left eye, his face, adorned simply with a suitable white moustache, remained austere and refined. Regardless, Elsa's didn't use outward appearance as a standard when evaluating men. …Rather than on the outside, what was truly precious was within the body.

Elsa: “In that respect… I think you’re very much to my tastes.”

Swordsman: “…It’s an honor for a man to be told so by a beautiful maiden.”

Elsa blushed, receiving a low sigh as a response from the matured man.

With his emerald eyes, the man gave the deceased earth dragon a sidelong glance, and placed his hand upon his silvery breastplate, praying for his steed’s soul to find peace.

Narrowing her eyes at the elegant gesture, Elsa licked her lips.

Elsa: “That prayer, and armor engraved with the mark of the Holy Church… an Acolyte Knight, I presume?”

Swordsman: “A former Acolyte Knight. I’ve already forsaken my devotion to the Holy Church. At present, I am only a simple swordsman.”

While he spoke, the man relaxedly placed his hands around his waist. Each side of the man’s waist bore one slim sword. He grasped the hilts of both of his blades and stood ready without withdrawing them from their sheaths.

At first glance, it was quite a strange stance, but there was no doubt it was how the man fought.

Elsa: “Acolyte Knight… an Acolyte Knight… how wonderful.”

Swordsman: “Formerly. Don’t make me repeat myself.”

Elsa: “Perhaps you quit, but you’re an Acolyte Knight regardless. Hey, you received the Blessing, right?”

Swordsman: “Do you think I would tell you?

Elsa: “I was just asking… I’ll let your flesh and blood answer the rest of my questions.”

The sickly sweet, blood-red grin on her face indicated the battle’s start.

Elsa's silhouette darted through the blizzard and over the snow, kicking the snow aside as she moved. Her footwork so brisk the snowfall underfoot remained uncrushed, Elsa sprung at the man with her bizarre yet stunning stride.

Elsa: "…"

Wielding her blade, she scraped at the man's neck, lightly scratching his windpipe with the tip of the knife. His human throat would transform into a musical instrument, the blade producing the lovely, desperate sound of one's last moments. Both the sound of the escaping air, and the warped, anguished expression of the Acolyte Knight should have been entertaining.

The Acolyte Knight remained unmoving. Elsa was still near, and her strike had already been delivered; however, his deep green eyes stayed motionless, as if they were the surface of a rippleless lake.

Elsa: "…Ah!"

In a flash, two blades streaked towards Elsa, grazing her forehead as she twisted her body.

The scarlet and azure blades belonged to the katanas carried on the man's waist. Katanas were single-edged swords that originated in the western region of Kararagi, and were valuable weapons of war known for their dreadful sharpness. However, what surprised Elsa was not the existence of the katanas, but the clear skillfulness in the strikes. The katanas were certainly inside their sheaths,

Elsa: "When did you pull those out? You startled me!"

Swordsman: "I'm also surprised, I didn't think you could avoid it."

The man clicked his tongue as his first attack was evaded, his strike missing the mark. Elsa, licking the blood dripping down from her slashed temple, somersaulted backwards to regain her balance.

Elsa: "…"

Acolyte Knights were quite fearsome. Or rather, perhaps, former Acolyte Knights were fearsome.

The swords' wind blew violently, and what Elsa saw over, and over, and over, in the snow, was death.

The scarlet and azure flashes of the blade were intertwined, and what was created around the man was a realm of death that would cut down anyone who touched it. The range of his swords were long, more than twice the length of Elsa's knife. Unable to approach him carelessly, Elsa rapidly flew around the man, utilizing her combat instincts to search for a way to win.

Elsa: "Pull out, put in, pull out, put in, pull out, put in…"

She concentrated on watching the speed of the sword strikes, in awe, enchanted with the man's skill with the sword.

Although she didn't know why, the man maneuvered his swords back to their scabbards after each strike and slashed as he drew them out again. The left and right sides flowed together in a sequence, and the execution of the sword extraction and insertion was remarkably fast. The two strikes could be fired simultaneously or separately, and she couldn't find any gaps in his movements.

Elsa: "If I take my time, I'll have the advantage…"

In the background, at the original target, at that building, the Crimson Hunting Squad and the Orcos Domain garrison were still fighting.

Judging from their skill, Logres and the others would be able to overpower them eventually. In that case, reinforcements would rush to this battle, and Elsa would gain the advantage.

…But that would be a supremely boring ending.

Elsa: "Before that, I should stay true to the nature of the Bowel Hunter."

Swordsman: "…Reckless!"

Elsa, determined to avoid a final scene that fell flat, forcibly plunged right into the sword flash. The man, however, raised his voice at her for her decisive yet barbaric action.

In the man’s eyes, Elsa’s charge was an rash suicide attack lacking the means to succeed.

In truth, there was no clear-cut solution to this struggle in Elsa’s mind. What there was, though, was a sense of ecstasy that boiled her blood in excitement.

Swordsman: “…A blow!”

With a high-pitched sound that echoed throughout the snowfield, the impact ripped the knife from Elsa’s hand. However, she succeeded in blocking the magnificent scarlet slash the man had unleashed. Rushing forward with a single bound, he closed much of the distance, then… the azure sword strike.

Swordsman: “Here we go, a second blow.”

Elsa: “Ah…”

She undid the bottom hem of her evening dress and flipped the second knife strapped to her pale thigh into her hand. Slashing at the azure blade from directly underneath, her knife scattered sparks and released a scraping sound as it flicked off the blade.

In exchange for blocking the man’s two blows, Elsa also had lost her two weapons. She took two steps forward to close in, his breath becoming visible.

Elsa: “…”

In the next moment, the man’s swords launched forward - scarlet and azure blades fired at the empty-handed Elsa.

Blood splattered, and the sword strikes split her flesh open deep. The impact pierced through her bones, a sharp sound like hitting a frozen rock throbbed around them, and finally, someone let out an exhale.

It was a sigh of disappointment, despite the man's lips quivering as he gazed in wonder at the figure before him.

Swordsman: "You're an idiot…"

Elsa: "Ah, it hurts, it hurts. I thought I was going to die. …Well, that's a sign that I'm still alive."

As Elsa spoke and smiled at him, the swordsman was at a loss for words. His reaction was natural.

The sword blows that the man fired were no different, both hitting Elsa directly in the flesh. How did Elsa respond to being so heavily outclassed? She simply stood still, with her arms outstretched.

Entering through Elsa's palms, the blades passed through her slender wrists, forearms, elbows, and upper arms; they were only stopped by the bones around her shoulders. He was unable to cut completely through due to Elsa's approach, seizing the swords at their hilts.

It was an insane decision, to lose so much blood and surely both arms. Yet—

Elsa: "It's my win. …I'll let you meet an angel."

Swordsman: "What the hell is this…?!"

As Elsa ignored the intense pain, the swordsman tried to pull his blades back.

However, Elsa leaned forward faster than the man could move.

Swordsman: "But…"

Elsa's lips parted, and her white teeth sunk into the man's neck.

Spewing blood as her teeth found their way through the gaps in his armor, Elsa fatally gouged into the man's neck. Bathed in that fresh blood and with crimson splotches covering her face, Elsa spat out the flesh in her mouth.

Elsa: “Oh… I really felt that just now.”

With that, she let out an exhilarated white breath onto the snowfield, bathing in the relief of, at last, the man’s demise.

8

Her arms, struck by the swords, were unable to be moved, and Elsa kept walking over the snow, blood continuing to drip down. Leaving a trail of blood on the snow behind her, she peered into the dragon carriage that the older man had been trying to protect.

Inside the cut door, shivering in the cold wind at the back of the dragon carriage was…

Igor’s Subordinate: “…This seems to be quite the spectacular scene.”

At the voice from behind her, Elsa slowly turned around. The person approaching her, standing by the dragon carriage, was a young man in warm clothes with a thin smile on his face… Igor’s protégé.

Elsa’s dark eyes narrowed at the young man who had appeared alone on the front lines without an escort.

Elsa: “You’re not to move from the command base. That’s what I thought, at least…”

Igor’s Subordinate: “I was planning to do that. But if Viktor Orcos moves, that’s a different story. I’ve been deployed here for that purpose. Although…”

Cutting his words off, the young man smiled scornfully at the corpse of the robust man lying on the snow.

Igor’s Subordinate: “I guess I didn’t even have a role to play. Bowel Hunter, you’re even better than they say.”

Elsa: “I’m not sure I can honestly accept your praise in my current situation. Why do you need to come out when he… Viktor Orcos moves, I wonder?”

Igor's Subordinate: "…Why do you think that is?"

Maintaining a smile on his face, the young man kept a distance of about ten meters from Elsa. Oddly enough, the snowfall had temporarily ceased, and there was nothing between them to obstruct their eyesight or voices. Her arms were unmovable, and her weapons were not at hand… her heart was beating awfully noisily in her chest.

Elsa: "…"

The prone man… according to the young man's words, he was Viktor Orcos himself. He was the source of this incident, and a traitor who treated his people like slaves.

Although, if that was the case…

Elsa: "…It's very odd that the children in the dragon carriage are dressed so warmly."

Behind Elsa, inclining her neck in puzzlement, there were no less than fifteen children squeezed into the dragon carriage. All of them were around ten years old, and their clothes were warm furs and other heavy outfits for the cold…

Elsa: "That's not the kind of clothing slaves are dressed in."

Igor's Subordinate: "What makes you say that…?"

Elsa: "Personal experience. Tattered rags and beaten wounds, filthy skin, and dirty hair. It's unnatural to have none of that."

The young man's face stiffened slightly as Elsa dug up a memory and answered plainly. With a fake smile, the annoyed subordinate scratched his head and spoke.

Igor's Subordinate: "You're Igor-sama's favorite, so I don't want to harm you…"

Elsa: "Don't worry. I have no interest in Baron-sama. He's too fat."

Igor's Subordinate: "I see. …Then, I won't hesitate!"

In response to Elsa’s reply, the young man unfolded his palm at her. From that palm, a dazzling, shining white light shot out. …That is, a hidden life form of light with supernatural power.

Elsa: “…An Acolyte Knight contracted with a spirit.”

Immediately following Elsa’s mention of the young man’s identity, several rays of destructive power unleashed from that white light.

Then the light swallowed the motionless Elsa, and yet still it continued on, the bright blast bathing the snowfield in white.

9

Upon awakening, Elsa observed her surroundings with her usual state of mind.

Whether she woke up in a tranquil bed, in the midst of an enemy encampment, or even from a nap in a disastrous scene of blood and guts, that never changed. It was a habit that had been deeply ingrained into her body.

Ever since she had taken that devil’s hand over ten years ago, that had been so—.

Elsa: “…Where am I?”

???: “Looks like you noticed.”

It was a modest room made out of stone, one she had no recollection of. As she looked around the room inquisitively, a voice called to her from the side. Shifting her attention to that direction, she was a little surprised. She had already sensed the presence, but its identity was the cause for her shock.

Sat cross-legged on the floor, with their brawny arms crossed and eyes closed was a grey haired swordsman, and—

Elsa: “I’m sure I had bitten off your throat, though.”

???: “So that’s the first thing you check after waking up? What an utterly horrid woman you are.”

Elsa: “Apologies. It’s in my nature. So, would it be correct to assume that you are Viktor Orcos?”

Viktor: “—Indeed.”

As Elsa posed a question with her head tilted in doubt, the swordsman— the one who Elsa faced off against, and ought to have died a noble death, Viktor Orcos deeply nodded his head in response.

Viktor was draped in light white clothing, having removed the holy armor of an Acolyte Knight. The scar that ought to have been left on his exposed neck was nowhere to be found. The fatal wound that had been thrust into him by Elsa’s fangs, was nowhere to be found.

Elsa: “—The power of your Blessing, correct?”

Viktor: “Blessings and the like, are not as pure as the impression one would get from that word. The gospels used by the Witch Cult are of a similar nature, albeit to a different degree.”

Elsa: “Even though you’re an Acolyte Knight, you do not have faith. Well, it doesn’t really matter.”

With a response as indifferent as she had stated, Elsa loosened her vigilance towards Viktor. For the time being, it seemed that there was no need to worry about the situation suddenly developing into a fight to the death.

That could also be extrapolated from her current appearance. After all—

Elsa: “Why did you go to the trouble of letting me live when we ought to have fought to the death? You even went as far as to treat my wounds.”

Licking her lips, Elsa raised up both of her arms. They were wrapped in white bandages from her elbows to the fingertips, and she could also sense that healing magic had been applied.

But, it was the bout against Viktor that had caused these injuries in the first place.

Having fought to the death, she had certainly taken his life once. It was difficult to imagine that he would have given medical treatment to Elsa

And, at the moment when Victor gave a complex frown to Elsa’s question.

???: “Ah! Onee-san is awake! Viktor-sama, you lied to me again!”

As the door of the room was opened. a high-pitched voice pierced the interior. When Elsa looked over to see what was going on, she saw a red-haired girl pointing at the bed from the entrance.

She was a girl in her mid-teens with freckles and a sense of youthfulness on her face. As she glanced at Viktor,

Red-Haired Girl: “Even though I politely asked you to call for me as soon as she woke up. Viktor-sama you are always like this!”

Viktor: “Nora, you’re speaking too loud. Sorry for the delay in notifying you, but she just woke up. In other words, the promise was just about to be fulfilled. You were overeager with your denunciation.”

Nora: “You can’t fool me by saying complicated words! If you feel bad, then reflect on it! Go on!”

Viktor: “…I’m sorry.”

As Victor lowered his head, the girl called Nora exhaled in satisfaction. Seeing that, Elsa wore a rare expression of slight surprise.

The warrior’s presence gave a fierce indication that as a "former" Acolyte Knight, Viktor’s strength was incomparable to that of an ordinary person. There was an indescribable pathos in the sight of such a person being rebuked by a single girl.

At the same time, Elsa noticed that she had a recollection of seeing Nora.

Elsa: “You… were the girl from that dragon carriage. I remember you. After all, you were in the front trying to protect the other children."

Nora: "…"

Nora's cheeks stiffened when Elsa identified her. Still, she stoutly refused to avert her eyes from Elsa. That was admirable.

The dragon carriage in question— that had been the cause of the battle between Elsa and Viktor, so she must have witnessed their fight.

Of course, she also would have seen Elsa bite out Viktor's throat. And even though that ought to have been the case,

Elsa: "And yet, you went as far as to treat my wounds. These bandages were also applied by you, correct?"

Nora: "H-How…?"

Elsa: "A faint hint of your scent remains on these bandages. I have a good sense of smell."

Elsa lightly snorted her nose, and Nora could not help but be at a loss for words. That reaction convinced Elsa that her guess was correct.

In addition, it was likely the girl who had suggested that Elsa be treated and protected. Viktor was coerced to comply, that seemed to be the rough gist of things.

The question was, why had such a thing occurred?

Elsa: "So, can I ask you what exactly happened?"

Viktor: "…I was also dead for a period of time. Hence, I can only talk about what happened after I revived."

Elsa: "Yes. I don't mind. I also remember being attacked by a new Acolyte Knight."

Right after she bit off Viktor's throat— when she was assailed by the young man who was Igor's retainer and had rushed to the scene, her memories came to a halt. While being an Acolyte Knight with phenomenal powers, the young man had cunningly concealed his abilities.

With both her arms wounded, she should have suffered an utterly one-sided defeat by that young man.

Viktor: "I was able to revive in time before my core shattered. Thanks to that, I was able to fight off the Acolyte Knight. Then, I pulled the dragon carriage in place of the dead earth dragon and retreated."

Elsa: "Pulling a dragon carriage in place of an earth dragon… Oh, I kind of wish I could have seen that."

Viktor: "…"

Elsa: "—? Is something wrong?"

Elsa tilted her head at Viktor when he balked at her honest opinion. However, ignoring that question of Elsa's,

Viktor: "After that, I brought you back, gave you medical treatment, and monitored you until you awakened. That is all."

Elsa: "I see… Even so, you seem to have a very different personality from what I've heard."

According to her employer, Baron Igor Kenash, Viktor Orcos was a despicable individual who betrayed the Holy Kingdom and preyed on the population of his domain for human trafficking purposes. However, there was not even the slightest hint of a small man's vulgarity in the actual Viktor. Their stand-off was also a fair and honest one.

Of course, such vulgarity did not always align with one's human nature, but—.

Viktor: "And, what exactly have you heard?"

Elsa: "That you are a slave trader who sells the subjects of your domain to other countries as slaves. A traitor who, the moment news of his business leaked out, secluded himself to his domain in order to hold down the fort while persisting in a rebellion that had no chance for victory…or something like that.”

Viktor: “I see. I guess it’d be something around that.”

Nora: “That’s…not even close! For what kind of reason would they be calling Viktor-sama like that?!”

Viktor and Nora each took a different extreme in their response to Elsa, who conveyed the facts without paying an ounce of consideration. Viktor scornfully smirked with a sense of resignation and Nora’s face was red with indignation.

Elsa nodded her head with an “Indeed” in agreement with Nora’s anger

Elsa: “The slave trade is just another business. It does a wonderful job of providing value to those who have none, and selling them. To disparagingly show contempt for that act, is quite a cruel thing to do.”

Nora: “Th-That’s not what I was mad about…”

Elsa: “—?”

Nora: “What I’m angry about is the lie that Viktor-sama is enslaving everyone in town!”

With a heart filled with rage, Nora drew closer to Elsa with that momentum. Her advance was stopped by Viktor, who extended his arm, but her words reached Elsa firmly.

And so did the fact that the contents of those words differed to the circumstances Elsa was aware of.

Viktor: “I don’t expect you to believe me, but what you have been told was falsified information. There is not a single shameful deed being carried out in the Orcos Domain. Everything was Igor’s schemes, false accusations.”

Elsa: "…"

Viktor: "The slave trade in question, it's ringleader is none other than Igor himself. Proceeding with my investigation to try and prosecute that, I was fine with transporting those girls as slaves until I could secure them, but…"

Giving a sidelong glance to the girl beside him, Viktor cast his eyes down in lament. When she looked at Nora who watched over Viktor anxiously, Elsa could imagine the unspoken tale that lay beyond those words.

And, the words he spoke were likely true. The "merchandise" present within the dragon carriage were wearing decent clothing, and Igor's retainer had turned on Elsa the moment she pointed that out.

Elsa: "In essence, you're trying to say I was set up."

Viktor: "…Precisely. Igor's crafty scheme was thorough, wasn't it? That guy's good at currying favor with those in power. My explanations will no longer reach anyone in the Holy Church. I thought I knew all there was to know about the corruption in this country, but I was… naive. Right now, I just feel deeply sorry to all the citizens who got caught up in it."

The brunt of his feelings of helplessness was not for his own future, but for his sense of responsibility regarding the population of his domain.

The imagination she had wrung out was correct. Viktor had been treated as a rebel on such a large scale. At this point, it was difficult to believe that the Holy Kingdom would abandon this course of action.

Elsa: "So then? Just what might be your objective in telling me such a story?"

Viktor: "…"

Elsa: "To be honest, I'm not really interested in whether what you just told me is true or not. I'm not saying that it doesn't matter, but the truth is painted over in the face of the outcome. Just like how earth is covered by snow. That's how it is in this country, isn't it? Neither you nor I can escape that rule."

Viktor: "That's quite harsh. Nevertheless, it's correct."

Rather than cold-hearted, it was more appropriate to call Elsa's answer indifferent, even while being informed on the situation. In response, Viktor sarcastically contorted the corner of his mouth and tapped Nora on the shoulder beside him.

Viktor: "I desire nothing from you. I'll just say this, don't go on a rampage… Moreover, it was on Nora's request that you were saved. I was going to leave you in the snow."

Elsa: "I see. In that case, why did you?"

With Viktor's hand still on her shoulder, Nora faced Elsa. Nora's gray eyes and Elsa's black eyes were reflected in the other's.

Then, as the girl cleared her throat,

Nora: "…Because I just didn't want you to die. Is that not good enough?"

Elsa: "…"

Nora: "The Holy Church, the Holy King, and the Benevolent Mother teach us to treat all forms of life with compassion. I, too, was saved by Viktor-sama right before I was really about to die… that's why."

Elsa: "But that Gustekan Holy Church is now trying to destroy the Orcos Domain. Yet you still do so?"

Nora: "I was saved by the teachings. I will never forget that, even if the teachings turn their back on me."

Elsa's eyes narrowed at Nora as she declared that so resolutely. The girl's eyes were filled with tears, which even now were on the verge of streaming down her stiffened cheeks. Still, she did not avert her eyes, she did not hang her head, and she spoke her mind.

That was an extremely sweet stimulation that made Elsa's heart throb.

Elsa: "—I'm sure, your insides must be very beautiful."

Nora: "Huh?"

Viktor: "Don't make too many imprudent remarks. If I see you as a danger, I'll chop your head off immediately."

With a lustrous smile, Viktor gave a warning to Elsa's methods of giving high praise. He sheltered Nora behind him, who wore a look on her face that suggested she did not understand, and he had his hand on the hilt of the sword at his waist.

To that excess of caution, Elsa showed off her bandage-covered arms, and,

Elsa: "I was joking. Look at this. I'm unable to do anything very dangerous."

Nora: "Viktor-sama! You're talking to a wounded person!"

Viktor: "…Fine."

With Elsa and Nora having rebuked him, Viktor had no choice but to put away his hostilities.

Viktor: "It's Nora's request. We'll treat you as our guest for a while, but… once you're able to move, you have to leave here as soon as possible. Eventually, Igor's forces will close in."

Elsa: "Oh yes. I may have failed to die, but they already consider me to be an enemy."

Was her survival a miracle of the Benevolent Mother, or was it perhaps on the whims of the devil? Either way, Viktor's opinion that she should not stay here too long was valid.

Elsa: "Then I'll stay without reservation, I'll be in your care until I can move."

Viktor: “Rest up well during your stay. We’re scarce, but if there’s anything you need, you can ask Nora.”

Elsa: “Is that so? Well in that case, I have a favor to ask her right away.”

When Elsa bit at the generous offer, Viktor and Nora both widened their eyes. Elsa gave a slight smile to the two.

Elsa: “—A crochet hook and some yarn, could I have some? It’s a hobby I use to pass the time.”

As the two of them were told that, they were quite surprised.

10

Nora: “Onee-san, I don’t know what to make of you….”

With a dismayed sigh, Nora was lying down on her bed as she gave such an evaluation of Elsa. Elsa herself tilted her head at the girl’s comment with a confused look on her face.

Elsa: “Is that so? Though I am merely spending my time in my own way, just as I would have thought myself to do.”

Nora: “In your own way? How exactly?”

Elsa: “Following my intuition, I guess. It’s my nature to follow my instincts when it comes to thinking about things after all.”

Nora: “And the result of those instincts, is knitting to pass the time when you’re badly hurt? Even going as far as to borrow the hands of another?”

With bitter feelings harborted in her youthful face, Nora concentrated on the task at hand. In the girl’s small hands were a crochet hook and a skein of yarn, and she knitted with restless, poor movements.

And all of this was in place of Elsa, who had injured both her arms.

Elsa: “You’re quite good at this. It’s worth my while to teach you.”

Nora: “Not that I’m not happy to receive compliments, but even if my knitting improves now…”

Elsa: “The things you learn will not be in vain. All the more if you don’t become a slave.”

Having extolled Nora with praise, Elsa was in good enough of a mood to let the girl continue her knitting. But, Nora’s hand stopped at those words, and Elsa let out a "What?" with raised eyebrows.

Nora: “Onee-san, um… have you ever been a slave?”

Elsa: “Was there the brand of slavery on my body, I wonder?”

Nora: “There… weren’t any, but…”

Responding to Nora’s question in a roundabout way, Elsa chuckled “Then there’s your answer”.

Generally— though this was common knowledge in the slave trade, it was common practice for slaves to be branded on their backs. It was a ritual to show ownership and to painfully remind the slave themself that their body was no longer their own.

A slave did not need a sense of self. They would be stripped of that right at the beginning. Branding was a rite of passage in that regard.

Elsa: “But slavery is a slave’s only way of life. I have no intention to deny that.

As long as you give up your own way of living, you will at least remain tied to life. And in this country, that’s a luxury.”

Nora: “Onee-san, you think it wouldn’t be so bad to become a slave?”

Elsa: “I don’t want to be one. That’s why I ran away. —There, turn that over.”

Nora widened her eyes at the assertion that seems to overturn her previous view. Not caring about the reaction, Elsa nonchalantly gave the next instruction and turned her attention out of the room.

In response to the earlier conversation, Nora was absorbed in knitting and thinking. She had not noticed, but there have been frequent signs of people coming and going in front of the room since a few minutes ago.

Elsa: "…"

With every nerve in her body on edge, Elsa focused her attention on those signs of people coming and going.

The sound of footsteps and breathing could be heard. Multiple signs caused her skin to tingle with wariness. The echoes of footsteps and the number of people milling about gave her an idea of the approximate size of the building.

It was a big building in its own right. Although not quite as grand as Igor's mansion, the architectural style of the atmosphere was quite close. Perhaps it was Viktor's mansion.

If he opened up his mansion to the fiefdom and used it as a base of operations, it made sense given his character. The robustness of the building could not be compared to that of an ordinary house. — Though it would be all the same if they were forced into a corner.

Elsa: "But, you seem to be cherished by everyone."

Nora: "—?"

Elsa's whispered tone of voice made Nora, who was concentrating on the task at hand, look at her curiously.

Nora could never understand. The signs of coming and going outside the room— they were Viktor's men, who were worried about Nora, who had been left in the room with Elsa. Given Elsa's position and title, their concern was justified.

On the other hand, Nora's presence was also a deterrent to their response to Elsa. One would think that Elsa, held as a prisoner of war in enemy territory, would be an outlet for their anger. The fact that this had not been the case was largely due to Nora's presence beside Elsa.

As a result, Nora contributed to her surroundings in a way that did not create unnecessary conflict.

Elsa didn’t know the extent to which Viktor had intended for that to happen.

Nora: “Here, and then like this… I did it, I think.”

Elsa: “Let me see.”

The doll that had been presented to her without much confidence had followed Elsa’s instructions carefully, so it was quite well made. If this was her debut work, it went far above the grade needed to pass; Nora was suited to knitting.

Elsa: “A wonderful job. Your fingers are quite dexterous, so you can do more than just be a slave.”

Nora: “…Onee-san, you’re not very good at complimenting people.”

Elsa: “Is that so? I guess so. I get told that quite often.”

With the doll placed in her bandaged, crippled hand, Elsa responded without much of a care. Nora sighed deeply in response and continued, "But…"

Nora: “I’m glad to hear you say I’m good with my hands. I don’t want to be a slave either.”

Elsa: “I see.”

The more one could do, the more paths opened up for them to live by other than being a slave.

Having understood Elsa’s words of wisdom, Nora digested them as she spoke. Elsa responded indifferently to the answer, yet pulled the doll to her chest.

As a matter of fact, no matter how much Nora thought about the future, there was no future for the Orcos Domain.

The Gustekan Church was using Igor, working with the intention of formally covering up any scandal.

That was why—

Elsa: “If you have something you want to say, you might as well say it.”

Nora: “—Hk.”

Elsa: “I’m not very good at understanding people’s feelings. So if you don’t tell me, I won’t know. And I owe you a debt of gratitude for saving me. Lending and borrowing is the principle of settling debts.”

Nora, who had been looking at Elsa holding the doll with mystified eyes, choked up. It was a casual remark, but Elsa did not tell unnecessary lies. Her words came from the heart.

—The act of lending and borrowing to clear debts. As the Bowl Hunter, it was one of Elsa’s few beliefs.

Elsa: “Naturally, there is a limit to what I can do.”

Nora: “…”

As if in thought, Nora turned over and fell silent. Elsa quietly waited for the girl to speak as the blood drained from her face and her exhalations quickened.

Frankly, if nothing else, that was fine. She’d like to settle the debt, but if the other party didn’t want to, that would be their decision. She would respect that. Though Elsa felt a little bad about it.

Nora: “S-Save…”

Elsa: “…”

Therefore, Elsa, who was prepared for nothing to be proposed, was only momentarily slow to react.

She looked up to see Nora, fists clenched in her lap, staring at Elsa as if she were gritting her teeth. The girl then repeated the words of her wish in a trembling voice.

Nora: “Please, save me… Viktor-sama, and everyone else, they say we have no choice but to fight. But even if we fight…”

They had no chance of winning. Nora also understood the tragic resolution that the adults had set in place. With that understanding, perhaps the girl was prepared to do the same.

However, if there was any hope to be found, the likes of any young resolve would easily be shattered.

At the girl’s wish, Elsa looked down at the doll, which was housed in her bountiful bosom. Elsa exhaled a small sigh as she looked into the eyes of the amateurish doll, and,

Elsa: “I guess I have to pay back what I owe, right?”

Without looking at the teary-eyed girl, she simply muttered that.

11

Even at night, which served as a symbol of serenity, the Kingdom of Gusteko was disconnected from the concept of stillness.

Outside the building, heavy snow blew violently in a storm, and thick, fast clouds overlooked the land endlessly. With both visibility and sound so hectic, it was possible to have the silence submit.

—Hence, it was easy for Elsa to slip out of the building, even if it had a watchman standing guard.

The likes of impaired arms were no problem whatsoever for an agent like herself.

Elsa opened the door to her assigned room and majestically slipped through the corridor in which the guard was standing. If she lurked in the gaps between consciousnesses and slipped past the watchful eye at a quick pace, she would not be caught.

Without making a sound, even leaving her shadow behind, she easily left the building; as expected, the building standing amidst the snow was the mansion of Viktor Orcos, located in the innermost place of the Orcos Domain.

Bonfires burned in the surroundings of the building, and lights for the guards could be seen here and there in the distance. The scent of excitement and caution that pervaded the surrounding area was probably evidence that Igor’s forces had invaded quite deep into the Orcos Domain.

Just before Elsa deserted the warfront, a joint operation with the "Crimson Hunting Squad" was in its final stages. Even if Elsa was missing, it would not cause Logres and the rest to change their strategy.

If that was the case, it would not be long before this place became a battlefield—

Elsa: “—Since you’re the main force, I’m not sure it’s a good idea for you to be staying up so late.”

???: “This body, though abominable, bears the qualifications of a Saint. It is needless to worry.”

Elsa looked back at the house, and Viktor, clad in a fighting spirit that could melt the snow, answered her question.

He wore a white cloak and had two katanas at his waist, ready for battle. Oddly enough, this situation bore a close resemblance to the battlefield where the two had initially met.

The problem was Elsa’s arms, and her lack of weaponry. Against an Acolyte Knight on a blizzard night, the situation was suddenly unfavorable.

Elsa: “What a thrill.”

Despite knowing that the situation was against her, Elsa’s cheeks flushed with excitement and she exhaled. She was in a state of euphoria, and her thinly-clad body was beginning to radiate heat from within.

In a world of extreme cold where even one's life would be in danger, the dense smell of death and the woman's lust overflowed, coloring the very essence of life and death.

However, when Elsa was unable to control her excitement, Viktor spoke,

Viktor: "Don't misunderstand. I have no intention of getting into a fight with you here."

Elsa: "…Is that so?"

Viktor: "I cannot agree to the reason for your disheartenment, but yes. —You're just leaving, right?"

Elsa felt disappointed by the peace offer as Viktor closed one eye in restraint. At these words, Elsa pulled back her chin and turned her gaze toward Viktor's mansion,

Elsa: "Indeed. I'm indebted to you, and I didn't kill anyone. So now you're going to let me do as I please."

Viktor: "I don't think you would do this, but I have no intention of letting you rejoin Igor's forces. If that's what you intend to do, I would need to stop just that."

Elsa: "Before I answer your question, could you tell me what the results would be depending on my choice?"

Viktor: "I would like to take Nora's wishes into consideration to the maximum extent possible. Nora tried to save you. If possible, I don't want to have to bury that corpse of yours under the snow."

Because of the girl's wish, Viktor gave his sharpened fighting spirit a slight reprieve.

Once someone was buried in snow, they would never be found unless that snow melted. And in Gusteko, there was no such thing as snow that melted naturally. Hence, that sleep would be eternal.

Burying someone in the snow was the most ruthless burial in the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko.

Elsa: "…"

Confronted with such a choice, Elsa silently pondered.

In this situation, Viktor's attitude was seemingly lenient. The options he presented implicitly showed Elsa a way to survive. If he was truly concerned for the good of his domain and was willing to suppress any anxiety, he should cut down Elsa without hesitation.

However, if that were to be mentioned, then the very act of taking Elsa into his dragon carriage was strange in the first place. And if therein lay an aim of Viktor's outside of lenience, then—

Elsa: "—I'll kindly do as I please. That will not change."

Exhaling a white breath, Elsa left the final conclusion of her pondering to intuition.

Viktor, who had been touching the hilt of his katana, paused for a moment in silent contemplation as Elsa's answer was given. But eventually, he slowly released his hand from the sword and straightened his half-slung posture.

Viktor: "Go now."

Elsa: "…If we get the chance, let's fight to the death once more, shall we?"

To that farewell, Viktor exhaled, and Elsa walked away with a smile on her face. With Viktor's gaze on her back, Elsa waved her bandaged hand.

While holding the doll Nora had made in that hand, Elsa disappeared in the falling snow.

Viktor: "—Will she amount to being a stray arrow? No, this will just be a vain struggle in the end, won't it?"

As she disappeared, Viktor Orcos muttered one last time without being heard—.

Igor: “Oh! Elsa, you’ve returned!”

In the warm hall, Elsa received a warm welcome from an obese man— Igor Kenash.

He was Elsa’s employer, and the leader of the Purification Operation of the Orcos Domain, stroked his ample belly and smiled fondly at her upon her return.

The smirk on his face twisted into a quizzical look when he noticed the bandages on Elsa’s arms,

Igor: “Hmm? What happened to your arms? Your beautiful fingers are ruined!”

Elsa: “There was a battle. When trying to take the lives of others, it is inevitable that injuries will be sustained.”

Igor: “If so, is that why you returned wounded? Makarista, damn useless bastard…!”

Biting his nails in frustration, Igor revealed his discontent with the ineptitude of his retainer— the Acolyte Knight called Makarista, rather than Elsa, who had returned.

Apparently, the clash between Elsa and Makarista had not been communicated to him. It was possible that there was a lapse in communication, alternatively, there was a chance that Makarista had been killed by Viktor

If that was the case, Elsa was a little disappointed. —She had yet to see the bowls of a Spirit user.

Elsa: “Well, that’s fine… who are those two?”

Putting aside her disappointment, Elsa pointed behind Igor— to the two young individuals standing there. They were young men, around twenty years old, like two peas in a pod. Were they perhaps twins? At least, they were not faces she had seen in the mansion before the Purification Operation, and they stuck to Igor tightly.

With a powerful ambiance, they bore shining holy armor that had been engraved with the Holy Seal. Without a doubt, they must have been members of the Acolyte Knights.

Elsa: “While I was away, you’ve acquired new guards… I presume?”

Igor: “They were dispatched from the higher ups. These right here are proof that my role is considered important by the Church. If anything happens to me, the attack on the Orcos Domain will fall apart. The only way for Viktor Orcos to break out of this situation is to target that, no matter how desperate it would be. Even a fool could make such predictions”

Elsa: “And for that purpose you have been granted Acolyte Knights. Quite the lavish hospitality.”

At Elsa’s words, which could be taken either as admiration or sarcasm, the faces of the young Acolyte Knights stiffened. But, Igor raised his hand to them and shook his head, "No, no."

Igor: “Don’t stimulate them too much, Elsa. For these Acolyte Knights, onto whom celibacy is imposed, your allure is too strong a poison. We cannot allow the sweet scent of debauchery to cause them to make a mistake.”

Elsa: “Your phrasing is a tad abstruse. I’m not very good at understanding such things.”

Igor: “That shall do fine. If a woman is beautiful, it is best for her to not be wise. A wise woman goes further than necessary. A woman does not need to do such speculation. If she can just be loved as a wallflower, that’s all that matters.”

It was quite irrational, but Elsa did not feel particularly strongly about his words.

They to whom only bad ideas come might as well be asleep. Dimwittedness was a waste of time to bother with, Elsa agreed on that. Therefore, Elsa followed her instincts. And as a result of following them—

Igor: “In any case, you have done well to return, Elsa. I am overjoyed for your return. Worry not about your wounded arms. It’s more important that you don't have any on that face and body of yours."

Elsa: "Is that so? Why's that?"

Igor: "After all, you will no longer need those limbs of yours."

With a vile smile, Igor spoke gruesomely. Elsa frowned at his significant comment. —Even faster than that, the two Acolyte Knights behind him sprung into action.

Elsa: "…"

A moment later, Elsa's vision was broken diagonally by a flash of tremendous sharpness that cleaved the wind.

The only reason it barely missed was because she had anticipated a surprise attack. A blow quicker than the speed of sound, if unanticipated, would be nearly impossible to avoid.

The two knights still continued with their method of attack, the sound of slicing wind circling overhead.

Elsa: "Twin whips… Truly, it's one interesting fighting style after the other with you Acolyte Knights, isn't it?"

Viktor used katanas, Makarista used a spirit, and the two in front of her used a dual-wielding style with whips— The twin knights freely wielded twin whips, in other words, four lines at the speed of sound, raged and dominated the room.

Elsa: "Though I thought there had been no report of the breakdown between your retainer and I?"

As Elsa moistened her lips with fighting spirit and posed a question, Igor smiled as he took a wide step back and detached himself from the battlefield.

Igor: "Mm. That's the first I've heard of that. I merely punish those whom I'm suspicious of. —I was just going to eliminate all elements that were not in the prior plan. In your case, I was planning to cut off your arms and legs and make you my beloved concubine once matters were settled. Till then I kept up my act."

Elsa: "Is that so? —Now, for the first time, I have grown fond of you. Quite a nice hobby you have."

When Igor revealed his cruel nature to her, Elsa responded with a beaming smile. Igor's nose puffed out in excitement at the beauty which could send shivers down one's spine,

Igor: "Then, will you be my favorite mistress by offering your arms and legs to me? It won't hurt."

Elsa: "It's hard to decline that offer…but I'm sorry. I put my hobbies first."

She didn't mind pain. It was true there was an exciting aspect to Igor's proposal. —But more than that, Elsa prioritized her own pleasure.

That was to say,

Elsa: "I'm going to give love to the insides of your bellies."

Immediately following that declaration of the Bowel Hunter's desires, the twin whips of the Acolyte Knights engulfed the Great Hall.

Marble walls and expensive carpets were mercilessly destroyed as dust filled the space. The tip of the whips manipulated by knights' had countless fine thorns, which made for a brutal contraption that ripped the flesh of its prey from its bones.

Even a mere graze would leave one with a serious injury. In a battlefield where they closed in like snakes moving at the speed of sound, Elsa, her arms dangling, swept through them with a gliding, dancing gait.

The concept of floors, walls, and ceilings became meaningless in Elsa's gait through space. Up and down, left and right, Elsa leapt around the hall, tracing the gaps of the whip attacks.

Igor: "What, what the hell are you doing, you Acolyte Knights?! The blessing granted to you by His Eminence is weeping!”

With the expectation that it would be an instant victory betrayed, Igor’s spittle flew as he rebuked the Acolyte Knights. The expressions of the twins remained unchanged at those words, however the speed and sharpness of each of the twin whips increased all the more.

Faster than sound, faster than wind, the whiplashes accelerated. However—

Elsa: “—Very good. But, it’s not enough.”

As the whips grazed her toes and glided across her black braid, Elsa smiled in ecstasy.

The coordination of the twin Acolyte Knights was superb. Their dual-wielded whips compensated for each other’s blind spots and never allowed the enemy to breach their high-speed attack range. Once the whip caught the enemy, a barrage of lashes would rush toward the stationary opponent, uprooting them.

If it landed, it was a tactic that guaranteed certain victory— hence, it was lacking in minute maneuvers.

Elsa: “For example, what if I do this?”

Elsa leapt directly above the hall as whip shots exploded beneath her feet. The twins followed the shadow and chose to pursue it with their whips, but that was an error in judgment.

Directly above the great hall, Elsa’s kick shattered an enormous crystal chandelier, and the massive mass fell to the ground in one fell swoop. Even a lash that was effective against the human body would not be powerful enough against such a large inorganic object.

Acolyte Knights: “—Hk!”

Jumping quickly to the left and right, the twin Acolyte Knights avoided being crushed by the crystal chandelier. A thick plume of smoke rose, and the whips of the counterattack cracked loudly as they aimed at the shadow standing in the middle of the plume,

Elsa: “—Yes, Got you.”

Elsa grabbed the whip strikes that came at her from each side with her raised left and right arms. Sharp thorns dug into her hands through the bandage, but Elsa didn’t let the pain bother her. Then, faster than the gasping Acolyte Knights, she turned the tip of the whip in her hands to the fittings of the fallen crystal chandelier,

Elsa: “Will your judgment continue to overlap now that you two are separated?”

Tying the whip to the damaged crystal chandelier, Elsa kicked it vigorously away. The super-heavy illumination spun and blew away, and the Acolyte Knight connected by the whip was swept up by its momentum.

Of course, if he let go of the whip, he would be freed from this violent storm. But even if they were twins, their thoughts are not linked. Due to the unforeseen circumstances, a momentary separation in their time was yielded.

Elsa: “How was that? Do you feel it?”

Sliding over to the twin whose judgment had lapsed, Elsa grabbed him by the face as she posed a question.

The other person’s throat tightened at her smile, and eyes darkened with fear. Immediately after, Elsa switched her position with the person she had grabbed and used him as a shield against whip lashes from behind her.

Having wounded his other half with sharp thorns, the unscathed twin’s throat clogged up. He must not cease his movements there. He had failed. Upon that discomposed face, Elsa cracked a whip that had fallen.

Acolyte Knight: “—Hk!”

Elsa: “Since you get along so well with your brother, I’ll give you the same wound. You can share in each other’s pain.”

With their faces gouged by whip lashes, Elsa pulled them both back with her whip in one fell swoop. Unable to resist her power, the twin Acolyte Knights collided head-on and collapsed to their knees in an embrace.

—Lined up torsos, overlapping bellies. Elsa removed the bandages from both arms and pulled out a kukri.

Elsa: "You were born with a blessing, weren't you? I'll give you two a blessing as well."

She smiled, stepped forward, and swung her blade with force.

With a single flash, the blessed holy armor was slashed in half across the twins' torsos. Divided by the upper and lower halves, the twin Acolyte Knights collapsed in a sea of fresh blood and guts.

Unable to even raise a cry of despair, the Acolyte Knights die before the madness of the Bowel Hunter.

Elsa: "…"

In the face of their dead corpses, Elsa folded her knees lightly and checked them carefully. Naturally, it was a fatal wound, no sign of life. Perhaps it was because they were not yet too familiar with their blessing, but they died in a single blow without reviving.

But, Elsa was more interested in what was inside the twins, who had worked so hard together—.

Elsa: "Ahh, how lovely. …Even though they are twins, their insides are still completely different."

She compared the color and shape of the scattered entrails with the tip of her kukri. Watching such a crazed Elsa, Igor, whose escorts were killed, opened and closed his mouth as if panting,

Igor: "A-Acolyte Knights, even them… And, ugh, your arms, were wounded…"

Elsa: "Oh, you mean these bandages? Though I was already fully healed from the beginning… I just didn't know when to unwind the bandages after all the trouble that had been taken to have them wrapped.”

In response to the weeping questioning, Elsa gracefully removed the nearly undone bandages.

Underneath, the skin was white without a scratch— not a single scar from Viktor’s sword or the thorn from the whip lashes she received from the recent battle.

Elsa: “Now then, time to deal with you…”

Igor: “W-Wait! What do you think…what do you think will happen to you if you kill me?”

Igor, whose face was drenched in greasy sweat, turned his voice inside out as Elsa enjoyed the twins’ intestines.

Igor: “I am now under the command of the Gustekan Church! If you kill me, you will become an enemy of the Holy Church… In other words, a great enemy of the Holy Kingdom…!”

Elsa: “A great enemy of the Holy Kingdom.”

At the sound of that, Elsa quietly closed her eyes. Igor gulped heavily at Elsa’s response, and he pinned his hopes on the words that followed. And then—

Elsa: “—That sounds very, very lovely.”

Her black eyes narrowed with a smile, they lit wet with murderous intent, and Igor screamed, "Eep". Then he backed away, and the man rushed off in a great hurry to the back of the hall— fleeing deeper into the mansion.

Igor: “A-Anyone! Anyone out there! Save me!!”

With a cracked voice calling for help, Igor ran deeper and deeper into the mansion.

The office at the far end of the mansion had a hidden passageway to escape outside.

If he could escape that far, if he could buy enough time, he wouldn't be caught by this horror—.

Igor: "Anyone! Save me… any, one…"

Igor ran frantically down the hallway and gasped for breath. There he finally realized the uncanniness of the situation.

More than twenty of Igor's mercenaries were waiting in the mansion. The reason why only two Acolyte Knights were brought to the hall was because he thought it would be enough to seize Elsa.

And yet, there was no sign of the mercenaries who should be there. He had shouted and not a single one showed themselves.

???: "—As expecteeed, Elsa is sooo picky."

The voice abruptly shook Igor's eardrums as he leaned against the wall and shrank back in eeriness.

It sounded to Igor like the voice of a young maiden. But the strange luster in her voice was not commensurate with her age, and the sound stirred panic.

Then he turned to the voice, and this time, Igor's mind reached its limit.

Igor: "Ah…"

???: "The people in this maaansion are all fatties so I don't like this. If Shadow Lion-chan gets fat, I'll make Elsa take the blame!"

The voice came from above. But Igor had no time to deal with that voice.

Igor's attention was riveted to the presence in front of him, the oral cavity lined with countless sharp fangs— a huge, mighty witchbeast with a wide-open mouth.

Even as his thoughts stopped, at the last moment Igor understood.

Slimy red wet fangs, he knew that this was the answer to why the mercenaries had not responded.

???: “Goodnight.”

That was the last voice Igor Kenash heard after all his debauchery and plotting.

13

After being thrusted by countless blades, Viktor Orcos finally stopped moving.

Logres of the Crimson Hunting Squad sighed as he looked down on Viktor, the target of Purification Operation, who bled profusely and had lost his right leg, and whose will to fight remained undiminished in the face of death.

Logres: “This isn’t a matter of him just being tough. It’s a miracle we survived…”

Crimson Hunter Squad Member 1: “Ditto.”

Crimson Hunter Squad Member 2: “I mean, I feel like half of me is dead.”

Crimson Hunter Squad Member 3: “My blood won’t stop either, though.”

The surviving members of the troupe verbally agreed with Logres, who was deflated with fatigue. Not a single one of them was unharmed. The number of members of the group were reduced by half, and it was truly a fight to the death.

Their location was the final stronghold of the Orcos Domain, the destroyed mansion of Viktor Orcos.

The Purification Operation, as Igor called it, had reached its conclusion, and after having pushed the rebels into their stronghold, Logres and his team magnificently overthrew Viktor and ended the battle.

Logres: “There were some huge casualties though. Shit. It would have been a lot easier with Elsa."

Four days earlier, the Bowel Hunter Elsa had gone missing during the operation— her absence had thrown a wrench in Logres' plans. Nevertheless, the reduced strength was compensated for by the entry of Makarista, who had revealed himself to be an Acolyte Knight.

Logres: "When it comes to an enemy that can kill Elsa, we had to prepare accordingly. That said, we incurred a net loss by setting up a precious magic stone to detonate, I thought we were done for when he endured with just one leg remaining."

True to his title of former Acolyte Knight, Viktor was indeed a monster.

Half of the Crimson Hunting Squad was cut down by Viktor, who was half-dead after one of his legs was blown off by an explosive mine. In the end, they were prepared to make sacrifices in order to earn a victory that was won by sheer numbers.

Logres: "Well, a win is a win. I'm not really in the mood for a mourning contest, but… have you got any last words?"

Viktor: "So the stray arrow, didn't make it in time, huh…?"

Logres: "Ahh?"

Languidly dropping his arms, Viktor muttered something regretful on the verge of death. The half-dead man dripped blood from his mouth to Logres, who was about to hear his last words,

Viktor: "To a whimsical stray arrow… I left the future of my domain…"

Logres: "—. That's a bit too much reliance on others. When you, the lord of the domain, went and did all that, this place was doomed. It was only natural for it to be destroyed.."

At the interrupted words, Logres clicked his tongue with disdain.

Logres himself was aware of what was behind the Purification

Operation. As he told Elsa, the unity of the Orcos Domain was disproportionate to the corrupt feudal lords. The Gustekan Church's practice of covering up dirty affairs was not uncommon.

—There was a ninety percent chance, Viktor had been set up.

But he had no means to reveal it, no way to uncover it, and no opportunity to do so. Because in this country, it is not the rightful truth, but the absurdly powerful that prevailed.

Makarista: "As that mercenary said, this is a situation created by your incompetence, that it is!"

Logres: "…You've come out, Makarista."

A high-pitched voice echoed, and a nervous-looking young man appeared in the collapsed hall. Makarista Perkin, Igor's confidant and acting commander of the operation.

Half of the slender young man's face was bandaged, and his bare eyeballs were bloodshot with anger. All of that pain and anger was directed at the dying Viktor.

Makarista: "I was going to repay you ten thousand times over for this wound, but here you are! You are truly an inferior person that I don't even have to deal with!"

Logres: "Who was the one who made a racket because they got their face cut off by that inferior someone…"

Logres muttered this only in his mouth so that Makarista, who spat out, did not hear.

In the meantime, the young man continued to curse at his enemy, but eventually he ran out of words,

Makarista: "Now then, let's shatter your very core, damned sinner. It is nauseating to think that an apostate like you was treated as a saint, even for a moment. You are a disgrace to the Acolyte Knights."

Sputtering, Makarista pointed his fingertips at Viktor's chest. As it was, an invisible force would destroy Viktor's body. —It was at that moment.

???: "—Oh dear, it seems I'm a little late."

The familiar glamorous voice blocked everyone present from moving.

With light footsteps, a lone woman landed in the devastation of the large hall. The woman, dressed in black and sporting a long black braid, gave the men, who stiffened, a terrifying look,

???: "Too bad. Seems like we didn't get the chance. Even though I had gone through so many troubles to prepare for this."

Logres: "…I had thought her a woman who wouldn't die even if killed, but this ain't the mood of a happy reunion."

Logres felt a sense of foreboding when he reunited with Elsa, a woman who tilted her head and whispered languidly.

All the while, Elsa's gaze passed by Logres and Makarista, staring at the dying Viktor. At her gaze, Logres also looked back at Elsa.

Viktor: "So the stray arrow has returned, huh…?"

Elsa: "—? No, I am the Bowel Hunter. I came back because I brought something that you wanted. In truth, if you wanted me to pass it over, I would've had us fight over it… At least that was what I was hoping for."

With that, Elsa held up a strange package that she was clasped in her right hand. It was a round, black package that was around an armful. —Its shape and size gave off an unpleasant premonition.

From Elsa's amused side-profile, he could imagine it wasn't anything good that had been wrapped up.

Elsa: "But it looks like both you and your domain are finished. This is a wasted souvenir, too bad."

Makarista: "…Ignoring everyone, that's as far as your carefree talk goes."

As Elsa shrugged her shoulders, Makarista interrupted her conversation.

The young man clawed at his blood-soaked bandage and stared at Elsa with hatred in his wide-open eyes.

Makarista: "How dare you, how dare you show your face in front of me like that? My face! My eyes! Gouged out! If we were to meet again, it'd be a fight to the death, even though you should have understood that!"

Elsa: "—? Indeed, that's exactly how it is."

At Makarista's blood-curdling exclamations, Elsa continued to be as nonchalant as ever. However, the current exchange made Logres understand the feud between them.

The scars on Makarista's face were things that had been carved by Elsa. And that was probably why Elsa had gone missing during the mission—.

Makarista: "Did you join this man and think you could win? This man's enemy was the Gustekan Church! The Holy Kingdom of Gusteko! His Eminence the Holy King himself…!"

Elsa: "You really are making the exact same mistake as your master."

At Makarista's bravado, Elsa untied the knot of the package in her hand. Instantly, the black package spread wide and it fell wildly to the ground, bouncing miserably.

—Having died with eyes and mouth wide open in horror, it was the head of Igor Kenash.

Logres: "…She went and did it."

Logres had an idea of what was inside, but when he saw the real thing, he covered his face and looked up to the sky. The members of the Crimson Hunting Squad reacted similarly, but Makarista was the only one who was utterly speechless.

The murder of Igor, who had become the general of the operation in accordance with the Holy Church's orders— it was nothing but an act of hostility against the Holy Church, as Makarista loudly claimed.

Elsa Granhiert had already nonchalantly made enemies of the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko.

Makarista: "Do you, understand what, you have done…"

Elsa: "I wish you'd stop with all that tedious talk."

At that moment, the dense smell of death and the demonic atmosphere overflowed, and transfigured the woman in front of him into the Bowel Hunter.

Elsa: "I do as I please. It doesn't matter if that enemy is the Church or the Holy Kingdom. In my not-so-smart way, I've put a lot of thought into this one."

Logres: "You put thought into it…? This can't be seen as anything other than a thoughtless result though."

Elsa: "Viktor Orcos. The Crimson Hunting Squad. And you, the Spirit-using Acolyte Knight."

Drawing her kukri, Elsa used its tip to indicate one man after another who was present there. Then she licked her tongue and soaked her black eyes in dark, wet lust,

Elsa: "I wonder how I'm going to get around to cutting open all of your bellies"

Logres: "Even us?"

Elsa: "Yes. I'm sure I'll have a lot of fun dancing with you guys."

Elsa responded with a wry smile to Logres's dismay. Logres was unnerved by the smile, which had no remorse whatsoever, and almost seemed childish.

But unlike Logres, Makarista seemed to think it was a load of nonsense..

Makarista: “It’s futile talking… Very well. In that case, I will enforce the death penalty as an Acolyte Knight!”

Elsa: “Does that mean you’re going to serve as my opponent?”

Makarista: “I’ll make you forget about being lucky enough to survive, and regret not having escaped!”

Makarista was enraged, and a pale light appeared around him. The light eventually transformed into a serpent with blue scales, and the Spirit manifested itself, exercising power outside of the ordinary.

Acolyte Knight Makarista Parkin— the most elite of the elite, sent by the Gustekan Church as a key figure in the Purification Operation at such a young age. He was a brilliant man who would have been expected to hold one of the most prominent positions in the Holy Church in the future.

—And therefore, he was pitiful.

To get involved with Elsa Granhiert, being targeted by her fetishes, whilst being unaware of her nature, which was more hideous than her strength, he spent the last two minutes of his life with the Bowel Hunter.

For those one hundred and twenty seconds of pain, fear, and despair, was the curtain close on his days of faith.

14

Elsa: “Oh my, if the Spirit-user dies first, their Spirit disappears as well.”

That was Elsa’s simple and succinct impression as she destroyed Makarista’s heart, causing him to let out the last shriek of his life.

The fallen Makarista had been cut repeatedly all over his body, especially in the abdomen, and he died. The horror of the battle was such that even Logres and his mercenaries, who were battle-hardened, wanted to avert their eyes.

Acolyte Knights, bestowed with a blessing, had a resilience and vitality that was unmatched compared to regular mortals. Although there are individual differences, Makarista's vitality was also not comparable to that of an ordinary person, and as a result, he was toyed with.

Elsa: “Next time I fight to the death with a Spirit-user, I'll have to open the Spirit's belly first. Until then, I'll just have to postpone the fun.”

Logres: “I really hate how you say such scary things, though…”

Logres called out timidly to Elsa, who whipped the blood stain from her kukri. Elsa turned around at the sound of his voice, "I guess so," she said, as she pulled her chin back,

Elsa: “You guys are still here. So, what are you going to do?”

Logres: “There's not anything for us to do… officially we're supposed to fight you to the death, but we're really not in the mood”

The details were unclear, but Elsa had turned on Makarista and Igor.

The Crimson Hunting Squad were an adversary, but the people who could order them to do so were collectively dead.

Logres: “You've thought it through to that extent, and then killed the master… I guess that's not the case though? Probably just took the opportunity to do it.”

Elsa: “Oh, my. How did you know?”

Crimson Hunting Squad Member 1: “Nah, ‘course we'd know.”

Crimson Hunting Squad Member 2: “As if we wouldn't know.”

Crimson Hunting Squad Member 3: “Ah, but now you can't take the opportunity to do so for us.”

Elsa widened her eyes at the words of mercenaries who understood her behavior. Then, as if understanding that it was not possible to fight in this atmosphere, her overflowing killing spirit disappeared. Regretfully.

Logres: "…And yet, how could you do all this in just four days? It's not easy to travel back and forth between Igor's mansion and the Orcos Domain."

Elsa: "Oh, that's easy. I borrowed legs from my sister."

Logres: "Sister…?"

Just as he frowned in question, Logres saw a huge shadow spring up behind Elsa. It truly was a foreign object that had suddenly crept into his purview, as if it had emerged from the shadows.

The beastly face, four legs, black fur, and terrifying demonic spirit — he knew it was a Witchbeast at first glance. As he recalled, that type of Witchbeast was nicknamed Shadow Lion. He couldn't come up with the exact name, though.

???: "—Viktor-sama!"

But, what was surprising was not the figure of the Witchbeast. What came as the next surprise was the red-haired girl who rolled off the back of that Witchbeast. A young girl with abrasions, who lacked the means to fight back, clung to the dying Viktor. At the sound of the girl's voice, Viktor turned his empty eyes. His life was right on the verge of ending.

Girl: "Viktor-sama! Viktor-sama! Don't, don't die…!"

Viktor: "—u."

Girl: "Eh?"

As the girl clutched at him, Viktor moved his lips and whispered something to her. Logres could not pick up what he had said. No one could hear it but the girl.

And with that breathless whisper as his last, the traitor Viktor Orcos died.

Logres: “Igor is dead, Viktor is also dead… man, just what kinda ending is this?”

The reunion with Elsa, the appearance of the strange Witchbeast, and the bereavement of the mysterious girl and Viktor— these events happened all at once before Logres’ eyes, and he groaned as he held his head in his hands.

A strange silence took over the place. But, it was the girl who broke the silence. She looked back at Elsa, whose thirsty eyes were opened wide,

Girl: “Why, why…?”

Elsa: “—?”

Girl: “Why, didn’t you save Viktor-sama, and everyone else… why?”

It was a terribly unrealistic question. Looking around at the devastation, it was easy to see the irrationality that has struck the Orcos Domain. As a young girl, albeit very young, born and raised in Gusteko, she fully understood the absurdity of the situation.

The situation was not something Elsa could have done anything about.

But, as Elsa tilted her head curiously at the question—

Elsa: “—Ah. When you said that, did you not mean only to save your life?”

Girl: “…Eh?”

Elsa: “To be precise, I thought you had only wanted for yourself to be saved, so I only saved your life, after that, I put my amusement first. I’m sorry.”

With a light bow and an evil look on her face, Elsa answered the girl’s question sincerely. There is not the slightest hint of a lie or hesitation in her voice. Therefore, everyone who heard her could believe her.

Those were the true thoughts of Elsa Granhiert, without exaggeration.

Girl: “Ah, AHHHHHHHH—!!”

The next moment, the girl grabbed Viktor’s broken katana and tried to lunge at Elsa. The girl’s screams were filled with murderous intent, and her hatred was focused on Elsa alone.

Crimson Hunting Squad Member 1: “Little miss!”

Crimson Hunting Squad Member 2: “There’s no use!”

Crimson Hunting Squad Member 3: “She’ll slice your belly open and kill you!”

However, the outburst was stopped by the men of the Crimson Hunting Squad. The strong men held her down, and the girl was unable to resist, yet she continued to raise her voice.

Girl: “Why…why! Die! I’ll get revenge for Viktor-sama! For everyone!”

Elsa: “That’s quite a terrible thing to say to the person who saved your life.”

Elsa shrugged her shoulders in frustration as the girl stared at her with bloodshot eyes and a wrathful look on her face.

Seeing her, Logres indeed felt sorry for the girl. He did not know the relationship between Elsa and the girl. But the girl had some kind of admiration and expectation of Elsa.

And that fleeting hope was incomprehensible to the monster known as Elsa.

Logres: “Elsa, leave already. It’s okay that we’re the only ones here, but if Igor’s other underlings find out, it’s going to be a mess. It’ll turn into another fight to the death.”

Elsa: “I wouldn’t mind that, though…”

Logres: “We would mind that! We survived, but we don’t want to have to fight out allies!”

Strictly speaking, there was some hesitation to call them allies, but Logres dared to say so. Elsa reluctantly sheathed her kukri.

She then turned to Witchbeast behind him and climbed up upon its back,

Elsa: “Oh yeah. About the girl, she doesn’t want to be a slave. So take her to a proper town. If you like, you could have her work at your place as well. She’s a girl, and her hands are dexterous, so you should have a use for her.”

Logres: “…This girl is definitely going to resent you.”

Elsa: “—Yes, that’s lovely. That girl and I will be bound together by hatred. She is going to keep that hatred bottled up in her body for a long, long time, and one day when we meet again.”

Removing her gaze from Logres, Elsa looked at the girl. The girl was still screaming with hatred as the men seized her—

Girl: “DIEEEEEEEEEEEE—!!”

Elsa: “—That is very, very lovely.”

With a countenance of a maiden in love, Elsa spoke thus with an ardent breath.

15

???: “As expecteeed, Elsa is a very stupid girl.”

The owner of that young voice said this with a great deal of dismay in her voice and demeanor.

The voice belonged to the girl in front of Elsa— straddling the back of the Witchbeast as it ran through the snow, being held against Elsa’s chest amidst the sensation of the breeze and tremors.

A girl with dark blue hair in a braid rested her head on Elsa whom just behind her,

Girl: “In the end, not only did you not get paid for being a mercenary, but now you are even wanted for killing a lot of important people. And on top of that, that girl resents you now, doesn’t she?”

Elsa: “Oh my, that’s terrible. But, it doesn’t really bother me. I have no lingering attachment to the Holy Kingdom… and thanks to that, I now have plenty of opponents to fight to the death.”

Girl: “You’ve made it difficult to operate in Gusteko, Mama will be fuuurious.”

Elsa smiled thinly and didn’t argue with the girl’s languidly elongated sentences. Instead, Elsa reached into her pocket and pulled out a woolen doll from it,

Elsa: “Yes, Meili. A new doll.”

Meili: “Geez, please don’t think I’m going to let this fool meee.”

The girl accepted the offered doll and patted the Witchbeast’s back, her cheeks puffed out in frustration. But the hands that held the doll were gentle, and she doubted if her true feelings were as good as her words.

Even that did not bring much emotion to Elsa.

Meili: “So, yeah, what’s next? Since it’s become difficult to do stuff in Gusteko, will we move away from the cold?”

Elsa: “I guess so. I yearn for demi-human guts soon. In Gusteko, you don’t see them anywhere but in slavery, after all.”

Meili: “There are only a few types of Witchbeast-chans. So then, shall we go Kararagi next?”

Elsa: “—How about Lugunica?”

Rejecting the option presented to her, Elsa followed her instincts and mentioned the name of that Kingdom.

The Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica— it was a fertile but somewhat distorted place, protected by the Dragon.

Meili: “Is that alsooo just based on a vague feeling?”

Elsa: “Yes, it is. —Lovely isn’t it?”

Elsa simply responded to the girl’s exhale of exasperation with an amused smile.

Forced to leave her birthplace, Elsa Granhiert traveled to the Dragon Kingdom. The fateful encounter that awaited her there was the beginning of a lovely destiny for her.

—But the Bowel Hunter, overflowing with lust at this very moment as she was, had no way of knowing that fact.

END

The Witch’s After Tea Party: Omega in Wonderland (LQ AI Translation)

1

With each step, and then another, pressing down deep, their body sank into the white snow.

Even under a clear sky without a blizzard, a snowy landscape was trouble. Piled high upon the earth, the white snow glittered a stark white, and one could not know what it hid beneath those crystals.

Would there be ground directly under the next step? Or perhaps the path would break off, and a natural trap would be complete, luring one toward a cliff concealed by a cornice.

Omega: “Thinking of it that way, doesn’t it make the next step hard to firmly take, Colette?”

Colette: “Uu… that’s right, it makes things difficult. Which leg should I put forward next, I wonder?”

Palmyra: “Omega! Don’t go planting unnecessary ideas! Colette, ignore her, ignore her!”

Noelle: “Palmyra-sama, lively chatter is all well and good, but you have come to a stop.”

What echoed across the snowfield, noisy as it was, were girls’ voices, each in their own way.

Of the four shadows advancing along the snowy path, two were in the lead, and two were falling behind. The energetic pair kept looking back again and again, concerned for the two lagging behind.

At that considerate remark, when the larger of the two lagging shadows faltered for words, the small shadow walking beside her—Omega narrowed her eyes,

Omega: “There is no need to let it weigh on you, Palmyra. Whatever about me, you are a girl who spent her days wanting for nothing in a well-off household; it would not be strange if you lacked stamina.”

Palmyra: “Are you… trying to encourage me with that? First off, even if that’s fine for me, what’s with your lack of stamina?”

Omega: “I can explain the logic. In this world, the vessel is influenced by the soul—that is the rule. In other words, I am clumsy at exercise from the soul up, lacking training.”

Palmyra: “Don’t say things that make me sad just hearing them!”

At Omega’s words, she shrugged her shoulders, and the flushed-faced Palmyra shouted, planting her hands on her knees.

Their feet, somehow pressing through the snow, came to a stop, and she desperately tried to steady her ragged breath that had turned white. At that sight, Omega snorted through her nose, and the two who had gone on ahead hurried back.

Omega: “What is this, you two, it’s a shame to waste the progress we made.”

Colette: “My! Omega-chan, how mean! Palmyra is this worn-out, and yet we could never go on ahead by ourselves. Right, Noelle-san!”

Noelle: “Indeed. From my perspective as far as Colette-sama is concerned, it is but a retreat within the margin of error.”

Omega: “A margin of error, is it. How much trouble do you think Palmyra and I will have to go through to make up for that margin?”

Palmyra: “D-Don’t… lump… me together… with you… haah.”

Palmyra, still unable to catch her breath, brushed aside the dark-navy hair hanging over her shoulder, and the one supporting her at her side was the youthful-faced Colette. The braided, chestnut-haired girl wore a concerned look of worry, anxious for her childhood friend who had left their home village together with her.

Omega: “Now, now, I would like you not to dote on Palmyra alone. You may not have noticed, but I’m on the verge of collapsing too, you know?”

Noelle: “It is not something to be proclaimed with such dignity… Nevertheless, compared to Omega-sama and Palmyra-sama, Colette-sama appears to be exceptional.”

Colette: “Eh? Me?”

At being singled out unexpectedly, Colette pointed at herself, eyes round.

Nodding at Colette’s reaction, Noelle was an Itinerant Preacher of the Gusteko Holy Church, worshipped in the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko—one of those who had undergone special training, and she excelled in stamina as well as combat ability.

Compared to someone like herself, Colette, who did not pale in terms of stamina, was worthy of surprise.

Omega: “However, things do have proper reasons. For example, Colette’s stamina, mismatched to her slender appearance, largely owes to the effect of the bracelet she carries.”

Noelle: “A bracelet, you say?”

Omega: “It is called the Beast Protection Bracelet. It is a memento left by her parents. Even if their flesh remains no longer, even now it protects Colette like that.”

At Omega’s chin-jerking indication, Colette lowered her brows and stroked the austere metal bracelet fitted to her right arm. Then, she went “Ah,” her eyes flying wide,

Colette: “That’s right! If this is the source of my energy, how about Palmyra trying it on too? Wouldn’t Palmyra get energetic as well? Waa, what a great idea!”

Palmyra: “Me? That bracelet of yours?”

Colette: “Yes, nothing ventured, nothing gained, right? Here you go, Palmyra.”

Smiling, Colette removed the bracelet and held it out to Palmyra. Palmyra looked back and forth between the bracelet and Colette’s face, then turned her eyes to Omega and Noelle as well.

Noelle tilted her head expressionlessly, and Omega gestured “By all means” with her hand. Following that, Palmyra slid her slender hand through the bracelet she had received—

Palmyra: “Urk.”

Colette: “Palmyra?!”

Her face instantly drained of color, she clapped a hand over her mouth and collapsed to her knees on the snow. With a cry, Colette rubbed Palmyra’s back. Unable to endure the nausea, Palmyra retched over and over, then, “Wh-What is… this…” she pushed the bracelet away from herself.

At the sight of the two, Omega picked up the bracelet that had fallen onto the snow,

Omega: “As expected, it seems the bracelet is already registered as Colette’s. If someone else tries to use it, it will pour Mana optimized to the registrant into them, and their Gate could well be destroyed. That area appears to be per the specification document.”

Noelle: “To hear you put it so… had you anticipated this outcome?”

Omega: “Yes. The result was largely as I predicted.”

Palmyra: “Drop dead, Omega…!”

Having verified the exactness of the specs, a most objectionable protest came from the retching Palmyra. At that remark, Omega tilted her head with the bracelet hooked on her fingertips.

Omega: “It is not good to use such bad words too much. What exactly are you dissatisfied about?”

Palmyra: “Don’t make me step into a pitfall when you know I’ll fall… you have awful taste, you…!”

Omega: “But the face you make when you fall into that pitfall can only be seen at that moment, can it not?”

Palmyra: “You have awful taste, you…!”

Repeating her complaint, Palmyra’s complexion was even paler than usual. Her stamina had bottomed out, and on top of that she had taken the counterattack from the Beast Protection Bracelet’s defense mechanism.

Omega: “Any further overexertion would endanger your life. We either leave Palmyra behind, or someone carries her; it is one of the two.”

Colette: “There’s no way we can leave her! The bracelet, give it back, Omega-chan! I’ll carry Palmyra on my back and go…!”

Omega: “Hold it, it is too soon to decide that.”

From Colette’s reaching hand, Omega deliberately kept the Beast Protection Bracelet out of reach. She could not keep it away. Colette took it back with ease, and the raised hand had nowhere to go down.

Even so, Colette did ask, “Why?” and properly played along with the conversation.

Colette: “What’s too soon? Palmyra looks really in trouble, you know?”

Omega: “She does. But is Palmyra the only dead weight you are bringing along?”

Colette: “Eh?”

Noelle: “In other words, you would like to be carried as well because you are about to collapse, Omega-sama?”

Omega: “Exactly.”

Perceptive Noelle made the inference, and Omega snapped her fingers and nodded deeply. Even without wearing the Beast Protection Bracelet, Omega’s degree of worn-outness was the same as, if not worse than, Palmyra’s. A body composed of Mana, depleted to the point that, if she was careless, it might start vanishing from her fingertips.

Omega: “Therefore, in terms of build, I think it wise for Colette to carry me, and for Noelle to carry Palmyra. What do you two think?”

Noelle: “I have no objection, but what of you, Colette-sama…?”

Colette: “I’m totally fine! Omega-chan is as light as a feather! More importantly, Noelle-san, are you sure you can be entrusted with Palmyra?”

Noelle: “Palmyra-sama, too, is as light as the remains of a bone-in cut, so there is no problem.”

Palmyra: “Wh-What is that… that simile that makes me feel pointlessly bad…”

Even Palmyra’s muttered abuse lacked its usual vigor entirely.

Thus, with the hearty assent of the two brimming with stamina, it was decided that Omega, like a feather, and Palmyra, like the remains of a bone-in cut of meat, would be carried on their backs.

2

The peculiar journey of four girls in cold-weather gear began with Omega’s solo journey.

After her soul had been sealed for a long time and she left the land that could be called the birthplace of her vessel, Omega set her sights westward to broaden her knowledge of the world—and magnificently went the wrong way.

On that mistaken road, along the way she met Colette and Palmyra, and without correcting the mistake they pushed straight on; there, after a bit of a dust-up with Noelle, they linked up—and that brings us to the present.

It was quite a varied lineup, and Omega rather liked it.

Omega: “An infamous me settled into a provisional vessel, a young girl who showed unprecedented aptitude for the “Beast Protection Bracelet,” and an Itinerant Preacher of the Gusteko Holy Church… hmm.”

“…”

Omega: “Palmyra, how would you like to be described? A runaway girl who abandoned life in a wealthy home, perhaps?”

Palmyra: “You really are an awful woman…”

Omega: “Ridiculous. That was perfect consideration on my part, thinking you’d hate something off the mark…”

Palmyra turned her grim face away from her, and Omega’s eyes widened in astonishment.

As Omega and Palmyra traded words, they were being carried according to the earlier proposal—Omega on Colette’s back, and Palmyra on Noelle’s. Though there were four of them, their footfalls on the snowy path sounded like two; ironically, the steps were brisker and crunchier than when all four had been sharing the burden.

Omega: “Look at how the scenery changes… Even visually, you can see just how much deadweight we were, so very clearly… Ah, I see.”

Palmyra: “…What is it.”

Omega: “I’ve figured out why you’re in a bad mood, and I get the feeling as well. It’s the footprints, isn’t it? It feels good to be the first to leave tracks on fresh snow where no one has stepped.”

Palmyra: “Shut up, you witch…!”

Insulted with a hateful look, Omega fell silent.

To Omega it was a simple fact, but to some people, calling someone a witch is a truly outrageous slur. If Palmyra is going to casually call someone a witch from now on, she will need to be admonished as an elder.

Omega: “Good grief, this must be the kind of trouble you don’t have to shoulder on a solo trip. One can feel the hardships he endured back in those days, surrounded only by problem children who were nothing but work.”

Colette: “Ah! Hey, Omega-chan, I see something over by that mountain!”

Gently shaking her head and sighing, Omega heard Colette’s voice brighten from directly beneath her.

The wide-eyed girl supported Omega’s rear with one hand while pointing across the snowfield with the other. She couldn’t see it. Not the something on the mountain—she couldn’t even see the mountain itself.

Noelle: “—It is there indeed. Well spotted, Colette-sama.”

Colette: “Ehehe, I have really good eyes. I’m sure it’s a town. Omega-chan, can we head there? Our water and food are almost empty.”

Omega: “Oh? After the limits of our stamina, now the limits of our water and provisions have come. Our journey is cutting it close in all sorts of ways, haha.”

Palmyra: “Is this the time to laugh? —Right now I just want to see faces other than yours. Straight there, straight there!”

Palmyra slapped Noelle’s shoulder to hurry her along, and Omega and Colette followed suit. The two sets of footsteps trudging through the snow, heave-ho, picked up pace more than when they’d had no destination.

Keeping that up, they aimed for the mountain that Omega still couldn’t see, but—

Colette: “—Huh?”

All at once, her previously steady steps slowed, and Colette let out a puzzled sound.

At her faltering tread, after she had been cheerfully pressing on across the snowfield, Noelle and Palmyra, coming from diagonally behind, also looked puzzled.

Palmyra: “What’s wrong, Colette? Did something happen?”

Colette: “Um, um, I don’t know either. Just that, somehow, I suddenly feel a really strong dislike for going any farther ahead, and so…”

Brow tails drooping, Colette herself was bewildered by the inexplicable discomfort. But her unhelpful explanation only left Palmyra confused as well.

Seeing her suffer from that unknowable resistance, Omega let out a small sigh and—

Omega: “Can’t be helped. —There.”

Colette: “Ah! The bad feeling is gone! Omega-chan, amazing!”

Omega: “Right? Then let’s move forward without worries—”

Palmyra: “Wait wait wait, hold it right there!”

With a light flick of her fingers, Omega had removed the cause of Colette’s distress. But now Palmyra had something to say, and they couldn’t get moving again.

Omega: “Palmyra, you and I are deadweight. It’s better to be aware of it.”

Palmyra: “I’m painfully aware of it! That’s not it—what did you just do?”

Omega: “Nothing much. I only removed the cause of Colette’s distress. Isn’t that right?”

Colette: “Yes, that’s right. Sorry for making us stop. I’m fine now!”

At Colette’s answer, chest puffed out, Omega shrugged upon her back. At their reactions, Palmyra opened and closed her mouth for a while, but—

Noelle: “Palmyra-sama, could this perhaps wait until we have moved to a warm place?”

Palmyra: “— I’m not wrong…!”

Noelle: “Yes, yes. I shall remember Palmyra-sama’s distress for you.”

It was unclear what they meant, but it seemed some feeling had been shared between Palmyra and Noelle. Noelle, who had only recently joined the three, and Palmyra, as wary as a cat—those two had taken a long time to warm up to each other, so it was good that something had finally given them a chance.

Colette: “Could it be, Omega-chan, that you climbed onto my back for that?”

Omega: “Hmm, I see. —Ah, yes.”

Colette: “Waa, amazing! You really can figure out anything!”

At Colette’s eyes sparkling bright, Omega said nothing, her gaze cool.

At any rate, there was no longer any trifling matter to stop Colette’s feet, Palmyra kept her nagging to herself, and with Noelle steadily pressing on, there was nothing to hinder their path.

Fortunately, once even Omega could make out the mountain she hadn’t been able to see, they could clearly see that there was a town of decent size at the mountain’s foot as it drew nearer.

The overt relief from the younger pair—Colette and Palmyra—spread, and even Noelle felt reassured to see the artificial townscape approaching.

Omega, too, felt somewhat relieved that her journey did not end here—but—

Omega: “—Hmm, how curious.”

That relief did not last very long.

As Omega murmured, accepting that fact with interest, Colette—who was carrying her—blinked and, with a bunny-like look so very her, said:

Colette: “Oh? Oh my? Where did Palmyra and Noelle go?”

3

Passing out of the snowy scenery, what lay around them changed from natural things to artificial things. With light-falling snow thinly accumulating on the ground underfoot on the streets, Colette wore a dazed expression.

Still carried on her back, Omega knit her thin brows as if suspicious.

Their water and food were spent; as for Omega and Palmyra in particular, their stamina had hit bottom as well—at last they had arrived at a town—judging by the sign at the entrance, its name seemed to be “Sylphoa”—but the very moment they stepped into Sylphoa’s streets, the two who should have been there vanished.

Colette: “Strange, it’s strange, Omega-chan. Where did the two of them go?”

Omega: “Indeed. The road up to here was a single straight path; it’s hard to say we got separated. And I wasn’t staring without blinking either, but up until five minutes ago, they should have been with us.”

Colette: “Even if not that long ago, we were together up to ten seconds ago! That’s why it’s mysterious!”

Searching for the two, Colette briskly darted her eyes about, looking all around. Being jostled so much on her back that her feet almost lifted off, Omega dropped to the ground before she could get tossed.

Steadying herself on legs that wobbled less than she'd thought, Omega also scanned the surroundings.

Omega: "Hmm, I thought they were a little behind us, but there's neither hide nor hair of them. Noelle is an Itinerant Preacher , so it wouldn't be strange if she moved at a speed too fast for the eye to follow, but…"

Colette: "But but, if she moved that fast, Palmyra would definitely let out a scream. Palmyra's a feisty one, but she has a jumpy side…"

At "jumpy side," a turn of phrase so very Colette-like, Omega's cheeks loosened.

For a moment, that gentle, laid-back choice of words overlapped in feeling with someone Omega knew, but—

Colette: "Eeeeh?!"

Before she could draw that feeling closer, Colette's astonished voice rang high.

When she turned to see what had happened, what Colette was staring fixedly at was Omega—no, Omega herself.

She wondered if perhaps Omega was so light that she hadn't felt putting her down—but that wasn't it. With fingers trembling, Colette pointed at Omega and—

Colette: "O-Omega-chan… Omega-chan with white hair!"

Omega: "White hair?"

At Colette's voice, unable to hide her surprise, Omega tilted her head in puzzlement.

Omega's current appearance was not her original one, but that of a provisional vessel—a girl with pink hair and slightly long ears.

Calling that white-haired would have to be Colette's mistake—.

Omega: "—No, that's not it. It really is white."

Gently drawing the hair that hung over her shoulder toward her, Omega confirmed her own white hair. But the change was not only in her hair. Looking closely, her line of sight was a little higher than usual. She had recently grown used to the eye level of this girl's body; her gaze now sat higher than that.

Namely—Omega patted her own face all over and was convinced.

Omega: "I see, so this is my original form."

In front of Omega, who murmured softly, Colette hastily nodded up and down. Cupping Colette's face in both hands, Omega yanked her in close.

In the eyes of the startled girl who squeaked "Euh," reflected there was a witch with white hair and well-formed features—without a doubt, it was the face of the "Witch of Greed," Echidna.

Colette: "Omega-chan, Omega-chan, if you suddenly grab my face in that form, it's very scary."

Omega: "Sorry. My desire to confirm got ahead of me. Even so, it's strange."

Colette: "Strange—as in, something's wrong? What is it?"

With her face still held in Omega's hands, her cheeks squashed, Colette asked.

Omega: "As I showed you and Palmyra before, I can manifest in my original form for a short time. However, right now I shouldn't be doing that. And furthermore—"

Colette: "Furthermore?"

Omega: "Even with me holding your face like this, it's unnatural that "Beast Protection Bracelet" isn't functioning."

On that point, Colette's eyes wavered with no apparent idea.

As for the Beast Protection Bracelet's function of launching an attack on a hostile to protect its owner—and moreover, regarding the matter of the user's consciousness being forcibly cut off during that—this had been kept from Colette.

However, regardless of whether the user was aware or unaware, Omega's sudden action should have met the conditions for activating the Beast Protection Bracelet. Unless, as with Palmyra, Colette had deeply opened her heart to Omega.

In any case, between the change in Omega's form and the Beast Protection Bracelet's failure to trigger—and in addition, the disappearance of Palmyra and Noelle—there were not many possibilities that came to Omega's mind from those three points.

If she were to examine them in order of likelihood—

Omega: "Colette, I want you to listen without being surprised."

Colette: "I'll try as hard as I can, but can I really not be surprised? I'm anxious."

Omega: "Then keep the surprise to a minimum, please. —Most likely, Palmyra and Noelle are safe. Rather, the ones in danger are you and me."

Colette: "Eeh."

Honoring Omega's request to keep the surprise to a minimum, Colette hurriedly clapped a hand over her mouth. Nodding at her honest attitude, Omega laid a hand on her own chest and looked around at the surrounding townscape.

And then, she said:

Omega: "It seems we're trapped in a world of dreams."

4

Palmyra: "H-Hey?! Colette! Omega! What happened to you two?!"

Startled by the sudden turn, Palmyra's voice flipped.

With her face drained and her profile taut with confusion and tension, the girl's field of view took in Colette and Omega collapsed on the street, where snow had piled up to the knees.

The very moment they passed through the town gate, the two of them suddenly dropped like puppets whose strings had been cut.

Jumping down from Noelle, who had been carrying her, Palmyra flipped over Colette and Omega, who had pitched forward into the snow. Both had their lids closed, as if they were asleep.

Palmyra: "But if you just suddenly fall asleep like that, that's some scary illness…!"

In a panic, Palmyra shook Colette's shoulder and slapped Omega's cheek to try to wake them. But the two had no reaction, as if dead; she was about to strike Omega with a harder open-handed slap when Noelle seized her hand.

Palmyra: "Noelle! Let go! I have to wake them up—"

Noelle: "I understand how you feel, but I believe slapping and shaking will only render Omega-sama pitiable."

Palmyra: "Then! …Then what are we supposed to do?"

Even when she tried to wrench free, Noelle's hand didn't budge. Sapped by that arm strength, Palmyra faltered and asked what Noelle thought. What on earth had happened to the two who wouldn't wake no matter how she called or hit them?

But instead of answering Palmyra's words, Noelle quietly looked around and—

Noelle: "It is too quiet."

Palmyra: "Hah? What are you even—"

Noelle: "Even if it is in the middle of falling snow, to enter a town and not hear a single human voice is—"

At Noelle’s words, with one finger raised, Palmyra held her breath and looked around.

Palmyra: “…”

Indeed, just as Noelle said, there wasn’t a single human voice or sound of life to be heard from the surroundings.

Setting aside the outlier that was sleeping Colette, Noelle should also excel in sight and hearing. If even Noelle couldn’t notice anything, then of course Palmyra had no chance of noticing either.

Palmyra: “But what does that even matter? More importantly, right now Colette and the others are—”

Noelle: “Palmyra-sama. It is possible that the townsfolk are in the same state.”

Palmyra: “The same… eh?! Don’t tell me, you—”

Startled rigid, Palmyra looked from Colette in her arms and Omega half-buried in the snow to the town where not a single soul was in sight, then—

Palmyra: “You mean everyone in town is asleep like Colette and the others?!”

Noelle: “We have no proof, but there is that risk.”

When Noelle slowly shook her head, her long braided golden hair swayed with the motion. Drawn by that gleam, Palmyra involuntarily swallowed.

An unfathomable situation—if it extended not only to Colette and the others, but to the entire town.

Palmyra: “That would be way beyond us to handle… No, I mean, what about us? Why aren’t we like those two? Isn’t that strange?”

Noelle: “I believe it is most likely due to my constitution.”

Palmyra: “Your constitution…?”

Noelle: “Yes. I am an Itinerant Preacher —one who has undergone the special training necessary to travel various lands to spread the teachings of the Gusteko Holy Church. Among that is also the engraving of formulae that repel sorceries and hexes from outside.”

Pressing down the swell of her ample chest beneath her cold-weather gear and the garb of a teacher, Noelle answered.

Her explanation spoke of a world Palmyra could not even imagine, and yet Palmyra could not accept it at face value.

Palmyra: “But that only explains why you could block it, right? It has nothing to do with me.”

Noelle: “Since I was carrying you, Palmyra-sama, I believe whatever interference Omega-sama and Colette-sama received was repelled together with me.”

Palmyra: “S-Such a coincidence…”

In other words, their fates diverged depending on whether one was on Colette’s back or Noelle’s. Drawing the unlucky option out of two choices sounded very much like Omega—if one wanted to put it that way—but—

Palmyra: “…”

A completely different, unpleasant feeling tightened around Palmyra’s chest.

Noelle: “Palmyra-sama?”

Palmyra: “…It’s nothing. More importantly, I’ve calmed down a little. …Hey, you’re an Itinerant Preacher , and you were taught methods for solving problems when terrible things happen, right? Then do you also know what to do when your traveling companions suddenly fall asleep and won’t wake up?”

Noelle: “Even the Holy Church’s teachings do not anticipate situations in such concrete terms. However, it is not as though we cannot meet your wishes at all, Palmyra-sama.”

Palmyra: “What does that… mean?”

Just as Palmyra was about to ask what she meant, it came—sooner than anything from Palmyra or Noelle, or from the two sleeping girls, there was an overture from another direction to move the situation along.

Man: “—To think that just when someone enters the town, there’d be two girls not asleep. What a surprise.”

Palmyra: “—!”

Suddenly, a man’s voice came from outside the town, and Palmyra stifled a scream as she turned around. In her view stood a tall, short-haired man with refined features.

A young man in his mid-twenties with dark-brown hair and lightly tanned skin raised a hand to Palmyra and Noelle, showing a somewhat friendly smile.

He hadn’t rushed them at once to attack; speaking up could be taken as a sign of goodwill—but—

Palmyra: “I don’t buy it. I’ve heard men can lie with a straight face if it’s to get a woman to like them. Noelle, tie him up.”

Man: “Hey, hey, hey! That’s a pretty extreme household creed! You there, miss—could you tell your companion something about this?!”

Noelle: “I find this level of caution desirable. When a journey is undertaken by women alone, one can never be too careful.”

Man: “I’ve got no allies! Cut me some slack here. —You there, miss, you’re in the same line of work, aren’t you?”

Finding one raised hand insufficient for greeting, the young man raised his other hand as well to show he meant no fight, then slightly lowered his tone and winked at Noelle.

Palmyra grew all the more wary of the young man, thinking it the gesture a man uses to chat up a woman in a tavern—but it wasn’t the gesture so much as the words that piqued her interest.

Noelle: “The same line of work, you say? Then you are…?”

Man: “Gusteko Holy Church. I serve as a Temple Knight, sister.”

As he spoke, the young man opened the front of the cloak covering his body with his raised right hand, showing the silver gleam beneath—the beautiful armor he wore—to establish his identity.

At Noelle’s reaction—eyes widening slightly—even Palmyra, who knew little of the Church, understood the young man was not lying.

Man: “—Zank Metley. A Temple Knight dispatched under the Holy Church’s authority to hunt the heresy lurking in this town of Sylphoa. Pleased to meet you, yeah?”

And with that, the young man—the Temple Knight, Zank Metley—winked again.

5

Zank: “Honestly, at first I was thrown for a loop. I mean, I thought the Blessing of Crowd-Warding was airtight, and then it gets broken.”

Palmyra: “Crowd-Drawing? Crowd-Warding?”

Noelle: “Blessing of Crowd-Warding… Just before entering the town, Colette-sama came to a stop, did she not. That unpleasant feeling Colette-sama felt then was precisely that.”

With question marks practically floating over her head, Palmyra heard Noelle bring up what had happened before they entered the town.

Hearing it, Palmyra went, “So that was…,” then cocked her head.

Palmyra: “Wait. Noelle, how can you tell that right away just from being told?”

Noelle: “Because I saw with my own eyes that Omega-sama broke the Blessing.”

Palmyra: “So that incomprehensible stunt Omega pulled back then was that…!”

While on Colette’s back after her steps had halted, Omega had severed the “Blessing” with nothing more than a flick of her finger.

As an Itinerant Preacher and one who knew how formidable the Gusteko Holy Church’s “Blessings” were, even Noelle—who was not easily perturbed—had to be impressed.

That said, it seemed to be an easy matter for Omega, who serenely calls herself a witch.

Zank: “Man~, having it get broken by a little miss like that does knock your confidence… Even so, back in training I was one of the ones praised as having a knack for receiving Blessings.”

With his shoulders slumping, Zank hung his head as he looked at Omega, who had been moved off the snow.

Palmyra regarded the sight with suspicion, but Noelle thought his claim was likely true.

Blessing of Crowd-Warding is, in other words, a barrier to keep outsiders from entering.

Omega broke the Blessing at a spot a fair distance from the town, and Sylphoa was not small in scale. Being able to lay a Blessing that could encompass it whole would mark one out as the upper crust even among Temple Knights.

At the very least, it was beyond comparison with Noelle, who was poor in the talent for receiving “Blessings.”

Palmyra: “But still… you said you were hunting heresy, right?”

Setting Noelle’s musings aside, Palmyra addressed Zank thus.

Palmyra, unexpectedly a girl with steady nerves, also wasn’t from the Holy Kingdom, which helped her feel no diffidence toward Zank. In principle, to the common folk of Gusteko, Temple Knights were beings up in the clouds, with scant chances to encounter them.

Zank answered the unusual girl's attitude in an easy tone, "Hm?"

Zank: "Yeah, that's right. It's under the Holy King's Holy Will. Ideally, I'd have wrapped it up before you ladies dropped by the town, but—"

Noelle: "—And the result of failing to do so is the plight of this town, is it?"

Zank: "I've got no comeback. Truth is, we're in a situation where the other side is a step ahead."

Palmyra: "The other side… the heretic who put Colette and Omega to sleep…"

With a hand to her mouth, Palmyra murmured with a severe look.

In Palmyra's head, she was surely picturing a dreadful "heretic" that threatened the entire town.

Noelle: "However—just because a Temple Knight is dispatched does not mean the opponent is always a mighty entity. Natural disasters and lifesaving—Temple Knights have various roles."

Palmyra: "Ah, really? No wonder…"

Zank: "Hey, hey, hey, are you maybe looking at me and feeling convinced? Sure, compared to "Blessings" my practical skills are so-so, but I'm still a Temple Knight. I've got confidence in my arm!"

Palmyra: "But you haven't defeated the town's heretic, have you."

Zank: "Sis! This little miss is ruthless!"

Noelle: "Palmyra-sama is like this with everyone. More importantly…"

Fixing her gaze on Zank, who was being taken lightly by a younger girl, Noelle paused once, white breath puffing. Drawing their attention thus, she went on to ask:

Noelle: "Crucially, what sort of party is this heretic lurking in the town?"

Zank: "…"

Noelle: "To plunge a whole town into sleep is no easy feat. Enveloping the town with the "Blessing" you laid is extraordinary as well, Zank-sama, but…"

Zank: "A trick beyond even that. I get it—I'm of the same opinion. To say something even scarier: in fact, I wasn't the first Temple Knight dispatched for this heretic hunt."

Zank's shrug and light tone nearly made Noelle misjudge the gravity for a moment.

Indeed, Palmyra, not versed in the Holy Kingdom's affairs, looked as if she didn't grasp the gravity, but Noelle was different. Even within the Gusteko Holy Church, only a very few are permitted to bear the title of Temple Knight, and she knew that every last one possessed exceptional might.

If Zank was the follow-up, then the Temple Knight dispatched earlier had fallen into the heretic's hands as well.

Zank: "You get that this is a dicey case now? So, while we were buying time with a Blessing of Crowd-Warding until the heretic-hunt plan was ready—"

Palmyra: "We just waltzed in and broke it, and showed up…"

At last understanding, Palmyra sighed, and Zank nodded, "That's how it is." With the general facts grasped, Noelle and her three companions were pure outsiders.

Barging into a Temple Knight's operational area could be called a blood-drainingly rash act.

Zank: "That's how it is. Sorry, but I'd like you ladies to leave the town. Once the heretic-hunt is finished, the little misses who were put to sleep should wake up. So—"

Palmyra: "Sure, we'll leave it to you… Like I'd ever say that. The ones asleep are our own, you know? Telling us to just leave them —”

Arms folded, Palmyra started to show a bold expression of refusal. But she couldn’t get the words of refusal out to the end. Before she could finish, she had peered into Zank’s eyes.

Zank: “Hey, hey, hey, that’s not right, little miss. —I went and carefully, politely, laid out our side of things. I said it, didn’t I? The Holy Will.”

Zank’s words flowed smoothly, as if scolding—tsk-tsk, without a hitch. While the look on his face carried an affable smile, the light in his eyes deepened. Not just his expression but his tone, too, took on a certain pressure, changing into something that smothered rebuttal.

Peered at by those eyes, a squeak of “hi” slipped from Palmyra’s throat before she knew it. But heedless of her frightened reaction, Zank brought his face even closer and—

Zank: “It’s the Holy Will. To go against it—are you a heretic, little miss?”

Noelle: “—Zank-sama, she is not a follower of the Holy Church.”

Zank: “Then it’s all the more strange. With an Itinerant Preacher right there, why hasn’t she become a believer? Miss, you’re not fulfilling your duty, are you.”

Unable to stand it, Noelle stepped in front of Palmyra, and Zank’s aim turned toward her.

To be frank, it was a painful topic for Noelle. The Itinerant Preacher ’s role is to preach the Gusteko Holy Church’s teachings across the land and increase the number of believers by even one more. Yet Noelle had never taught the Church’s teachings to Omega, Colette, or Palmyra. If she were called unfit as an Itinerant Preacher , she had a string of conduct she could not rebut.

Aware of that, Noelle couldn’t retort; Zank furrowed his brows and turned his gaze elsewhere. Leaving Noelle and Palmyra, he turned his steps toward Omega and the others.

The two who had been put to sleep and were about to be buried in snow had been moved under an eave with a roof, and Zank now stepped toward them.

And—

Zank: “I get you’re worried about your little companions, but leave the rest to us—”

Palmyra: “Hey! Don’t touch Colette and the others!”

As Zank reached his hand toward the two lying there, Palmyra came to her senses and rushed to stop him.

Forgetting her earlier fear, Palmyra leapt out from behind Noelle to protect Omega and Colette and clung to Zank’s arm. At that, Zank’s profile hardened.

In that instant, Noelle thought, This is bad, but did not take further action—because what followed was not by Noelle, but by the sleeping Colette.

Zank: “—Gah?!”

In the same instant, a thudding impact like flesh being punctured rang out, and Zank’s body was hurled far across the snow.

His heel skidded along the street; shaking the arm that had taken the blow, Zank grimaced in pain. What had sent the Temple Knight flying was the unbelievable leg strength of a delicate girl—still asleep, Colette had struck Zank to protect Palmyra.

As Colette sprang nimbly to her feet, the austere bracelet on her right arm flashed.

Colette: “—rrrrrrr.”

Letting out a beastlike growl, Colette shielded Palmyra and Omega behind her. At Colette’s actions and transformation, Zank’s eyes went wide, and then—with his face suddenly emptied of agitation—

Zank: “That power, it isn’t something granted by the Holy King. — It’s heresy.”

In a quiet voice with frozen emotion he said as much; the very moment he did, Palmyra moved at once. She slapped the shoulder of the growling Colette, then hugged the body of the nearby dozing Omega and—

Palmyra: “Colette! Pick me up and run!”

At once, Colette whirled and hoisted Palmyra, who was embracing Omega. With strength unthinkable for a slender girl she carried the two, leaping into the snowy townscape. With outlandish leg power she kicked off the building walls, vaulted to the rooftops, and sped away in one go.

Zank: “Tch, I can’t let them—”

Noelle: “You should not go any further!”

Sliding in front of Zank as he moved to give chase, Noelle spread both arms to stop him. At Noelle’s act he clicked his tongue, and Zank’s baleful gaze pierced her.

Zank: “Why obstruct me? Is an Itinerant Preacher siding with a heretic?”

Noelle: “That is not the case. If you pursue recklessly, you will be in danger. Further, your objective is the heretic who put the town to sleep… they are a separate matter.”

Zank: “—Heresy is heresy. If you’re telling me to let it go, I can’t listen to that, you know?”

Noelle: “I am not telling you to overlook it. I am saying there is an order of priorities.”

Meeting Zank’s sharp gaze looking down at her, Noelle straightened her back and faced him. By feel alone, the presence of Palmyra and the others flying away was already beyond a distance she could track. Noelle did not have it completely figured out either, but the performance of the “Beast Protection Bracelet” on Colette’s arm was high, certainly something fitting for the Gusteko Holy Church to designate “heretical.”

For the Church does not tolerate guardians or strange abilities whose logic cannot be explained by “Blessings.”

Noelle: “Let me say this: whether they belong to heresy has not yet been determined. I am in the midst of ascertaining it. If you—”

Zank: “Ascertaining, huh. That also sounds like the excuse of a lapsed sister.”

Noelle: “In that case, shall we cross blades here? There is also the possibility you will be unable to fulfill the Holy Will—but is that what you want?”

With blue eyes narrowed, Noelle showed a stance that would not yield a step. Zank did not relax his pursuit, but at that rebuttal he knit his brows and, after being silent for only a few seconds—

Zank: “If you’re going to go that far, fine, I get it. Surely mutual ruin is the outcome that most betrays the Holy Will. But in that case, you’ll be helping with the town’s heretic-hunt too, miss.”

Saying so, he raised both hands, and the menace vanished from Zank’s manner in a flash.

Seeing Zank switch back to the air of a good-natured young man, Noelle also relaxed her shoulders and nodded, “I accept.”

On the matter of priorities, she had for the moment shifted Zank’s focus away from Omega and the others. It was only putting things off, but it should have been right to buy time to think.

—If it’s Omega, even if she has been put to sleep, she should bring about some kind of change.

Noelle: “—And so, concretely, just who or what is this heretic?”

With faith in the sleeping pink-haired witch in her heart, Noelle showed Zank an actively cooperative stance.

At that question, Zank went “Yeah,” a dark emotion again mixing in his eyes; but he turned it not on Noelle but toward the townscape of Sylphoa, and—

Zank: “What’s lurking is a wretched heretic who wields an art that interferes with peaceful sleep.”

6

Omega: “It’s only speculation, but you and I were probably put to sleep. The reason Palmyra and Noelle aren’t here is because they managed to avoid being put to sleep.”

Colette: “B-But, it’s strange. Why would it be like that? Is it because Omega-chan and I are a bit more sleepyheads than Palmyra and the others?”

Omega: “Well, roughly speaking, that’s fine.”

Releasing the hands that had been cupping Colette’s face, Omega stroked her own white hair. Flustered by a form she’d seen before but wasn’t used to seeing, Colette glanced restlessly around.

According to Omega, this was inside a dream seen while sleeping, but—

Colette: “Ah, wait, Omega-chan. But even if you and I fell asleep together, isn’t it very strange that we’d see the same dream together?”

Colette had thought before that, when she had a pleasant dream, it would be nice if she could see the same dream together with a close friend—but she’d never heard of it actually being possible.

Dreams seen while sleeping should, whatever they are, belong only to oneself.

Omega: “You’re right, Colette. Which means this world is an exception to that common sense about dreams, and the one who set this up is an out-of-the-ordinary practitioner.”

Colette: “Auu… an exception, an exception. I see.”

Omega: “Most likely, by now in the reality outside the dream, Palmyra and the others are desperately carrying our bodies that have fallen asleep. I hope they’re not forcing themselves in an attempt to wake us.”

Colette: “I’m sure it’ll be fine. Palmyra and Noelle-san are kind. But still, making the two of them worry worries me a lot. My chest is starting to ache and ache.”

Omega: “Hmm, that’s a grave situation. —Oh.”

In front of Colette, who was pressing a hand to her chest, the thinking Omega lifted her face. Colette immediately understood what Omega had reacted to.

They were standing at the entrance to a town called Sylphoa—and in the townscape visible from there, more and more people going to and fro began to appear one after another.

Colette: “Waa, waa, Omega-chan! So many people! Who are they?”

Omega: “I see. Those are probably the original residents of this town… but if they aren’t “reproductions,” then this becomes quite the story.”

Colette: “—?”

Omega: “It might be that all those many people are in the same situation as we are.”

Not understanding Omega’s murmur, Colette tilted her head, then made her eyes round at that easy-to-grasp explanation. Even to Colette’s eyes, there were far more than a hundred or two hundred people in the town. If all of them were the same as Colette and Omega, then outside the dream this would be a town where everyone had fallen asleep.

Colette: “Ah, but if it’s nighttime, maybe it wouldn’t be that different?”

Omega: “We reached the town in broad daylight, so it wouldn’t be something as simple as day–night reversal. It’s fascinating that in the present day there remains a practitioner of dream arts of this caliber.”

Colette: “Dream arts…?”

Omega: “The set of laws that interfere with dreams. You could call it a category a bit different from magic or sorcery. Arts that manipulate such laws existed even four hundred years ago, when I was alive.”

Saying so, Omega slowly stepped into the town. Hurrying after that taller-than-usual back, Colette asked:

Colette: “Omega-chan, is it safe to go inside? If we’re going to get outside the dream, wouldn’t it be better to head out of the town?”

Omega: “I don’t know how strong a dream world the caster constructed, but if there are as many entrances as residents, then the origin point is the town. In this dream world, nothing besides this town likely exists.”

Colette: “I don’t understand at all, I don’t understand. Honestly, Omega-chan!”

Even if she wanted to stop her and have a talk, Omega wouldn’t halt her steps. When Colette peered at her face from the side, Omega’s black eyes were sparkling, and her pace was quick.

Omega herself called herself a know-it-all who wanted to know everything. It was a situation so full of mystery that Colette’s head was spinning, but to Omega it seemed nothing but fun.

Riding that momentum, Omega spoke to one of the passersby—a middle-aged man.

Omega: “Hey, could you spare us a moment? We’re folks who came from outside the town.”

Man: “…Huh? Sorry, but I’m working. If you want to talk, ask someone else.”

Omega: “Come now, don’t say that. By the way, what’s your job? Is there anything I can help with?”

Man: “Don’t say strange things. My job is… my job is… huh? My job is…”

The man with his hat pulled low paused to think in the middle of answering Omega’s question. Narrowing her eyes at the man as he began muttering to himself like that, Omega addressed someone else.

But the woman she spoke to next, and then the boy after her, and even the elderly person after that—all thought hard at Omega’s question, and the conversation couldn’t continue.

